The Boston Bee, in a recent number, thus remarks: "We were not a little amused, at the phonographic exhibition the other evening, by a story told by Professor Church with reference to the difficulty he had to meet in learning to pronounce the English language, whose barbarous orthography is so totally at variance with its elementary sounds. The gentleman said that the first time he visited London he caught a violent cold on the passage. He had studied English at the French university, and made about as much progress in giving correct sounds to the words as a green Yankee might be supposed to do in the French tongue with nothing but a dictionary for a guide. Some things he knew, and some he didn't know; one thing, however, he felt, and that was, he needed a physician to cure his cold. Accordingly he sent for one, and in the interim, wishing to show Dr. John Bull how well he could talk English, he took Nugent, and found that "toux" was "cough," in the latter tongue.

"C-o-u-g-h," spelled the Frenchman, "how they spell that? I have him! P-l-o-u-g-h is plow, and c-o-u-g-h is cow. I got a cow!"

The doctor entered, and began to feel his pulse, where all seemed right.

"I have no trouble there," said Professor Church, putting his hand to his throat. "I got a cow!"

"Well, I am not a cow-doctor," said the surgeon, indignantly. "Why do you send for me to see your cow?"

"But you will not understand me," said the disconcerted Frenchman: "here is my cow—here!" and he thumped his breast in desperation.

The doctor shook his head, as though he thought him demented. The professor again had recourse to his dictionary, thinking, if he got the precise locality of his cow, the doctor would understand. Accordingly he looked for the word "chest," and found the first definition to be "box;" then shouting as loud as he could, he exclaimed,—

"Now you understand: I got a cow in my box!"

The doctor burst into a roar of laughter, and the poor Frenchman almost died of chagrin. When the professor told the story, the audience were perfectly convulsed, and fully appreciated the gentleman's enthusiasm, as he concluded by saying, "If your phonography can do any thing for my cow, it will be a great thing."

1472. ROBINSON CONFOUNDED.

When the late King of Denmark was in England, he very frequently honored Sir Thomas Robinson with his company, though the knight spoke French in a very imperfect manner, and the king had scarcely any knowledge of English. One day, when Sir Thomas was in company with Lord Chesterfield, he boasted much of his intimacy with the king, and added that he "believed the monarch had a greater friendship for him than any man in England." "How report lies," exclaimed Lord Chesterfield; "I heard no later than this day, that you never met but a great deal of bad language passed between you."

1473. A BLUNDER

A Frenchman, wishing to speak of the cream of the English poets, forgot the word, and said, "do butter of poets." A wag said that he had fairly churned up the English language.

1474. YOUR BIRTH.

We often laugh at our neighbors' mistakes; they might have smiled at our own, had they overheard a passenger in one of our steam packets, who wished to inform a French lady on board that her "berth was ready," make the communication as follows: "Madame, votre NAISSANCE est arrangée."

1475. IMPUTED GLUTTONY.

At a table d'hôte, at Cologne, a manufacturer from Sheffield, who spoke nothing but English, was seated next to a German lady, who did not speak it at all. Handing her a plate of peaches, he said, "Have a peach, marm?"

"Nein," (no,) replied the lady.

"Nine!" exclaimed he, staring with astonishment, first at her and then at the other guests at the table. "Why, marm, there's only six in the dish; but there they are for you," at the same time rolling them upon her plate.

§ 149. AMUSING AND COMICAL.

1476. BEST SORT OF LANGUAGE FOR THE PULPIT.

The vicar in a certain village in England, returning one Sunday from church, was thus accosted by an opulent farmer: "Well, doctor," said he, "you be gwain on pretty well now; but why dount ye gi' us now and tan a scrap of Latin?" "Why," said the vicar, "if I had thought it had been your wish, I should have had no objection, but for one thing—I am afraid you would not understand it." "That," said the other, "is nout to you; an we do pay vor the best, we oft to ha' the best."

1477. RETORT COURTEOUS.

A Russian lady, being engaged to dinner with M. de Talleyrand, at that time minister for foreign affairs, was detained a full hour by some unexpected accident. The famished guests grumbled, and looked at their watches. On the lady's entrance, one of the company observed to his neighbor in Greek, "When a woman is neither young nor handsome, she ought to arrive betimes." The lady, turning round, sharply accosted the satirist in the same language: "When a woman," said she, "has the misfortune to dine with savages, she always arrives too soon."

1478. HUMOROUS SAYINGS OF CHARLES V.

Charles V., who spoke fluently several European languages, used to say, that we should speak Spanish with the gods, Italian with our female friends, French with our male friends, German with soldiers, English with geese, Hungarian with horses, and Bohemian with the devil.

1479. DR. JOHNSON CAUGHT IN HIS OWN NET.

Macklin and Dr. Johnson disputing on a literary subject, Johnson quoted Greek. "I do not understand Greek," said Macklin. "A man who argues should understand every language," replied Johnson. "Very well," said Macklin, and gave him a quotation from the Irish.

1490. THE MONK AND THE HEBREW BOOK.

A monk, being charged with making a catalogue of a library, meeting with a Hebrew book, put, "Item, a book which begins at the very end."

1491. THE TWO SIGN PAINTERS.

"There came here, from the good city of Baltimore, some twenty-eight years ago," says the Norfolk Herald, "a painter of signs, who professed to know a thing or two. He took very readily, for in truth he was no mean artist. Upon every sign that he painted, he put his 'imprint,' Sprague, (that was his name,) to which he added the Latin word fecit. The unlearned, 'the little boys and all,' supposing the two words to constitute the name of the painter, accosted him every where as Mr. Fecit, Mr. Sprague Fecit, until the poor fellow, annoyed to death by the ridicule which his little learning had brought upon him, ran away. He was some years after succeeded by another knight of the brush, from the same goodly city, who was something of a humorist, and disposed to throw Latin, like physic, to the dogs. He, too, painted many signs for us, but was content to boast of his work in plain English, as might be seen by this modest inscription — 'Coppuck did it.'"

1492. NO JOKE.

"A Frenchman and myself," says a writer, "were talking together on the deck of a steamboat. A third person stood by, and laughed whenever we laughed. Supposing, of course, that he understood the subject, I appealed to him, and what think you was the man's reply? 'Why, Lordy massee, I couldn't make out what nary one o' you was talkin' about!' And, by the way, this reminds me of a still better joke. A Spaniard and I were once talking together in Spanish, when a third person burst out laughing, and honestly avowed that she didn't believe either of us understood the other. Nor did she mean it for a joke; no, indeed; the excellent woman was perfectly serious. She looked upon our Spanish conversation as a sort of gibberish manufactured for the occasion, by mutual consent."

1493. ART OF POPULAR TEACHING.

Bulwer, in his England and the English, hits off the literary charlatans most aptly. We extract the passage for the amusement of our readers.

"At present a popular instructor is very much like a certain master in Italian, who has thriven prodigiously upon a new experiment on his pupils.

"J — was a clever fellow, and full of knowledge which nobody wanted to know. After seeing him in rags for some years, I met him the other day most sprucely attired, and with the complacent and sanguine air of a prosperous gentleman.

"I am glad to see, my dear sir," said I, "that the world wags well with you."

"It does."

"Doubtless your books sell famously."

"Bah, no bookseller will buy them. No, sir, I have hit on a better metier than that of writing books. I am giving lessons in Italian."

"Italian! why, I thought when I last saw you, that you told me Italian was the very language you knew nothing about."

"Nor did I, sir; but as soon as I had procured scholars, I began to teach myself. I bought a dictionary. I learnt that lesson in the morning which I taught my pupils at noon. I found I was more familiar and explanatory, thus fresh from knowing little, than if I had been confused and over-deep by knowing much. I am a most popular teacher, sir; and my whole art consists in being just one lesson in advance of my scholars."

1494. THE KING'S EXAMINATION OF A SOLDIER.

It was customary with Frederic the Great, whenever a new soldier appeared in his guards, to ask him three questions, viz.: "How old are you? How long have you been in my service? Are you satisfied with your pay and treatment?"

A smart young soldier, born in France, who had served in his own country, desired to enlist in the Prussian service. His figure caused him to be immediately accepted; but he was totally ignorant of the German dialect, and his captain, giving him notice that the king would question him in that tongue the first time he should see him, cautioned him at the same time to learn by heart the three answers that he was to make the king. Accordingly, he learned them by the next day; and as soon as he appeared in the ranks, Frederic came up to interrogate him; but he happened to begin upon him by the second question, and asked him, "How long have you been in my service?" "Twenty-one years," answered the soldier. The king, struck with his youth, which plainly indicated that he had not borne a musket so long as that, said to him, much astonished, "How old are you?" "One year, an't please your majesty." Frederic, more astonished still, cried, "You or I must certainly be bereft of our senses." The soldier, who took this for the third question, replied firmly, "Both, an't please your majesty." "This is the first time I was ever treated as a madman at the head of my army," rejoined Frederic. The soldier, who had exhausted his stock of German, kept silent, and when the king questioned him again, to penetrate into this mystery, the soldier told him in French, that he did not understand a word of German; at which the king laughed heartily, and advised him to learn that language, and exhorted him to perform well his duty.

A Frenchman, (probably the same one who was so much puzzled by the various acceptations in which the Anglo-Saxons use the word "box," after spending some time in England, thought he had acquired a very tolerable acquaintance with the English tongue; but he lamented to several friends, at a dinner party, "Dare is von vord you use every day in so many significations, of which I cannot saisir l'acceptation — it is te vord tattletoo." In reply to the remarks of his English hearers that no such word was known to them, monsieur, with much animation, proceeded to explain: "Ah, you say it is not Anglais, and 'nom de nom,' you use it constamment! Suppose von child drink glass of watere, de nourrice tell him, 'Tattletoo, dear!' Suppose two friends take von promenade, ven von is fatigue, he say to de oder, 'Tattletoo.' Suppose, in the Parliement, un membre say some ting trop ridicule, de assembly make the chambre retentir with vociferation of, 'Vell, I am blessed, tattletoo!' Suppose, enfin, von individu has suffisant of any ting, and vant no more, he say, 'Tattletoo!' Corbleu, you always use de word a tousand times a day, and encore you say it is not Anglais! I am not von ignorant of Anglais, Sarcristie; and yet je voudrais bien savoir, I should like to know what you mean by tattletoo, tattletoo!"

Here arose an altercation; none of the Englishmen knew what tattletoo was; all denied ever having heard it before. Johnson, Walker, &c., were produced to prove the non-existence of the word in "Angle-land," whilst Webster was conclusive authority for its non-manufacture in Yankee-land. In short, the fire was so heavy against monsieur that, with many exclamations of, "Comment, messieurs, you doubt my honneur; you dispute de dam tattletoo, ven I say it is Anglais. Ciel de Dieu!" He was already fumbling for his card case, with evident intentions of regarding the question as a personal matter, when the master of the house politely changed the subject, passed the wine, and, ringing the bell, told the servant to put a few coals on the fire. Pat, as usual, without reflection, threw a small cart load of fuel into the grate, and was on the point of adding a second discharge from the capacious coal scuttle, when his master cried out,

"Stop, stop, Pat, that'll do." "Voila!" burst out the Frenchman, triumphantly, "Voila, encore une fois, votre sacre tattletoo! You tell de garçon to put coal on de fire, and den you say tattletoo! tattletoo! Mon Dieu, que vous etes des fous, ven you tell me for dat tattletoo is not Anglais! Tattletoo!"

1486. THE BISHOP AND THE KING.

Soon after Dr. Porteus, the late Bishop of London, was advanced to the metropolitan see, he went to court, where his majesty addressed him in French, which the prelate not understanding, the king then spoke to him in Italian, with which language he was likewise unacquainted. "What, my lord," said the king, "don't you understand the polite languages?" "O my liege," replied the bishop, "the acquisition is not necessary, as the devil is as much mortified by a reproof in plain English as any other dialect."

1487. THE GERMAN PRONUNCIATION OF THE ENGLISH TH.

Many Germans, it is well known by all who are conversant with their pronunciation, substitute the sound of d for that of th. A gentleman from Leipsic, being asked how old he was, replied, he was dirty, (thirty;) and when asked the age of his wife, he answered, she was dirty-two, (thirty-two.)

§ 150. MISCELLANEOUS.

1488. GOBAT IN A STRAIT PLACE.

This gentleman was a missionary to Abssyinia, and the event which follows occurred at Massowah, a port of the Red Sea.

"Finding myself," he says, "surrounded by the young Arabs, I availed myself of the opportunity to converse with them on religion. and I soon had occasion to be convinced of their infidelity. In Arabic there are two different words to designate an unbeliever. One of these words is inoffensive, but the other, which is gafer, corresponding nearly with our word 'infidel,' is habitually employed by the Mohammedans against Christians, while a Christian is punished with death if he applies it to a follower of Mohammed. During my residence in Abyssinia, the Arabic language had become less familiar to me, so that inadvertently, while conversing, I used the to my opinion. I then asked him how he would call such as understood the passage in the other manner. 'They are gafer,' he replied, using the terrible word I had myself employed. The crowd immediately dispersed in silence, and I was delivered."

1489. LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU STUDYING LATIN.

Lady Mary Wortley Montagu was a great admirer of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and that was one of the chief reasons that set her upon the thoughts of stealing the Latin language. Mr. Wortley was the only person to whom she communicated her design, and he encouraged her in it. She used to study five or six hours a day, for two years, in her father's library, and so got that language, whilst every body else thought she was reading nothing but novels and romances.

that I had committed a fault; and, though it was only a fault of grammar, I felt a great repugnance at dying for such an offence. I cried to God to deliver me by whatever means he thought best. Converseing on the way with my accusers, I caught them giving to a passage in the Koran a sense which I knew to be false. I was contriving in this way to justify the expression I had used. At this moment we perceived an old sheik, much venerated for his sanctity, and we agreed to take him for umpire. But for fear they would misrepresent, I called to him at a distance, 'How do you understand this passage in the Koran?' He interpreted it agreeably

A distinguished divine of our country, a few years since, was publishing a work now justly celebrated, and in one of his notes had written some three pages of ridicule upon a certain passage in Plato, but when reading the proof recollected that Plato had expressly said, "Let no man unacquainted with geometry try to learn of me." He therefore carried the proof to a mathematician, and asked him to correct it. The geometer, having read it, said, "You, reverend sir, are a better Greek scholar than I. but in your translation, you have made Plato blunder geometrically, which I know Plato never did. I would translate the passage thus," &c.

The divine, on examining the geometer's new translation, struck out two and three quarters pages ridicule, and carried back a quarter of a page, directed against this sentence of Plato: "The more rapid motion is, the slower it will appear." "Sir," said the geometer, "you have omitted one word of the Greek—the article. Plato says the motion, and is speaking of the planets. The more rapid a planet's real motion eastward, the slower it will appear to move westward." The divine acknowledged his error, and the great work appeared unblemished by ridicule of Plato.

1491. A CLASSICAL REBUKE.

Professor Wines advertised a gratuitous lecture at Newark on the Theory of Government. At the hour of commencement, the audience being very small, the professor administered the following neat, classical, and pungent rebuke:—

"Plato, when delivering lectures in Athens, sometimes had Aristotle for his only hearer; on which occasion he was accustomed to proceed with his lecture as usual, remarking that when he had Aristotle for a hearer, he had the better half of Athens. On the same principle I may congratulate myself on my audience this evening."

1492. LECTURES AND READING.

The connection between public lectures and a taste for reading was strikingly illustrated at Manchester, England. A Mr. Dawson having lectured there on Cromwell, every book on the subject in the libraries of the town was out at the same time. A similar result was witnessed in Boston, in 1840, while Professor Silliman was delivering his course of Lowell Institute lectures on geology. There was a general stampede for works on this science, and it is said that at one time it was almost impossible to purchase a text-book of geology in any of the Boston bookstores.

§ 152. LETTERS, POSTAGE, AND POST-OFFICES.

1493. EXCUSE FOR A LONG LETTER.

In a postscript to one of the Provincial Letters, Pascal excuses himself for the letter being so long, on the plea that he had not had time to make it shorter.

1494. CURIOUS MISTAKE OF LADY G.

George Selwyn once affirmed in company that no woman ever wrote a letter without a postscript. "My next letter shall refute you," said Lady G. Selwyn soon after received a letter from her ladyship, when, after her signature, stood "P. S. Who is right now, you or I?"

1495. THE BIG CHINESE LETTER.

The most singular document that was ever addressed to our government, is from the Emperor of China to the President of the United States. It consists of a roll seven feet one inch long by two feet eleven inches wide. The writing is on a field of plain yellow silk, with a margin of silk of the same color, embroidered in gold thread. The letter is in two languages, (Chinese and Manchu Tartar,) in characters of large size, and in perpendicular columns, which are separated in the middle by the imperial seal, which is composed of Chinese characters, enclosed in a cartouche about three inches square. This roll is enclosed in a wrapper of yellow silk, (yellow being the imperial color,) which again is enclosed in a round box covered with yellow silk, and closed by two fastenings of jade stone; and finally is enclosed in an oblong square box of rosewood, and padded and lined with yellow silk.

The whole purport of the letter is, that the emperor has been much pleased that a mutual interchange of friendly relations has taken place. He concludes his letter in these words: "Now, bound by perpetual amity and concord, advantages will accrue to the citizens of both nations, which, I trust, must certainly cause the president also to be extremely well satisfied and delighted."

1496. TRAVELS IN SEARCH OF JOHN SMITH.

Some time since, Mr. Turner, a solicitor of Maitland, posted a letter which he intended for Mr. John Smith, solicitor, O'Connell Street, Sydney, but which he accidentally directed "London." Now, Smiths are exceedingly plentiful in London, and John is by no means an uncommon prefix. O'Connell Streets, however, are not very plentiful, but it appears there are some; and there are three John Smiths residing on O'Connell Streets, each of whom opened it, and finding it was not intended for them, returned it. In Dublin there are several O'Connell Streets, and lots of John Smiths, and to Dublin it was sent; but after all the Smiths in the law list had been "tried," to use the technical expression, without the right one being found, it was determined to send the letter back to the writer, indorsed with the certificate of seventeen different postmen, that they all had searched in vain for the person for whom it was intended. Last week it arrived in Sydney, and was sent to Maitland, when the mistake was discovered, and Mr. John Smith, O'Connell Street, received his letter, together with four one-pound notes enclosed in it.

1497. BRIEF AND PITHY CORRESPONDENCE.

Many years since we saw a brief and pithy correspondence, officially published as having taken place between J. K. Paulding, while secretary of the navy, and an agent of the department in the State of Alabama. We give its substance from memory.

Dear Sir: Please inform this department by return of mail how far the Tombigbee River runs up. Respectfully, J. K. Paulding, Sec'y, &c.

Mobile.

Hon. J. K. Paulding. Dear Sir: In reply to your letter, just at hand, I have the honor to say that the Tombigbee River don't run up at all.

I have the honor to be. &c.,

Our word for it, Paulding has never written a tale or invented a fable, whose wit has so much disturbed the reader as the truthful reply of his clerk. A long letter might have so mystified the Tombigbee, that, like the Niger, no traces of its source could ever be developed. Indeed, it is said, a "soft answer turneth away wrath;" but an answer can be soft and short too.

1498. LACONIC.

A remarkable example of the laconic style has recently taken place, which would put Leonidas and his countrymen to shame. An Edinburgh Quaker sends to a brother Quaker in London a sheet of letter paper, containing nothing whatever in the writing way, save a note of interrogation, thus, (?); his friend returned the sheet, adding for a sole reply a 0. The meaning of the question and answer is as follows: "What news?" "Nothing."

1499. WHAT LETTERS SHOULD BE.

Many people, and well-informed people too, sit down to write a letter, as if they were about to construct a legal document, or government despatch. Precision, formality, and carefully worded and rounded periods are considered all essential, even though the epistle be intended for a familiar friend. Others appear to be writing for publication, or for posterity, instead of making epistolary communication a simple converse between friends. Away with such labored productions. A letter on business should be brief; to a friend, familiar and easy. We like Hannah More's ideas upon the subject. She used to say, "If I want wisdom, sentiment, or information, I can find them better in books. What I want in a letter is the picture of my friend's mind, and the common sense of his life. I want to know what he is saying and doing; I want him to turn out the inside of his heart to me, without disguise, without appearing better than he is, without writing for a character. I have the same feeling in writing to him. My letter is therefore worth nothing to an indifferent person, but it is of value to the friend who cares for me." She added, that "letters among near relations were family newspapers, meant to convey paragraphs of intelligence, and advertisements of projects, and not sentimental essays."

1590. NEW MODE OF DEFRAUDING THE POST-OFFICE.

A London paper says, "A canny citizen of the name of Macdonald, whose good lady had gone into Yorkshire on a visit to her friends, made the following simple arrangement with her, as to the mode of communicating intelligence without incurring postage: If he was well he was to send her a newspaper, addressed 'Mrs. Macdonnell,' and if otherwise, 'Mrs. Macdonill,' in which latter case she was to return without a moment's delay."

1501. ADVENTURES OF A LETTER.

The Stamford Mercury says, "Some time since, a letter, containing bills of exchange amounting to £5000, was posted in London, addressed to a banking firm in Boston. The word 'Lincolnshire' being omitted from the address, the letter was put in an American bag, and crossed the Atlantic, to Boston, in Massachusetts. No owner being found, brother Jonathan honestly returned the letter, and on Tuesday morning last it reached its proper destination, Messrs. Gee & Co.'s, Boston, Lincolnshire, after twice traversing the Atlantic, and having caused a journey to London, and a long and anxious correspondence."

1502. RESULTS OF PENNY-POSTAGE IN ENGLAND.

A gentleman recently returned from Europe states that the influence of the penny postage system throughout Great Britain, in improving the intellectual, moral, and social habits of the humbler classes, is truly wonderful; that thousands are learning to write for the pleasure of corresponding with their friends. The effect of reducing postage from a shilling to a penny, in increasing the number of letters, is well illustrated by the anecdote of a person writing to his son in London; "Remember, my dear boy, to write often, for every letter saves me eleven pence."

1503. M. DE VELAYER'S ORIGINAL POST-PAID ENVELOPE.

M. Piron tells us that the idea of a postpaid envelope originated, early in the reign of Louis XIV., with M. de Velay, who, in 1653, established, with royal approbation, a private penny post, placing boxes at the corner of the streets for the reception of letters, wrapped up in envelopes, which were to be brought to offices established for that purpose.

M. de Velay also caused to be printed certain forms of billets, or notes applicable to the ordinary business among the inhabitants of great towns, with blanks, which were to be filled up, by the pen, with such special matter as might complete the writer's object. One of these billets has been preserved to our times by a pleasant misapplication of it. Pelisson, Mde. de Sévigné's friend, and the object of the bon-mot, that "he abused the privilege which men have of being ugly," was amused at this kind of skeleton correspondence; and under the affected name of Pisandre, (according to the pedantic fashion of the day), he filled up and addressed one of these forms to the celebrated Mademoiselle de Scuderi, in her pseudonyme of Sappho. This strange billet-doux has happened, from the celebrity of the parties, to be preserved, and is still extant—one of the oldest, we presume, of penny-post letters, and a curious example of a prepaying envelope, as well as a new proof of the adage, that "there is nothing new under the sun."

LIBRARIES.

§ 153. COLLECTION OF LIBRARIES.

1504. THE ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY.

HE Egyptian Ptolemies founded the vast library of Alexandria, which was afterwards the emulative labor of rival monarchs: the founder infused a soul into the vast body he was creating, by his choice of the librarian Demetrius Phalereus, whose skilful industry amassed from all nations their choicest productions. Without such a librarian, a national library would be little more than a literary chaos. His well-exercised memory and critical judgment are its best catalogue. One of the Ptolemies refused supplying the famished Athenians with wheat until they presented him with the original manuscripts of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides; and in returning copies of these originals, he allowed them to retain the fifteen talents which he had pledged with them as a princely security.

1505. FIRST PRIVATE LIBRARY IN ENGLAND.

Richard de Bury, Bishop of Durham, chancellor and high treasurer of England so early as 1341, perhaps raised the first private library in that country. He purchased thirty or forty volumes of the Abbot of St. Albans for fifty pounds' weight of silver. He was so enamored of his large collection, that he expressly composed a treatise on his love of books, under the title of "Philobiblion," an honorable tribute paid to literature, in an age not literary.

1506. SCANTY LIBRARIES OF EARLY TIMES.

There probably was a time when there existed no private libraries in the kingdom of England, nor any save the monastic: that of Oxford, at the close of the thirteenth century, consisted of "a few tracts kept in chests." In that primeval age of book-collecting, shelves were not yet required. Royalty itself seems to have been destitute of a royal library. It appears, by one of our recently published records, that King John borrowed a volume from a rich abbey, and the king gave a receipt to Simon, his chancellor, for "the book called Pliny," which had been in the custody of the abbot and convent of Reading. The Romance of the History of England, with other volumes, have also royal receipts. The king had either deposited these volumes for security with the abbot, or, what seems not improbable, had no established collection which could be deemed a library, and, as leisure or curiosity stimulated, commanded the loan of a volume.

The borrowing of a volume was a serious concern in those days, and heavy was the pledge or the bond required for the loan. One of the regulations of the library of the Abbey of Croyland, Ingulphus has given. It regards "the lending of their books, as well the smaller without pictures, as the larger with pictures:" any loan is forbidden under no less a penalty than that of excommunication, which might possibly be a severer punishment than the gallows.

Long after this period, our English libraries are said to have been smaller than those on the continent; and yet, one century and a half subsequently to the reign of John, the royal library of France, belonging to a monarch who loved literature, Jean le Bon, did not exceed ten volumes. In those days they had no idea of establishing a library; the few volumes which each monarch collected, at great cost, were always dispersed by gifts or bequests at their deaths; nothing passed to their successor but the missals, the heures, and the offices of their chapels. These monarchs of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, amid the prevailing ignorance of the age, had not advanced in their comprehension of the uses of a permanent library beyond their great predecessor of the ninth, for Charlemagne had ordered his books to be sold after his death, and the money given to the poor.

Among the early French kings there were several who were lovers of books, and were not insensible of the value of a studious intercourse, anxious to procure transcribers and translators. A curious fact has been recorded of St. Louis, that, during his crusade in the East, having learned that a Saracen prince employed scribes to copy the best writings of philosophy for the use of students, on his return to France he adopted the same practice, and caused the Scriptures and the works of the fathers to be transcribed from copies found in different abbeys. These volumes were deposited in a secure apartment, to which the learned might have access; and he himself passed much of his time there, occupied in his favorite study—the writings of the fathers.

1507. MUNIFICENCE OF BODLEY.

Camden, under the year 1598, tells us, that Bodley, being disengaged from affairs of state, about the year 1578, set himself a task which would have suited the character of a crowned head—the promotion and encouragement of learning; for he began to repair the public library at Oxford, and furnished it with new books. It was founded by Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, but through the iniquity of the times was, in the reign of Edward VI., stripped of all the books; but Bodley, having made the choicest collection, from all parts of the world, of the most valuable books, partly at his own cost, and partly by contributions from others, he first stocked, and afterwards left it so well endowed at his death, that his memory deserves to be cherished amongst men of worth and letters.

1508. THE FIRST ITALIAN LIBRARY.

"The first public library in Italy," says Tiraboschi, "was founded by a person of no considerable fortune; but his credit, his frugality, and fortitude were indeed equal to a treasury. This extraordinary man was Nicholas Niccoli, the son of a merchant, and in his youth himself a merchant; but after the death of his father, he relinquished the beaten roads of gain, and devoted his soul to study, and his fortune to assist students.

At his death he left his library to the public; but his debts being greater than his effects, the princely generosity of Cosmo de' Medici realized the intention of its former possessor, and afterwards enriched it by the addition of an apartment, in which he placed the Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldaic, and Indian manuscripts.

1509. SCHILLING'S CHINESE LIBRARY.

For the great additions of Chinese literature made before 1850 to the library of the Academy of Science at St. Petersburg, the society is chiefly indebted to Baron Schilling, of Cronstadt. That learned man, whose active and intelligent mind embraced at once so many various objects, — so many different branches of science, — was deeply versed in the literature of the nations of Central Asia and China. His taste for this class of erudition induced him to form a truly valuable collection of Chinese books. He maintained a regular correspondence with all the most learned Orientalists in Europe, by which means he was made acquainted with the progress of Chinese literature in England, Germany, and France. One of the great objects he had in view was to multiply the most valuable monuments of Chinese literature, so as to render them more generally accessible.

The infinite number of graphic signs employed in the Chinese language presents an almost insurmountable obstacle to any attempt to multiply books written in that language by means of printing in movable characters. Baron Schilling conceived that the process of lithography was peculiarly adapted to the reprinting of Chinese books, and he resolved to try the experiment. His first productions in this way were the beautiful editions of the Chong-Yong, and the Ta-Hio, which obtained the unqualified admiration of all the learned Orientalists of Europe. In the opinion of M. Remusa, as expressed in one of his reports to the French institution, Baron Schilling's lithographic reprints may fairly rival, in point of correctness and elegance, the most perfect productions of the imperial printing establishment at Peking. Nevertheless, the obstacles to the employment of lithography in Chinese printing were so exceedingly great, as to induce Baron Schilling to apply himself with earnest assiduity to the discovery of some new and more available process. The types and other apparatus which he invented in furtherance of that object, and some specimens of printing preserved in the Asiatic museum of the Russian Academy of Science, are calculated to afford great assurance to those who may be disposed to prosecute the task which the learned and ingenious Schilling left unfinished.

In 1830, when Baron Schilling's Chinese library was purchased by the czar, it consisted of two hundred and fifty-two works, comprised in three hundred and twenty-three volumes, and one thousand eight hundred and thirteen packets. Among these works were several of the best dictionaries of the Chinese and Mandchoo languages; a magnificent edition of the works of the Chinese classic writers, forming twenty-four volumes and one hundred and eighty-five packets; the celebrated Geographical Dictionary, in six languages; two copies of the Mandchoo translation of the celebrated romance King-Ping-Mei; together with several other very remarkable works.

No sooner had Baron Schilling disposed of this first collection than he determined on forming a second. A Russian mission being about to proceed to Peking, he seized the opportunity of travelling in the suite of the mission as far as the frontiers of China, where he, for some time, fixed his residence. By means of the peculiar channels of communication he was enabled to establish, the best literary productions of China were transmitted to him from the capital by every opportunity that presented itself. The consequence was, that he soon found himself in possession of a collection of books in the Chinese, Mandchoo, Mongol, and Thibet languages, certainly unequalled, either in Europe or in Asia. Among the most valuable Chinese works in the collection was a superb copy of the Statistical Description of China, already alluded to, consisting of no less than three hundred packets; the Decrees of the Emperor Yong-Tehing, in three hundred packets; a magnificent edition of the works of the Chinese classic authors, in twenty-four volumes, each volume being contained in a wooden box; a great number of maps and prints; the most celebrated romances of the Chinese; and, finally, several works published by the missionaries, and printed by the Chinese method. All the above works are held in high estimation by amateurs.

1510. LITERATURE BY MEASURE.

A steward wrote to a bookseller in London, for some books to fit up his master's library, in the following terms: "In the first place I want six feet of theology, the same quantity of metaphysics, and near a yard of old civil law, in folio."

1511. THE LITERARY SERGEANT.

Learning is not always associated with greatness, nor do the owners of books always know their value. Rimsky Korzadoff, a sergeant in the guards, was suddenly raised to be the favorite of Catharine II. of Russia. He thought it would be proper to have a library, and sent for a bookseller of St. Petersburg, to whom he gave an order for this necessary portion of the furniture of his house. "What books," inquired the bookseller, "would you please to have?" "That is your business," replied Rimsky; "you understand that matter better than I do. You know the proper assortments which I have destined a large room to receive. Let there be large books at the bottom, and smaller and smaller up to the top, in the manner in which they are placed in the library of the empress." "How did you contrive to find a sufficient quantity of large books for the purpose, since folios are out of fashion?" asked a friend of the bookseller. "O, I went to my warehouse, and drew out some old German commentators on the Bible, and writers on jurisprudence, where they had lain in quires ever since they were sent to my predecessor for a bad debt. I took care to put them in new coats; and the showy outsides of very many of them, as is common in the world, must be a passport to any deficiency within."

Lucian composed a biting invective against an ignorant possessor of a vast library—like him who, in the present day, after turning over the leaves of an old book, chiefly admires the date.

Lucian compared him to a pilot who was never taught the science of navigation; to a rider who cannot keep his seat on a spirited horse; to a man who, not having the use of his feet, wishes to conceal the defect by wearing embroidered shoes, but, alas! he cannot stand in them. He ludicrously compares him to Thersites, wearing the armor of Achilles, tottering at every step, leering with his little eyes under his enormous helmet, a hunchback raising the cuirass above his shoulders. "Why do you buy so many books?" he says; "you have no hair, and you purchase a comb; you are blind, and you will have a grand mirror; you are deaf, and you will have fine musical instruments. Your costly bindings are only a source of vexation, and you are continually discharging your librarians for not preserving them from the silent invasion of the worms, and the nibbling triumphs of the rats."

1513. HAPPY RETORT.

A young woman went into a library in School Street, Boston, and asked for Man as He Is. "That is out," replied the librarian, "but we have Woman as She Should Be."

1514. CHARLES LE SAGE.

Charles le Sage, in 1373, had a considerable library, amounting to nine hundred volumes. He placed this collection in one of the towers of the Louvre, hence denominated the "Tour de la Librairie," and intrusted it to the custody of his valet de chambre, Gilles Malet, constituting him his librarian.

This Gilles Malet, who was also the king's reader, had great strength of character. He is thus described by Christine de Pise: "Souverainement bien lisoit, et bien pontoit et entendens homs estoit," (He read sovereignly well, with good punctuation, and was an understanding man.) He has recorded a personal anecdote of him. One day a fatal accident happened to his child, but such was the discipline of official duties, that he did not interrupt his attendance on the king at the usual hour of reading. The king, having afterwards heard of the accident which had bereaved the father of his child, observed, "If the intrepidity of this man had not exceeded that which nature bestows on ordinary men, his paternal emotion would not have allowed him to conceal his misfortune."

Charles le Sage was no common personage; for, great as was the care and ingenuity required, he drew up an inventory, with his own hand, of his royal library. In that early state of book-collecting, volumes had not always titles to denote their subjects, or they contained several in one volume; hence they are described by their outsides, their size, and their shape, their coverings, and their clasps. This library of Charles V. shines in extreme splendor, with its many-colored silks and velvets, azure and vermeil, green and yellow, and its cloths of silver and of gold, each volume being distinctly described by the color and the material of its covering. This curious document of the fourteenth century still exists.

This library passed through strange vicissitudes. The volumes in the succeeding reigns were seized on, or purchased at a conqueror's price, by the Duke of Bedford, regent of France. Some he gave to his brother Humphrey, the Duke of Gloucester, and they formed a part of the rich collection which that prince presented to Oxford, there finally to be destroyed by a fanatical English mob; others of the volumes found their way back to the Louvre, repurchased by the French at London. The glorious missal that bears the regent's name remains yet in England, the property of a wealthy individual.

1515. DR. BARRETT'S ODDITIES.

He frequently asked a long question, the answer to which was a single word, and in the middle of his question he would stop to ask the name of the person he addressed, though ever so familiar to him. In this way he asked Corvan, —

"What was the name of the philosopher who first taught — your name, if you please?"

"Domine Corvan."

"Right; — what is the name of the —"

"Corvan, I say, sir," was again the answer.

"Hout! man," said the irritated examiner; "who ever heard of Corvan a philosopher?"

Another peculiarity of the same kind was interrupting what he said with some irrelevant interpolation, and then again taking up the word where he had broken off. Thus, when he was librarian, he used frequently to interrupt the sentence by reading the title page, or description of a plate, in some book that lay on the table before him. One day, a gentleman, wishing to find a book in the library for which he had searched in vain in its proper place, inquired from Barrett how he should get it. Barrett referred him to Dr. Wilson, the other librarian. He said he had already applied to him, and that he could not tell him where it was. Barrett, turning over the leaves of a book that lay before him, answered, —

"Dr. Wilson is — the Universal History — a very odd fellow: he puts up all the books — the Tower of Babel — a place where nobody can find them."

On one occasion, a gentleman at Clontarf, who wished to become tenant of some college lands, invited him, when bursar, with some other fellows, to dinner. He had not been so far from college since his childhood. It was then that, passing by Lord Claremont's beautiful demesne, and seeing the sheep grazing, he asked what extraordinary animals they were, and when told, expressed the greatest delight at seeing, for the first time, live mutton. As he passed along the shore, the seat attracted his peculiar admiration. He described it as "a broad, flat superficies, like Euclid's definition of a line expanding itself into a surface, and blue, like Xenophon's plain covered with wormwood."

The college bell, at that time, hung in a high steeple in the front square, and, when it tolled at night-roll, was distinctly heard across the bay, at Clontarf, like Milton's curfew, —

"Over some wide-watered shore, Swinging slow with sullen roar."

After dinner, when the guests, as was then usual, began to drink to the health of favorite ladies, the doctor was asked by his host for his belle. "I'll give you," said he, "the college bell; for I'm told she's finer than big Tom of Lincoln." This was not meant as a play upon words, which he could not comprehend, and never attempted in his life; the bell he always called "she," from the same vulgarity that makes a gun or a ship of the feminine gender.

1516. M. DE BAUTRU AND THE KING.

M. de Bautru told me one day, that during his embassy to Spain he went one day to visit the library in the Escorial, and saw at once, from the conversation which he had with the librarian, that he was an extremely ill-informed and incompetent person for the situation. He was afterwards introduced to the king, with whom he talked of the beauties of the palace, and of the choice which he had made of a librarian. He told him he had immediately perceived that he was no common person, and that, in his opinion, his majesty would do well to make him superintendent of his finances. "Why so?" said the king. "Sire," said Bautru, "as he has taken so little from your books, it is probable he may take as little from your finances."

1517. LITERARY RAT.

A gentleman, who was requested to value the books of a deceased clergyman, found, to his surprise, that many of the most valuable works were imperfect, having leaves torn out. Upon asking a servant, who had lived with the divine some years, if he knew any thing of the circumstances, he replied, after some hesitation, "Why, to be sure, sir, I did now and then tear a leaf out, but I never went twice to the same book, so it couldn't be of much consequence."

1518. GREGORY VII. BURNING THE LIBRARY.

Inflamed with the blindest zeal against every thing pagan, Pope Gregory VII. ordered that the library of the Palantine Apollo, a treasury of literature formed by successive emperors, should be committed to the flames. He issued this order under the notion of confining the attention of the clergy to the Holy Scriptures. From that time all ancient learning which was not sanctioned by the authorities of the church has been emphatically distinguished as profane, in opposition to sacred. This pope is said to have burnt the works of Varro, the learned Roman, that St. Austin should escape from the charge of plagiarism, being deeply indebted to Varro for much of his great work, the City of God.

1519. THE PINELLIAN LIBRARY.

The great Pinellian library, after the death of its illustrious possessor, filled three vessels, to be conveyed to Naples. Pursued by corsairs, one of the vessels was taken; but the pirates finding nothing on board but books, they threw them all into the sea. Such was the fate of a great portion of this famous library. National libraries have often perished at sea, from the circumstance of conquerors transporting them into their own kingdoms.

1520. VALUABLE LIBRARY.

The late King of Prussia caused to be bound in large volumes his whole private fortune, which consisted of bank notes. It was contained in an apartment called the private library of the king, and on each book, in letters of gold, was inscribed, "Posthumous Memoirs of the King of Prussia, for his Son alone." The present king made himself master of the contents of this library in about six months, and replaced the relics of his honored father by the works of Frederic the Great. The cabinet is certainly more intellectually filled, and perhaps the departure of the last king's Memoires is one of the reasons why Prussia is about to receive a constitution.

1521. ARISTOTLE'S WORKS.

Sad and interesting is the fate of Aristotle's library; he who by a Greek term was first saluted as a collector of books. His works have come down to us accidentally, but not without irreparable injuries, and with no slight suspicion respecting their authenticity. The story is told by Strabo in his thirteenth book. The books of Aristotle came from his scholar Theophrastus to Neleus, whose posterity, an illiterate race, kept them locked up without using them, buried in the earth. One Apellion, a curious collector, purchased them; but finding the manuscripts injured by age and moisture, conjecturally supplied their deficiencies. It is impossible to know how far Apellion has corrupted and obscured the text. But the mischief did not end here: when Sylla, at the taking of Athens, brought them to Rome, he consigned them to the care of one Tyrannio, a grammarian, who employed scribes to copy them; he suffered them to pass through his hands without corrections, and took great freedoms with them. The words of Strabo are strong — "Ibique, Tyrannionem grammaticum iis usum atque (ut fama est) intercidisse, aut invertisse." He gives it indeed as a report; but the fact seems confirmed by the state in which we find these works. Averroes declared that he read Aristotle forty times over, before he succeeded in perfectly understanding him: he pretends he did at the one and fortieth time; and to prove this he published five folios of commentary.

1542. A LITERARY IGNORAMUS.

An ignorant man, boasting of his library of French books, said that he had several volumes, but he was surprised that all the French productions were the works of one Tom; Tom. being an abbreviation of the French word Tome, meaning volume.

1523. SHELLEY'S LIBRARY

Shelley's library was a very limited one. He used to say that a good library consisted not of many books, but a few chosen ones; and being asked what he considered such, he said, "I'll give you my list — catalogue it can't be called: the Greek Plays, Plato, Lord Bacon's Works, Shakspeare, the Old Dramatists, Milton, Goethe and Schiller, Dante, Petrarch and Boccaccio, Machiavelli and Guicciardini, — not forgetting Calderon; and last, yet first, the Bible." It is not meant that this was all his collection. He had read few English works of the day; scarcely a novel except Walter Scott's, for whose genius he had sovereign respect; Anastasius, by which he thought Lord Byron profited in his Don Juan; and the Promissi Sponsi. In speaking of Hope and Manzoni, he said, "that one good novel was enough for any man to write, and he thought both judicious in not risking their fame by a second attempt."

1524. ROBERT BURNS.

Robert Burns was one day in a very fine private library of books, which the proprietor seemed to value more for their outward show than for their internal value. Burns, after some few hours' conversation with the owner, wrote the following couplet, and left it on the library table: —

"Free through these books, ye maggots, seek your winding,
But, for the owner's sake, O, spare the binding."

1525. A DICTIONARY LIBRARY.

The apt reply of a distinguished scholar of our own country to a benefactor of the institution of learning with which he was connected, when an increase of the library was the subject of discussion, deserves perpetual remembrance.

"We need more books," said the professor.

"More books!" said the merchant; "why, have you read through all you have already?"

"No. I never expect to read them all."

"Why, then, do you want more?"

"Pray, sir, did you ever read your dictionary through?"

"Certainly not."

"Well, a library is my dictionary."

1526. AN EXTENSIVE LIBRARY.

There was once in a certain part of India such a voluminous library, that a thousand camels were requisite for its transport, and a hundred Brahmins had to be paid for the care. The king felt no inclination to wade through all this heap of learning himself, and ordered his well-fed librarians to furnish him with an extract for his private use. They set to work, and in about twenty years' time they produced a nice little encyclopædia, which might have been easily carried by thirty camels. But the monarch found it still too large, and had not even patience enough to read the preface. The indefatigable Brahmins began therefore afresh, and reduced the thirty cargoes into so small a substance, that a single ass marched away with it in comfort; but the kingly dislike for reading had increased with age, and his servants wrote at last on a palm leaf, "The quintessence of all science consists in the little word Perhaps! Three expressions contain the history of mankind: They were born; they suffered; and they died. Love only what is good, and practise what you love. Believe only what is true, but do not mention all that which you believe."

LINGUISTS AND PHILOLOGISTS.

§ 157. BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES, PROGRESS IN STUDIES.

1527. MIRANDULA.

Mirandula was born in the year 1463; and, if we may trust to the accounts handed down to us by some of his contemporaries, was even in early youth such a prodigy of learning as the world has not often seen. His memory was prodigious. He never forgot any thing he had heard or read. It has been affirmed that, by the time he had reached his eighteenth year, he had made himself familiar with no fewer than twenty-two different languages; a story in which, as well as the similar one which certain ancient authors tell us of the famous Mithridates, King of Pontus, who is said to have spoken twenty-four languages fluently, there must be, we can hardly doubt, a very liberal allowance of the fabulous.

At the University of Bologna, which he entered at the early age of fourteen, Mirandula greatly distinguished himself not only by his uncommon powers of intellect and memory, but by an industry and application almost equally rare. His future ardor and success in the pursuit of literature, up to the period of his death, was altogether in accordance with this early promise. "I have, by assiduous and intense application," he writes to one of his friends, in his twenty-third year, "attained to the knowledge of the Hebrew and Chaldaic languages, and am at present struggling with the difficulties of the Arabic. Such are the achievements which I have ever thought, and still think, worthy the ambition of a nobleman." Mirandula's letters, which unfortunately form but a very small collection, are the most interesting productions of his pen we now possess. They breathe in every page both a literary enthusiasm that is quite inspiring, and a serenity and cheerfulness of heart, than which, adorned as it is by all the graces of a fervent devotion and a very high-toned morality, nothing can be more delightful. So precious were they wont to be esteemed, that in some of the earlier editions we find them entitled, "The Golden Epistles of the most learned, most noble, and most eloquent of Mortals." This inscription, which, seeming, as it does, to a modern taste, to partake somewhat of the pompous and extravagant, speaks at least the reverence and affection with which his own contemporaries regarded their admirable author.

1528. PROFESSOR WHITE.

White was a very extraordinary man, of great profundity as an Asiatic linguist. He was first discovered by the late Dean Tucker, working as an apprentice to a poor weaver, in a village either in Gloucestershire or Somersetshire. At this village, on a certain day, was to be a dinner party. The dean, strolling about before dinner, chanced to go into a poor weaver's shop. He took up a dirty, shattered Greek Testament. "How comes this here? who reads this book?" "Sir, my lad is always poring over such books." On speaking to the lad, he found him well versed in Greek and Latin. By appointment he waited upon the dean in the afternoon, who introduced him to the company. A collection was made for him. Tucker undertook the care of him, put him to school at Gloucester, and from thence sent him to Oxford. Here he gradually rose in academical success—followed of Wadham, professor of Arabic, canon of Christ Church, and Hebrew professor

1529. EUGENE ARAM

Eugene Aram, who was born in Yorkshire in the year 1704, only learned to read a little English in the school of his native village, and never afterwards had the benefit of any further instruction; yet, by his own exertions, he first qualified himself to teach all the common branches of education, including arithmetic and mathematics, and then proceeded, with an industry that has scarcely been surpassed, to make his way to the highest departments of learning. In a letter written to a clerical friend from York Castle, after his conviction, in which he gives an account of his life, he says, referring to the period when he was first engaged in study, thus at the same time teaching others and himself, "Perceiving the deficiency in my education, and sensible of my want of the learned languages, and prompted by an irresistible covetousness of knowledge, I commenced a series of studies in that way, and undertook the tediousness, the intricacies, and the labors of grammar. I selected Lilly from the rest, all which I got and repeated by heart. The task of repeating it all every day was impossible while I attended the school; so I divided it into portions, by which method it was pronounced thrice every week; and this I performed for years. Next I became acquainted with Camden's Greek Grammar, which I also repeated in the same manner, memoriter. Thus instructed, I entered upon the Latin classics, whose allurements repaid my assiduous and my labors. I remember to have at first hung over five lines for a whole day; and never, in all the painful course of my reading, left any one passage but I did, or thought I did, perfectly comprehend it. After I had accurately perused every one of the Latin classics, historians and poets, I went through the Greek Testament, first parsing every word as I proceeded; next I ventured upon Hesiod, Homer, Theocritus, Thucydides, and all the Greek tragedians. A tedious labor was this; but my former acquaintance with history lessened it extremely, because it threw a light upon many passages which, without that assistance, must have appeared obscure." There was scarcely any part of literature, indeed, with which Aram was not profoundly conversant. History, antiquities, heraldry, botany, had all been elaborately and extensively studied by him; but his favorite pursuit was the investigation and comparison of languages, with a view to the determination of their origin and connection. For this purpose, in addition to Greek, Latin, and French, he had studied with great attention several of the Oriental tongues, and all the remaining dialects of the Celtic. He had meditated, indeed, the compilation of a dictionary of the Celtic, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English, in which different languages he is said to have left behind him a list of about three thousand words, which he considered them to possess in common. Some of his observations upon this subject have been printed, and are creditable both to his ingenuity and good sense. The address, we may add, which he delivered on his trial in his own defence, is an extraordinary specimen of the curious learning with which his mind seems to have been stored. But he is a mournful example of high mental powers brought low by ill-regulated passions, and of the vanity and worthlessness even of talents and knowledge when separated from moral principle.

That wonderful scholar, Sir William Jones, who, in addition to great acquirements in various other departments of knowledge, had made himself acquainted with no fewer than twenty-eight different languages, was studying the grammars of several of the Oriental dialects up to within a week of his lamented death. At an earlier period of his life, when he was in his thirty-third year, he had resolved, as appears from a scheme of study found among his papers, "to learn no more rudiments of any kind, but to perfect himself in, first, twelve languages, as the means of acquiring accurate knowledge of history, arts, and sciences." These were the Greek, Latin, Italian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Hebrew, Arabic, Persian, Turkish, German, and English. When he was afterwards induced, however, from the situation he held in India, to devote himself more especially to Oriental learning, he extended his researches a great way even beyond these ample limits. In addition to the tongues already enumerated, he made himself not only completely master of Sanscrit, as well as less completely of Hindostanee and Bengalee, but, to a considerable extent, also, of the other Indian dialects, called the Thibetian, the Pali, the Phaluvī, and the Derī; to which are to be added, among the languages which he describes himself to have studied least perfectly, the Chinese, Russian, Runic, Syriac, Ethiopic, Coptic, Dutch, Swedish, and Welsh.

1531. TIBERIUS HEMSTERHUYTS.

Tiberius Hemsterhuys was born at Gröningen, in North Holland, February 1, 1685. His earliest studies were conducted in part by his father, who was a physician, and a man of cultivated taste. He appears to have been one of those precocious children, whom we look upon with fear and trembling, and who, if they survive childhood, not unfrequently sink down into a dull mediocrity. In his fourteenth year he joined the university of his native city, which was then rendered illustrious by the lectures of John Bernoulli, the prince of mathematicians, and the friend of Leibnitz and Newton. He is said to have confidently predicted the future fame of his young pupil, affirming that, in mathematical knowledge, he was without a rival in the university. The grateful scholar was wont to say, that Bernoulli had conferred upon him a divine gift. After he had spent some years in Gröningen, he went to Leyden, to enjoy the instructions of Perizonius, professor of history, eloquence, and Greek. As a proof of the high character which he had then acquired, it may be mentioned, that the curators of the university assigned him the duty of arranging the manuscripts in the library, which were then in a scattered state. From this mark of distinction, it was generally inferred, that he would succeed the aged Gronovius in the Greek professorship. The place was given, however, to Havercamp, not so much by the will of the public authorities, as by the exertions of some individuals, who feared that their own light would be eclipsed, if Hemsterhuys should be chosen.

In 1704, and in the nineteenth year of his age, Hemsterhuys went to Amsterdam, as a teacher of mathematics and philosophy in the Athenæum. Some persons, entering upon a profession of that nature, would have abandoned the pursuit of elegant learning. Hemsterhuys, however, did not confine his attention to his professional studies, but extended his researches over a large field, justly considering, that all the branches of science and literature are connected by a common bond.

About this time, an incident occurred, which turned the attention of Hemsterhuys more decidedly to the study of Greek literature. As a new edition of Julius Pollux was soon to be published at Amsterdam, inquiry was made for an editor who would supply certain deficiencies in the work. Application was made to Hemsterhuys, who, on the strong recommendation of Grævius, undertook the labor, and supplied a commentary, betraying marks of juvenility, indeed, but winning the applause of the scholars of Holland. In a short time, he received letters from Richard Bentley, the British Aristarchus, commending the labor bestowed upon Pollux, but containing emendations on the passages from the comic writers, where Pollux endeavored to support his position by examples. In correcting these passages, Hemsterhuys also had taken unwearied pains, fully aware that this was the main point for inquiry.

But when he had read the criticisms of Bentley, he at once saw that his own toil had been thrown away. Excessively mortified, he resolved to abandon Greek literature forever. For two months he did not touch a book in that language. Subsequent reflection, however, convinced him of the injustice of comparing his juvenile productions with those of a veteran scholar, and he resumed, with wonted cheerfulness, his Greek studies. But Bentley's admonition had such an effect, that he determined, before trusting himself to this dangerous precipice, to compass the whole circle of knowledge, and, especially, that he would make no further attempt in respect to the verses of the comic writers—the point where he had been criticized—until he had obtained a thorough insight into the various kinds of metres employed by the writers in question. As a guide and model in these investigations, he selected his great adviser himself, preferring him to all other critics, and not concealing his displeasure, if any one invidiously carped at the learning of a scholar whom he was able in no manner to rival.

With the design of adding to his stores of learning, he studied, with untiring energy, the ancient writers, beginning with Homer, the fountain of genius. Indeed, he so selected and disposed of his various knowledge, that whatever related to the genius of the two classical languages, to history, to the manners and customs of the people, or to the wisdom of the ancients, was put into a condition for ready use.

In ancient times, as is well known, mathematics and the various branches of philosophy were included in a course of liberal education. Classical usage, in this particular, was followed by the restorers of learning in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Soon afterwards, however, the circle of studies was much narrowed by the exclusion of mathematics and philosophy. The result was, that two parties were formed, who became thoroughly inimical to each other. The student of grammar, history, poetry, and eloquence looked down with contempt upon him who was plodding with lines and angles, or plunging into the depths of metaphysics. On the other hand, the pursuits of elegant literature found no favor with the disciples of Euclid and Aristotle. Hemsterhuys, as might have been expected, had no sympathy with these narrow prejudices. The study of geometry tends to withdraw the mind from sensible objects, and fix it upon those which are perceived by reflection. It also renders the intellect acute and discriminating. Who can doubt but that philologists, if disciplined in this manner, will possess a keener perception than such as have never drawn a diagram? Those who are acquainted with the writings or conversation of Hemsterhuys know how much benefit he derived from geometry. Whatever flowed from his lips, whatever he committed to writing, even in matters pertaining to criticism, at once revealed an intellect accustomed to the precise reasoning of exact science. He never laid down his premises incautiously; but, from well-known and admitted principles he proceeded to state, in an orderly manner, the inevitable inferences.

There is, moreover, another branch of mathematics, with which it is discreditable for a critic not to be acquainted. This is astronomy, particularly ancient astronomy, without a knowledge of which neither the Greek nor Latin poets, who drew thence so many of their ornaments, can be fully understood. The more thoroughly he endeavored to comprehend this science, the less could he refrain—though a mild and charitable judge of others—from making merriment with those modern interpreters of the classical poets, who, when an explanation is needed from ancient astronomy, come to a disgraceful stand, or fall into ludicrous mistakes.

Hemsterhuys was the more ardent in his study of philosophy as he was impelled to it by his natural inclinations. Indeed, he roamed at will over all parts of the field, now lingering in the sacred retreat of Pythagoras, then in the academy of Plato; at one time in the lyceum of Aristotle, at another in the porch of Zeno, or the gardens of Epicurus, gazing with admiration on many things which the vanity of the present age boastfully holds up as new discoveries. Most students of ancient philosophy either take a sip of it, or stay in the sunnier spots. But Hemsterhuys, in obedience to the promptings of genius, investigated metaphysics, the most difficult branch of all. Nothing can well be found more abstruse than the Parmenides of Plato, where he unfolds his doctrine respecting ideas. Once and again, he returned to the study of this dialogue, not desisting till, on the fourth perusal, he elicited the hidden sense. Difficulty did not blunt his curiosity, as is common; it only stimulated it. Not contented with the ancient philosophers, he connected the study of Leibnitz with Plato, Locke with Aristotle, and other modern authors with the ancient, so that one who discoursed with him on ancient philosophy might conclude that his reading was confined to that, but when modern philosophy was the theme of conversation, might suppose he had read nothing besides.

Hemsterhuys took special pains to apply the critical art to historical investigations, and, also, to excite his pupils to do the same, setting before them, as a model to direct their studies, the historian Polybius, the most severe historical critic among the extant ancient historians, and who was held in such admiration by Hemsterhuys, that he said he would give for a single lost book of his history a cart load of the homilies of the fathers.

He applied himself, however, not merely to the study of the classical historians, but he sought, by an examination of the wonders of ancient art, to sharpen his mind so as to perceive the elegance and beauty that are inherent in them. He studied nothing more eagerly, or intelligently, than the ancient gems, coins, vases, cameos, and statues, which the museum of his relative, James Wild, amply supplied. Such was his delicate appreciation of beauty and proportion, that he excelled most scholars in his accurate judgment of the paintings, statuary, and architecture of the day.

1532. DANIEL WYTTEBACH.

The friend and biographer of Ruhnken, and one of the most celebrated philologists of Holland, was Daniel Wyttbach. He caught the falling mantle of his master, and carried to the study of antiquity the same intelligence and the same irrepressible enthusiasm. His lectures and his writings have shed an enduring lustre upon the university where he taught, and upon his adopted country. He was born at Berne, in Switzerland, August 7, 1746. Two of his ancestors were teachers of the reformers, Zuingli and Leo Judas. His father was professor of theology, first at Berne, and afterwards at Marburg. His early education appears to have been conducted almost exclusively under the paternal roof. He was ten years of age when his father removed to Marburg. At the age of fourteen, he was admitted to the university of that place, where he spent the four following years. But his peculiar genius was not yet developed. The course of studies was very extensive, and ill fitted to a youth of the peculiar susceptibilities of Wyttbach. The professors, though estimable men, were not Gesners nor Heynes. Their instructions appear to have been communicated in a rigid and formal manner, and breathed little of the spirit of genuine scholarship. The elder Wyttbach was a man of excellent character, but somewhat stern, and without a particle of that genius which glowed in the bosom of his son. In the treatment of the religious feelings of that son he showed but little judgment or humanity. No wonder the youth sighed for deliverance. His history at this period is thus described, in the course of some directions, which he subsequently addressed to his pupils: "When I was in my eighteenth year, I had learnt about as much Greek as you have generally acquired after being with me four months. I had attended the lectures of the professors, both in literature and in the severer sciences, with no great advantage. I appeared to others to have made progress, but not to myself. I was weary of the toil. I wanted space to soar higher. I returned to my studies, and began to review them privately. Though I had advanced somewhat farther than I had gone when attending the lectures of the professors, yet it was in a manner which did not at all correspond to my expectations, and I gave it up in disgust. I proceeded from one study to another in the course, yet all were wearisome and repulsive; and yet, like one whose appetite is disordered, I was continually seeking for some intellectual food. I remembered the pleasure which I had enjoyed, when a boy, in the study of Greek. I searched for the books which I had formerly read. I took out of a corner Plutarch's Treatise on the Education of Boys, and read it once and again, with much effort, but little pleasure. Then I went over with Herodian, which afforded me a little more enjoyment, but was far from satisfying my mind. I accidentally found, elsewhere, Xenophon's Memorabilia. Ernesti's edition, which I had before known only by name. I was captivated with the indescribable sweetness of that author. The grounds of it I better understood afterwards. In studying this treatise, I made it a point never to begin a section without reperusing the preceding, nor a chapter or book without studying the preceding chapter and book the second time. Having, at length, completed the work in this manner, I again read the whole in course. It occupied me almost three months; but such unceasing repetition was most serviceable to me."

By the help of Ernesti's notes, Wyttbach acquired some skill in criticism, as well as bibliographical knowledge. He then determined to read the Greek authors in chronological order, and thus lay a foundation for the superstructure which he was intending to build by means of other branches of learning.

"I began upon Homer. When a boy, I had studied about a hundred lines of the first book of the Iliad. This book I finished in two months, reviewing it in the same manner that I had the Memorabilia. I continued the study of Homer more as a task than a pleasure. I did not yet recognize that divine genius. Many other youth, as I happen to know, have had the same experience. In consequence, I read Xenophon in connection with Homer, devoting the greater part of my time to his works. They were so easy to be understood, that I, as it

Tiberius Hemsterhuys was born at Gröningen, in North Holland, February 1, 1685. His earliest studies were conducted in part by his father, who was a physician, and a man of cultivated taste. He appears to have been one of those precocious children, whom we look upon with fear and trembling, and who, if they survive childhood, not unfrequently sink down into a dull mediocrity. In his fourteenth year he joined the university of his native city, which was then rendered illustrious by the lectures of John Bernouilli, the prince of mathematicians, and the friend of Leibnitz and Newton. He is said to have confidently predicted the future fame of his young pupil, affirming that, in mathematical knowledge, he was without a rival in the university. The grateful scholar was wont to say, that Bernouilli had conferred upon him a divine gift. After he had spent some years in Gröningen, he went to Leyden, to enjoy the instructions of Perizonius, professor of history, eloquence, and Greek. As a proof of the high character which he had then acquired, it may be mentioned, that the curators of the university assigned him the duty of arranging the manuscripts in the library, which were then in a scattered state. From this mark of distinction, it was generally inferred, that he would succeed the aged Gronovius in the Greek professorship. The place was given, however, to Havercamp, not so much by the will of the public authorities, as by the exertions of some individuals, who feared that their own light would be eclipsed, if Hemsterhuys should be chosen.

In 1704, and in the nineteenth year of his age, Hemsterhuys went to Amsterdam, as a teacher of mathematics and philosophy in the Athenæum. Some persons, entering upon a profession of that nature, would have abandoned the pursuit of elegant learning. Hemsterhuys, however, did not confine his attention to his professional studies, but extended his researches over a large field, justly considering, that all the branches of science and literature are connected by a common bond.

About this time, an incident occurred, which turned the attention of Hemsterhuys more decidedly to the study of Greek literature. As a new edition of Julius Pollux was soon to be published at Amsterdam, inquiry was made for an editor who would supply certain deficiencies in the work. Application was made to Hemsterhuys, who, on the strong recommendation of Grævius, undertook the labor, and supplied a commentary, betraying marks of juvenility, indeed, but winning the applause of the scholars of Holland. In a short time, he received letters from Richard Bentley, the British Aristarchus, commending the labor bestowed upon Pollux, but containing emendations on the passages from the comic writers, where Pollux endeavored to support his position by examples. In correcting these passages, Hemsterhuys also had taken unwearied pains, fully aware that this was the main point for inquiry.

But when he had read the criticisms of Bentley, he at once saw that his own toil had been thrown away. Excessively mortified, he resolved to abandon Greek literature forever. For two months he did not touch a book in that language. Subsequent reflection, however, convinced him of the injustice of comparing his juvenile productions with those of a veteran scholar, and he resumed, with wonted cheerfulness, his Greek studies. But Bentley's admonition had such an effect, that he determined, before trusting himself to this dangerous precipice, to compass the whole circle of knowledge, and, especially, that he would make no further attempt in respect to the verses of the comic writers—the point where he had been criticized—until he had obtained a thorough insight into the various kinds of metres employed by the writers in question. As a guide and model in these investigations, he selected his great adviser himself, preferring him to all other critics, and not concealing his displeasure, if any one invidiously carped at the learning of a scholar whom he was able in no manner to rival.

With the design of adding to his stores of learning, he studied, with untiring energy, the ancient writers, beginning with Homer, the fountain of genius. Indeed, he so selected and disposed of his various knowledge, that whatever related to the genius of the two classical languages, to history, to the manners and customs of the people, or to the wisdom of the ancients, was put into a condition for ready use.

In ancient times, as is well known, mathematics and the various branches of philosophy were included in a course of liberal education. Classical usage, in this particular, was followed by the restorers of learning in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Soon afterwards, however, the circle of studies was much narrowed by the exclusion of mathematics and philosophy. The result was, that two parties were formed, who became thoroughly inimical to each other. The student of grammar, history, poetry, and eloquence looked down with contempt upon him who was plodding with lines and angles, or plunging into the depths of metaphysics. On the other hand, the pursuits of elegant literature found no favor with the disciples of Euclid and Aristotle. Hemsterhuys, as might have been expected, had no sympathy with these narrow prejudices. The study of geometry tends to withdraw the mind from sensible objects, and fix it upon those which are perceived by reflection. It also renders the intellect acute and discriminating. Who can doubt but that philologists, if disciplined in this manner, will possess a keener perception than such as have never drawn a diagram? Those who are acquainted with the writings or conversation of Hemsterhuys know how much benefit he derived from geometry. Whatever flowed from his lips, whatever he committed to writing, even in matters pertaining to criticism, at once revealed an intellect accustomed to the precise reasoning of exact science. He never laid down his premises incantiously; but, from well-known and admitted principles he proceeded to state, in an orderly manner, the inevitable inferences.

There is, moreover, another branch of mathematics, with which it is discreditably for a critic not to be acquainted. This is astronomy, particularly ancient astronomy, without a knowledge of which neither the Greek nor Latin poets, who drew thence so many of their ornaments, can be fully understood. The more thoroughly he endeavored to comprehend this science, the less could he refrain—though a mild and charitable judge of others—from making merriment with those modern interpreters of the classical poets, who, when an explanation is needed from ancient astronomy, come to a disgraceful stand, or fall into ludicrous mistakes.

Hemsterhuys was the more ardent in his study of philosophy as he was impelled to it by his natural inclinations. Indeed, he roamed at will over all parts of the field, now lingering in the sacred retreat of Pythagoras, then in the academy of Plato; at one time in the lyceum of Aristotle, at another in the porch of Zeno, or the gardens of Epicurus, gazing with admiration on many things which the vanity of the present age boastfully holds up as new discoveries. Most students of ancient philosophy either take a sip of it, or stay in the sunnier spots. But Hemsterhuys, in obedience to the promptings of genius, investigated metaphysics, the most difficult branch of all. Nothing can well be found more abstruse than the Parmenides of Plato, where he unfolds his doctrine respecting ideas. Once and again, he returned to the study of this dialogue, not desisting till, on the fourth perusal, he elicited the hidden sense. Difficulty did not blunt his curiosity, as is common; it only stimulated it. Not contented with the ancient philosophers, he connected the study of Leibnitz with Plato, Locke with Aristotle, and other modern authors with the ancient, so that one who discoursed with him on ancient philosophy might conclude that his reading was confined to that, but when modern philosophy was the theme of conversation, might suppose he had read nothing besides.

The friend and biographer of Ruhnken, and one of the most celebrated philologists of Holland, was Daniel Wytténbach. He caught the falling mantle of his master, and carried to the study of antiquity the same intelligence and the same irrepressible enthusiasm. His lectures and his writings have shed an enduring lustre upon the university where he taught, and upon his adopted country. He was born at Berne, in Switzerland, August 7, 1746. In consequence, I read Xenophon in connection with Homer, devoting the greater part of my time to his works. They were so easy to be understood, that I, as it were, devoured them. I was rarely compelled to use a lexicon, for nearly every thing was intelligible from the context. I made use of a Latin version, which was advantageous to one of my age, but is never so in schools. All the works of Xenophon, the Memorabilia excepted, I read four times in four months. I now thought that I could read any author with equal ease. I took up Demosthenes. I had a copy without a Latin translation, but accompanied by the Greek notes of Jerome Wolf. Darkness itself! But I had learnt not to be frightened in setting out. I went on. I found greater difficulties than I had ever had before, both in the words and in the length of the sentences. At last, with much ado, I reached the end of the first Olynthiac. I then read it a second and a third time. Every thing now appeared plain and clear. Still, I did not yet perceive the fire of eloquence for which he is distinguished. I hesitated whether to proceed to the second oration, or again read the first. I resolved to do the latter. How salutary are the effects of such a review! As I read, an altogether new and unknown feeling took possession of me. In perusing other authors, my pleasure had arisen from a perception of the thoughts and words, or from a consciousness of my own progress. Now, an extraordinary feeling pervaded my mind, and increased with every fresh perusal. I saw the orator on fire, in anguish, impetuously borne forward. I was inflamed also, and carried on upon the same tide. I was conscious of a new elevation of soul, and was no longer the same individual. I seemed myself to be Demosthenes, standing on the bema, pouring forth this oration, and urging the Athenians to emulate the bravery and glory of their ancestors. Neither did I read silently, as I had begun, but with a loud voice, to which I was secretly impelled by the force and fervor of the sentiments, as well as by the power of oratorical rhythm. In this manner I read, in the course of three months, most of the orations of Demosthenes. My ability to understand an author being thus increased, I took more delight in Homer, whom I soon finished. Afterwards, I studied other great authors with far more profit."

1533. RUHNKEN AND VALCKENAEER COMPARED.

When Hemsterhuys died, in 1766, he was succeeded by Valckenaer. Thenceforward Ruhnken and Valckenaer, being professors in the same institution, were united in the closest intimacy. Both were the pupils of the same master, and both were profound Greek scholars. Yet there were many points of dissimilarity. In Hemsterhuys reason was predominant. He approached a subject, as it were, by calculation. In Valckenaer was the rapidity of genius. He did not weigh; he saw by intuition. He excelled in powers of invention. Ruhnken stood midway between his master and his fellow-disciple. He had genius, but it was under the control of judgment. Valckenaer had a wonderful sagacity in investigating and putting in order the fragments of poets, scattered and hidden among all the monuments of antiquity—a species of criticism in which Scaliger and Bentley excelled. He did not find his pleasure, like Ruhnken, among glosses, scholiasts, grammarians, or inedited manuscripts. He sought a thorough insight into the genius of the language, its analogy, origin, and dialects. He was at home, also, in sacred criticism and church history, having studied under Schulzens and Venema. Ruhnken had little knowledge of the Christian fathers, those excepted who joined elegance of taste to learning. He made ample amends, however, by his acquaintance with the commentators on Plato and Aristotle, with the civilians and antiquarians, with coins and inscriptions. Either could have adorned the professorship of the other. Valckenaer had read all the Latin writers, but it was with a view to the illustration of Greek. Ruhnken had read both Greek and Latin for their own sake. He had a grace, a happy dexterity, which was not possessed by Valckenaer. He made a beautiful arrangement of his materials. Such an equal light is cast over the whole as greatly to delight the reader. Valckenaer's Latin style, though chaste and elegant, did not possess that natural beauty, that simple grace, that luminous distinctness, which almost place Ruhnken among the best of the Romans. Valckenaer, as Hemsterhuys had done, read a multitude of the books of the day, Dutch and French. Ruhnken refrained almost wholly, except from works which pertained to his profession. He nearly lost the use of German. He employed Dutch and French for the common purposes of life. All his care was expended in writing Latin, till he attained a style which was nearly faultless. In the lecture-room Valckenaer had the advantage. His manner reminded one of what Horace says of Pindar—" Fervet immensusque ruit profundo Pindarus ore." His voice was deep-toned and sonorous; his appearance was grave and imposing; in his language there was a happy intermingling of poetical phraseology. When he was a young man, he had the gravity of age, as was the case, also, with Hemsterhuys and Ernesti. Ruhnken, in his advanced years, had the freshness and agility of youth. Hence the common people thought him much less learned than Valckenaer. The latter was sometimes melancholy. Ruhnken preserved his youthful feelings, as well as features, to old age.

In this happy literary companionship they passed their lives, till the death of Valckenaer, which took place in March, 1785.

In erudition Ruhnken has rarely been excelled. By confining his attention wholly to the two classical languages, he became a master of almost every thing which they contain. There was no Greek or Latin poet, philosopher, historian, orator, rhetorician, grammarian, lexicographer, scholiast, commentator on Plato or Aristotle, no author of any kind, edited or inedited, in a word, there was no monument of ancient classical learning, which was not known, marked, copied or referred to in his note-books.

1534. JOSHUA BARNES.

Dr. Bentley used to say of Joshua Barnes, that he understood as much Greek as a Greek cobbler.

This bon-mot, which was first related by Dr. Salter of the Charter-house, has been explained by an ingenious writer, as not insinuating that Barnes had only some knowledge of the Greek language. Greek was so familiar to him that he could off-hand have turned a paragraph in a newspaper, or a hawk-er's bill, into any kind of Greek metre, and has often been known to do so among his Cambridge friends. But with this uncommon knowledge and facility in that language, being very deficient in taste and judgment, Bentley compared his attainments in Greek, not to the erudition of a scholar, but to the colloquial readiness of a vulgar mechanic.

In 1700 he married Mrs. Mason, a widow lady of Hemingford, in Huntingdonshire, with a jointure of two hundred pounds per annum. The common report is, that this lady, who was between forty and fifty, having for some time been a great admirer of Mr. Barnes, came to Cambridge, and desired leave to settle a hundred pounds a year upon him after her death; which he politely refused, unless she would condescend to make him happy in her person, which was none of the most engaging. The lady was too obliging to refuse any thing to "Joshua, for whom [she said] the sun stood still;" and soon after they were married.

1535. JOHN HENDERSON.

John Henderson was born at Limerick, but went to England early in life with his parents. From the age of three years he discovered the presages of a great mind. Without retracing the steps of his progression, a general idea may be formed of them from the circumstance of his having professionally taught Greek and Latin in a public seminary,* at the age of twelve years. Some time after, his father (a man of expanded heart and intelligent understanding, every way worthy of his son) commencing a boarding-school in the neighborhood of Bristol, young Henderson undertook to teach the classics; which he did with much reputation, extending, at the same time, his own knowledge in the sciences and general literature to a degree that rendered him a prodigy of intelligence.

At the age of eighteen, by an intensity of application of which few persons can conceive, he had not only perused all the popular English authors of a later date, but had taken an extensive survey of foreign literature. He had also waded through the folios of the schoolmen, as well as scrutinized, with the minutest attention, the obsolete writers of the last three centuries: preserving, at the same time, a distinguishing sense of their respective merits, particular sentiments, and characteristic value; which, on proper occasions, he commented on, in a manner that astonished the learned listener, not more by his profound remarks than by his cool and sententious eloquence.

So surprisingly retentive was his memory, that he never forgot what he had once learned; nor did it appear that he ever suffered even an image to be effaced from his mind; while the ideas he had so rapidly accumulated existed in his brain, not as a huge chaos, but as clear and well-organized systems, illustrative of every subject, and subservient to every call. It was this quality which made him so superior a disputant; for as his mind had investigated the various sentiments and hypotheses of men, so had his almost intuitive discrimination stripped them of their deceptive appendages, and separated fallacies from truth, marshalling their arguments, so as to elucidate or detect each other. But in all his disputations, it was an invariable maxim with him never to interrupt the most tedious and confused opponents, though, from his pithy questionings, he made it evident that, from the first, he anticipated the train and consequences of their reasonings.

His favorite studies were philology, history, medicine, astronomy, theology, logic and metaphysics, with all the branches of natural and experimental philosophy; and that his attainments were not superficial, will be readily admitted by those who knew him best. As a linguist, he was acquainted with the Persian, Arabic, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, together with the French, Spanish, Italian, and German; and he not only knew their ruling principles and predominant distinctions, so as to read them with facility, but in the greater part conversed fluently.

1536. ELIHU BURRITT, THE LEARNED BLACKSMITH.

A letter written by Elihu Burritt, the learned blacksmith, contains some interesting incidents of his career.

Mr. Burritt mentions that, being one of a large family, and his parents poor, he apprenticed himself, when very young, to a blacksmith, but that he had always had such a taste for reading, that he carried it with him to his trade. He commenced the study of Latin when his indentures were not half expired, and completed reading Virgil in the evenings of one winter. He next studied Greek, and carried the Greek Grammar about in his hat, studying it for a few moments while heating some large iron. In the evenings he sat down to Homer's Iliad, and read twenty books of it during the second winter. He next turned to the modern tongues, and went to New Haven, where he recited to native teachers in French, Spanish, German, and Italian, and at the end of two years he returned to his forge, taking with him such books as he could procure. He next commenced Hebrew, and soon mastered it with ease, reading two chapters in the Bible before breakfast; this, with an hour at noon, being all the time he could spare from work. Being unable to procure such books as he desired, he determined to hire himself to some ship bound to Europe, thinking he could there meet with books at the different ports he touched at. He travelled more than a hundred miles on foot to Boston with this view, but was not able to find what he sought; and at that period he heard of the American Antiquarian Society at Worcester. Thither he bent his steps, and arrived in the city in the most utter indigence. Here he found a collection of ancient, modern, and Oriental books, such as he never imagined to be collected in one place. He was there kindly allowed to read what books he liked, and has reaped great benefit from this permission.

He used to spend three hours daily in the hall, and he made such use of these privileges, as to be able to read upwards of fifty languages with greater or less facility.

1537. FRANKLIN.

Franklin commenced the study of the languages at twenty-seven years of age. We shall quote in his own words the account he gives us of the manner in which he pursued this branch of his studies:—

Benjamin Franklin.

"I had begun," says he, "in 1733 to study languages. I soon made myself so much a master of the French as to be able to read the books in that language with ease. I then undertook the Italian. An acquaintance, who was also learning it, used often to tempt me to play chess with him. Finding this took up too much of the time I had to spare for study, I at length refused to play any more, unless on this condition--that the victor in every game should have a right to impose a task, either of parts of the grammar to be got by heart, or in translations, &c., which task the vanquished was to perform upon honor before our next meeting. As we played pretty equally, we thus beat one another into that language. I afterwards, with a little painstaking, acquired as much of the Spanish as to read their books also. I have already mentioned that I had had only one year's instruction in a Latin school, and that when very young, after which I neglected that language entirely. But when I had attained an acquaintance with the French, Italian, and Spanish, I was surprised to find, on looking over a Latin Testament, that I understood more of that language than I had imagined, which encouraged me to apply myself to the study of it again; and I met with more success, as those preceding languages had greatly smoothed my way."

1538. A LITERARY CURIOSITY.

The subject of the following notice, though but little known during his lifetime, was undoubtedly one of the most indefatigable scholars America has produced.

He lived in a very retired way, on a small farm, in Pomfret, Vermont, dividing his time between the necessities of daily toil and the severe studies requisite for the great purpose which he had in view.

Ten or twelve years were thus spent in unremitting research, and when his great Lexicon wanted but a few months of completion, he sank exhausted in death, leaving his work unfinished.

The following article was published some time since in the Congregational Journal, and in copying it we need only to add, that recent circumstances within our knowledge, but which we are hardly at liberty to make public, give to this matter a particular and present interest.

"Some years since, our curiosity was excited by what we accidentally learnt of the literary pursuits of a secluded gentleman in the town of Pomfret, Vermont, not far back from the Connecticut River. Residing at no great distance from him, it was our cherished purpose to visit his retreat, and ascertain for ourselves the truth of the reports concerning him. The purpose was not executed, and in the mean time death removed the stranger. Not forgetting our interest in him, we have at last succeeded in obtaining materials for a short biographical and bibliographical notice.

"Jonathan Ware was born in Wrentham, Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard College, in 1790.

"In straitened circumstances, and occupied in cultivating a most ungrateful farm, he engaged in a work of herculean labor, the accomplishment of which, as far as he carried it, and under all his embarrassments, is a matter of wonder.

"As a literary curiosity, a monument of exhausting and persevering toil, it is without a rival in American scholarship.

"Having devoted a large portion of his life to the studies of the ancient and modern languages, for which he had a Germanic passion, he conceived the idea of preparing a Polyglot Lexicon of the Old Testament.

"It was not designed to be a commentary in any sense, though the critical and exegetical notes we meet with in another manuscript volume show that he did not confine himself to mere verbal investigation.

"The manuscript Lexicon, bound in a quarto form, lies before us. Originally, the author designed to make it a quatuor-glot Lexicon, embracing the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English, according to which restriction he constructed the first draught of his Lexicon.

"Nor did he observe in this first draught the alphabetical arrangement; but beginning with the first chapter and the first verse of Genesis, he proceeded onward to the close of Malachi, selecting whatever words he thought entitled to notice, and giving the verses in which they were found.

"Thus the Hebrew word lehem has against it, in opposite columns, artos in Greek, panis in Latin, and bread in English.

"In some cases there is a copiousness of definitions, as, Hebrew, lehem; Greek, thallasce, pelagos, limen; Latin, mare, oceanus, lucus; English, sea, lake, ocean.

"In prosecuting his studies he had enlarged his acquaintance with modern languages, and desirous of making his work more valuable and acceptable to the learned, he proceeded to reconstruct his entire work, following the alphabetical order, and adding the Spanish, Italian, and Russian languages, making his Lexicon an octo, instead of a quatuor-glot.

"Thus against the word Abel, in Hebrew, in the opposite columns we have lithos in Greek, lapis in Latin, pedra in Spanish, pietra in Italian, pierre in French, stone in English.

"In many instances, on the side margin, references are made to the passages where the word is to be found.

Such a work would be a convenience to scholars in many cases; and in the preparation demanded immense labor; but after all, it is a curiosity rather than an important instrument of study and knowledge, and can hardly be made available to any practical utility adequate to the time and labor expended upon it. Ten or twelve years were consumed in bringing it to the state of completion in which the author left it, and with six months more he thought he should be able to give the finishing stroke. The six months were not granted, and the work is left in such a condition that no one can carry out the idea of the author.

"If we advert to the manual execution, the chirography is most admirable.

"Not one blot mars the entire manuscript; not a single letter appears to have been 'scratched out,' amended, or retouched; and the delicate strokes in the Hebrew and Greek letters are given with such accuracy of flexure and distinctness, that the reading is as easy as the printed page, though the letters are extremely small, not exceeding those of the Hebrew and Greek text books in common use, and the words closely crowded together.

"So familiar was Mr. Ware with the Hebrew, that in a small manuscript volume originally designed, as appears from the vast entries, for a memorandum of the weather and passing events, but which was soon converted into a learned book of criticism, he always quotes passages from the Old Testament in the original language, writing them out with the same apparent facility as he would in English, and in as neat and beautiful a style as that of the Lexicon.

"Mr. Ware had brought his work nearly to a close, and, wishing to consult some books not within his reach at Pomfret, set out in February, 1838, on a journey to Cambridge and Boston, to consult their ample libraries.

"He was kindly and respectfully received by the Cambridge professors, and arrangements made to furnish him with the books he needed.

"In returning, he took a cold, which terminated in lung fever, of which he died, after a few days' sickness, at the house of his daughter, Mrs. Butterfield, wife of Samuel Butterfield, Esq., of Andover, aged 71 years."

The following letter of condolence written to his daughter, by Professor H. Ware, Jr., immediately subsequent to his decease, will exhibit the impression which the venerable student made during his visit to Cambridge. It is a matter of regret that he could not have enjoyed during his life, in a substantial way, a small dividend on his posthumous worth.

"CAMBRIDGE, February 19, 1838.

"Dear Madam: I am greatly obliged by your letter. We had seen, with surprise and strong emotion, the announcement of your father's death, who had just left us in apparently vigorous health, and in high spirits.

"During the two days that he spent here, he seemed to enjoy himself very much, and was full of animation.

"His enthusiasm about his work had all the charming simplicity of youth; and we could not but feel an admiration for the industry and perseverance which had carried him through so laborious an enterprise. He spent two mornings with Professor Palfrey, who examined his manuscript with a good deal of interest, and expressed great satisfaction at the neatness and accuracy with which the difficult work was executed. Mr. Folsom, also, than whom no man is better able to appreciate such a work, was greatly pleased with all that he saw.

"Your father spent one night at my father's, and passed part of the day with me. He was also a guest with President Quincy.

"His health seemed perfect, and you may believe that we were not a little shocked at the suddenness of his death.

"If we could have been allowed to express a wish, it would have been that he might have lived to see the completion of his favorite and long-cherished plan; but He who orders all knows what is best. We must be content that he was able, and was permitted to have the satisfaction of mind which accompanies devotion to some great and praiseworthy task. He cannot fail of his reward.

"I cannot find that he took any books from Cambridge, excepting what were given him as presents and tokens of respect. He was to have received some from the college library, of which a list was made out by Professor Palfrey, and sent to the president; but, the corporation not yet having acted on the request, your father had not received them.

"Will you permit me now to suggest, as the manuscripts of your honored parent are not probably sufficiently complete to be published, and as no other person could complete them, and as they are of a character to be interesting and useful only to scholars, that therefore they should be by and by deposited in our college library, where they will remain to all time accessible to any who might wish to use them, and a monument to their industrious and worthy author?

"His alma mater would be proud to possess this treasure of one of her sons.

"I am, very respectfully, and with best wishes,

"Yours, dear madam,

"HENRY WARE, JUN."

1539. MITHRIDATES AND CLEOPATRA.

Mithridates, King of Pontus, knew twenty-two languages, and spoke them correctly.

And Plutarch says that Cleopatra knew almost all the languages spoken by the people of the Levant.

1540. MADAME ANNA BISHOP.

When Madame Anna Bishop was giving concerts in Guanajuato, Mexico, in the winter of 1849, her placards announced that she would sing in ten languages, viz., Spanish, Italian, French, German, Russian, Tartar, English, Irish, Scotch, and Ethiopian!

1541. HERMANN AS A LECTURER—AS A MAN.

"If one were to go into the lecture-room of Hermann, the professor of poetry and eloquence at Leipsic," says Dr. Sears, "a few moments before the hour, he would see a crowd of the maturest scholars of the university, and of philologists who had been educated elsewhere, finding their seats, and preparing their papers for taking notes. The hum of numerous whispering voices fills the room. An aged but spirited man, of moderate stature, with fire in his eye and fury in every movement, darts in at the door. The well-known signal, given by those nearest him, instantly silences a hundred tongues. By this time you hear his clinking spurs, and, as he mounts the stairs to the desk, your eye falls upon his blue coat, with metal buttons and badge of knighthood, his deerskin breeches, and long riding boots. His whip and gloves, and hat and chair, are all flying to their places, and a stream of extemporaneous Latin is already pouring forth. Before you are aware of it, the ship is under full sail. The whole energy of the lecturer's mind is directed to his object; the point of difficulty in the Greek text, or in the interpretation, is placed directly before you in all its bearings; the principles involved are clearly stated and discussed in animated and flowing Latin; the difference between his views and those of Böckh, Möller, or Disson, are alluded to freely, but kindly, occasionally with keen satire, but more frequently with the playfulness of harmless wit; and thus the hour is passed, and the most difficult and abstruse subjects luminously exhibited and disposed of, before the hearer stops to take a long breath. When the lecture is over, one's mind is so exhilarated, and so possessed of the spirit of the Greek author, as to be ready to plunge directly into a protracted perusal of the text; but, after a moment, a feeling of exhaustion suggests the query, whether it would not be better to go to the dinner table.

"Such is Godfrey Hermann in his lecture-room. Visit him in his museum, as he calls his study in the city, and he will entertain you with free and lively conversation; and if you have any reasonable claim upon his attention, he will show you a chair, and draw you into protracted conversation, as if you were an old friend. In his family, that resides a little out of the city, he appears as a plain but lively old man. Simplicity and sterling sense characterize his domestic circle.

"Hermann has no airs of professional dignity. He seems to act with reference to himself, simply as a man, not as the titled individual whom kings love to honor; and, in this respect, he is the very opposite of Schlegel of Bonn. Once he promised the writer some of his occasional works, but would not set a time when they might be called for. A few days after, he was seen walking from one side of the city to the other, to the writer's lodgings, with the pamphlets under his arm. The Germans generally pour out their curses liberally upon Napoleon, as the enslaver of their nation; but Hermann, in the true spirit of an old Greek, said it was a good thing, once in a while, to have the slumbering spirit of a whole continent stirred by such a man as Napoleon. In regard to the proverbially intricate statutes of the Leipsic University, he once observed, that, for his part, he followed his own sense of propriety in the affairs of the university; for no man could safely calculate on a life long enough to trace the laws through all their alterations and amendments, so as to be able to follow them.

"Hermann has been a spirited controversialist, and always victorious, till Böckh and Müller entered the lists. Neither of these men could be completely vanquished by any opponent. Probably no German scholar understands the Greek language, its grammar, lexicography, and general usage, and Greek metre, better than Hermann, or has read the Greek authors more than he."

1542. VAN HEUSDE'S TRIBUTE TO WYT- TENBACH.

"Wytttenbach," says Van Heusde, "seems to have been born for the study of antiquity, and by it to have been made, as it were, an ancient himself. He was so imbued with classical learning, from a child, that all which he said, all which he wrote, and all which he thought, had an ancient coloring about it, and seemed to have sprung from antiquity itself. He spoke Latin in his public lectures as one does his native language; indeed, as few are able to use it. For his diction flowed pure, limpid, harmonious, luminous, wholly free from the defilements of a later age; it gushed out, as it were, spontaneously, so that he seemed not to have premeditated either what he should say, or how he should say it. And yet there was nothing to desire in respect to propriety and elegance of language, or the arrangement of the discourse. He never hesitated, though the subjects to be named or illustrated were unknown to the ancients, and, therefore, without Latin terminology; nothing presented itself that was not fitly named and clearly unfolded, so as to be, as it were, visible. In teaching, he had the rare gift of being able to make a subject perfectly plain — a quality, in his view, of the highest value. I sometimes reflected at home upon points which he had explained in his lectures, and sought to recall the words and phrases which he had employed in illustrating particular topics. But hardly any thing recurred to me, unless it were some barbarous epithet, by which I could designate an object of which the ancients were ignorant. Indeed, he had not used any peculiar or favorite term, but by the whole complexion of a style and manner that were ancient, he unfolded the new subject just as the classical writers themselves would have done if they had had a conception and wanted language to express it.

"His diction," continues Van Heusde, "was manifestly Attic, not drawn from any Latin author, but breathing the Socratic sweetness, mirth, and pleasantry, as they are seen in the Memorabilia. He wrote Greek, if not with the same facility, yet with the same elegance and purity, with which he did Latin, as I have seen in letters written in Greek, which he sometimes addressed to his friends for the pleasure of it. He much regretted, that, at the revival of learning, the Greek language had not been adopted into the republic of letters, instead of the Latin. It is a difficult task for one to write in Latin so as to satisfy himself or others. Not, indeed, that the Latin does not possess some rare qualities, as grace, proportion, gravity. What can be more elegant than Cicero's epistles? What more stately and magnificent than his orations?

Nothing like the epistles is found in Greek literature. But the language is wanting in the beauty of outward form, in inward force, copiousness, richness. There is no philosophy, as he said, in it; which all have found who have tried to philosophize in Latin, and which is demonstrated in the language itself, as it borrows even the term philosophy, having no appropriate word of its own."

1543. DR. JOHNSON.

Dr. Johnson had a veneration for the voice of mankind beyond what most people will own; and, as he liberally confessed that all his own disappointments proceeded from himself, he hated to hear others complain of general injustice. "I remember," says Mrs. Piozzi, "when lamentation was made of the neglect showed to a great philologist, as some one ventured to call him, 'He is a scholar, undoubtedly, sir,' replied Dr. Johnson; 'but remember that he would run from the world, and that it is not the world's business to run after him. I hate a fellow whom pride, or cowardice, or laziness drives into a corner, and does nothing, when he is there, but sit and growl; let him come out as I do, and bark.'"

1544. THE RETORT NOT COURTEOUS.

"Dr. Porson," said a gentleman to the great "Grecian," with whom he had been disputing—"Dr. Porson, my opinion of you is most contemptible." "Sir," returned the doctor, "I never knew an opinion of yours that was not contemptible."

1545. CLASSICAL GLORY.

Dr. George, the celebrated Grecian, upon hearing the praises of the great King of Prussia, entertained considerable doubt whether the king, with all his victories, knew how to conjugate a Greek verb in μ .

1546. WYTTEBACH'S MANNERS AND HABITS.

The manners and general habits of Wytenbach, at this time, [1788-1820,] may be learned from some notices of him by his disciple, Philip van Housde, for many years professor at Utrecht, and well known as a zealous Platonist. They are found in the preface to his Introduction to the Platonic Philosophy, and are addressed to Creuzer of Heidelberg.

"I was pleased with my father's plan, that I should attend the celebrated instructions of Cras, at Amsterdam, because they were connected, as I understood, with the study of Cicero, and of ancient philosophy; but the most pleasing circumstance of all was, that it would furnish me ready access to that prince of Platonic interpreters, Wytenbach, who had been in my thoughts day and night. Accordingly, when I called upon him,—it was evening; the time and place I well remember,—he asked me at once about my studies, and the proficiency which I had made in them. I mentioned the writers with whom I had been occupied, particularly the poets. He gave me a book which was at hand, and showed me a passage to read and translate. The book was his lately edited Historical Selections; the passage, the description, by Thucydides, of the plague at Athens. I read with embarrassment, and translated in a bungling manner. Mention was accidentally made of Plato. 'Have you read Plato, then?' said he. 'I have not read him,' I replied, 'but I have run over the Apology and the Phædo; yet I wish to read and understand him; and I have come to Amsterdam with the hope of enjoying your lectures, and, if permitted, your advice and conversation.' He was pleased with my answer; at least, his whole appearance was at once changed; the wrinkled brow became smooth; the severe aspect, assumed towards a tyro blundering in his reading and translation, vanished. His countenance became wonderfully mild and winning. 'Go on,' said he, 'as you have begun; for he is not to be despaired of who has begun to like Plato, as Quintilian said of Cicero. Do you know these authors?' He then ordered wine. As we sat down to our Socratic cups, as he called them, we chatted most delightfully. Whenever I recall that evening, as I do very often, I am filled with admiration at his truly Socratic spirit. His conversation, first concerning Quintilian and Cicero, then Plato, was remarkably fitted to elicit whatever thoughts I had. This I afterwards understood. At that time I did not think of any thing of the kind. I could only answer his questions.

"In the Socratic art, as I found by my own experience, Wytenbach excelled. Hence it is not strange that his method of instruction was useful to the young in a degree equalled by few. It was a medium between two extremes, both of which it is difficult to avoid. On the one hand, it was not harsh or severe, fitted to repress the feelings rather than to excite them, and to form men of a melancholy cast. On the other hand, it was not of a too facile and compliant nature, adapted to train men of a shallow and trifling character. He had the rare quality of directing his energies wholly to the subject in hand, without deviating into those intricate and fruitless digressions, where diligence is almost wholly lost. No one ever approved or defended the method of grammatical interpretation more strenuously than he. Yet he was not a grammarian in the vulgar sense, a stickler for words and syllables. He always referred, in his lectures, to laws and rules of art, with their varieties and exceptions. All these he applied at once to the writings of the ancients, alike in interpreting them correctly, and, if need were, in emending them. Thus the minutest grammatical criticisms were of the same tenor with the most important; for they did not pertain to the feuds and trifling disputes of grammarians, bitter and pertinacious as we know them to have been, but they served to restore and illustrate the immortal remains of Homer, of Plato—men of the loftiest genius, where we can hardly tolerate the slightest stain. This I perceived when he read Plato with me. for I was accustomed occasionally to submit to him the more difficult passages which I could not comprehend.

"At evening, in particular, he gave himself to my disposal, in his library, sitting down. if not to Socratic cups, certainly to those instructions and discourses which were far pleasanter to me. Having read the passages which I desired, he examined each with the closest attention, that he might first ascertain the structure of the language. then the use and meaning of every word and phrase, not excepting even the smallest particles. The force of each term by itself being thus unfolded, I did not need a translation of the passage as a whole, for, under his guidance, I seemed to have comprehended it all spontaneously. The sentence being explained, I generally hastened on to another, which I also desired to understand. But he would not consent. 'We must hasten slowly, my good friend,' he would say; 'we have not yet attended to the Attic dress, or to that Platonic form, or to the exquisite use of language, or to the rare elegance of the entire sentence.' Not seldom one passage, or even a single word, detained us a whole hour. Still, I did not regret the delay then, or afterwards; for, in explaining single words, he unfolded and set off to advantage the wonderful powers of the Greek language, the comely form of the Attic dialect, the polished and beautiful Attic itself, especially the native eloquence, which is seen, not in tropes, metaphors, or other rhetorical ornaments, but is expressed in the literal and skilful use of language, particularly as found in Plato, to whose diction and style all antiquity have assigned the highest rank."

Hemsterhuys's equanimity and strength of character are finely illustrated by the following incident: "When he resided at Franeker, two individuals, belonging to a noble family, came to share the hospitality of his house for two days. Scarcely were the happy circle seated, when a letter was handed to him, communicating the intelligence that his son James, a youth of the highest promise, and connected with the navy, had died in a foreign land. He laid aside the letter, and successfully concealed the grief which was consuming his spirits till his guests had departed, unwilling to mar the festivities of the visit by the outburst of sorrow which the news would occasion his family. His firmness reminds one of an incident in the life of Xenophon, who, being informed, in the midst of a sacrifice, of the death of his son Gryllus, went through the solemn service before he gave vent to his grief."

1548. HEMSTERHUY'S AND PEDANTS.

The vanity of the ignorant pretender to knowledge Hemsterhuys generally passed by in silence. A certain individual, who was often in the circles where he was present, was accustomed to talk very familiarly of Pindar, Sophocles, and Demosthenes,—authors whom he had never read,—animadverting upon them with the utmost freedom, and, as the Latin proverb has it, playing the actor while Roscius was present. On one occasion, John Alberti and others fastened their eyes on Hemsterhuys, expecting that he would rebuke the vanity and impudence of the man; but he uttered not a word. "Why should I not," he observed, "let him indulge his darling passion, just as I do in the case of others, who, with equal ignorance, make their boasts from the pulpit of acquaintance with Greek and Oriental learning, when Schultens and myself are present?"

1549. RUHNKEN'S SELF-CONFIDENCE.

Ruhnken spoke out what he thought. He was so entirely free from vanity, that he appeared less learned than many others, while, at the same time, he had a thorough knowledge of his own capacities and acquirements. In a conversation with his friends, allusion was made to the great merits of Villoison. "True," replied Ruhnken, "Villoison is an accomplished young man; but he ought to have come here, and attended the instructions of myself and Valckenaer." This remark appeared to savor of pride, yet it was nothing but the candid expression of his own consciousness. It reminds one of the saying of Chrysippus, the stoic, who, being asked by a friend to whom he should intrust the education of his son, replied, "To me; for if I knew any one better than I am, I would place myself under his care."

1550. RUHNKEN, THE SWEDISH, AND THE GERMAN PROFESSOR.

Though Ruhnken was mild in his manners, possibly to a fault, he could ill bear the vanity and pedantic affectation which he was sometimes compelled to encounter. On one occasion he received a visit from a Swede, a man of learning, but excessively troublesome, whose unseasonable calls reminded the Leyden professors of an irruption of the old northern barbarians. Ruhnken, while showing him the library, opened a case which contained the manuscripts of Joseph Scaliger. "Hic este ille vir expectans judicium," exclaimed the Swede, alluding to the inscription on Scaliger's tomb. At the same time, he stoutly argued that Scaliger was no critic. "Be gone with your stupidity," thundered Ruhnken suddenly in his ears, at the same moment pushing in the lid of the case of manuscripts. The northman fled in terror.

On another occasion, a German professor, who was inflated with self-esteem, asked Ruhnken to show him the library, at the same time telling him of some very learned Germans, who had written books full of erudition in their vernacular language. "I wish," said Ruhnken, "that they had written in Latin, as Gesner, Ernesti, and Heyne did, so that they might be more read by foreigners." "Are you, then, my good sir," rejoined the stranger, "still involved in the error of supposing that there will be any more writing of Latin in this age?" Ruhnken, indignant at his self-complacency, added, "Good-by, Mr. Professor; seek some other library, where you may find German books."

1551. WYTTENBACH'S TRIALS AS RUHNKEN'S SUCCESSOR.

Wyttenbach, writing July 5, 1805, to F. A. Wolf, says, "I often call to mind, my dear Wolf, that day which you gave me at Amsterdam, and which I passed most agreeably in talking with you. I had hoped it would be but the beginning of an uninterrupted intimacy and intercourse, by letter, between us, though absent from each other. But hitherto that expectation has been disappointed, and the fault has been all my own. I regret exceedingly that I have permitted it to be so. We ought to be on terms of intimacy, from our common love of letters and of our lamented Ruhnken. Though, as I have said, the fault is mine, it was not owing to any want of inclination, but to a want of time and health, which have compelled me to drop or defer my correspondence with my dearest friends, and with you among the rest. But your Homer, sent to me last September by Gösch, a gift inscribed to me in your own handwriting, has strangely moved me to reply. I have sent you, in return, a present of my last work, which was conveyed through Luchtmans to Leipsic, whence it will go to your friend, Etchstädt, and thence to you. I now put my letter into the hands of Gösch, who will see that it is immediately delivered to you.

"After your return, I visited Ruhnken several times, who seemed to take great pleasure in speaking of you, and held you in so high estimation as to desire you for a colleague, and manifested unusual anxiety for your reply. You surely had good reason for declining such terms; for, on the salary which was offered, you would have had to starve like a hero; or if, as would have been necessary, you had received twice that amount, a flame of envy would have been kindled around you.

Our friend Ruhnken died in May, 1798. I came to Leyden to make preparation for his funeral, and came frequently afterwards to console and cheer the afflicted family, the depth of whose sorrow I will not attempt to describe. Your letter arrived at the same time, but I could not well answer it then. These things, though I had not forgotten you, my dear Wolf, escaped my memory. The distress of the bereaved family engaged all my thoughts. In their behalf, I made application to the curators for a pension. As it was a time of change in our public affairs, and new curators frequently succeeded to the place of the old, much time was consumed without bringing any thing to pass, and the estate of the family was, in the mean time, wasting away. When the public commotions were in some degree allayed, I addressed a communication to the new curators, presenting, as strongly as I could, the claims of the Ruhnken family. They replied, that my request could be granted only on condition of my succeeding Ruhnken myself. I hesitated, but at length consented, though with less salary than had been offered me here before, and less than I was then receiving in Amsterdam, where my situation was, furthermore, in every respect agreeable. I came to Leyden, supposing that every one applauded this good deed of mine. But how sadly was I disappointed! The daughters of my deceased friend proved ungrateful;

the mother acknowledged my benefaction. But others envied and slandered me. I will mention, as you may not know it, that the younger daughter, the one who was blind, died in May, 1801. Elizabeth, the elder, went to France, and was married to a military surgeon, whose acquaintance she had made in Leyden. He is now a country doctor in Normandy. Her situation is not altogether agreeable; it is unworthy of her father's fame, and of the high hopes excited when she was that beautiful and accomplished girl, whose hand was sought so frequently by men of rank. The mother is pretty well, for one who is both dumb and blind."

1552. ATTACKS ON WYTTENBACH BY CONTROVERSIALISTS.

The following extract from a letter of Wyttenbach to Count de Fontanes give us some interesting facts respecting the former:—

"That you, respected sir, who are so distinguished both for your sense and learning, and who, by a kind Providence, are now placed over us, should condescend to signify to me by letter, that you were not displeased with my Phædo, emboldens me to write to you, and lay before you some affairs in which I am interested. I have been professor forty years; twenty-eight at Amsterdam, and the remainder at Leyden. I was brought to this place almost against my will, in order to take charge of two vacant professorships, that of Latin eloquence and universal history, and that of Greek literature and antiquities, to which the charge of the library has been added. I still discharge the duties of my threefold office. During all this period, I have employed whatever leisure I could find in study and in writing for the press, and begin to learn more and more the extent of my ignorance. By such thoughts I have sometimes been almost tempted to turn aside from the literary career upon which I had entered. Two things have chiefly kept me from doing so—the approbation of intelligent men, and the encouraging number and character of my pupils. I have therefore adhered to my purpose, though publicly assailed by the tongue of envy and calumny. Recently, no less than three individuals have attacked me, two anonymously, in two Belgian journals—the one an advocate, it is said, the other a professor in Harderwyck. The third is a retired theologian, an old hand at abuse, and a trumpeter of the Kantian philosophy. Knowing my dislike of the sect, he has been trying to vent upon me, in barbarous Latin, the bitterest abuse that could be picked up from the gutter. Although this abuse has not hit me, and I care nothing about it on my own account, yet, since these low fellows make every good man the mark of their ribaldry, and sell themselves to the multitude, making mischief among our students, it would be doing a good service to have that nuisance abated by public authority. I have now several works ready for publication. Among them is the continuation of my Bibliotheca Critica, which is to contain addenda to Phædo and Plutarch, and a memoir of Louis William Wassenaer, a young Batavian, of one of the oldest families, and promising still greater distinction in literature. He was on the point of giving us a learned treatise on the life and writings of Chrysippus, when, in July last, his death snatched away all these high hopes. This journal, which I used to publish at intervals of about one year, and several works prepared by myself and by others, are kept back by the new censorship for the press, which, while it is useful in suppressing vulgar libels, causes such delay in the publication of literary works as greatly to prejudice the interests of learning. We look to your excellency to provide a remedy for this evil."

1553. EXPLOSION OF THE STYGIAN MAGAZINE.

The explosion of the Stygian Magazine ship, at Leyden, in 1807, was a calamity from which many suffered dreadfully. The great linguist Wytténbach was among the sufferers. His account of the matter, as it affected himself and others, is deeply interesting. "The explosion took place on the 12th day of January, 1807, the last of the winter vacation which I had been employed in writing my Annotations to Plutarch. In my library, all the books which I then needed, and especially the notes already written on this and other authors, were spread out on tables near the windows. I left them in that condition to go to dinner, expecting to return immediately afterwards to my work. While I was sitting at table with my niece, a strange and frightful noise, as of many cannons, fell upon our ears. Suddenly, the roof of the adjoining house fell in. The windows of our apartment were dashed in pieces, and a storm of broken glass was beating upon us. We sprang up and ran into the street, the affrighted servant and waiting-maid following us. Our neighbors also, were at their doors, in a state of amazement. Many persons were mangled; some of them escaped from their houses; some were enclosed, and were screaming and calling for aid; and others, with bleeding limbs, were running through the streets. The cause of the disaster was not yet known. Soon, at the distance of a hundred paces, we saw the ruins, where every thing was levelled with the ground, and whence the devastation was spread in all directions beyond. Our house was still standing, for it was situated to the west of that place, and the wind, coming from that quarter, carried the blast more to the east. The place of that Stygian Magazine ship, which was full of powder, and which prostrated every thing in its vicinity, was but one hundred and eighty paces from my house, and many edifices, twice and three times as long as mine, were reduced to a heap of ruins. I had not yet looked at what was under our feet. The street was perfectly strown with flying papers. I took one up, and recognized my own handwriting, and found they were all mine. We went to picking them up, and, as I looked to my study windows, which were on the front side, and in the first story, I found they were broken in, and the papers, containing my notes, projected from their tables into the street. We returned to the house, to see what had happened there. The apartments were all shattered; the windows, the doors, the glass and porcelain ware, nice furniture, timepieces, lamps, and plates, were all dashed in pieces. The entire roof was carried away. Parts of the house, including my lecture-room, were fallen, and we feared it would be unsafe for us to remain in it. But the carpenters assured us that there were still two apartments which might be safely occupied. We therefore remained till the end of January, the first week without roof, windows, or doors. We suffered extremely from the rain, the snow, the cold, and the wind. Our remaining furniture, linen, bed-clothes, and the like, were, by these means, greatly damaged, and still more my library, which was exposed two nights to the falling dew. We were all the while expecting repairs to be made, but the carpenters kept putting us off. The adjoining houses, which threatened to fall, were torn down by order of the magistrates, who, fearing that ours would thereby be prostrated, sent armed men to remove us, and others who resided near us. The domestics were panic-struck, and friends, alarmed for me, — though I knew there was no cause for it, — hastened to our relief, and persuaded us to take our most valuable articles and leave the house. I yielded reluctantly to their will, and packed up those goods, and delivered them to my friends for safe keeping. In the tumult many things were lost which had hitherto been safe, and, among the rest, a purse with six hundred florins. Nevertheless, we remained in the house fifteen days longer, daily packing our goods in a quiet manner, and conveying them, by the canal, to the garden where I now reside, and from which I go, on stated days, into the city to lecture. But in arranging my effects, and in sorting out my library, I miss many of my books, and even my note books and comments on Greek and Latin authors; and I now feel the truth of what numerous individuals before said, but what I could not believe, that, at the time of the explosion, many of my papers were blown away, and carried by the wind to the scene of devastation. In the injury done to my furniture, library, etc., I have lost about six thousand francs.

"These, my dear Sante Croix, are what relate to me. I have written respecting them, because you requested it; for, truly, I am ashamed to mention such trifles, compared with the calamities of others. One hundred and fifty persons were crushed in the ruins, and among them the two professors, Kluit and Luzac. The former was my friend, and had made large collections on the History of the Middle Ages, and of Holland, which he was expecting to publish, but which perished with him. Luzac was crushed by the falling house of a friend, as he was approaching the door to visit him."

The following whimsical accident happened some years ago to a well-known learned and self-taught Cambro-Briton:—

Devoted to his books, it was his daily custom to take a solitary walk along the shore. He was not unobserved; his appearance altogether was not of the most prepossessing description. Some soldiers followed him in his ramble; they noticed his actions, his looks, alternately at the distant town, the river, and a something which he held in his hand, which they could not decipher, but which they were sanguine enough to imagine a plan of the place, and the poor Welshman a French spy! They communicated their opinions to each other, and it was resolved to take the plotting villain into custody. Richard, in consequence, was immediately seized, and, after a night's confinement in the black hole, was taken before a magistrate. His sagacious accusers made their charge, and were convinced of his bad design, from his actions, and the papers he had on his person. We are not told what was the opinion of the bench, but it was thought necessary to send for some person acquainted with the strange characters found in his greasy pockets. A gentleman, eminent in the literary world, happened to be at hand; he explained to the magistracy the perfect harmlessness of the unfortunate prisoner; that the supposed plans and correspondence were portions of the Talmud, and of the classical productions of Theocritus, Lucian, and some Hebrew and Greek authors, and therefore no apprehensions need be entertained of endangering the safety of the state by discharging the Welshman.

1555. THE DESTITUTION OF SALE.

The learned Sale, who first gave the world a genuine version of the Koran, and who had so zealously labored in forming that Universal History which was the pride of our country, pursued his studies through a life of want; and this great Orientalist, (I grieve to degrade the memoirs of a man of learning by such mortifications,) when he quitted his studies, too often wanted a change of linen, and often wandered in the streets in search of some friend who would supply him with the meal of the day.

1556. AFFLICTIONS OF DR. CASTELL.

Dr. Edmund Castell devoted his life to his Lexicon Heptaglotton. It is not possible, if there are tears that are to be bestowed on the afflictions of learned men, to read this pathetic address to Charles II. and forbear them. He laments the seventeen years of incredible pains, during which he thought himself idle when he had not devoted sixteen or eighteen hours a day to this labor; that he had expended all his inheritance, (it was more than twelve thousand pounds;) that it had broken his constitution, and left him blind as well as poor. When this invaluable polyglot was published, the copies remained unsold on his hands; for the learned Castell had anticipated the curiosity and knowledge of the public by a full century. He had so completely devoted himself to Oriental studies, that they had a very remarkable consequence, for he had totally forgotten his own language, and could scarcely spell a word. This appears in some of his English letters, preserved by Mr. Nichols in his valuable Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century, vol. iv. Five hundred of these Lexicons, unsold at the time of his death, were placed, by Dr. Castell's niece, in a room so little regarded, that scarcely one complete copy escaped the rats, and "the whole load of learned rags sold only for seven pounds." The work, says D'Israeli, at this moment would find purchasers at forty or fifty pounds.

1557. WYTENBACH EDITING PLUTARCH.

Wytenbach, professor afterwards in Leyden, was a learned and distinguished philologist. He devoted no little of his time and talents to the illustration of the works of Plutarch. The results of these researches appeared in his excellent critical edition of the Moral Works of Plutarch, published at Oxford in 1795–1802, five volumes quarto. The following letter of his to the delegates of the Clarendon press of Oxford, during the publication of Plutarch, will be found highly interesting to literary men:—

D. Wytenbach to Wm. Cleaver, Bishop of Chester.

“LEYDEN, July, 1800.

“Being under the necessity of writing to the delegates of the Clarendon press, I am induced to address myself particularly to you, by that kindness and that learning which is celebrated in the common speech of men, but of which I have certain proof in your excellent book on Rhythm. Ever since the delegates took my Plutarch under their wing, I have made it my first aim to execute the work with such care and despatch as to satisfy their wishes. But soon the calamitous war between England and Holland broke out, which is not yet terminated, and which first interrupted and finally cut off all intercourse. And yet, by the end of the year 1794, the whole of Plutarch's Morals, complete, as now publishing at Oxford, had reached the hands of the delegates. The remaining parts consisted of the fragments, the spurious treatises, my annotations, and the indexes. In the preparation of these, I went on zealously, as long as there was any way of transmitting to you the manuscript. In the month of May, 1798, I had a portion all finished, when my friend Ruhnken died, and I was interrupted in the midst of my course, by being called upon to settle his affairs. The Rev. Dr. John Randolph, who, from the beginning, corresponded with me on the part of the delegates, always urged me to transmit my manuscript as fast as I could get it in readiness, that the press might not be delayed. But the British ambassador at the Hague, to whom I had been accustomed to commit my papers, had now left the place, and I could not, as things were, think of sending by vessels, and committing to unsafe hands, the labors of so many years. I replied, informing him of my readiness to send them as soon as he would point out a safe mode of conveyance. It was agreed that I should transmit them to a certain merchant at Hamburg, who would deliver them to Crawford, the British minister at that place. Accordingly, I put those parts which I had finished into a box covered with pitch, and sent it to Mr. H. D. Rowohl, who wrote me, soon after, that he had received it in good condition, and delivered it to his excellency the British minister. I have never heard a syllable, either verbally or in writing, respecting its safe arrival in Oxford, though it was put into the hands of the minister at Hamburg in November, 1798. While I was so distracted with my own business, and that of others, that I knew not which way to turn, it became necessary, in consequence of my appointment as Ruhnken's successor, to remove from Amsterdam to Leyden. I did not fail, however, to write to Dr. Randolph, requesting him to inform me of the fate of my papers; but no reply came to me from England. That happy island 'was more deaf to my cries than the rocks of the Icarian Sea.' Are we, then, so cut off from each other, by the sea and by war, that the letters which I write ago, I heard that Dr. Randolph had been made Bishop of Oxford. While I rejoice in his promotion, at the same time my hope of getting an answer lessens, since, to his former occupations, others, both civil and ecclesiastical, will now be added. I beg you, therefore, reverend sir, to inform me, either by yourself or through some other person, whether that box ever reached Dr. Randolph. If not, as I fear may be the case, let the delegates use all their influence with the minister at Hamburg, to make search for it. I beg you, let me not lose my four years' labor; for I could not, in four years to come, replace it with equal completeness and accuracy."

In a subsequent letter, dated January 6, 1801, Wyttenbach says,—

"I wrote you some time since, that a parcel of my papers on Plutarch, the labor of four years, which I sent to Oxford three years ago, was lost on the way. But last month, after having lain in Hamburg this whole interval, it came safely into the hands of the Oxford gentlemen. To extort from them a copy for you is among the impossibilities. I will see that a copy is sent you, as soon as the work shall be finished.

"When I committed my Plutarch to your patronage, I did it influenced by your great names, your reputation for learning and rank, and the splendor and influence of the Oxford University. I was not governed by a love of gain; for I might have received more from another quarter. I entertained some fears respecting the safety of the papers which were to be transmitted, but none that the terms of agreement would not be adhered to. Do not, gentlemen delegates, make me suffer a pecuniary loss, in addition to the other troubles of the times. The engagement was, that I should receive a guinea a sheet, printed in the manner of Bryan's edition of Plutarch's Lives. But in our edition, in innumerable instances, a smaller type is used, and is to be retained through all the annotations, so as greatly to reduce the number of pages. It may be well thus to diminish the size of the book, but I suggest whether it would be right, also, to diminish the stipulated price. But, no doubt, the delegates will properly adjust the compensation, of their own accord. I will use all diligence to finish the annotations and indexes in such time, and compress them into such a compass, that the execution shall be perfectly satisfactory to you."

It would seem, from a pretty extensive correspondence, that the Oxford gentlemen were not remarkably liberal in their dealings with Wyttenbach. He refers, more than once, to their reducing the size of the type, as if to lessen the editor's pay. He applied for a certain sum, to meet the expense of extra copying, which their haste required, that the press might not be stopped, in case of any accident occasioned by the war, but that a duplicate might be on hand; and they granted him half the sum, for which, however, there may possibly have been a sufficient reason. It was afterwards agreed that for the annotations, in a reduced type, Wyttenbach should receive a greater sum than a guinea a sheet, or eight quarto pages. But the delegates finally made a new proposal, namely, to pay three hundred guineas for the remainder of the work, without regard to the number of pages; "which conditions," says Wyttenbach, "I accepted, though at a sacrifice, that the work might not be delayed any longer."

§ 161. DIVERTING SAYINGS AND DETAILS.

1558. FUSELI'S POETRY.

It pleased Fuseli to be thought one of those erudite gentlemen whom the poet describes,—

"Far seen in Greek—deep men of letters;"

and he loved to annoy certain of his companions with the display of his antique lore. He sometimes composed Greek verses in the emergency of the moment, and affected to forget the author. He once repeated half a dozen sonorous and well-sounding lines to Porson, and said, "With all your learning, now you cannot tell me who wrote that." The professor, "much renowned for Greek," confessed his ignorance, and said, "I don't know him." "How could you know him," chuckled Fuseli; "I made them this moment." When thwarted in the academy, —and that was not seldom,—his wrath aired itself in a polyglot. "It is a pleasant thing, and an advantageous," said the painter, on one of those occasions, "to be learned. I can speak Greek, Latin, French, English, German, Danish, Dutch, Icelandic, and Spanish, and so let my folly or my fury get vent through nine different avenues."

1559. LORD BELGRAVE AND SHERIDAN.

Lord Belgrave, having finished a speech in the House of Commons, with a long Greek quotation, Sheridan, in reply admitted the force of the quotation so far as it went, "but," said he, by way of a joke, "had the noble lord proceeded a little further, and completed the passage, he would have seen that it applied the other way." Sheridan then spouted something ore rotundo, which had all the ais, ois, ous, ion, and koss, that give the world assurance of a Greek quotation; upon which Lord Belgrave very promptly and handsomely complimented the honorable member on his readiness of recollection, and frankly admitted that the continuation of the passage had the tendency ascribed to it by Mr. Sheridan, and that he had overlooked it at the moment when he gave his quotation. On the breaking up of the House, Fox, who piqued himself on having some Greek, went up to Sheridan, and asked him, "Sheridan, how came you to be so ready with that passage? It certainly is as you say, but I was not aware of it before you quoted it." It is unnecessary to observe, that there was no Greek at all in Sheridan's impromptu.

1560. PORSON AND DR. GILLIES.

Dr. Gillies, the historian of Greece, and Mr. Porson, used now and then to meet. The consequence was certain to be a literary contest. Porson was much the deeper scholar of the two. Dr. Gillies was one day speaking to him of the Greek tragedies, and of Pindar's odes. "We know nothing," said Dr. Gillies, emphatically, "of the Greek metres." Porson answered, "If, doctor, you will put your observation in the singular number, I believe it will be very accurate."

1561. PLEASANT RETORT.

Professor Porson being once at a dinner party where the conversation turned upon Captain Cook and his celebrated voyages round the world, an ignorant person, in order to contribute his mite towards the social intercourse, asked him, "Pray was Cook killed on his first voyage?" "I believe he was," answered Porson, "though he did not mind it much, but immediately entered on a second."

1562. PORSON'S SARCASM.

Porson said of a prospect shown to him, that it put him in mind of a fellowship—a long, dreary walk, with a church at the end of it.

1563. INCONVENIENCE OF A LATIN COLLEAGUE.

There is a fact related of the late Admiral Sir Samuel Cornish, which may be put in comparison with any thing feigned by Smollett of Commodore Truncheon, Captain Crowe, or Ben Bowling. Sir Samuel, like most of the great British seamen of old, rose entirely by his merit, from a low life to a very high command in the navy; and as his abilities as an admiral were undoubted, so his acquisitions as a scholar were extremely slender. At the surrender of Manila, in 1763, his colleague, Colonel Draper, who was shortly after Sir William Draper, and who was one of the most accomplished scholars of his age, and prided himself highly on his literary attainments, carried on all his negotiations, relative to the ransom of the city, in the Latin language, with the Spanish archbishops. On the shameful evasion of the payment of the ransom, Admiral Cornish, who, like Truncheon, could not write Latin or any other foreign lingo, and suspected that the whole failure was to be ascribed to the negotiation being carried on in that antiquated jargon, declared, and confirmed it with a forecandle oath, that he never would accept a command again with any man who understood Latin.

1564. DR. JOHNSON'S SARCASM.

A young clergyman, very deficient in learning, complaining to Dr. Johnson, that some how or other he had lost all his Greek, "I suppose," said the doctor, "it was at the time I lost my great estate in Yorkshire."

1565. DR. JOHNSON AND THE NOBLEMAN.

"I have often thought," says Mrs. Piozzi, "Dr. Johnson more free than prudent, in professing so loudly his little skill in the Greek language; for though he considered it as a proof of a narrow mind to be too careful of literary reputation, yet no man could be more enraged than he, if an enemy, taking advantage of this confession, twitted him with his ignorance; and I remember when the King of Denmark was in England, one of his noblemen was brought by Mr. Colman to see Dr. Johnson at our country house; and having heard, he said, that he was not famous for Greek literature, attacked him on the weak side, politely adding, that he chose that conversation on purpose to favor himself. Our doctor, however, displayed so copious, so compendious a knowledge of authors, books, and every branch of learning in that language, that the gentleman appeared astonished. When he was gone home, says Johnson, "Now, for all this triumph, I may thank Thrale's Xenophon here, as I think, excepting that one, I have not looked in a Greek book these ten years; but see what haste my dear friends were all in," continued he, "to tell this poor innocent foreigner that I knew nothing of Greek! O, no, he knows nothing of Greek!" with a loud burst of laughter.

1566. THE TRAVELLING LIBRARY.

Professor Porson, the celebrated Grecian, was once travelling in a stage-coach, where a young Oxonian, fresh from college, was amusing the ladies with a variety of talk, and, amongst other things, with a quotation, as he said, from Sophocles. A Greek quotation, and in a coach too, roused the slumbering professor from a kind of dog sleep, in a snug corner of the vehicle. Shaking his ears and rubbing his eyes, "I think, young gentleman," said he, "you favored us just now with a quotation from Sophocles; I do not happen to recollect it there." "O, sir," replied the tyro, "the quotation is word for word as I have repeated it, and from Sophocles, too; but I suspect, sir, it is some time since you were at college." The professor, applying his hand to his great-coat pocket, and taking out a small pocket edition of Sophocles, quietly asked him if he could be kind enough to show him the passage in question in that little book. After rummaging the pages for some time, he replied, "Upon second thoughts, I now recollect that the passage is in Euripides." "Then perhaps, sir," said the professor, putting his hand again into his pocket, and handing him a similar edition of Euripides, "you will be so good as to find it for me in that little book." The young Oxonian again returned to his task, but with no better success, muttering, however, to himself, a vow never again to quote Greek in a stage-coach. The tittering of the ladies informed him plainly that he had got into a hobble. At last, "Why, sir," said he, "how dull I am! I recollect now; yes, now I perfectly remember that the passage is in Æschylus." The inexorable professor returned to his inexhaustible pocket, and was in the act of handing him an Æschylus, when our astonished freshman vociferated, "Coachman! holla, coachman! let me out; I say instantly let me out! There's a fellow here has the whole Bodleian library in his pocket."

1567. HERMANN A SMOKER.

The German students and professors have been almost as much noted for their devotion to the Indian weed as to the ancient classics. Passow, in one of his letters, makes the following allusion to the noted philologist Hermann: "Hermann is a splendid fellow, if he did not smoke quite so much tobacco. Lately, he smoked thirty-six pipes over the Iliad in a single day! When I called on him the first time, he talked with me standing; but when he heard that I came from Gotha, he at once shoved me a chair, which struck me so drolly that I began to laugh. It struck him, too, as a little funny, and so we both set up a loud shout."

162. AMBITION, ENERGY, AND ENTHUSIASM.

1566. CHEKE'S SYSTEM OF ENGLISH ORTHOGRAPHY.

Sir John Cheke.

The learned Sir John Cheke, the most accomplished Greek scholar of his age, descended from correcting the Greek pronunciation to invent a system of English orthography. Cheke was no formal pedant; with an enlarged notion of the vernacular language, he aimed to restore the English of his day to what then he deemed to be its purity. He would allow of no words but such as were true English, or of Saxon original; admitting of no adoption of any foreign word into the English language, which at this early period our scholar deemed sufficiently copious. He objected to the English translation of the Bible, for its introduction of many foreign words; and to prove them unnecessary, he retranslated the Gospel of St. Matthew, written on his own system of new orthography. His ear was nice, and his Attic taste had the singular merit of giving concision to the perplexed periods of our early style. But his orthography deterred the eyes of his readers; however the learned Cheke was right in his abstract principle, it operated wrong when put in practice.

1569. HERMANN'S ENTHUSIASM.

The following extract from a letter from Professor Hermann to Schütz shows the enthusiasm of the great philologist to fine advantage:—

"Respected Sir: Together with the Clouds of Aristophanes, the stern Eumenides ventures to appear before you. You will wonder at my boldness and rapidity; but since the way in these untrodden regions was opened by you, the study of Æschylus has been my favorite employment. This mighty genius has enchained and enkindled my soul. His strains sound in my ear like a battle shout from the field of Marathon; and, in the enthusiasm of the moment, many a time I fancy that I unriddle the deep sense of his dark words. I feel as if I were myself a poet; what I have found I cannot keep to myself. If the work can abide a severe scrutiny,—if it can endure yours, which I most desire,—I shall be inexpressibly happy. If it should fail of this, my love of truth, which, if not innate, must have been instilled into me by my invaluable teacher Reiz, would render it easy to acknowledge my errors. For to acknowledge an error is to see the point from whence progress is to be made; to defend it is to retreat. If you will have the goodness to gratify me with your valuable opinion, you will thereby greatly increase the obligation and the affection with which I shall never cease to be yours."

1570. RUNNING A RACE TO WIN IT.

An original, coarse, self-confident youth, seventeen years of age, came to Heyne, proposing to study nothing but philology. Heyne knew the usages of the schools to be such that few men would be supported as mere philologists. He therefore discouraged the young man, saying that it was customary for every student to choose one of the learned professions, and study philology in connection with that; and added, that there were but four or five professorships in all Germany, where a professor of classical philology would be supported. The determined youth replied, very characteristically, "I intend to have one of them." This young man was Wolf, subsequently the author of the celebrated Prolegomena to Homer. The interview was not very gratifying to either party. Wolf expected to be received with open arms, and applauded for his courage and zeal. Heyne desired to see more modesty and civility. The result was, that, while the greatest classical scholar in Germany was lecturing, year after year, with unbounded applause, on Homer, the young man who was destined to become the greatest Homeric critic of his age was prosecuting his studies in the very same place, and yet would not attend those lectures—the only lectures, it would be supposed, in which he would take any special interest. That bold spirit was only nerved to greater daring by the repulse which he met with. He resolved, on the spot, to become the rival, rather than the disciple. In the case of another, this would have been a great mistake; but in the case of Wolf, it was not so. He had a spirit which nothing could discourage, and an intellectual energy which loved to grapple with difficulties. His course was his own, and the results were his own. Had he been disciplined by Heyne, he might have been less paradoxical as a critic, and less rough and self-willed as a man; but the world might never have been blessed with the Homeric heresy.

1571. A POOR BOY'S FORCE OF CHARACTER.

It would be wrong to attribute all the improvement made in philology to Heyne. Twelve years earlier, another poor boy, son of a cobbler, was born in Stendal, about midway between Berlin and Hamburg. The extraordinary force of his character alone raised him above the occupation of his father. He pushed his way along in the world by his own resoluteness and unconquerable love of knowledge. In the Latin school—into which he found his way, nobody knows how—he maintained himself, as Luther did, by singing before the doors of the great, and by giving private lessons in music. In his sixteenth year he went to Berlin, in order to enjoy better literary advantages. Fabricius had recently died; and the extensive and select library of that great scholar was about to be sold in Hamburg by public auction. This poor country boy felt an insatiable desire for some of the choice editions of the classics contained in that library. He accordingly undertook the journey from Berlin to Hamburg on foot, a distance of about one hundred and sixty miles, and on his way, begged of the rich the money for the purchase, and returned on foot, with the books on his shoulders. We cannot pursue his early career any farther. He entered the University of Halle. Afterwards he became corrector, or usher, in the gymnasium of Seehausen, where he laid the foundation of his Greek scholarship. Having struggled with numerous difficulties, and made various fruitless attempts to enter upon a higher course, he finally succeeded in becoming librarian to a nobleman near Dresden, where his aspiring genius not only found nourishment in the literary treasures of that city, but received its proper direction from the collections of art which adorn this Florence of Germany. It was here that the way was at length opened for his being transferred to Rome, and placed in the midst of the ruins of the ancient world. He was at first secretary to one of the cardinals, who needed the aid of a Greek scholar in his library. Winckelmann's progress in ancient learning and ancient art was wonderful. He read all the remains of Greek literature, in order to throw their concentrated light upon the history of art. Not only were these productions, including fragments and inscriptions, interpreted with philological severity, but the original text was criticized and corrected as it had been done by no student of art before him. He was soon regarded as the first Grecian in Rome. His History of Ancient Art was no sooner published, than it placed him at the head of that department of learning in Europe. He was made superintendent of all the antiquities in and about Rome, and afterwards president of the Society of Antiquarians. The most interesting fact to us is, that through Winckelmann classical literature was associated with the elegant arts. The cultivation of a Grecian taste now became distinctly an object of the student's ambition; and by the confluence of the two new streams of learning, which flowed fresh from the schools of Heyne and Winckelmann, was produced that style of scholarship which is at present the chief characteristic of German philology, and which is most perfectly represented, in all its parts and due proportions, in the lamented Charles Otfried Müller, of Göttingen, a scholar whose early death has deprived classical learning of one of its chief ornaments.

1572. DIFFICULTIES OVERCOME BY YOUNG HEYNE.

Heyne was a native of Chemnitz, in the kingdom of Saxony. His parents lived in the greatest poverty. Want was the earliest companion of his childish sports. The first impressions made upon his heart were those produced by a mother's tears, on returning to her house at the close of the week, without having sold enough of the cloth woven by her husband to furnish bread for their children. His earliest employment was to wander about, endeavoring to force the sale of this article, in times of great commercial depression. Indeed, his father's condition was not unlike that of the starving English operatives at this moment. The heart of young Heyne was driven to desperation, and the hungry boy was naturally enough a violent Chartist in feeling; and he afterwards attributed it to the kindness of Providence, that there was no popular tumult to set fire to his patriotic soul. He entered the school in the faubourg, and, during the first year, gave lessons to little children, in order to raise money to pay his own tuition. At length the ordinary instruction in the school no longer met his wants, and, to take lessons in Latin would cost three cents a week more, which neither he nor his parents could provide. One day, as he was sent to a distant relative for a loaf of bread, his countenance showed that he had been weeping. On inquiry, it was ascertained that poverty kept him from those studies which he longed to pursue, and the three cents a week were at once promised him. The boy returned, tossing his loaf into the air, and bounding, with his bare feet, like a lamb. As he made rapid progress in his studies, the time soon came when he could learn no more at the school in the suburbs. At this period, if there had been the least encouragement to industry, he would have become a weaver like his father. His fondest desire was to enter the Latin school within the walls of the town; but it whence his guldens a week for tuition, his books, and his blue mantle? A pastor in the faubourg had received good accounts of the boy's talents and scholarship, and was, moreover, his second sponsor. These circumstances induced the good preacher to have the youth examined by a competent instructor; and, the examination turning out favorably, he sent him to the Latin school, at his own expense. In this school he remained seven years, during which period he made great progress in his studies.

At the age of nineteen he went to Leipsic; but, on arriving at the university, he learnt, for the first time, that his support was to be discontinued. Indeed, he had earned his living, for some time, by giving private lessons; but he had been encouraged to expect the continued aid of the old preacher. Thus, with but two guldens in his pocket—less than two dollars—with a slender wardrobe, and with no books, he found himself a stranger, in a large city, about to enter the university. Most boys would have returned home at once, and have abandoned a pursuit beset with so many difficulties. Heyne was willing to endure any hardship, if he might go on with his studies. His sufferings at this period were almost incredible. He was reduced to such extreme distress, that a waiting-maid was moved to compassion, and actually supplied him daily with food from her own wages. "Dear creature," he afterwards exclaimed, when at the head of the critics of his age, "could I now but find thee among the living, how gladly would I repay thee!" Some of the professors admitted him gratuitously to their lectures; one of them lent him books, and gave him advice, and, among other things, advised him to follow Scaliger's example, and read the Greek authors through, in chronological order. He followed the advice with such ardor, or, in his own language, "with such folly," that for more than six months he slept only two nights in the week. But another professor sent the beadle to demand the tuition for a course of lectures, a part of which only he had attended. Heyne was in distress. He had never succeeded in obtaining a stipend. He often had to buy his dinner with less than three pfennigs, or about one cent. At this time he had an opportunity of becoming a private tutor in a family. "But I perceived," he observes, in his autobiography, "that to leave the university then would ruin my scholarship for life. For several days I struggled under these contending influences. I cannot now comprehend how it was that I had the courage to decline the offer, and to pursue my studies at the university." These are among the most interesting incidents in Heyne's early life. But his evil star followed him to the very day of his appointment to the most important philological professorship in Germany. Even after he had finished his course in the university, and while he was in Dresden, living on promises of promotion, he could not afford to hire lodgings. A friend permitted him to stay in his room, but could offer him no bed. He slept on the floor, with books for his pillow. Heeren, his son-in-law and biographer, says, that "a sort of soup, made of the empty pods of peas, was often his only repast." After a few years, when the place of Gesner, the celebrated professor of languages in Göttingen, became vacant by his death, Ruhnken, of Leyden, was invited to fill it. But he preferred not to leave Holland, where he had resided so long, and was so advantageously situated, and declined the appointment, adding the inquiry, why the university should think it necessary to go out of the country to find a worthy successor of Gesner; and affirming that there was a young man in Saxony who would soon fill Europe with his fame; that his name was Christian Gottlob Heyne. A letter was immediately addressed to Ernesti, in Leipsic, to ascertain where the individual was to be found. All that Ernesti could say was, that there was such a young man, and that he was somewhere in Dresden. Letters were then sent to the Saxon capital, but no information respecting Heyne could at first be obtained. Thus the residence of the candidate for the most important professorship in Germany could not, without difficulty, be found. Ruhnken and Hemsterhuys, in Holland, had read his edition of Tibullus, and predicted his future greatness; and their word overcame all the doubts arising from the fact of his obscurity. From the hour of that appointment we are to date the origin of the present school of German philology. Gesner and Ernesti had previously introduced a better taste; but the comprehensiveness and thoroughness of modern German philology are first found in Heyne.

Until his time, classical literature did not form a distinct profession. It was but a subsidiary branch of the other professions, especially of theology. Heyne was the first man who took his position, not as a theologian, or jurist, but as a philologist by profession. He enlarged the domain of philology, marked out its boundaries, and arranged its parts into a complete and independent system.

The following extract of a letter from Passow to Broom, in 1804, gives a good idea of the methods of study adopted by the philologists of Leipsic, and of the character of some of the most celebrated scholars:—

"Beck is unquestionably the first theologian here; he possesses an immense amount of theological, philological, and historical learning, well digested and arranged. But it is impossible to conceive of a colder man; and this lifeless manner, unhappily, appears in every word he utters. . . . The exercises in his Latin Society are particularly valuable to me. Each member, twelve in all, selects a classic author for his examination, and hands in to the professor, in single sheets, as fast as they are prepared, his comments, written in Latin. Every member takes his turn, once in six weeks, and reads his commentary before the society, where it is freely criticized, and the topics involved discussed by all the members. I have selected for my exercises, as comprehending the system of Platonic love, the Symposia of Xenophon and Plato, Phædrus, and a part of Maximus Tyrius. Professor Hermann, from whom I am hearing a grand course of lectures on the Edipus Tyrannus of Sophocles, has received me into his Philological Society, which is on the same plan as Beck's, except that speaking and writing Greek are included. In his society, I interpret the Ajnx and the Trachiniae of Sophocles. Hermann, who has just published an edition of Orpheus, and is now preparing a huge commentary on the Agamemnon of Æschylus, is exactly the opposite of Beck, and has many remote resemblances to Jacobs, only he becomes communicative as soon as you know him. He always enters his lecture-room in full riding-dress, with spurs and whip; and in the Philological Society, a stranger would scarce know who presided, but for the exhaustless stores of the professor's learning; for one is very much at ease with him, and he has still a very youthful look, being but thirty-two years old. He is the only professor that is universally beloved, notwithstanding he sometimes deals in biting sarcasm."

1574. CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AT GÖTTINGEN.

The Society of Philologists, formed in Germany a few years ago, originated thus: In 1837, the University of Göttingen held its centennial celebration. The festival of a university which could look back upon so proud a century as that which marked the history of this celebrated seat of learning naturally attracted an unusual assemblage of scholars. Distinguished philologists of all parties met together, forgetting their animosities, and embracing each other as fellow-laborers in the same great enterprise, though contemplating it from different points of view.

So touching was the scene, and so delightful the magnanimous feelings with which those who participated in it greeted each other, that Thiersch, the pillar of Greek learning in Bavaria, a man of the noblest enthusiasm, as well as of great eloquence, gave utterance to his struggling emotions, and ventured, in his remarks, to propose the formation of a society which should secure the annual recurrence of such occasions. A special meeting was called to consider the subject, at which Humboldt presided. The proposal was received with acclamation, and the first meeting was appointed to be held in Nuremberg, in 1838, at which Thiersch was to preside. In 1839, the society met at Manheim.

Frederic Jacobs, whose age and partial deafness prevented him from attending the first meeting where his name had been mentioned with particular marks of respect, had also decided not to attend the second. But Rost of Gotha resorted to a stratagem, which was successful in procuring the attendance of Jacobs. At the age of seventy-five, he undertook his four days' journey, travelling forty miles a day, and calling, as he went, on his literary friends at Frankfort, Darmstadt, and Heidelberg. When this amiable old man and popular writer—the favorite of all parties—arrived, he could not decline addressing the assembled classical teachers of his country, mostly of the younger generation. He spoke in an affecting strain of eloquence, which was received with unusual applause. After the meeting, the principal members of the society appointed Hermann of Marburg to draw up a special communication in Latin, addressed to Jacobs, testifying in the warmest terms their respect for him as one of the most accomplished of classical scholars, and their personal regards for him as a man and as a friend. This circumstance called him out, in another public speech, on a subsequent day, so that the occasion was a kind of jubilee to that noble representative of the past generation.

LITERARY MEN AND LITERATURE.

1575. VOLUMINOUS AUTHORS.

Dr. Cotton Mather, who died in Boston in 1728, was a man of unequalled industry, vast learning, and most disinterested benevolence. No person in America had at that time so large a library, or had read so many books, or had retained so much of what they had read. It was his custom to read fifteen chapters in the Bible every day. He wrote over his study door, in capital letters, "BE SHORT." In one year he kept sixty fasts and twenty vigils, and published fourteen books. His publications amounted in all to three hundred and eighty-two, some of them being of huge dimensions. His Magnalia was the largest; it consisted of seven folio volumes. His Essays to do Good are read with pleasure and profit even now. He lived to the age of sixty-five years.

His father, Dr. Increase Mather, was also a man of great industry and erudition for the age in which he lived, and but little behind the son in point of mental activity and usefulness. He is said to have spent sixteen hours a day in his study; and his sermons and other publications were very numerous. In a volume entitled Remarkables of the Life of Dr. Increase Mather, is a catalogue of no less than eighty-five of his publications, not including many learned and useful prefaces written for other books. He died in his eighty-fifth year, having been a preacher sixty-six years.

For abundance of literary productions, however, both these learned men must yield the palm to Didymus of Alexandria, who lived in the time of Augustus. He was one of the greatest critics and grammarians of his age. He was called Ironides, because he wrote four thousand books.

1576. LOUIS XVI. READING IN PRISON.

It may not be generally known that Louis XVI. was quite a literary man, and to some extent an author. His first work was a collection of maxims from Fenelon. Subsequently he translated a portion of Gibbon's History, and caused it to be published in the name of Le Clerc de Sept Chenes, his reader. Indeed, he was fond of literary occupation even to a fault.

During his imprisonment, he was, till shortly before his death, denied pen, ink, and paper. His usual employment, therefore, was the instruction of his son, and reading. He preferred Latin authors to French. He read, almost every day, portions of Tacitus, Livy, Seneca, Horace, and Terence. The works which he read in his native language were chiefly travels. On the evening before his death, he found that he had read, during an imprisonment of five months and seven days, — or in all one hundred and fifty-nine days, — no less than one hundred and fifty-seven volumes.

1577. LOVE OF BOOKS IN EXILE.

Maurice, Prince of Isenbourg, greatly distinguished himself by his courage during a service of twenty years, under Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick, and Marshal Broglie, and in the war between the Russians and Turks. Health and repose — every thing which can make life delightful — were sacrificed to the gratification of his ambition and love of glory.

During his service in the Russian army, he fell under the displeasure of the empress, and was sent into exile. The calamitous condition to which persons exiled by this government are reduced is well known.

But this philosophic prince contrived to render even a Russian banishment agreeable. While oppressed, both in body and mind, by the painful reflection which his situation at first created, and reduced by his anxieties to a mere skeleton, he accidentally met with the Essay on Exile, written by Lord Bolingbroke. He read it several times, and even made a translation of it. "And in proportion to the number of times I read it," he tells us in the elegant and nervous preface he wrote to it, "I felt all my sorrows and disquietudes vanish away."

1578. ALEXANDER AND HIS BOOKS.

Alexander the Great was passionately fond of reading; and whilst the world resounded with his victories; whilst blood and carnage marked his progress; whilst he dragged captive monarchs at his chariot wheels, and marched with increasing ardor over smoking towns and desolated provinces in search of new objects of victory. — he felt during certain intervals the languor of unemployed time; and lamenting that Asia afforded no books to amuse or instruct him, he wrote to Harpalus to send him the works of Philistus, the tragedies of Euripides, Sophocles, Æschylus, and the dithyrambics of Thalestes.

1579. LEARNED SLAVES.

Crassus — one of the wealthiest unthroned individuals on record, and probably as wealthy as Louis Philippe, if not as Cæsar — owed his greatest riches to his manufacture of highly accomplished slaves, to whose education in various arts he sedulously, and even personally attended: and these slaves, if we may believe a writer in the Foreign Quarterly, who quotes from Plutarch's romances, were sold at enormous prices. In those days, a rich man could readily purchase a poet to write his own name into reputation; and Seneca tells of a pretender to literature keeping many learned slaves, for each of which he had given above four thousand dollars, the cost of a mere laborer varying from fifteen to one hundred and fifty dollars.

1580. DYING IN THE HARNESS.

Rev. Dr. Charles Chauncey, the second president of Harvard College, may be truly said to have "died in the harness." Till more than eighty years of age, he was a most indefatigable student, making it his constant practice to rise in the morning at four o'clock. When he was eighty years old, as he was going to preach on a winter's day, his friends observed to him that he would certainly die in the pulpit; but he only pressed the more vigorously through the snow-drifts, observing, "How glad I should be if this should prove true!" He died soon after this, at the age of eighty-one.

Rev. William Woodbridge, the father of William C. Woodbridge, the great American geographer, had been a minister and teacher more than fifty years, when he also died in the harness. At the time of his death, he was teaching a female school at Franklin, Conn., in midwinter, and on the Sabbath supplying the pulpit of the venerable Dr. Nott. His age could not have been much less than eighty.

The manner of death of the late John Quincy Adams is too recent and well known to require any thing more than a mere allusion to the fact.

1581. WIT SPICED WITH WISDOM.

Philip, King of Macedon, having invited Dionysius the younger to dine with him at Corinth, attempted to deride the father of his royal guest, because he had blended the characters of prince and poet, and had employed his leisure in writing odes and tragedies. "How could the king find leisure," said Philip, "to write such trifles?" "In those hours," answered Dionysius, "which you and I spend in drunkenness and debauchery."

1582. BRUTUS IN HIS TENT.

Brutus, the avenger of the violated liberties of Rome, while serving in the army under Pompey, employed among books all the moments he could spare from the duties of his station, and was even thus employed during the awful night which preceded the celebrated battle of Pharsalia, by which the fate of the empire was decided. Oppressed by the excessive heat of the day, and by the preparatory arrangement of the army, which was encamped in the middle of summer on a marshy plain, he sought relief from the bath, and retired to his tent, where, whilst others were locked in the arms of sleep, he employed himself until the morning dawned in drawing a plan from the history of Polybius.

Safes have become so common, where there is much exposure to danger from fires, that few business men are to be found without them. But the best and most-to-be-approved safe we have read of is that which is referred to in the following anecdote from Zimmerman:—

"When Demetrius had captured the city of Megara, and the property of the inhabitants had been entirely pillaged by the soldiers, he recollected that Stilpo, a philosopher of great reputation, who sought only the retirement and tranquillity of a studious life, was among the number. Having sent for him, Demetrius asked him if he had lost any thing during the pillage. "No," replied the philosopher; "my property is safe, for it exists only in my mind."

1584. ANECDOTE OF CICERO.

Cicero, who was more sensible of mental pleasures than those of any other kind, says in his oration for the poet Archias, "Why should I be ashamed to acknowledge pleasures like these, since for so many years the enjoyment of them has never prevented me from relieving the wants of others, or deprived me of the courage to attack vice and defend virtue? Who can justly blame—who can censure me—who while others are pursuing the views of interest, gazing at festal shows and idle ceremonies, exploring new pleasures, engaged in midnight revels, in the distraction of gaming, the madness of intemperance, neither reposing the body nor recreating the mind, I spend the recollective hours in a pleasing review of my past life—in dedicating my time to learning and the Muses?"

1585. THE TWO PLINYs.

Pliny the elder devoted every moment of his life to learning. A person read to him during his meals, and he never travelled without a book and a portable writing-desk by his side. He made extracts from every work he read, and scarcely conceiving himself alive while his faculties were absorbed in sleep, endeavored by his diligence to double the duration of his existence.

Pliny the younger read upon all occasions, whether riding, walking or sitting, whenever a moment's leisure afforded him the opportunity. Yet he made it an invariable rule to prefer the discharge of the duties of his station to those occupations which he followed only as an amusement. It was this disposition that so strongly inclined him to solitude and retirement. "Shall I never," he would exclaim in moments of vexation, "break the fetters by which I am restrained? Are they indissoluble? Alas!

I have no hope of being gratified. Every day brings new torments. No sooner is one duty performed than another succeeds. The chains of business become every hour more weighty and extensive."

1586. A SELF-EDUCATED MAN.

Robert Dodsley, an eminent bookseller and ingenious writer, was born at Mansfield, in England, in 1703. He wrote Cleon, a tragedy, and several other dramatic pieces, a poem on agriculture, and was highly esteemed in the literary world. Yet he was very little indebted to the schools for his elevation, but chiefly to what is called natural genius, and an early and insatiable fondness for reading. He was originally a mere livery servant.

1587. THE NOBLE ROMAN.

Manlius Curius, the noblest Roman of the age, having vanquished several warlike nations, driven Pyrrhus out of Italy, and enjoyed three times the honor of a triumph, retired to his cottage in the country, and there cultivated with his own victorious hands his little farm, where the ambassadors from the Samnites arrived, to offer him a large present of gold, he was found seated in his chimney corner dressing turnips. The noble recluse refused the present, and gave the ambassadors this answer: "A man that can be satisfied with such a supper has no need of gold; and I think it more glorious to conquer the owners of it than to possess it myself."

1588. PETRARCH AND THE BISHOP.

The mind of Petrarch was always gloomy and dejected except when he was reading, writing, or resigned to the agreeable illusions of poetry, upon the banks of some inspiring stream, among the romantic rocks and mountains, or the flower-enclosed valleys of the Alps. To avoid the loss of time during his travels, he constantly wrote at every inn where he stopped for refreshment.

One of his friends,—the Bishop of Cavaillon,—being alarmed lest the intense application with which he studied at Vaucluse might totally ruin a constitution already much impaired, requested of him, one day, the key of his library. Petrarch immediately gave it to him, without asking the reason of his request, when the good bishop, instantly locking up his books and writing-desk, said, "Petrarch, I hereby interdict you from the use of pen, ink, and paper, for the space of ten days."

The sentence was severe; but the offender suppressed his feelings, and submitted to his fate. The first day of exile from his favorite pursuits was tedious, the second was accompanied with incessant headache, and the third brought on symptoms of an approaching fever. The bishop, observing his indisposition, kindly returned him the key, and thus restored him to his health.

1589. DISORDERLY HABITS OF DUBOIS.

Cardinal Dubois, prime minister of France, was exceedingly tardy in the fulfilment of his duty, and irregular in all his proceedings. His papers were as much disordered as the builders of Babel were, on the confusion of tongues. When he wanted any memoranda, he was obliged to turn over large piles of lumber, and, being exceedingly irritable, he would stop and give vent to his passion whenever (which was usually the case) his researches were fruitless. One of his clerks, on one occasion, advised him to get a person to perform this ceremony for him, as it would be the means of preventing much delay.

1590. THE SILENT CLUB.

There was at Amadan a celebrated academy. Its first rule was framed in these words:—

"The members of this academy shall think much, write little, and be as mute as they can."

A candidate offered himself—he was too late—the vacancy was filled up. They knew his merit, and lamented their disappointment in lamenting his own. The president was to announce the event; he desired the candidate should be introduced.

He appeared with a simple and modest air,—the sure testimony of merit. The president rose, and presented a cup of pure water to him, so full that a single drop more would have made it overflow: to this emblematical hint he added not a word, but his countenance expressed deep affliction.

The candidate understood that he could not be received because the number was complete, and the assembly full; yet he maintained his courage, and began to think by what expedient, in the same kind of language, he could explain that a supernumerary academician would displace nothing, and make no essential difference in the rule they had prescribed.

Observing at his feet a rose, he picked it up, and laid it gently upon the surface of the water, so gently that not a drop of it escaped. Upon this ingenious reply, the applause was universal; the rule slept or winked in his favor. They presented immediately to him the register upon which the successful candidate was in the habit of writing his name. He wrote it accordingly; he had only to thank them in a single phrase, but he chose to thank them without saying a word.

He figured upon the margin the number of his new associates, 100; then, having put a cipher before the 1, he wrote under it, "Their value will be the same—0100."

To this modesty the ingenious president replied with a politeness equal to his address; he put the figure 1 before the 100, and wrote, "They will have eleven times the value they had—1100."

1591. BYRON AND THE TAILOR.

In the world of anecdotes, one is told of Lord Byron, which is ludicrous, if not instructive. Willis heard it at "a company of very celebrated authors," and from the lips of one of "the celebrated." Here it is:—

He said that Byron would never have gone to Greece but for a tailor in Genoa. The noble bard, he went to say, was very economical, as was well known in small matters. He had hired a villa at Genoa, and furnished it, with the intention of making it a permanent residence. Lord and Lady Blessington, and a large society of English people of good style, were residing there at the time. In the fullest enjoyment of his house and his mode of life, Byron wanted a new coat; and, having some English cloth, he left it, with his measure, in the hands of a Genoese tailor, with no particular instructions as to the making.

The tailor, overcome with the honor of making a coat for an Eccellenza Inglese, embroidered it from collar to tail, and sent it home with a bill as thickly embroidered as the coat. Byron kept the coat, for fear of its being sold, as his, to an actor of English parts on the stage, but resolutely refused to pay for more than the making of a plain and plebeian garment. The tailor threatened an attachment, and Byron assigned over his furniture to his banker, and finally quitted Genoa in disgust, ready, of course, as he would not otherwise have been, for a new project.

From indignation at an embroidered coat tail, the transition to "liberty or death!" "woc to the Moslem!" or any other vent for his accumulated bile, was easy and natural. He embarked in the Greek cause soon after, and the embroidered coat was not (as it should have been) "flung to the breeze at Salamis"—the banner of inspired heroism.

1592. ARISTOTLE ON LEARNING.

Aristotle was asked what were the advantages of learning. He replied, "It is an ornament to a man in prosperity, and a refuge to him in adversity."

1593. DR JOHNSON'S PUDDING.

The following anecdote, derived from the notes of a traveller, may or may not be true; but it bears some of the marks of truth. In any event, if there be truth in the maxim, "Laugh and be fat," it may do good to insert it. We give it in the words of the traveller himself.

Last summer I made an excursion to Scotland, with a view of completing my series of views, and went over the same grounds described by the learned tourists Dr. Johnson and Boswell. I am in the habit of taking very long walks on these occasions, and, perceiving a storm threaten, I made the best of my way to a small building. I arrived in time at a neat little inn, and was received by a respectable looking man and his wife, who did all in their power to make me comfortable. The landlord I found to be, as the Scotch generally are, very intelligent, and full of anecdote, of which the following may serve as a specimen:—

"Sir," said he, "this inn was formerly kept by Andrew McGregor, a relation of mine; and these hard-bottomed chairs in which we are now sitting, were years ago filled by the great tourists Dr. Johnson and Boswell, travelling like the lion and jackall. Boswell usually preceded the doctor in search of food. Being much pleased with the cooks of the house, he followed his nose into the larder, where he saw a fine leg of mutton: he ordered it to be roasted with the utmost expedition, and gave particular orders for a nice pudding. 'Now,' said he, 'make the best of pudding.' Elated with his good luck, he immediately went out in search of his friend, and saw the giant of learning slowly advancing on a pony.

"My dear sir," said Boswell, out of breath with joy and good news, 'I have just bespoke, in a comfortable and clean inn here, a delicious leg of mutton; it is now getting ready, and I flatter myself we shall make an excellent meal.'

"Johnson looked pleased. 'And I hope,' said he, 'you have bespoke a pudding.'

"'Sir, you have your favorite pudding,' said the other.

"Johnson got off the pony; the poor animal, relieved of the giant, smelt his way into the stable. Boswell ushered the doctor into the house, and left him to prepare for the delicious treat. Johnson felt his coat rather damp from the mists of the mountains, went into the kitchen, and threw his upper garment on a chair before the fire. He sat on a hob near a little boy, who was very busy attending to the meat. Johnson occasionally peeped from behind his coat, while the boy kept basting the mutton. Johnson, moreover, did not like in the least the appearance of his head when he shifted the basting ladle from one hand, and the other was never idle; and the doctor thought at the same time he saw something fall on the meat, upon which he determined to eat no mutton on that day. The dinner being announced, Boswell exclaimed.—

"'My dear doctor, here comes the mutton. What a picture! Done to a turn, and looks so beautifully brown!'

"The doctor tittered. After a short grace, Boswell said,—

"'I suppose I have to carve, as usual. What part shall I help you to?'

"The doctor replied, 'My dear boy, I did not like to tell you before, but I am determined to abstain from meat to-day.'

"'O, dear, this is a disappointment,' said Boswell.

"'Say no more. I shall make myself ample amends with the pudding.'

"Boswell commenced the attack and made the first cut at the mutton. 'How the gravy runs! What fine-flavored fat, so nice and brown, too! Ah, sir, you would have relished this prime piece of mutton.'

"The meat being removed, in came the long-wished-for pudding. The doctor looked joyous; fell eagerly to, and in a few minutes nearly finished, all the pudding. And Mr. Boswell said,—

"'Doctor, while I was carving the mutton, you seemed inclined to laugh; pray tell me what tickled your fancy?'

"The doctor then literally told him all that had passed at the kitchen fire, about the boy and the basting. Boswell turned as pale as a par-nip, and, sick of himself and the company, darted out of the room. Somewhat relieved on returning, he insisted on seeing the dirty little rascally boy, whom he severely reprimanded before Johnson. The poor boy cried—the doctor laughed.

"'You snivelling fellow,' said Boswell, 'why did you not put on the cap I saw you in this morning.'

"'I couldn't, sir,' said the boy.

"'Why couldn't you?' said Boswell.

"'Because my mamma took it from me to boil the pudding in.'

"The doctor gathered up his herculean frame—stood erect—touched the ceiling with his wig—squinted—indeed, looked any way but the right way. At last, with mouth wide open, and none of the smallest, and stomach heaving, he, with some difficulty, recovered his breath, and looking at Boswell with dignified contempt, he roared out,—

"Mr. Boswell, sir, leave off laughing, and, under pain of my eternal displeasure, never utter a single syllable of this abominable adventure to any man living while you breathe."

1594. DAVY'S BEQUEST.

Humphry Davy's great invention, the safety lamp, which might have been a source of great profit to him, he presented, with characteristic liberality, to the public. When pressed to secure to himself the benefit of a patent, he declined to do so, in conformity with the high-minded resolution, which he formed upon acquiring independent wealth, of never making his scientific eminence subservient to gain, he uttered the following remarkable words: "I have enough for all my views and purposes. More wealth might be troublesome, and distract my attention from those pursuits in which I delight. More wealth could not increase my fame or happiness. It might undoubtedly enable me to put four horses to my carriage; but what would it avail me to have it said that Sir Humphry drives his carriage and four?"

Which is the easiest — to make this resolution and abide by it, when in the possession of ten thousand dollars or one hundred thousand dollars? And in which case is the renunciation most praiseworthy?

1595. DISINTERESTEDNESS.

One of the noblest bequests ever made by a literary man to the public, was that of Viscount Fitzwilliam of Ireland. This illustrious nobleman left to the University of Cambridge his Alma Mater, his splendid library, pictures, drawings, and engravings, together with sixty thousand pounds sterling, for the erection of a museum for their reception and exhibition. In this valuable collection there are more than ten thousand proof prints by the first artists, with a very extensive library of rare and costly works, among which are nearly three hundred Roman Missals finely illuminated.

1596. LAVATER AND PHYSIOGNOMY

As a physiognomist, Lavater has shown himself an original observer, and may even claim to be called, in some sense, a discoverer. He differed from all who had preceded him in this science, in directing his attention rather to the firm and stationary — "the defined and defiable" — parts of the countenance, than to those which are movable and accidental. He distinguished between what is superficial in the character — the passions and accidental determinations of the individual — and the original self. The former he supposed to be indicated by the movable and muscular parts of the countenance, the latter by the firm and bony. In order to form an opinion of the character from the face, he required to see the face at rest — in sleep or in an unconscious state.

The following anecdote is related by his son-in-law, G. Gessner, as an instance of his practical skill in this science: "A person to whom he was an entire stranger was once announced and introduced to him as a visitor. The first idea that rose in his mind, the moment he saw him, was, 'This man is a murderer.' He, however, immediately suppressed the thought as unjustifiably hasty and severe, and conversed with the person with his accustomed civility. The cultivated understanding, extensive information, and ease of manner which he discovered in his visitor inspired him with the highest respect for his intellectual endowments; and his esteem for these, added to his natural candor and benevolence, induced him to disregard the unfavorable impression he had received from his first appearance, with respect to his moral character. The next day, he dined with him by invitation; but soon after, it was known that this accomplished gentleman was one of the assassins of the late King of Sweden; and he found it advisable to leave the country as soon as possible."

In Goethe's reminiscences of Lavater occurs the following: "Not long after this, I came into connection with Lavater also. The Letter of a Pastor to his Colleagues (one of Goethe's youthful productions) had been very luminous to him, in passages; for there was much in it that fully coincided with his own sentiments. With his ceaseless driving, our correspondence soon became very brisk. He was just making earnest preparations for his larger Physiognomik. He called upon every body to send him drawings, profiles, but especially pictures of Christ; and although what I could render in this way amounted to almost nothing, he insisted upon it, once for all, that he would have a Savior drawn according to my conception of him. Such requisitions of the impossible gave rise to many jests, and I knew no other way of defending myself against his peculiarities but by turning out my own. . . .

"He had commissioned a not unskilful painter in Frankfort to send him the profiles of several individuals whom he mentioned. The sender allowed himself the jest of sending Bahrdt's portrait at first, instead of mine; whereupon came back a pleasant, indeed, but a thundering epistle, with all sorts of trumps and asseverations that this could not be my picture, and with whatever else Lavater, on such an occasion, might have to say in confirmation of his physiognomical doctrine."

1597. POLLISON, CERVANTES, BUNYAN, AND OTHERS.

Pollison, who was fond of literature, was confined in the Bastille for many years; and he asserts that a close application to literary subjects enabled him to soften the rigors of his confinement.

Cervantes, while in prison, composed his famous work for the purpose of amusing himself.

Bunyan wrote the Pilgrim's Progress under similar circumstances.

Dolomieu was confined in a loathsome dungeon, and deprived of pen, ink, and paper; but he pursued his favorite studies, using a bit of a stick for a pen, the snuff of his candle mixed with water for ink; and on the margin of old books, and on scraps of paper, he composed his famous work, Sur la Philosophie Minéralogique.

Thomas Campanella was imprisoned for twenty-seven years in Spain; and he offered his testimony also in favor of science.

1598. IMPORTANCE OF MENTAL AND PHYSICAL CULTURE.

The union of worldly with intellectual matters — of business or professional engagements with literary pursuits — makes a pleasing mixture, and causes the one to serve as a relaxation to the other. Dr. Johnson is said to have exclaimed, "O that I had been brought up to some profession!"

1599. INTENSITY OF MENTAL LABOR.

Boerhaave asserts that after he had engaged himself in some deep and intricate studies, he became unable to sleep for several nights.

Beattie could not endure the sight of his Essay on Truth, after its completion. The remembrance of the mental pain which he had suffered in composing it so agitated his feelings that he looked on it with horror.

1600. GASSENDI, SIR MATTHEW HALE, AND OTHERS.

Gassendi was accustomed to read, throughout the greater part of the night, by the lamp in the parish church, his parents being too poor to supply him with candles.

William Prynne was exceedingly diligent; he read or wrote about sixteen hours in the day. To prevent loss of time, he caused his food to be laid on a table in his study; and when he was hungry, he made a scanty meal.

Sir Matthew Hale relates, with regard to himself, that he labored for sixteen hours in the day during the first two years that he spent in the Inns of Court.

Descartes frequently studied fifteen hours in the day.

M. de Buffon studied twelve or fourteen hours.

Joseph Scaliger was so exceedingly fond of intellectual engagements, that he would sometimes remain in his study for two or three days without food.

John Knox evinced a high opinion of the value of learning, when he said to Queen Mary of Scotland, in his blunt phrasology, "I am here now;

yet I cannot tell what other men shall judge of me, that, at this time of day, I am absent from my book, and waiting at court."

Carnandes was so enamored with the pursuits of knowledge, that he scarcely allowed himself time to pare his nails or comb his hair.

Budæus and Turnebus spent their wedding days in the study.

1601. THE PLEASURE OF RESEARCH.

Something must be alleged in favor of those who may sometimes indulge researches too minutely; perhaps there is a point beyond which nothing remains but useless curiosity; yet this, too, may be relative. The pleasure of these pursuits is only tasted by those who are accustomed to them, and whose employments are thus converted into amusements. "A man of fine genius," A Idison relates, "trained up in all the polite studies of antiquity, upon being obliged to search into several rolls and records, at first found this a very dry and irksome employment; yet he assured me, that at last he took an incredible pleasure in it, and preferred it even to the reading of Virgil and Cicero."

Brutus relates that he saw Marcellus in exile at Mitylene, living in all the happiness of which human nature is capable, and cultivating with as much assiduity as ever all kinds of laudable knowledge. This spectacle made him think that it was rather he who went into banishment, since he was to return without Marcellus, who remained in it. Brutus adds that Cæsar overshot Mitylene, because he could not stand the sight of Marcellus, reduced to a state so unworthy of him.

The eloquence of Cicero, whose oration in favor of Marcellus is extant, procured his recall; the whole senate interceding for him with such earnestness, that they seemed to be suppliants for themselves, rather than for Brutus. "This," says Lord Bolingbroke, "was to return with honor; but surely he remained abroad with greater, when Brutus could not resolve to leave him, nor Cæsar to see him; for both of them bore witness of his merit. Brutus grieved, and Cæsar blushed, to go to Rome without him." Marcellus, however, was assassinated at Athens, on his return home, by Chilo, an old friend and fellow-soldier. Chilo's motive is not explained.

1603. A COUPLE OF SYLLOGISMS.

Notwithstanding the very valuable use of syllogistic reasoning, when properly employed, it has often been used to prove the worst doctrines good, and the grossest falsehoods truths. The following anecdotes may serve as ludicrous specimens of logical perversion:—

Granger, who was a remarkably ugly man, contended that he was the handsomest thing in the world. He proves it thus:—

"The handsomest part of the world," said he,

"is Europe; of Europe, France; of France, Paris; of Paris, the university; of the university, the college of —; in the college of —, the handsomest chamber is mine; in my chamber, I am the handsomest thing — ergo, I am the handsomest thing in the world."

The other specimen is a man who said he would prove a scolloped oyster to be better than heaven; which he attempted by this curious syllogism:—

"A scolloped oyster is better than nothing; and nothing is better than heaven — ergo, a scolloped oyster is better than heaven."

1604. THE STOICAL PROBLEM.

There was a famous problem among the Stoics, which ran thus: "When a man says, 'Lie,' does he lie, or does he not? If he lies, he speaks the truth; if he speaks the truth, he lies." Many were the profound works written on this wonderful problem. Chrysippus favored the world with no less than six; and Philetus studied himself to death in his vain attempts to solve it.

1605. THE DOG'S SYLLOGISM.

On a certain occasion, King James visited the University of Cambridge. Some of the most learned members of the university were appointed to dispute before him. The question was, whether brutes had reason, and could make syllogisms.

Mr. Preston, a fellow of Queen's College, used the following argument for the affirmative: "A hound, when he comes to a place where three ways meet, tries one, and then another, but, finding no scent, runs down the third with full cry, concluding that, as the hare had not taken either of the first two, she must necessarily have taken the third." The argument, we are told, had a wonderful effect upon the learned audience, and especially upon the king, who would have bestowed some church preferment upon its author, but for his known inclination to Puritanism. A nobleman present testified his approbation by settling fifty pounds a year upon him. Logic was certainly at a premium at Cambridge in those days.

1606. THE DILEMMA OF PROTAGORAS.

Protagoras maintained that all is illusion, and that there is no such thing as truth. But Aristotle refuted him by the following dilemma: "Your proposition is true or false; if it is false, then you are answered; if true, then there is something true, and your proposition fails."

§ 168. LYPOGRAMMATISTS.

1607. TRYPHIODORUS, PINDAR, AND OTHERS.

The Greeks composed lypogrammatic works—works in which one letter of the alphabet is omitted. A lypogrammatist is a letter-dropper. In this manner, Tryphiodorus wrote his Odyssey: he had not α in his first book, nor β in his second; and so on with the subsequent letters, one after another. This Odyssey was an imitation of the lypogrammatic Iliad of Nestor. Among other works of this kind, Athenæus mentions an ode by Pindar, in which he had purposely omitted the letter s; so that this incept ingenuity appears to have been one of those literary fashions, which are sometimes encouraged even by those who should first oppose such progresses into the realms of nonsense.

There is in Latin a little prose work of Fulgentius, which the author divides into twenty-three chapters, according to the order of the twenty-three letters of the Latin alphabet. From A to O are still remaining. The first chapter is without A; the second without B; the third without C; and so with the rest. Du Chât. in the Ducatianna, says there are five novels in prose of Lope de Vega; the first without A, the second without E, the third without I, &c. Who will attempt to examine them?

In the Ecloga de Calvis, by Hugbald, the monk, all the words began with a C.

The Orientalists are not without this literary folly. A Persian poet read to the celebrated Jami a gazel of his own composition, which Jami did not like; but the writer replied it was, notwithstanding, a very curious sonnet, for the letter Alif was not to be found in any one of the words! Jami sarcastically replied, "You can do a better thing yet; take away all the letters from every word you have written."

1608. GREGORIO LETI AND LORD NORTH.

Gregorio Leti presented a discourse to the Academy of the Humorists at Rome, throughout which he had purposely omitted the letter R, and he entitled it the exiled R. A friend having requested a copy, as a literary curiosity,—for so he considered this idle performance,—Leti, to show it was not so difficult a matter, replied by a copious answer of seven pages, in which he had observed the same severe ostracism against the letter R. Lord North, one of the finest gentlemen in the court of James I., has written a set of sonnets, each of which begins with a successive letter of the alphabet.

1609. LOPE DE VEGA.

Lope de Vega, the lypogrammatist, was a celebrated Spanish dramatic poet of the sixteenth century. It is said that he printed more than twenty-one million three hundred thousand lines; which, at fifty lines to a page, and four hundred and twenty-six pages to the volume, would be equal to a thousand large volumes. And yet, in one of his latest works, he affirmed that the printed portions of his works were fewer than those which were yet in manuscript, but were ready for the press.

Many have doubted the truth of his statements; but Perez de Montalvan attests that he composed as rapidly in poetry as in prose, and that he could make verses faster than his amanuensis could write them. He estimates his plays at eighteen hundred, and his sacramental pieces, as he calls them, at four hundred. There is no doubt that he was a voluminous writer, and one might almost think that lypogrammatism was not only a convenience to him, but a necessary. Short hand in those days, we believe, was very little understood.

But Lope de Vega was a learned man, as well as a voluminous writer. One of his volumes—the Arradia—makes the shepherds, with their Dulcineas, discuss questions of theology, grammar, rhetoric, arithmetic, geography, music, and poetry. He died at the age of seventy-three.

MANUSCRIPTS.

§ 169. DISCOVERY OF RARE AND VALUABLE
MANUSCRIPTS.

1610. PAPYRUS MANUSCRIPTS OF HERCULANEUM.

It is now nearly a century since the resuscitation of Herculaneum and Pompeii began to attract the attention of antiquaries and lovers of classical literature. Two different elements contributed to the destruction of those two cities, traces of which are to be seen every where. In Pompeii a torrent of volcanic mud was active, and was the cause of the wonderful preservation even of the colors of the paintings; whilst the fire which raged at Herculaneum destroyed almost every thing — except the thoughts of men. It was this destructive element, (the fire,) which, by converting the papyrus into a sort of charcoal, was instrumental in its eventual preservation. It cannot be said that the unrolling of these manuscripts has yet answered the expectations of the public, or the expenses of the Neapolitan government, as it has happened that the library preserved was that of an Epicurean philosopher, and confined to a very limited range of literature. The Neapolitan government has expended in the institution connected with the unrolling of those manuscripts nearly six thousand ducats per month, and the following are the results hitherto obtained from its operations:—

So long back as 1793, the work of Philodemus, on the effects of music, was unrolled. Its tenor is wholly Epicurean, its objects being to show that music has no effect of any importance on man, and that it is a superfluous, unnecessary art. The work contains thirty-eight columns, or pages, and is in Greek.

In the year 1809, the work of a certain Rabirius was unrolled, being a poem on the battles between Cæsar and Mark Antony. This is the only papyrus, hitherto unrolled, written in Latin. At the same time, the second and eleventh books of Epicurus De Natura were unrolled, treating of meteors. In the year 1827, Philodemus on virtue, and the voices opposed to it, and a separate work on vices, made their appearance. In the first-named work, the author ascribes one of Aristotle's popular works to Theophrastus. Several topics of husbandry and agriculture, and the treatment of children and slaves, are discussed in the latter work.

In the year 1832 was unrolled Polystratus on undeserved contempt, or the sense of honor, and what is to be done or omitted by man; in the same year, Philodemus on rhetoric, treating of sophistry, and discussing the question, whether true patience be compatible with eloquence. In the year 1835 was unrolled Philodemus on the right of every one, especially of philosophers, to express their ideas freely in conversation; which was followed, in the year 1839, by another work of the same author, on the living of the gods, their social and domestic habits, their favorite meals, &c.

In the same year was unrolled Metrodorus on sentiment and feeling, which, however, was considered a work of no value. The Academia Ercolanensis has edited the whole of the papyri unrolled, in six folio volumes, which contain some complements of the passages wanting, and a Latin translation of the Greek text. As every one has not either the means or opportunity of perusing this voluminous work, the Cavalier Lorenzo Blanco has extracted the substance of the six volumes, and published it in three small octavo volumes, written in Italian. He is one of the employés in the Officina de' Papiri, and is fully qualified for his task. This work is entitled Epitome de' Volumi Ercolanensi.

1611. GALILEO'S LITERARY CRITICISM.

Serassi, the writer of the curious Life of Tasso, was guilty of an extraordinary suppression in his zeal for the poet's memory. The story remains to be told, for it is little known.

Galileo, in early life, was a lecturer at the University of Pisa. Delighting in poetical studies, he was then more of a critic than a philosopher, and had Ariosto by heart. This great man caught the literary mania which broke out about his time, when the Crusicans so absurdly began their Controversie Tassesse, and raised up two poetical factions, which infected the Italians with a national fever. Tasso and Ariosto were perpetually weighed and outweighed against each other. Galileo wrote annotations on Tasso, stanza after stanza, and without reserve, treating the majestic bard with a severity which must have thrown the Tassoists into an agony. Our critic lent his manuscript to Jacopo Mazzoni, who, probably being a disguised Tassoist, by some unaccountable means contrived that the manuscript should be absolutely lost — to the deep regret of the author and all the Ariostoists. The philosopher descended to his grave not without occasional groans, nor without exulting reminiscences of the blows he had in his youth inflicted on the great rival of Ariosto; and the rumor of such a work long floated on tradition.

Two centuries had nearly elapsed, when Serassi employed on his elaborate Life of Tasso, among his uninterrupted researches in the public libraries of Rome, discovered a miscellaneous volume, in which on a cursory examination, he found deposited the lost manuscript of Galileo. It was a shock from which, perhaps, the zealous biographer of Tasso never fairly recovered; the awful name of Galileo sanctioned the asperity of critical decision, and more particularly the severe remarks on the language—a subject on which the Italians are so morbidly delicate, and so trivially grave.

Serassi's conduct on this occasion was at once politic, timorous, and cunning. Gladly would he have annihilated the original, but this was impossible. It was some consolation that the manuscript was totally unknown; for, having got mixed with others, it had accidentally been passed over, and not entered into the catalogue; his own diligent eye only had detected its existence. "Nessuno fin ora sa, fuori di me, se vi sia, ne dove sia, e così non potrà darla alla luce," &c. But in the true spirit of a collector, avaricious of all things connected with his pursuits, Serassi cautiously, but completely, transcribed the precious manuscript, with an intention, according to his memorandum, to unravel all its sophistry. However, although the abbate never wanted leisure, he persevered in his silence; yet he often trembled lest some future explorer of manuscripts might be found as sharp-sighted as himself. He was so cautious as not even to venture to note down the library where the manuscript was to be found, and to this day no one appears to have fallen on the volume.

On the death of Serassi, his papers came to the hands of the Duke of Ceri, a lover of literature; the transcript of the yet undiscovered original was then revealed; and this secret history of the manuscript was drawn from a note on the title page, written by Serassi himself. To satisfy the urgent curiosity of the literati, these annotations on Tasso, by Galileo, were published in 1793.

Here is a work which, from its earliest stage, much pains had been taken to suppress; but Serassi's collecting passion inducing him to preserve what he himself so much wished should never appear finally occasioned its publication. It adds one evidence to the many, which prove that such sinister practices have been frequently used by the historian of a party, poetic or politic.

1612. JOHN EVELYN'S KALENDARUM.

The Manuscript Diary, or Kalendarium, of the celebrated John Evelyn lay among the family papers at Wotton, in Surrey, from the period of his death, in 1706, until their rare interest and value were discovered in the following singular manner:—

The library at Wotton is rich in curious books with notes in John Evelyn's handwriting, as well as papers on various subjects, and transcripts of letters by the philosopher, who appeared never to have employed an amanuensis. The arrangement of these treasures was, many years since, intrusted to the late Mr. Upcott, of the London Institution, who made a complete catalogue of the collection.

One afternoon, as Lady Evelyn and a female companion were seated in one of the fine old apartments of Wotton, making feather tippets, her ladyship pleasantly observed to Mr. Upcott, "You may think this featherwork a strange way of passing time; it is, however, my hobby, and I dare say, you, too, Mr. Upcott, have your hobby." The librarian replied that his favorite pursuit was the collection of the autographs of eminent persons. Lady Evelyn remarked that, in all probability, the manuscripts of "Sylva" Evelyn would afford Mr. Upcott some amusement. His reply may be well imagined. The bell was rung, and a servant desired to bring the papers from a lumber-room of the old mansion; and from one of the baskets so produced was brought to light the manuscript Diary of John Evelyn—one of the most finished specimens of autobiography in the whole compass of English literature.

The publication of the Diary, with a selection of familiar letters and private correspondence, was intrusted to Mr. William Bray, F. S. A.; and the last sheets of the manuscript, with a dedication to Lady Evelyn, were actually in the hands of the printer at the hour of her death. The work appeared in 1818; and a volume of Miscellaneous Papers, by Evelyn, was subsequently published, under Mr. Upcott's editorial superintendence.

Wotton House, though situate in the angle of two valleys, is actually on part of Leith Hill, the rise from thence being very gradual. Evelyn's Diary contains a pen-and-ink sketch of the mansion as it appeared in 1653.

1613. TACITUS IN A MONASTERY.

The most valuable copy of Tacitus, of whom so much is wanting, was discovered in a monastery of Westphalia. It is a curious circumstance in literary history, that we should owe Tacitus to this single copy, for the Roman emperor of that name had copies of the works of his illustrious ancestor placed in all the libraries of the empire, and every year had ten copies transcribed; but the Roman libraries seem to have been all destroyed, and the imperial protection availed nothing against the teeth of time.

1614. QUEEN ELIZABETH'S MANUSCRIPT.

In 1825, the son of Mr. Lemon, the keeper of the state papers, discovered, on examining some of the papers of the reign of Elizabeth, a paper in the handwriting of the queen, and marked "The Third Booke." Conceiving this to belong to something of importance, he placed it carefully aside, and, by a diligent search, at length obtained the papers of four other books, which proved to be an entire translation of Boethius De Consolatione Philosophiæ. In Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, it is mentioned that Queen Elizabeth had translated this work; but no vestige of it was known to exist. Nearly the whole of the work is in her majesty's own handwriting; but there are parts evidently written by her private secretary, and by the secretary of state of the time. All the difficult passages and all the poetical portions are in the queen's own hand, and it is not a little curious, that in the translation of the latter she had imitated all the variety of metre which is found in the work. It is therefore a literal, rather than a poetical translation. There are letters also discovered which identify this translation to have been made by the queen, and it is to be hoped that the public will soon be gratified with the publication of this literary curiosity. From a document accompanying this translation, it appears that her majesty composed the work at Windsor, during five weeks of the winter season; and from a courtly computation made by the queen's secretary, we collect the information, that less than twenty-four hours of labor were actually bestowed upon this manuscript of many pages.

1615. CARDINAL GRANVELLE'S LETTERS.

Cardinal Granvelle carefully preserved all his letters. He left behind him several chests filled with a prodigious quantity, written in different languages, commented, noted, and underlined by his own hand. These curious manuscripts, after his death, were left in a garret to the mercy of the rain and the rats. Five or six of these chests the steward sold to the grocers. It was then that a discovery was made of this treasure. Several learned men occupied themselves in collecting as many of these literary relics as they possibly could. What were saved formed eighty thick folios. Among these original letters are found great numbers, written by almost all the crowned heads in Europe, with instructions for ambassadors, and many other state papers.

1616. RESEARCHES OF POGGIO AND OTHERS

At the restoration of letters, every part of Europe and Greece was ransacked; and, the glorious results considered, there was something sublime in this humble industry, which often produced a lost author of antiquity, and gave one more classic to the world. This occupation was carried on with enthusiasm, and a kind of mania possessed many, who exhausted their fortunes in distant voyages and profuse prices. Among those whose lives were devoted to this purpose, Poggio, the Florentine, stands distinguished; but he complains that his zeal was not assisted by the great. He found under a heap of rubbish, in a decayed coffer, in a tower belonging to the Monastery of St. Gallo, the work of Quintilian. He is indignant at its forlorn situation. "At least," he cries, "it should have been preserved in the library of the monks; but I found it in veterrimo quodam et obscuro carceret." And, to his great joy, he drew it out of its grave. The monks have been complimented as the preservers of literature; but by facts like the present, their real affection may be somewhat doubted.

1617. THE MAGNA CHARTA RESCUED FROM A TAILOR'S SCISSORS.

Sir Robert Cotton one day, at his tailor's, discovered that the man was holding in his hand, ready to cut up for measures, an original Magna Charta, with all its appendages of seals and signatures. He bought the singular curiosity for a trifle, and recovered in this manner what had long been given over for lost. This anecdote is told by Colomies, who long resided and died in Great Britain. The original Magna Charta is preserved in the Cottonian library. It exhibits marks of dilapidation; but whether from the invisible scythe of time, or the humble scissors of a tailor, we leave to archaeological inquiry.

1618. JUSTINIAN'S CODE.

The original manuscript of Justinian's Code was discovered by the Pisans, accidentally, when they took a city in Calabria. That vast code of laws had been, in a manner, unknown from the time of that emperor. This curious book was brought to Pisa, and, when Pisa was taken by the Florentines, was transferred to Florence, where it is still preserved.

§ 170. DESTRUCTION OR LOSS OF MANUSCRIPTS.

1619. LITERARY DISHONESTY.

Leland's invaluable manuscripts were left at his death in the confused state in which the mind of the writer had sunk, overcome by his incessant labors, when this royal antiquary was employed by Henry VIII. to write our national antiquities. His scattered manuscripts were long a common prey to many who never acknowledged their fountain head. Among these suppressors and dilapidators, pre-eminently stands the crafty Italian Polydore Virgil, who not only drew largely from this source, but, to cover the robbery, did not omit to depreciate the father of our antiquities—an act of a piece with the character of the man, who is said to have collected and burnt a greater number of historical manuscripts than would have loaded a wagon, to prevent the detection of the numerous fabrications in his History of England, which were composed to gratify Mary and the Catholic cause.

1620. TRICKS OF AUTHORS.

It is suspected that the historical antiquary Speed owed many obligations to the learned Hugh Broughton, for he possessed a vast number of his manuscripts, which he burnt. Why did he burn? If persons place themselves in suspicious situations, they must not complain if they be suspected. We have had historians, who, whenever they met with information which has not suited their historical system, or their inveterate prejudices, have employed interpolations, castrations, and forgeries, and in some cases have annihilated the entire document.

1621. THE HARLEIAN MANUSCRIPT.

The Harleian manuscript 7379 is a collection of state letters. This manuscript has four leaves entirely torn out, and is accompanied by this extraordinary memorandum, signed by the principal librarian:—

"Upon examination of this book, Nov. 12, 1764, these four last leaves were torn out.

"C. MORTON.

"Mem. Nov. 12, sent down to Mrs. Macaulay."

As no memorandum of the name of any student, to whom a manuscript is delivered for his researches, was ever made before or since, or in the nature of things will ever be, this memorandum must involve that female historian in the obloquy of this dilapidation.

1022. DIARY OF THE MARQUIS OF HALIFAX.

We have a remarkable case, where a most interesting historical production has been silently annihilated by the consent of both parties. There once existed an important diary of a very extraordinary character, Sir George Saville, afterwards Marquis of Halifax. This master spirit,—for such I am inclined to consider the author of the little book of Maxims and Reflections,—with a philosophical indifference, appears to have held in equal contempt all the factions of his times, and, consequently, has often incurred their severe censures. Among other things, the Marquis of Halifax had noted down the conversations he had had with Charles II., and the great and busy characters of the age. Of this curious secret history there existed two copies, and the noble writer imagined that by this means he had carefully secured their existence; yet both copies were destroyed from opposite motives—one at the instigation of the Pope, who was alarmed at finding some of the Catholic intrigues of the court developed; and the other at the suggestion of a noble friend, who was equally shocked at discovering that his party, the revolutionists, had sometimes practised mean and dishonorable deceptions. It is in these legacies of honorable men, of whatever party they may be, that we expect to find truth and sincerity. But thus it happens, that the last hope of posterity is often frustrated by the artifices or the malignity of these party passions.

1023. THE LETTERS OF PEIRESC A SUBSTITUTE FOR FIREWOOD.

At the death of the learned Peiresc, a chamber in his house filled with letters from the most eminent scholars of the age was discovered. The learned in Europe had addressed Peiresc in their difficulties, who was hence called the avocat général of the republic of letters. Such was the disposition of his niece, that, although repeatedly entreated to permit them to be published, she preferred to regale herself occasionally with burning these learned epistles, to save the expense of firewood.

1024. SINGULAR EFFECT OF SUDDEN MISFORTUNE.

The republic of letters has suffered irreparable losses by shipwrecks. Guarino Veronese, one of those learned Italians who travelled through Greece for the recovery of manuscripts, had his perseverance repaid by the acquisition of many valuable works. On his return to Italy he was shipwrecked, and, "unfortunately for himself and the world," says Mr. Roscoe, "he lost his treasures." So pungent was his grief on this occasion, that, according to the relation of one of his countrymen, his hair became suddenly white.

1025. LEONARDO DA VINCI.

The manuscripts of Leonardo da Vinci suffered from his relatives. When a curious collector discovered some, he generously brought them to a descendant of the great painter, who coldly observed that he had a great deal more in the garret, which had lain there for many years, if the rats had not destroyed them. Nothing which this great artist wrote but showed an inventive genius.

1026. CICERO ON GLORY.

Raimond Soranzo, a lawyer in the Papal court, possessed two books of Cicero on Glory, which he presented to Petrarch, who lent them to a poor aged man of letters, formerly his preceptor. Urged by extreme want, the old man pawned them, and, returning home, died suddenly without having revealed where he had left them. They have never been recovered. Petrarch speaks of them with ecstasy, and tells us that he had studied them perpetually. Two centuries afterwards this treatise on Glory, by Cicero, was mentioned in a catalogue of books bequeathed to a monastery of nuns, but, when inquired after, was missing. It was supposed that Petrus Alcyonius, physician to that household, purloined it, and after transcribing as much of it as he could into his own writings, had destroyed the original. Alcyonius, in his book De Exilio, the critics observed, had many splendid passages which stood isolated in his work, and were quite above his genius. The beggar, or in this case the thief, was detected by mending his rags with patches of purple and gold.

1027. PULTENEY'S MEMOIRS.

Pulteney, afterwards the Earl of Bath, had prepared memoirs of his times, which he proposed to confide to Dr. Douglas, Bishop of Salisbury, to be composed by the bishops; but his lordship's heir, the general, insisted on destroying these authentic documents, of the value of which we have a notion by one of those conversations which the earl was in the habit of indulging with Hooke, whom he at that time appears to have intended for his historian.

§ 171. MISCELLANEOUS.

1028. SPANISH AND FRENCH LITERATURE.

Books were so scarce in Spain in the tenth century, that several monasteries had among them only one copy of the Bible, one of Jerome's Epistles, and one of several other religious books. There are some curious instances given by Lupus, Abbot of Ferrieris, of the extreme scarcity of classical manuscripts in the middle of the ninth century. He was much devoted to literature, and, from his letters, appears to have been indefatigable in his endeavors to find out such manuscripts, in order to borrow and copy them. In a letter to the pope, he earnestly requests of him a copy of Quintilian, and of a treatise of Cicero; "for," he adds, "though we have some fragments of them, a complete copy is not to be found in France." In two other of his letters, he requests of a brother abbot the loan of several manuscripts, which he assures him shall be copied, and returned as soon as possible by a faithful messenger.

Another time he sent a special messenger to borrow a manuscript, promising that he would take very great care of it, and return it by a safe opportunity, and requesting the person who lent it to him, if he were asked to whom he had lent it, to reply, to some near relations of his own, who had been very urgent to borrow it. Another manuscript, which he seems to have prized much, and a loan of which had been so frequently requested that he thought of banishing it somewhere, that it might not be destroyed or lost, he tells a friend he may, perhaps, lend him when he comes to see him, but that he will not trust it to the messenger who had been sent for it, though a monk, and trustworthy, because he was travelling on foot.

1629. VALUE OF A MANUSCRIPT.

There have been ages when, for the possession of a manuscript, some would transfer an estate, or leave in pawn for its loan hundreds of golden crowns; and when even the sale or loan of a manuscript was considered of such importance as to have been solemnly registered in public acts. Absolute as was Louis XI., he could not obtain the manuscript of Rasis, an Arabian writer, to make a copy, from the library of the faculty of Paris, without pledging a hundred golden crowns; and the president of his treasury, charged with this commission, sold part of his plate to make the deposit. For the loan of a volume of Avicenna a baron offered a pledge of ten marks of silver, which was refused, because it was not considered equal to the risk incurred of losing a volume of Avicenna. These events occurred in 1471. One cannot but smile at an anterior period, when a Countess of Anjou bought a favorite book of homilies for two hundred sheep, some skins of martins, and some bushels of wheat and rye.

1630. LITERARY BROKERAGE.

In ancient times manuscripts were important articles of commerce; they were excessively scarce, and preserved with the utmost care. Usurers themselves considered them as precious objects for pawn. A student of Pavia, who was reduced by his debaucheries, raised a new fortune by leaving in pawn a manuscript of a body of law; and a grammarian, who was ruined by a fire, rebuilt his house with two small volumes of Cicero.

1631. CONNOISSEURSHIP.

A few years ago, some ignorant or over-cunning individuals imported into Europe several Arabic manuscripts, very superbly bound, and in the most excellent condition. These were eagerly bought up by persons who were rather admirers than readers of Arabic. Some of the connoisseurs, who thought their sealed books a great treasure, showed them to persons better skilled in the language than themselves, when it was discovered that these learned treasures merely consisted of the legers and other account books of Arabian tradesman.

MEMORY.

§ 172. STRENGTH AND ACTIVITY OF MEMORY.

1632. MAGLIABECHI'S PRODIGIOUS MEMORY.

MAGLIABECHI was born at Florence, on the 29th of October, 1633. His parents were of so low and mean a rank that they were well satisfied when they had got him into the service of a man who sold greens. He had never learned to read, and yet he was perpetually poring over the leaves of old books, that were used as waste paper in his master's shop.

A bookseller who lived in the neighborhood, and who had often observed this, and knew the boy could not read, asked him what he meant by looking so much at the printed paper. He said that he did not know how it was, but that he loved it of all things; that he was very uneasy in the business he was in, and should be the happiest creature in the world if he could live with him, who had always so many books about him. The bookseller was pleased with his answer, and at last told him, that, if his master was willing to part with him, he would take him.

Young Magliabechi was highly delighted, and the more so when his master, at the bookseller's request, gave him leave to go. He went, therefore, directly to his new and much-desired business, and had not been long in it before he could find any book that was asked for as readily as the bookseller himself. Some time after this he learned to read, and from this time forth, whenever he could find a moment's leisure, he was found with a book in his hand.

He seems never to have applied himself to any particular study. An inclination for reading was his ruling passion, and a prodigious memory his great talent. He read every book, almost indifferently, as they happened to come into his hands, and that with a surprising quickness, and yet retained not only the sense, but often all the words, and the very manner of spelling.

His extraordinary application and talents soon recommended him to Ermini, librarian to the Cardinal of Medici, and Marmi, the great duke's librarian. He was by them introduced into the conversations of the learned, and made known at court; and he began to be looked upon every where as a prodigy, particularly for vast and unbounded memory.

It is said that there was a trial made of the force of his memory, which, if true, is very amazing. A gentleman of Florence, who had written a piece which was to be printed, lent the manuscript to Magliabechi, and, some time after it had been returned, went to him, with a melancholy face, and pretended to have met with a most unhappy accident, by which, he said, he had lost his manuscript. The author seemed almost inconsolable for the loss of his work, and entreated Magliabechi to try to recollect as much of it as he possibly could, and write it down. Magliabechi assured him he would, and, on setting about it, wrote down the whole manuscript, without missing a word.

By treasuring up every thing he read in so strange a manner, or at least the subject and all the principal parts of the books he ran over, his head became, at last, as one of his acquaintances expressed himself, "a universal index, both of titles and matter."

By this time Magliabechi was grown so famous for the vast extent of his reading, and his amazing retention of what he had read, that it began to grow common amongst the learned to consult him when they were writing on any subject. Thus, for instance, if a priest were composing a panegyric on a particular saint, Magliabechi would, on his applying to him, inform him what writers had spoken favorably of the saint, and in what part of their works the commendations were to be found; in some cases to the number of above one hundred authors. He would tell him not only who had treated of his subject expressly, but also who had only touched upon it accidentally, in writing on other subjects; both which he did with the greatest exactness, naming the author, the book, the words, and often the very number of the page, in which they were inserted. He did this so often, so readily, and so exactly, that he came at last to be looked upon almost as an oracle.

Lastly, he read the title pages only; then dipped here and there into the preface, dedication, and advertisements if there were any; and then cast his eyes on each of the divisions and different sections or chapters of the book; and thus he conceived the matter almost as completely as if he had read it at full length.

Magliabechi had a local memory too of the places where every book stood; as in his master's shop at first, and in the Pitti, and several other libraries afterwards; and seems to have carried this even farther than to the collection of books with which he was personally acquainted. One day the great duke sent for him, after he was his librarian, to ask him whether he could procure for him a book that was particularly scarce. "No, sir," answered Magliabechi. "it is impossible: for there is but one in the world; that is in the grand seignior's library at Constantinople, and is the seventh book, on the seventh shelf, on the right hand as you go in."

Although Magliabechi lived so sedentary a life, and studied so intensely, he arrived to a good old age. He died in his eighty first year, on July 14, 1714. By his will he left a very fine library, of his own collection, for the use of the public, with a fund to maintain it; and the surplus, if any, to be given to the poor.

He was not an ecclesiastic, but chose never to marry; and was negligent, even to slovenliness, in his dress. His appearance was such as must have been far from engaging the affection of a lady; and his face, in particular, judging from the representations of him in busts, medals, and portraits, would have rather prejudiced his suit than advanced it. He received his friends, and those who came to consult him on any points of literature, in a civil and obliging manner; though, in general, he had almost the air of a savage, and even affected it.

In his manner of living he affected the character of Diogenes; three hard eggs, and a draught or two of water, were his more usual repast. When any one went to see him, he was found lolling in a sort of fixed wooden cradle, in the middle of his study, with a multitude of books—some thrown in heaps, and others scattered about the floor—all round him; and this his cradle, or bed, attached to the nearest pile of books by a number of cobwebs. At the entrance of visitors he was accustomed to call out to them not to hurt his spiders.

Thus lived and died Magliabechi, in the midst of public applause; and with such an affluence, for all the latter part of his life, as very few persons have ever procured by their knowledge or learning.

His vast knowledge of books induced Cosmo III. to do him the honor of making him his librarian; and what a happiness it must have been to Magliabechi, who delighted in nothing so much as reading, to have the command of such a collection of books as that in the great duke's palace. He was also very conversant with the books in the Lorenzo library; and had the keeping of those of Leopoldo and Francesco Maria, the two cardinals of Tuscany.

And yet even all this did not satisfy his extensive appetite, for he had read almost all books, that is, the greatest part of those printed before his time, and all in it; for it was latterly a general custom, not only among authors, but of the printers too of those times, to make him a present of a copy of whatever they published.

It is worthy of remark, that the Duke of Tuscany, as Magliabechi assured Lord Raley, had become jealous of the attention he was receiving from foreigners, as these literary strangers usually went first to see Magliabechi before they called on the grand duke.

Moderato Fonte, a Venetian lady, was born in 1555. Though placed in a monastery, she married, and after twenty years of conjugal happiness, died in 1592. She became distinguished as an author, and some of her works had merit. She wrote a poem called Il Floridore, and another on the passion and resurrection of Christ, besides De Meriti de le Donne, in which she maintains that the female sex is not inferior in understanding to the male.

The memory of this remarkable woman was so retentive that she could repeat, verbatim, a sermon or discourse which she had only once heard.

Some time previous to Dr. Hawke's publication of his beautiful little Ode on Life, since published in Peache's Collection of Poems, in four volumes, he carried it down with him to a friend's house in the country, to retouch. Dr. Johnson was of this party, and as Hawksworth and the doctor lived on the most intimate terms, the former read it to him for his opinion. "Why, sir," says Johnson, "I cannot well determine on a first hearing; read it again—second thoughts are sometimes best." Dr. Hawksworth complied; after which Dr. Johnson read it himself, approved of it very highly, and returned it. Next morning, at breakfast, the subject of the poem being resumed, Dr. Johnson, after expressing his admiration of it, said he had but one objection to make to it, which was, that he doubted its originality. Hawksworth, alarmed at this, challenged him to the proof, when the doctor repeated the whole poem, with the exception of only a few lines.

"What do you say now, Hawky?" said the doctor. "I only say this," replied the other, "that I shall repeat nothing of my composing before you again; for you have a memory that would convict an author of plagiarism in any court of literature in the world."

1635. WILLIAM HUTTON.

When the late William Hutton, a man of an original cast of mind, as an experiment in memory, opened a book which he had divided into three hundred and sixty-five columns, according to the days of the year, he resolved to try to recollect an anecdote, as insignificant and remote as he was able, rejecting all under ten years of age; and, to his surprise, he filled those spaces for small reminiscences within ten columns; but till the experiment had been made, he never conceived the extent of this faculty.

1636. A FAMOUS REPORTER.

Mr. William Woodfall, the son of the celebrated printer of the Public Advertiser, in which the Letters of Junius first appeared, undertook, without any assistance, the arduous task of reporting the debates of both houses of Parliament, day by day, in his father's paper, and afterwards in other daily journals. This gentleman possessed a most extraordinary memory, as well as wonderful powers of literary labor. It is asserted that he has been known to sit through a long debate of the House of Commons, not making a single note of the proceedings, and afterwards to write out a full and faithful account of what had taken place, extending to sixteen columns, without allowing himself an interval of rest. The remarkable exertions of this most famous reporter gave the newspapers for which he wrote a celebrity which compelled other newspapers to aim at the same fulness and freshness in their parliamentary reports. What Woodfall accomplished by excessive bodily and mental exertion, his contemporaries succeeded in bringing to a higher degree of perfection by the division of labor; and thus, in time, each morning newspaper had secured the assistance of an efficient body of reporters, each of whom might in turn take notes of a debate, and commit a portion of it to the press several hours before the whole debate was concluded.

1637. CLAUDIUS, TULLY, QUEEN ISABELLA, AND OTHERS.

It is reported of the Emperor Claudius, that he retained in memory all Homer, Sallust, Demosthenes, Avicen, and Aristotle's Metaphysics. Tully and Seneca never heard any thing material but it was imprinted in their memory. Scaliger said he learned Homer in twelve days, and all the Greek poets in four months. Seneca, the philosopher, could repeat two thousand names in the exact order in which they were rehearsed to him. Themistocles, when he was to be taught the art of memory, said, "I had rather be taught the art of forgetfulness, for I remember those things I would not, and I cannot forget those things I would."

Queen Isabella, the young sovereign of Spain, is said to possess a wonderfully retentive memory, which puts to the blush all the efforts of Gouraud. She can name, with perfect readiness, the date of every important event of ancient and modern history. Whilst she was at Barcelona, the queen mother and some other individuals were conversing on the subject of memory, alluding to several eminent persons who had been in a remarkable degree gifted with that faculty. "I think," observed the young queen, "that I have a tolerably good memory." And she directed Señor Donozo Cortes, her secretary, to bring her a book which she had never seen. The secretary presented to her a volume of the lyric poems of Ochoa. Her majesty read from it about three hundred lines, and then, closing the book, she repeated them without an error. Some time after this occurrence, being in the palace at Madrid, and surrounded by several persons of her court, she turned to her secretary and said, "Donozo, you recollect having heard me read those lines of Ochoa; now you shall hear that I still remember them perfectly." And she immediately repeated them from beginning to end, without mistake or omission. In like manner, the names of nearly all the persons who have been presented to her in the course of her life, and especially those with whom she has, from time to time, conversed, are engraven on her recollection.

1638. PORCIUS, CYNEAS, SENECA, AND OTHERS.

Among the ancients, Latro Porcius, Cyneas, and some others, are represented as having possessed wonderful memories. The following is a translation of what Seneca says of himself, in relation to this subject:—

"I do not deny that I myself possessed powers of memory in a very considerable degree. It was not only sufficient for the ordinary business of life, but appeared to some to be almost miraculous. When single verses were prescribed to each individual who came to attend our preceptor, on hearing them prescribed, I recited them in order, beginning with the last, and ending with the first." The number of verses was more than two hundred.

Seneca mentions, in the same work, the great memory of Latro Porcius, whom he calls his very dear companion, who retained in his memory all the declamations he had ever spoken, and never knew his memory fail him, not so much as in one single word. He also takes notice of Cyneas, who was ambassador to the Romans, from King Pyrrhus, who in one day had so well learned the names of his spectators, that on the subsequent day he saluted the senate, &c., by their proper names.

Pliny mentions similar instances, (Lib. 7. c. 24.) Cyrus knew the names of all the soldiers in his army. Lucius Scipio knew the names of the Roman people. Mithridates, who ruled over twenty-two kingdoms, delivered laws to them in as many languages, and publicly addressed the natives of each kingdom in their own tongue, without an interpreter. Charmidas, or rather Carneades, could name all the books in a great library as they stood in order. Bonaparte is said to have had, in many respects, a wonderfully retentive memory.

1639. POSTMASTER IN ALBANY.

There was a postmaster, a few years ago, in the city of Albany, who could call the names of at least thirty-six thousand of the citizens as he met them, having learned their names and countenances at the post-office.

1640. VOLTAIRE AND LA MOTTE.

One day Voltaire, when a young man of about twenty-four, read to La Motte, who had a prodigious memory, a tragedy which he had written. La Motte listened with the greatest possible attention, to the end. "Your tragedy is excellent," said he, "and I dare answer beforehand for its success. Only one thing vexes me: you have allowed yourself to borrow, as I can prove to you, from the second scene of the fourth act." Voltaire defended himself as well as he could against the charge. "I say nothing," answered La Motte, "which I cannot support, and to prove it, I shall recite this same scene, which pleased me so much when I first read it, that I got it by heart, and not a word of it has escaped me." Accordingly he repeated the whole without hesitation, and with as much animation as if he had composed it himself. All present, at the reading of the piece, looked at each other, and did not know what to think. The author was utterly confounded. After enjoying his embarrassment for a short time, "Make yourself easy, sir," said La Motte; "the scene is entirely your own—as much your own as all the rest; but it struck me as so beautiful and touching, that I could not resist the pleasure of committing it to memory."

1641. M. PASCAL.

It is reported of that prodigy of parts, Monsieur Pascal, that till the decay of his health had impaired his memory, he forgot nothing of what he had done, read, or thought, during any part of his rational 1642. A PLEASANT COMPANION.

Sydney Smith had an extraordinary memory, always ready. He could repeat pages of poetry, English, Latin, and French: when, where, or how he learned them no one of his family pretended to know; but they were always ready and appropriate in company, when conversation turned that way. He was equally ready in enlivening a party of young ladies, by every variety of charades and conundrums, generally made on the spur of the moment, by cutting paper into curious figures, and by a display of clever tricks; for all which, his demand in payment was a kiss from each. His company was much sought after. He was always lively and agreeable, and his conversation full of variety and interesting anecdotes.

1643. GROTIUS, LORD GRANVILLE, AND OTHERS.

The memory of Grotius was so retentive that he remembered almost every thing he read. Scaliger could repeat a hundred verses after once reading them. Lord Granville knew the Greek Testament, from the beginning of Matthew to the end of the Revelation.

Borri, of Milan, was considered a prodigy for his retentive and comprehensive memory. When the works of Labienus were burnt by the common executioner, Cassius Severus was present, and cried out, that they must burn him also, for he possessed the contents of all the books in his memory.

1644. MEMORY versus THICK SKULLS.

"I had invited Porson," says an English author, "to meet a party of friends in Sloane Street, where I lived; but the professor had mistaken the day, and made his appearance in full costume the preceding one. We had already dined, and were at our cheese. When he discovered his error, he made his usual exclamation of a whoee! as long as my arm, and turning to me with great gravity, said, 'I advise you in future, sir, when you ask your friends to dinner, to ask your wife to write your cards. Sir, your penmanship is abominable; it would disgrace a cobbler. I swear that your day is written Thursday, not Friday,' at the same time pulling the invitation out of his pocket. A jury was summoned, and it was decided nem. con., 'that for once the professor was in the wrong,' which he instantly admitted. 'Your blunder,' I replied, 'my friend, will cost me a beef-steak and a bottle of your favorite Trinity ale, so that you will be the gainer.'

"He sat on, 'as was his custom in the afternoon,' till past midnight, emptying every flask and decanter that came in his way. As I knew there was no end in his bacchanalia when fairly seated with plenty of drink and a listener, I retired, leaving him to finish the remains of some half dozen of bottles; for it was immaterial to the professor the quality of the stuff, provided he had quantity.

"On my descending, the following morning, to breakfast, I was surprised to find my friend lounging on a sofa, and perusing with great attention a curious volume of Italian tales, which I had picked up in my travels. I learnt that, having found the liquor so choice, and the Novelle Antiche so interesting, he had trimmed his lamp and remained on the premises. 'I think,' said he, 'that with the aid of a razor, and a light-colored neckcloth, and a brush, I shall be smart enough for your fine party.'

"A pretty large company assembled in the evening, and Porson treated them with a translation (without book) of the curious tale which had excited his notice. So extraordinary was his memory, that although there were above forty names introduced into the story, he had only forgotten one. This annoyed him so much, that he started from the table, and after pacing about the room for ten minutes, he stopped short, exclaiming, 'Eureka! The count's name is Don Francesco Averani.' The party sat till three o'clock in the morning, but Porson would not stir, and it was with no small difficulty that my brother could prevail on him to take his departure at five; having favored me with his company exactly thirty-six hours. During this time, I calculated he finished a bottle of alcohol, two of Trinity ale, six of claret, besides the lighter sort of wines, of which I could take no account; he also emptied a half pound canister of snuff, and, during the first night, smoked a bundle of cigars.

"Professor Porson, most unhappily, gave way to his inclination to drinking, and died of apoplexy at the age of forty-nine years. At a post mortem examination, it was ascertained that his skull was one of the thickest that had ever been observed. And this, too, notwithstanding the fact that he was one of the most remarkable scholars of the age in which he lived.

1645. THE YOUNG BRAHMIN.

The following recent statement, and from a most unquestioned source, (Mr. Rhenius, missionary in Southern India, year 1827,) discloses a great tenacity of verbal memory.

"I have lately witnessed," says he, "a remarkable instance of a wonderfully retentive memory in a young Brahmin from Ramnad. Three days ago, a gentleman wrote a sentence in English, (of which language the Brahmin knew nothing,) containing thirty syllables; each syllable was numbered in order. All the syllables, with their numbers, were told him, not in their proper order, but skipping from three to twenty, then to six, and so on. When the whole sentence was finished, the Brahmin, arranging the numbers in his head in regular order, told the sentence, word for word. To-day we wrote him a sentence in English, of sixty-nine syllables, and proceeded in telling him the numbers, as before. While this was going on, I wrote a sentence in Hebrew, containing fourteen syllables, telling the numbers in the same skipping manner: while this was proceeding, he repeated to us the sentence which he had heard three days before; and when the numbers of the new English and Hebrew sentences were finished, he told us both of them in regular order, as if he had read them from a book. This was certainly a prodigious memory, and astonished us all."

1646. COOKE, THE TRAGEDIAN.

Of strong memory few examples will compare, in force, with that of Cooke, the tragedian; who, it is said, committed the entire contents of a daily newspaper in the space of eight hours!

1647. VOLTAIRE AND THE ENGLISHMAN.

An Englishman at a certain time came to Frederick the Great of Prussia for the express purpose of giving him an exhibition of his power of recollection. Frederic went to Voltaire, who read to the king a pretty long poem which he had just finished. The Englishman was present, and was in such a position that he could hear every word of the poem, but was concealed from Voltaire's notice.

After the reading of the poem was finished, Frederic observed to the author, that the production could not be an original one, as there was a foreign gentleman present who could recite every word of it. Voltaire listened with amazement to the stranger, as he repeated, word for word, the poem which he had been at so much pains in composing, and, giving way to a momentary freak of passion, he tore the manuscript in pieces. A statement was then made to him of the circumstances under which the Englishman became acquainted with his poem, which had the effect to mitigate his anger, and he was very willing to do penance for the suddenness of his passion, by copying down the work from a second repetition of it by the stranger, who was able to go through with it as before.

1648. PORSON AT SCHOOL.

Professor Porson, when a boy at Eton school, discovered the most astonishing powers of memory. In going up to a lesson one day, he was accosted by a boy in the same form—"Porson, what have you got there?" "Horace." "Let me look at it." Porson handed the book to the boy, who, pretending to return it, dexterously substituted another in its place, with which Porson proceeded. Being called on by the master, he read and construed Carm. 1, x. very regularly. Observing the class to laugh, the master said, "Porson, you seem to me to be reading on one side of the page, while I am looking at the other; pray whose edition have you?" Porson hesitated. "Let me see it," rejoined the master; who, to his great surprise, found it to be an English Ovid. Porson was ordered to go on; which he did easily, correctly, and promptly, to the end of the ode.

1649. LOUISA WEST'S MEMORY.

Miss Louisa West, a girl fifteen years of age, at Georgetown, Kentucky, committed to memory, accurately, the whole New Testament in six weeks, at the same time attending to her other domestic duties.

1650. ASTONISHING MENTAL FEAT.

A remarkable instance is related, by Dr. Macklin, of a man who waited on the Greffier Fagel, to display his wonderful memory, offering to give any proof of it that might be required. A newspaper was lying on the table, and he was requested to read it through, and then repeat it verbatim. He accordingly did so, without omitting a single word, from the title to the imprint at the end. The Greffier Fagel expressing his astonishment, "O," said the man, "this is nothing; shall I now repeat the same backwards?" "It is impossible!" replied the Greffier. "By no means," said the other, "if you have patience to hear it." He then, without the least hesitation, repeated every separate article, beginning at the imprint and ending at the title.

1651. WILLIAM LYON, THE STROLLING PLAYER.

A strolling player at Edinburgh, of the name of William Lyon, had a most astonishing memory. He one evening made a bet of a bowl of punch, that he would, at the rehearsal the next morning, repeat the whole of the Daily Advertiser, from beginning to end. Being called on the next day, he handed the newspaper to a gentleman present, to see that he repeated every word correctly. This task he accomplished without making the slightest error, through all the varieties of advertisements, price of stocks, domestic and foreign news, accidents, offences, law intelligence, &c.

1652. WIT versus MEMORY.

Thomas Fuller.

Thomas Fuller wrote the History of the Worthies of England, a performance of great merit, and many other valuable works. Astonishing things are reported of his memory. From once hearing a sermon, he could repeat the whole of it verbatim. He undertook, in going from Temple Bar to the further end of Cheapside, to tell, at his return, every sign as it stood in order, on both sides of the way, repeating them either backwards or forwards, which he performed exactly. He was a learned, industrious, lively writer, but rather fond of punning. He was a very corpulent man, and once, as he was riding with a gentleman of the name of Sparrowhawk, he could not resist the opportunity of passing a joke upon him. "Pray what is the difference," said he, "between an owl and a sparrowhawk?" The other answered this sarcastic question as follows: "An owl is fuller in the head, fuller in the body, and fuller all over."

1653. BISHOP JEWELL.

The famous Bishop Jewell had, by application and industry, so improved his retentive powers, that he could readily repeat any thing that he had written, after once reading it over; and therefore usually at the ringing of the bell he began to commit his sermon to heart, and kept what he learnt so firmly, that he used to say, if he were to make a speech premeditatedly before a thousand auditors, who were shouting or fighting all the while, he could repeat the whole of what he had designed to deliver. Many barbarous and hard names out of a calendar, and forty strange words, Welsh, Irish, &c., after once reading, or twice at the most, with a short meditation, he could repeat, both forwards and backwards, without any hesitation. Sir Francis Bacon reading to him only the last clauses of ten lines in Erasmus's paraphrase, in a confused and dismembered manner, he, after a small pause, rehearsed in the right way, and without a single mistake.

§ 174. IRREGULAR OR DEFECTIVE MEMORY.

1654. THE MIND AN ACCOUNT BOOK.

Several instances have been known of men who required no other account book—so far as their own wishes or necessities were concerned—than their own memories.

We knew a farmer in Connecticut of this description. Nothing, in his early life, of a pecuniary or business character, which he once understood, appeared ever to escape him; and had it not been for the sake of gratifying his neighbors, he might never have kept a written memorandum of any thing whatever. Yet this man's memory, in many things, was exceedingly uncertain, not to say treacherous. He never could remember the multiplication table, or the division table, or the rules of simple multiplication and division, although often taught them in the clearest and simplest manner.

1655. THE WOMAN WITH TWO MINDS.

The following anecdote is from the writings of Dr. Darwin:—

"I was once concerned for an elegant and ingenious young lady, who had a reverie on alternate days, which continued nearly the whole day; and as in her days of disease she took up the same kind of ideas which she had conversed about on the alternate day before, and could remember nothing of them on her well day, she appeared to her friends to possess two minds."

The case, however, was a case of disease, which was removed in due season, by the use of the appropriate remedial means, so that the young woman's memory became, at length, as regular as that of other people.

1656. REMEMBERING IDEAS, NOT WORDS.

One of our most distinguished American authors has a memory so prodigious that he seldom, if ever, forgets a fact he acquires, though he never remembers how he obtained it. Hence he is sometimes unable to give credit even to those to whom credit may be due, on account of which he has occasionally incurred the charge of plagiarism.

The same individual never forgets a face he has once seen, though his memory of names is defective. As his place of residence has often changed, and as he is and long has been quite a traveller, he continually meets with such numbers of his fellow-men whose faces he knows, and of whose general character, even, he may have a recollection, but of whose names he knows nothing, that it is a serious trouble to him.

He also remembers objects once seen with an uncommon distinctness. Having once seen Niagara, for instance, he always sees it. He has been heard to say repeatedly that he would not give a straw to see the greatest objects of curiosity a second time, because, having once clearly seen them, they are forever afterwards vividly before his mind.

1657. FORGETTING ONE'S OWN NAME.

We are told of men who are so much engaged in literary pursuits as to forget, for a time, their own names. The author of one of the most popular series of school-books in this country is sometimes at a loss, when approaching his residence in the city, and looking out for the door, to remember his own name. This statement has been received from his own mouth, and may therefore be relied on.

And yet the literary gentleman to whom this anecdote refers is by no means deficient in memory as regards other matters.

1658. THE OLD STATE AND THE NEW STATE.

The following story is related by the late Dr. Mitchell in the Medical Repository, and rests, for its authenticity, on Major Ellicott, professor of mathematics in the U. S. Military Academy at West Point. The subject was a young lady, of a good constitution and excellent capacity, and well educated.

"Her memory was capacious and well stored with a copious stock of ideas. Unexpectedly and without any forewarning, she fell into a profound sleep, which continued several hours beyond the ordinary term. On waking she was discovered to have lost every trait of acquired knowledge. Her memory was tabula rasa; all vestiges, both of words and things, were obliterated and gone.

"It was found necessary for her to learn every thing again. She even acquired, by new efforts, the art of spelling, reading, writing, and calculating, and gradually became acquainted with the persons and objects around, like a being for the first time brought into the world. In these exercises she made considerable proficiency.

"But after a few months another fit of somnolency invaded her. On rousing from it, she found herself restored to the state she was in before the first paroxysm, but was wholly ignorant of every event and occurrence that had befallen her afterwards.

"The former condition of her existence she now calls the old state, and the latter the new state; and she is as unconscious of her double character as two distinct persons are of their natures respectively. For example, in her old state she possesses all her original knowledge; in her new state only what she acquired since. If a lady or gentleman be introduced to her in the old state, and vice versa, (and so of all other matters,) to know them satisfactorily she must learn them in both states. In the old state she possesses fine powers of penmanship, while in the new, she writes a poor, awkward hand, not having had time or means to become expert.

"During four years and upwards, she has had periodical transitions from one of these states to the other. The alterations are always consequent upon long and sound sleep. Both she and her family are now able to conduct the affair without embarrassment. By simply knowing whether she is in the old or the new state, they regulate their intercourse, and govern themselves accordingly."

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

1659. DISCOVERY OF RICHARD I. BY MUSIC.

MINSTREL, called Blondel, who owed his fortune to Richard I., King of England, animated with tenderness towards his illustrious master, was resolved to go over the world till he had discovered the destiny of this prince. He had already traversed Europe, and was returning through Germany, when, talking one day at Lintz, in Austria, with an innkeeper, in order to make this discovery, he was not a little delighted to learn that there was, not far from the gates of this very city, at the entrance of a large forest, a strong and ancient castle, in which (by order of the Emperor Leopold) a foreigner of some distinction had not long since been confined. The prisoner, moreover, as it appeared, was guarded with great care. A secret impulse persuaded Blondel that this prisoner was Richard; he went immediately to the castle, the sight of which made him tremble; he got acquainted with a peasant, who went often there to carry provision, questioned and offered him a considerable sum to declare who it was that was shut up there; but the good man, though he readily told all he knew, was ignorant both of the name and quality of the prisoner. He could only inform him that he was watched with the most exact attention, and was suffered no communication with any one but the keeper of the castle and his servants. He added that the prisoner had no other amusement than looking over the country, through a small grated window, which served also for the light that glimmered into his apartment.

He told him that this castle was a horrid abode; that the staircase and apartments were black with age, and so dark that at noonday it was necessary to have lighted flambeaux to find the way along them.

Blondel listened with eager attention, and meditated several ways of coming at the prisoner, but all in vain. At last, when he found that from the height and narrowness of the window he could not get a glimpse of his dear master. (for he firmly believed it was he,) he bethought himself of a French song, the last couplet of which had been composed by Richard, and the first by himself. After he had sung, with a loud voice, the first part, he stopped, and heard a voice which came from the castle window — "Continue and finish the song." Transported with joy, he was now assured it was the king his master, who was confined in this dismal castle.

The chronicler adds, that one of the keeper's servants falling sick, he hired himself to him, and thus made himself known to Richard; and informing his nobles, with all possible expedition, of the situation of their monarch, he was released from his confinement on paying a large ransom.

1600. MUSIC AT PUBLIC FESTIVALS.

In the reign of Henry VI., we find that minstrels were better paid than the priests. In 1430, and other years, at the annual feast of the fraternity of the Holy Cross, at Abington, twelve priests received fourpence each for singing a dirge, while the same number of minstrels received two shillings and fourpence each, besides diet and horse meat. Lest the clergy of the present day should be jealous, we hasten to add, that some of the minstrels rode thirty miles to reach the place where they were to sing and be so liberally paid. At that time, sixpence was the price paid for a sermon, which was read by a doctor in theology of one of the mendicant orders.

1661. ROMAN AND FRENCH SINGERS.

The French and Italian musicians have not been able to sympathize with each other for a long time, each believing the music of their own country to be the best. Few, however, are probably aware that the quarrel is as ancient as the following story indicates. It should be borne in mind that, before the time at which the story commences, musicians had been sent from Rome to teach the religious orders of Germany, France, and England.

The most pious King Charles having returned to celebrate Easter at Rome with the apostolic lord, a great quarrel ensued between the Roman and Gallic singers. The French pretended to sing better and more agreeably than the Italians, who in their turn, regarding themselves as more learned in ecclesiastical music, which they had been taught by St. Gregory, accused their competitors of corrupting and spoiling the true chant.

The dispute being brought before the king, the French musicians, thinking themselves sure of his support, insulted the Roman singers, who, emboldened by superior knowledge, treated them as fools and barbarians. The king asked his chanters which they thought to be most pure, water drawn from the source, or that which, after being mixed with turbid and muddy rivulets, was found at a great distance from the original spring. They answered, "All water must be most pure at its source." The king answered, "Mount ye up then to the pure fountain of St. Gregory, whose chant ye have corrupted."

He then applied to the pope for singing-masters, and the pope appointed Theodore and Benedict, two chanters of great learning and ability, who had been taught by Gregory himself. He also granted to him choral books of that saint, which he had written himself in Roman notes. One of the masters was sent to Metz, the other to Soissons. He commanded all the singing masters of his kingdom to correct their choral books, and to conform in all respects to the Roman manner of performing the church service.

Thus were the French Antiphonaria corrected, which had been before vitiated, interpolated, and abridged, at the pleasure of every choirman; and all the chanters of France learnt from the Romans the chant which they now call the French Chant. But as for the beats, trills, shakes, and accents of the Italians, the French were never able to execute or express them; nor, for want of sufficient flexibility in the organ of voice, were they capable of imitating in those graces any thing but the guttural and tremulous noise of goats. The principal school was established at Metz, whose singers surpassed all the rest of the schools. The Roman chanters also taught those of France the art of organizing.

1662. THE ORIGINAL ORGAN.

We do not find any mention of an organ before the year 757, when Constantine Cupronymus, Emperor of the East, sent to Pepin, King of France, among other rich presents, a musical machine, which the French writers describe to have been composed of pipes and large tubes of tin, and to have imitated sometimes the roaring of thunder, and sometimes the warbling of a flute. A lady was so affected on first hearing it played on that she fell into a delirium, and could never afterwards be restored to her reason.

In the reign of the Emperor Julian, these instruments had become so popular, that Ammianus Marcellinus complains that they occasioned the study of the sciences to be abandoned.

1663. CHURCH ORGANS.

In the latter part of the seventeenth century, the cause of church music suffered severely from the difficulty in procuring organs, as there were only four organ makers in England who were worthy the name. A few, which, when taken from the churches, had been sold for family use, were repurchased, repaired, and again took their places in the churches, until better ones could be procured; and as it was impossible, from the few workmen, to supply the demand, others were invited from the continent. Bernard Schmidt and two nephews came over from Germany, and Harris and his son from France. They completely eclipsed the English artists, and soon had the field to themselves.

Schmidt first built one for the Royal Chapel at Whitehall. It was made in haste, and failed to give the satisfaction expected. He then resolved never to hurry another, or to build for a sum which would oblige him to make an imperfect instrument. He would use only the best material, and if he found a bad pipe while voicing, he wasted no time upon it, but threw it away, and made another. Many of his organs, after being in use more than a hundred years, were worth more than when first made.

The elder Harris died soon after his arrival in England; but his son, who was an ingenious and energetic man, became a powerful rival to the Germans.

Towards the close of the reign of Charles II., the benchers of the Temple Church, who wished to obtain the best organ which could be made, received proposals from Schmidt and young Harris, who each presented such powerful claims that the benchers felt unwilling to decide, and therefore proposed Bedric, another harper, is said to have possessed no less than three villas in Gloucestershire. It is therefore evident that the custom of extravagant remuneration for musical ability commenced at a very early period; and the above instances may still keep in countenance many of the more recent instances of wild profusion, so unmercifully ridiculed even by the recipients.

Henry Lawes, who composed the music of Milton's Mask of Comus, is said to have been the first who introduced the Italian style of music into England; but he strongly censured the prevailing fondness for Italian words. "To make the public sensible of this ridiculous humor," says he, "I took a table or index of old Italian songs, and this index (which, read together, made a strange medley of nonsense) I set to a varied air, and gave out that it came from Italy, whereby it hath passed for a rare Italian song."

1670. SINGING BY RULE.

A writer in the New England Chronicle, in 1723, thus observes: "Truly I have a great jealousy that if we once begin to sing by rule, the next thing will be to pray by rule, and preach by rule; and then comes Popery."

MUSIC COMPOSERS.

1671. HABITS OF MOZART.

The time which Mozart most willingly employed in composition was the morning, from six or seven o'clock till ten, his hour of rising. After this, he did no more for the rest of the day, unless he had to finish some piece that was wanted. He always worked very irregularly. When an idea struck him, he was not to be drawn from it. If he was taken from the piano-forte, he tried to compose in the midst of his friends, and passed whole nights with his pen in his hand. At other times he had such a disinclination to work, that he could not complete a piece till the moment of its performance.

It once happened that he put off some music which he had engaged to furnish for a court concert so long, that he had not time to write out the part which he was to perform himself. The Emperor Joseph, who was peeping every where, happening to cast his eyes on the sheet which Mozart seemed to be playing from, was surprised to see nothing but empty lines, and said to him, "Where's your part?" "Here," replied Mozart, putting his hand to his forehead.

The Don Giovanni of this eminent composer, which is one of the most popular compositions ever produced, was composed for the theatre at Prague, and first performed in that city in 1787. This refined and intellectual music was not at that time understood in Germany—a circumstance which Mozart seems to have anticipated; for, previous to its first representation, he remarked to a friend, "This opera is not calculated for the people of Vienna; it will be more justly appreciated at Prague; but, in reality, I have written it principally to please myself and my friends."

Ample justice has, however, at length been rendered to this great production; it is heard with enthusiasm in nearly all the principal cities of that quarter of the globe where music is cultivated as a science—from the frozen regions of Russia to the foot of Mount Vesuvius. Its praise is not limited by the common attributes of good musical composition; it is placed in the higher rank of fine poetry; for not only are to be found in it exquisite melodies and profound harmonies, but the playful, the tender, the pathetic, the mysterious, the sublime, and the terrible, are distinctly to be traced in its various parts.

The overture to this opera is generally esteemed Mozart's best effort; yet it was only composed the night previous to the first representation, after the general rehearsal had taken place. About eleven o'clock in the evening, when retired to his apartment, he desired his wife to make him some punch, and to stay with him, in order to keep him awake. She accordingly began to tell him fairy tales, and odd stories, which made him laugh till the tears came. The punch, however, made him so drowsy, that he could go on only while his wife was talking, and dropped asleep as soon as she ceased. The efforts which he made to keep himself awake, the continual alternation of sleep and watching, so fatigued him, that his wife persuaded him to take some rest, promising to awake him in an hour's time.

He slept so profoundly, that she suffered him to repose for two hours. At five o'clock in the morning she awoke him. He had appointed the music copiers to come at seven; and by the time they arrived, the overture was finished. They had scarcely time to write out the copies necessary for the orchestra, and the musicians were obliged to play it without a rehearsal.

Some persons pretend that they can discover in this overture the passages where Mozart dropped asleep, and those where he suddenly awoke again.

1672. CHERUBINI AND ZINGARELLI.

Cherubini was in the habit of composing when surrounded by company. If his ideas did not flow very freely, he would borrow a pack of playing cards from any party engaged with them, and fill up the pips with faces caricatured, and all kinds of humorous devices; for he was as ready with his pencil as his pen, though not equally great with both.

Zingarelli would dictate his music, after reading a passage in one of the fathers of the church, or in some Latin classic.

1673. CHEERFUL MUSIC.

The poet Carpani once asked his friend Haydn how it happened that his church music was always of an animating, cheerful, and a gay description. To this Haydn's answer was, "I cannot make it otherwise. I write according to the thoughts which I feel. When I think upon God, my heart is so full of joy, that the notes dance and leap, as it were, from my pen; and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will be easily forgiven me that I serve him with a cheerful spirit."

1674. CARISSIMI.

Carissimi, a famous composer of music, being praised for the ease and grace of his melodies, exclaimed, —

"Ah! with what difficulty is this ease acquired!"

1675. THE WHIMS OF GENIUS.

Haydn, when he sat down to compose, always dressed himself with the greatest care, had his hair nicely powdered, and put on his best suit. Frederic II. had given him a diamond ring, and Haydn declared that, if he happened to begin without it, he could not summon a single idea. He could write only on the finest paper, and was as particular in forming his notes as if he had been engraving them on a copper plate. After these minute preparations, he began by choosing the theme of his subject, by imagining to himself the incidents of some little adventure or romance.

Gluck, when he felt himself in a humor to compose, had his piano-forte carried into a beautiful meadow, and, with a bottle of champagne on each side of him, transported his imagination into Elysium.

Sarti, a man of gloomy imagination, preferred the funeral stillness of a spacious room, dimly lighted by a single lamp.

Cimarozza delighted in noise and mirth: surrounded by a party of gay friends, he conceived his operas; and, as the ideas presented themselves, he seized and embodied them. In this way he planned that beautiful comic opera, Il Matrimonio Segreto.

Pacsiello composed his Barbiere de Seviglia and La Molinara in bed.

Sacchini declared, that he never had any moments of inspiration, except his two favorite cats were sitting one on each shoulder.

1676. STRADELLA, HORTENSIA, AND THE ASSASSINS.

Alessandro Stradella, of Naples, was not only an excellent composer, but also eminent as a performer on the violin; and in addition to these qualifications, possessed a fine voice, and an exquisite taste for singing. His compositions, which are all vocal, are perhaps superior to any that were produced in the seventeenth century, with the single exception of the works of Carissimi; and, perhaps, had he enjoyed equal longevity, he might have rivalled even that wonderful musician.

Stradella, probably at a very early period of his life, having acquired great reputation by his talents, was employed by a noble Venetian to teach a young lady, of a noble Roman family, named Hortensia, to sing. Hortensia, on whom nature had bestowed a beautiful person and an exquisite voice, notwithstanding her illustrious birth, having been seduced from her friends, had submitted to live with this Venetian in a criminal manner.

Her delight in music, and admiration of the talents of her instructor, soon gave birth to a passion of a different kind; and, like Heloise, she found that though at first

"Guiltless she gazed, and listened while he sung,
While science flowed seraphic from his tongue;
From lips like his the precepts too much move —
They music taught, but more, alas! to love."

By frequent access, Hortensia and her master became mutually enamored of each other. Before their attachment was discovered, they agreed to quit Venice together, and fly to Naples. After travelling in the most secret manner, they arrived at Rome, on their way to that city.

The Venetian seducer, enraged at their escape, determined to satiate his revenge in having them assassinated, in whatever part of the world they could be found; and for this purpose engaged two desperate ruffians, by a large sum of ready money, and a promise of a still greater reward, when the work should be accomplished.

The assassins proceeded directly to Naples, the place of Stradella's nativity, supposing that he would naturally return thither for an asylum, in preference to any other part of Italy. After many researches in that city, they were at length informed that Stradella and the lady resided at Rome, where she was regarded as his wife. Of this they conveyed intelligence to their employer, assuring him of their determination to go through with the business they had undertaken, provided he would procure them letters of recommendation to the Venetian ambassador at Rome, and grant them an asylum as soon as the deed should be perpetrated.

After waiting at Naples for the necessary letters and instructions, they proceeded to Rome, where, such was the celebrity of Stradella, that they very shortly discovered his residence.

But hearing that he was soon to conduct an oratorio of his own composition, in the Church of St. John Lateran, in which he was not only to play, but to sing the principal part; and as his performance was to begin at five o'clock in the evening, they determined to avail themselves of the darkness of the night, when he and his mistress should return home.

On their arrival at the church, the oratorio was begun, and the excellence of the music and its performance, joined to the rapture that was expressed by the whole congregation, made an impression, and softened the rocky hearts even of these human savages to such a degree as to incline them to relent, and spare the life of a man whose genius and abilities were the delight of all Italy.

Here we have an instance of the miraculous powers of modern music, superior to any that could be well authenticated of the ancient, and which may fairly lead us to conclude that the fabulous stories of Orpheus, Amphion, &c., were but exaggerations of matters of fact, well known in those days, but which have not descended to posterity.

Both these assassins being equally affected by the performance, and alike inclined to mercy, accosted him in the street when he quitted the church. After complimenting him on his oratorio, they confessed the business on which they had been sent by the Venetian nobleman, whose mistress he had taken away; adding that, charmed by his music, they had abandoned their purpose, and were determined to relinquish the rest of the reward that had been promised them, and to tell their employer that Stradella and his mistress had quitted Rome the night before their arrival in that city.

After this providential escape, the lovers set out that very night for Turin, as a place most remote from their implacable enemy and his emissaries; and the assassins, returning to Venice, told the enraged Venetian that they had traced the fugitives to Turin, where the laws being not only more severe, but the difficulty of escaping so much greater, than in any other part of Italy, on account of the garrison, they should decline any further concern in the business.

This intelligence did not, however, incline the exasperated nobleman to relinquish his purpose, but rather stimulated him to new attempts. He therefore engaged two other assassins in his service, procuring for them letters of recommendation from the Abbé d'Estrade, at that time the French ambassador at Venice, addressed to the Marquis de Villars, ambassador from France to Turin; the Abbé d'Estrade requesting, at the desire of the Venetian ambassador, protection for two merchants who intended to reside some time in that city. The letter being delivered by these new assassins, they paid their respects regularly to the ambassador, waiting for a favorable opportunity to accomplish their undertaking with safety.

The Duchess of Savoy, at that time regent, having been informed of the sudden flight of Stradella and Hortensia from Rome, and of their arrival at Turin, and knowing the danger they were in from the vindictive spirit of their enemy, placed the lady in a convent, and retained Stradella in her palace as her Mestro di Capella.

In a situation apparently so secure, Stradella's fears for his safety began to abate; till one day, at six o'clock in the evening, as he was walking for the air on the ramparts of the city, he was attacked by two ruffians, who each gave him a stab in the breast with a dagger, and immediately escaped to the house of the French ambassador, as to a sanctuary.

The assault having been witnessed by numbers of people, who were walking in the same place, occasioned such an uproar in the city that the news soon reached the duchess, who instantly ordered the gates to be shut, and the assassins to be demanded of the French ambassador; but he, insisting on the privileges granted to men of his function by the law of nations, refused to give them up.

This transaction, however, made a great noise all over Italy, and M. de Villars wrote immediately to the Abbé d'Estrade, to know the reason of the attack upon Stradella by the two men whom he had recommended, and was informed by the abbé that he had been surprised into a recommendation of these assassins by one of the most powerful of the Venetian nobility.

In the mean while, Stradella's wounds, though extremely dangerous, proved not to be fatal; and the Marquis de Villars having been informed by the surgeons that he would recover, in order to prevent any further dispute about the privileges of the corps diplomatique, suffered the assassins to escape. But so invincible was the implacability of the enraged Venetian, that, never relinquishing his purpose, he continued to maintain spies at Turin, to watch the motions of Stradella.

A year having elapsed after the cure of his wounds, he fancied himself secure from any further attempts upon his life. The duchess regent, interesting herself in the happiness of two persons who had suffered so much, and who seemed born for each other, had the ceremony of their marriage performed in her own palace; after which Stradella, being invited to Genoa to compose an opera for that city, went thither with his wife, determining to return to Turin during the carnival; but the Venetian, being informed of this change of residence, sent assassins after them, who rushed into their chamber early one morning, and stabbed them both to the heart. The murderers, having secured a bark which lay in port, by instantly retreating to it escaped justice, and were never afterwards heard of.

1677. MOZART'S MUSICAL TOIL.

"It is a very great error," says Mozart, "to suppose that my art has been so very easily acquired. I assure you that there is scarcely any one who has so worked at the study of composition as I have. You could hardly mention any famous composer whose writings I have not diligently and repeatedly studied throughout."

1678. INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF HAYDN.

When Haydn, while yet a chorister boy in the cathedral of Vienna, commenced the study of musical composition, he had no other guide than an old treatise on harmony, which he had picked up at a stall. But, as he used often to declare, it was from being thus early thrown on the resources of his own mind that he learnt his chief effects in harmony. He was but nineteen years of age when he left the cathedral, or rather was expelled from it, for cutting off the train of one of the boys' gowns. An old admirer of his chanting, one Keller, a hair-dresser, gave him shelter under his roof; and Haydn, in return, married the benevolent hair-dresser's daughter.

Shortly after, he removed to more convenient apartments in another house, where he had the singular felicity of having the first dramatic poet of the continent for his fellow-lodger,—the renowned Metastasio,—through whose friendly aid he acquired a competent knowledge, not only of the Italian language, but of literature and the arts. It was here, and when in his twentieth year, that Haydn composed the first of those quartettes for which his name is so celebrated; it became immediately popular in Vienna, and was soon followed by others of still greater merit.

For six years Haydn and Metastasio had lived under the same roof, in habits of the closest intimacy, when a sinfonia in la sol re §, which has since been much celebrated, caught the ear of the old Prince Antoine Esterhazy, and Haydn was taken into his service.

The next inheritor of the title, Prince Nicolas, was a still more ardent amateur. His passion was for the barytone, an instrument toned between the tenor and the bass; and it gives a curious idea of the idle character of an Austrian prince's life, to mention that Haydn's duty was to leave every day a new composition for this Gothic instrument on the prince's desk. He had now found the situation fitted for the development, and, in some degree, for the reward, of his great faculties.

His life was that of a student—tranquil, uniform, and diligent. He rose early, and with a piano by the side of his table, composed, in general, until dinner. The evening was given up to rehearsals, or to the opera, which was performed in the palace four times a week, or to visiting. He was here at the head of an admirable orchestra, in one of the noblest mansions in Germany, in the midst of comforts, which his former life rendered luxuries, and in growing fame with the world. Such was Haydn's quiet lot for no less a period than thirty years.

The most liberal offers had been repeatedly made to Haydn, from the principal opera theatres in Europe: but his love of ease, and his attachment to the service of his patron, retained him in Hungary. The death of Prince Nicolas, in 1789, at length unsettled his resolution; and, in 1790, he went to London, on an engagement with Salomon, the violinist, to compose for twenty concerts, at fifty guineas each. Haydn was then fifty-nine years old. He remained in England but one year, and, after visiting some of the other capitals of Europe, returned to Vienna, where he died.

Handel, the most sublime musical genius that any age or country has produced, was a native of Halle, in Upper Saxony. Like most eminent musicians, he exhibited a remarkable precocity of talents, so that while boys in general were learning the rudiments of the art, he had entitled himself to the rank of professor, and was actually composer to the opera at Hamburg when he was in his fifteenth year.

After passing his early life on the continent, caressed and honored at every court he visited, Handel fixed himself in England, in the year 1712, where he attained the very summit of fame by his oratorios.

In the early part of the reign of George I., a project was formed by the nobility for erecting a musical academy in the Haymarket, with a view to secure a constant supply of operas, to be composed by Handel, and performed under his direction. There was, however, a strong party against Handel, and in favor of the Italians Buononcini and Attilio, who were composers for the opera. In 1720, Handel obtained leave to perform his opera of Radamisto, which was received with the most extravagant applause. The crowds and tumults, which had attended the performance of his operas at Venice, were hardly equal to those in London. Many ladies, who had forced their way into the house with an impetuosity but ill suited to their rank and sex, actually fainted through the excessive heat and closeness of it. Several gentlemen were turned back, who had offered forty shillings for a seat in the gallery, after having despaired of getting any in the pit or boxes.

The attempt to establish Handel's opera produced great heats between his partisans and those of Attilio and Buononcini. The succeeding winter brought this musical disorder to its crisis. In order to terminate all matters in controversy, it was agreed to put them on this fair issue. The several parties concerned were to be jointly employed in making an opera, in which each of them was to take a distinct act; and he who, by the general suffrage, should be allowed to have given the best proofs of his abilities, was to be put into possession of the house. The proposal was accepted; whether from choice or necessity is not certain. The event was answerable to the expectations of Handel's friends. His act was the last, and the superiority of it so very manifest, that there was not the least pretence for any further doubts or disputes. It should be mentioned, that as each made an overture, as well as an act, the affair seemed to be decided even by the overture with which Handel's began. The name of the opera was Muzio Scevola.

The management of the opera was, however, of no pecuniary advantage to Handel; on the contrary, after spending all he had on the concern, he was compelled to relinquish it. By employing his talents in composing operas for Covent Garden Theatre, he somewhat retrieved his affairs, though his prosperity was soon clouded by an indifference on the part of the public, which made him decide on visiting Dublin.

Handel remained eight or nine months in Ireland, where he extended his fame, and began to repair his fortune. The Messiah, now allowed to be the best of all his compositions, was listened to with rapture by the citizens of Dublin, although it had experienced but a cold reception in London. The news of the success of that unparalleled composition in the sister kingdom, opened the ears of the English; and it afterwards gained so rapidly on their esteem, as soon to become, what it well deserved to be, the greatest of their musical favorites.

On Handel's return to London, in the beginning of 1742, as he had relinquished all thoughts of opposing the managers of the opera, former enmities began to subside; and, when he recommenced his oratorios at Covent Garden, the Lent following, he found a general disposition in the public to countenance and support him. Samson was the first he performed that year, which was not only much applauded by crowded houses in the capital, but was soon disseminated, in single songs, throughout the kingdom.

Ever since the English public were first awakened to a sense of the solemnities of the Messiah, this great work has been heard in all parts of the kingdom with increasing reverence and delight; it has fed the hungry, clothed the naked, fostered the orphan, and enriched succeeding managers of oratorios more than any single musical production in this or any other country. This sacred oratorio, as it was first called, on account of the words being wholly composed of genuine texts of Scripture, appearing to stand in such high estimation with the public, Handel, actuated by motives of the purest benevolence and humanity, formed the laudable resolution of performing it annually for the benefit of the Foundling Hospital; which resolution was constantly put in practice to the end of his life, under his own direction, and long after under that of Mr. Smith and Mr. Stanley. In consequence of these performances, the benefactions to the charity from the years 1749 to 1777 amounted to ten thousand two hundred and ninety-nine pounds. The organ, in the chapel of this hospital, was likewise a present from Handel; and he bequeathed, as a legacy to this charity, a fair copy of the original score of the Messiah.

From the period of his quitting Ireland, he continued his oratorios to the time of his death; though, late in life, like the great poets Homer and Milton, he was afflicted by blindness; which, however it might dispirit and embarrass him at other times, had no effect on his nerves or intellect in public, as he continued to play concertos and voluntaries between the parts of his oratorios to the last, with the same vigor of thought and touch for which he was ever so justly renowned. To see him, however, led to the organ, after this calamity, at upwards of seventy years of age, and then conducted towards the audience, to make his accustomed obeisance, was a sight so truly afflicting to persons of sensibility as greatly diminished their pleasure in hearing him perform.

During the oratorio season, he practised almost incessantly; which must have been the case, or his memory uncommonly retentive. At last, however, he rather chose to trust to his inventive powers than those of reminiscence; for giving the band only the skeleton or ritornels of each movement, he played all the solo parts extempore, while the other instruments left him, ad libitum, waiting for a signal of a shake, before they played such fragments of symphony as they found in their books.

Indeed, he not only continued to perform in public, after he was afflicted with blindness, but to compose in private; for we have been assured that the duet and chorus in Judas Maccabæus, of

"Zion now his head shall raise;
Tune your harps to songs of praise," were dictated to Mr. Smith, by Handel, after the total privation of sight.

The last oratorio at which he attended and performed was on the 6th of April, and he expired on the 13th, 1759.

Handel, being only a musician, was obliged to employ some person to write his operas and oratorios, which accounts for their being so very defective as poetical compositions. One of those versifiers employed by him once ventured to suggest, in the most respectful manner, that the music he had composed to some lines of his was quite contrary to the sense of the passage. Instead of taking this friendly hint as he ought to have done, from one who (although not a Pindar) was at least a better judge of poetry than himself, he looked upon the advice as injurious to his talents, and cried out, with all the violence of affronted pride, "What! you teach me music? The music is good music: confound your words. Here," said he, thrumming his harpsichord, "are my ideas; go and make words to them."

Handel became afterwards the proprietor of the Opera House, London, and presided at the harpsichord in the orchestra, piano-fortes not being then known. His embellishments were so masterly, that the attention of the audience was frequently diverted from the singing to the accompaniment, to the frequent mortification of the vocal professors. A pompous Italian singer was, on a certain occasion, so chagrined at the marked attention paid to the harpsichord, in preference to his own singing, that he swore that if ever Handel played him a similar trick, he would jump down upon his instrument, and put a stop to the interruption. Handel, who had a considerable turn for humor, replied, "O! O! you vill jump, vill you? very voll, sare. Be so kind and tell me de night ven you vill jump, and I vill advertishe it in de bills; and I shall get grate dale more money by your jumping than I shall get by your singing."

When George III. was a child, he was frequently taken into the music-room at Leicester House, which belonged to his royal mother, the Princess Dowager of Wales. Handel, observing that the little prince was very attentive to his oratorio music, exclaimed, when the prince, on one occasion, had crept close to the double bass and organ, "Ah! dat littel prince vill keep ub my music ven I am defand gone." This prophecy was verified: for the king did not relish later compositions; and Handel's music used to be performed to him by the queen's band every evening at Windsor Castle, after the usual promenade on the terrace.

Although he lived much with the great, Handel was no flatterer. He once told a member of the royal family, who asked him how he liked his playing on the violoncello, "Vy, sir, your highness plays like a prince." When the same prince had prevailed on him to hear a minuet of his own composition, which he played himself on the violoncello, Handel heard him out very quietly; but when the prince told him that he would call in his band to play it to him, that he might hear the full effect of his composition, Handel could contain himself no longer, and ran out of the room, crying, "Worscher and worscher, upon mine honor."

One Sunday, having attended divine worship at a country church, Handel asked the organist to permit him to play the people out; to which, with a politeness characteristic of the profession, the organist consented. Handel accordingly sat down to the organ, and began to play in such a masterly manner, as instantly to attract the attention of the whole congregation, who, instead of vacating their seats as usual, remained for a considerable space of time fixed in silent admiration. The organist began to be impatient, (perhaps his wife was waiting dinner,) and at length, addressing the performer, told him that he was convinced that he could not play the people out, and advised him to relinquish the attempt; which being done, a few strains in the accustomed manner operated like the reading of the riot act.

1680. MOZART COMPOSING AT SIX YEARS OF AGE.

No musician has more successfully embraced the whole extent of his art, or shone with greater lustre in all its departments, than Mozart. His great operas no less than his most simple songs, his learned symphonies as well as his airy dances, all bear the stamp of the richest imagination, the deepest sensibility, and the purest taste. All his works develop the originality of his genius, and rank him with that small number of men of genius who form an epoch in their art.

At six years of age, Mozart had made such progress in music, as to be able to compose short pieces for the harpsichord, which his father was obliged to commit to paper for him. His father, who was a musician of some eminence, returning home one day with a stranger, found little Mozart with a pen in his hand. "What are you writing?" said he. "A concerto for the harpsichord," replied the child. "Let us see it," rejoined the father; "it is, no doubt, a marvellous concerto." He then took the paper, and saw nothing, at first, but a mass of notes mingled with blots of ink, by the mal-address of the young composer, who, unskilled in the management of the pen, had dipped it too freely in the ink. He had blotted and smeared the paper, and had endeavored to make out his ideas with his fingers. On a closer examination, his father was lost in wonder, and his eyes, delighted, and overflowing with tears, became riveted on the notes. "See," exclaimed he to the stranger, "how just and regular it all is; but it is impossible to play it; it is too difficult." "It is a concerto," said the child, "and must be practised till one can play it; hear how this part goes." He then sat down to perform it, but was not able to execute the passages with sufficient fluency to do justice to his own ideas.

The sensibility of Mozart's organs was excessive; the slightest harshness or discordancy in a note was quite a torture to him. Entirely absorbed in music, this great man was quite a child in every other respect. His hands were so wedded to the piano, that he absolutely could not use them for any thing else. At table his wife carved for him; and in every thing relating to money, or to the management of his domestic affairs, he was entirely under her tutelage.

1081. SUICIDE OF A MUSICIAN.

The following remarkable instance of suicide occurs in Dr. Burney's History of Music. Jeremiah Clarke had his education in the Chapel Royal, under Dr. Blow. In 1693, the doctor resigned in his favor the place of master of the children, and almoner of St. Paul's, of which cathedral Clarke was soon after appointed organist. In 1700, Dr. Blow and his pupil were appointed gentlemen extraordinary in the king's chapel, of which, in 1704, they were jointly admitted to the place of organist. The compositions of Clarke were not numerous, as an untimely and melancholy end was put to his existence before his genius had been allowed time to expand. Early in life he was so unfortunate as to conceive a violent and hopeless passion for a very beautiful lady, of a rank far superior to his own; and his sufferings, under these circumstances, became at length so intolerable, that he resolved to terminate them by suicide. The late Mr. Samuel Wicly, one of the lay vicars of St. Paul's, who was very intimate with him, related the following extraordinary story, which he had from his unfortunate friend himself:—

Being at the house of a friend in the country, he found himself so miserable, that he suddenly determined to return to London. His friend, observing in his behavior great marks of dejection, furnished him with a horse, and a servant to attend him. In his way to town, a fit of melancholy and despair having seized him, he alighted, and giving his horse to the servant, went into a field, in the corner of which there was a pond surrounded with trees, which pointed out to his choice two ways of getting rid of life; but not being more inclined to one than the other, he left it to the determination of chance, and taking a piece of money out of his pocket, and tossing it in the air, determined to abide by its decision; but the money falling on its edge in the clay seemed to prohibit both these means of destruction. His mind was too much disordered to receive comfort, or take advantage of this delay; he therefore mounted his horse and rode to Loudon, determined to find some other means of getting rid of life; and in July, 1807, not many weeks after his return, he shot himself in his own house, in St. Paul's Churchyard.

1082. HANDEL DRIVEN TO HIBERNIA.

Playing tricks with music with numberless divisions, to the neglect of that harmony which conforms to the sense, and applies to the passions, is false taste. Handel introduced a great number of performers, and more of instruments into the orchestra, and employed even drums and cannon to make a fuller chorus; which proved so much too muny for the fine gentlemen of his age, that he was obliged to remove his music into Ireland; after which they were reduced, for want of composers, to introduce the tricks and patchwork above mentioned. Driving Handel to the Hibernian shore is referred to in the Dunciad:—

"Strong in new arms, lo! giant Handel stands,
Like bold Briareus, with a hundred hands;
To stir, to rouse, to shake the world he comes,
And Jove's own thunders follow Mars's drums.
Arrest him, empress! or you sleep no more—
She heard, and drove him to the Hibernian shore."

1083. POPE'S QUERY.

It is remarkable that, in the earlier part of his life, Pope was so very insensible to the charms of music, that he once asked his friend Dr. Arbuthnot, who had a fine ear, "whether the rapture which the company expressed upon hearing the compositions and performances of Handel did not proceed wholly from affectation."

1084. EARLY DEVELOPMENT OF MOZART'S TALENTS.

The accounts of this admirable composer's early proficiency in music are almost incredible. He began the piano at three years of age; his first delight was almost scientific; he used to spend his first hours in looking for thirds, and felt charmed with their harmony.

At five years old, he began to invent little pieces of such ingenuity, that his father used to write them down. He was a creature of universal sensibility, a natural enthusiast, from his infancy fond, melancholy, and tearful. When scarcely able to walk, his first question to the friends who took him on their knee was, whether they loved him, and a negative always made him weep.

His mind was all alive; and whatever touched it made it palpitate throughout. When he was taught the rudiments of arithmetic, the walls and tables of his bed-chamber were found covered with figures. But the piano was the grand object of his devotion. At six years old, this singular child commenced with his father, and sister two years older than himself, one of those musical tours common in Germany, and performed at Munich before the elector, to the great admiration of the most musical court on the continent. His ear now signalized itself by detecting the most minute irregularities in the orchestra; but its refinement was almost a disease; a discord tortured him; he conceived a horror of the trumpet, except as a simple accompaniment, and suffered from it so keenly, that his father, to correct what he looked on as the effect of ignorant terror, one day desired a trumpet to be blown in his apartment. The child entreated him not to make the experiment; but the trumpet sounded. Mozart suddenly turned pale, fell on the floor, and was going into convulsions, when the trumpeter was sent out of the room.

When only seven years old, he taught himself the violin, and thus, by the united effort of genius and industry, mastered the most difficult of all instruments. From Munich he went to Vienna, Paris, and London. His reception in the British metropolis was such as the curious give to novelty, the scientific to intelligence, and the great to what administrators to stately pleasure. He was flattered, honored, and rewarded. Handel had then made the organ popular, and Mozart took the way of popularity. His execution, which, on the piano, had astonished the English musicians, was, on the organ, brought in aid of his genius, and he overcame all rivalry.

On his departure from England, he gave a farewell concert, of which all the symphonies were composed by himself. This was the career of a child nine years old! With the strengthening of his frame, the acuteness of his ear became less painful; the trumpet had lost its terrors for him at ten years old; and before he had completed that period, he distinguished the dedication of the Church of the Orphans, at Vienna, by the composition of a mass, motets, and a trumpet duet; and acted as director of the concert.

This detail of years is minute; but who will object to reckoning the steps by which genius climbs to fame? Mozart had now traversed the great kingdoms of the earth, and seen all that could be shown to him of European wealth and regal grandeur. He had yet to see the kingdom of European genius. Italy was an untried land, and he went at once to its capital. He was present at the Miserere, which seems to have been then performed with an effect unequalled since. The singers had been forbidden to give a copy of the score. Mozart bore it away in his memory, and wrote it down.

This is still quoted among musicians as a miracle of remembrance; but it may be more truly quoted as an evidence of the power which diligence and determination give to the mind. Mozart was not remarkable for memory; what he did, all men may do; but the same triumph is to be purchased only by the same exertion. The impression of this day lasted during life; his style was changed; he at once adopted a solemn reverence for Handel, whom he called the "Thunderbolt," and softened the fury of his inspiration by the taste of Boccherini. He now made a grand advance in his profession, and composed an opera, Mithridates, which was played twenty nights at Milan.

1685. EARLY SUCCESS OF HANDEL.

The father of Handel had destined him to the study of the law; but he evinced very early a propensity to music, which nothing could restrain. He was strictly forbidden to touch any musical instrument; but notwithstanding this injunction, he found means to get a clari-chord privately conveyed to a room at the top of the house, to which he constantly stole when the family were asleep.

While he was yet under seven years of age, he went with his father to the court of Saxe-Weissenfels, to the prince of which his half brother was valet-de-chambre. His father had refused to let young Handel accompany him; but he followed the chaise on foot, and by his entreaties was taken into the chaise and carried to court. Here, playing one day on the organ in the church after the service was over, he attracted the notice of the duke, who induced the father to suffer him to study music.

At the age of nine years he began to compose the church service for voices and instruments, and from that time actually composed a service every week, for three years successively.

When only fourteen, he went to Berlin, where Buononcini, a leading composer attached to the Opera, affected a contempt for so mere a child as Handel, and, to put his talents to the test, composed a cantata in the chromatic style, difficult in every respect, and such as he thought would puzzle even a master; but Handel treated the composition as a trifle, and executed it at once with a truth and accuracy that were astonishing.

Before he had reached his fifteenth year, Handel had composed three operas; the first, Almeria, which was performed at Hamburg thirty nights successively; Florinda and Nerone, the other two, were equally successful. He now, by his talents and industry, was enabled to yield some assistance to his mother, who was left a widow. By the persuasions of the Prince of Tuscany, he was induced to go to Florence, where he was received with the most marked attention by the court.

Here, when still only eighteen years of age, he composed the opera of Rodrigo, for which he received one hundred sequins, and a service of plate. The following year he went to Venice, where he was first discovered at a masquerade, while playing on a harpsichord in his visor. Scarlati was there, and affirmed "that it was either the little Saxon or the devil."

While at Venice he composed, in three weeks, the opera of Agrippina, which was played twenty-seven nights without interruption. The theatre almost at every pause resounded with shouts and acclamations of Vive il caro Sassone. Such was the early success of this immortal composer, who died possessed of an ample fortune, acquired solely by his talents.

1686. HAYDN'S FIRST EFFORTS.

Like Mozart, Haydn gave strong manifestations of his taste for music, even in infancy. His father, who had some knowledge of music, used to play the harp to his wife's singing, while the infant Haydn imitated a violin and bow with two pieces of wood, and thus took part in this quiet family concert. When of sufficient age, he was placed among the choir of boys in the cathedral of Vienna. His duties as a singer occupied only two hours in the day, but Haydn practised in general sixteen, and sometimes eighteen hours. He was wont to speak in rapturous terms of the delight he received from the combinations of sound; even when he was playing with his companions, he was never able to resist the harmony of the organ in the cathedral. Haydn now began to think of composition, but could not obtain lessons from any of the able professors of Vienna. He was thus thrown on his own resources, yet still despaired not. He bought an old treatise on harmony at a stall, and devoting himself to the study of it with all the zeal of genius, speedily acquired a mastery of the principles of the art, and ere long became one of its brightest ornaments.

Perhaps there is no curiosity more natural and universal than the desire to know all we can of those who, by any uncommon gifts, have the power of extensively influencing or exciting the minds of their fellow-men. What a charm there is about the most trifling anecdote of Mozart! Ole Bull seems to have been almost as precocious in his musical genius. His family being all amateurs, he was accustomed from infancy to hear a great deal of music. A maternal uncle, in particular, was passionately fond of this divinest of the arts. He had a choice collection of rare and curious instruments, had musical clubs very frequently at his house, and himself played well on the violoncello. He delighted to amuse himself with little Ole's extreme susceptibility to sound. When he was three years old, he often put him in the violoncello case, and hired him with sweetmeats to stand there while he played. The candy would keep him quiet a few minutes, but soon the little feet began to beat time, and the eager eyes kindled more and more. At last, his nervous excitement would become so great, that he could not stay in the violoncello case; he must come out; the music was dancing all through him, and he was crazy to give it utterance. Already the spirit spoke within him, which led Correggio to say, "I too am a painter."

When the child returned home, he would seize the yard measure, and, with a small stick for a bow, imitate what his uncle had played. He heard it with the inward ear all the while. But as his parents were not so pervaded with the tune as he was, he would explain his movements as he went along, telling how beautifully the bass came in at such a place. At five years old, his uncle bought him a violin; a very little one, as yellow as a lemon. He says he was never lifted quite so high above the earth as he was when he first drew the bow across that little yellow violin. To the surprise of his family, he immediately played well upon it, though he had received no instruction. He had not even been taught to read music by the usual process. But he had always been present at family concerts and quartet clubs, and as the musicians played, he observed the written notes, till they became as familiar as household words. And now, with his little yellow violin, he plays a quartet of Pleyel's to the assembled club, who look at each other with astonishment, and exclaim, "Why, who has taught the child?"

At ten years old, a foreign music master urges the necessity of teaching the boy according to rule. The father consents, and the child makes trial of the mechanical method. He is told that he must handle his bow differently, hold his violin quite otherwise, leave off improvising, and practise by note. But nothing comes to him thus; the life goes out of him, and he cannot play. Father and teacher coax and reprove, till the sensitive child, in his agony, cries and screams. His genius will not go into the straight jacket. It was worse than harnessing Pegasus into a stage-coach team. The boy had his way, and music continued to come to him without aid from the drill sergeants of sound. The result is before us. Those who think a stricter education would have made a more thoroughly correct performer are little aware how much would have been lost to them had this strong and fluent nature been enveloped by a process less free.

1688. PASSION FOR MUSIC.

There is a touching tale of a musician, on the verge of death, who rose from his bed to finish a tune which a wayward boy, who run away, had left unfinished. The musician finished the musical phrase, and instantly died.

There is another interesting instance on record. Benda, the celebrated German composer, was the most absent man imaginable. The following is a remarkable instance: His wife had just expired in his arms, and Benda was in an agony of grief. Suddenly, as if struck by an inspiration, he rushed to the piano, and drew from it a series of most mournful modulations; but soon interested, in spite of himself, in the succession of chords he played, and carried away by his imagination into the realms of fancy, he forgot so completely the subject of his inspiration, that, a servant having come to ask him if he would send the customary lettres de fair part, "Ask my wife!" answered Benda, without stirring.

1689. HAYDN'S COURT KNOWLEDGE.

A female singer, who was in high favor with a German prince, was appointed to sing one of Haydn's compositions. At the rehearsal, she and the conductor differed as to the time in which it should be sung. It was agreed that the composer should be referred to, who, when the conductor waited on him, asked him if the lady was handsome.

"Very," was the reply, "and a special favorite with the duke."

"Then she is right," said Haydn, with a significant look at the poor disconcerted professor, who, in all probability, had he gained his point, would have lost his place; and this Haydn well knew.

1690. MONSIGNY.

The susceptibility of the celebrated musical composer Monsigny was so extreme, that the composition of each of his operas threw him into a fit of illness, from which he recovered only to relapse into another. Monsigny composed more from sentiment than from learning; for the thorns of science and study were never mingled with the flowers which he gathered: the spoiled child of nature, his talents had not acquired that ready docility which is the result of a more rigorous education; his genius was an instrument which he could not dispose of at will, like those who, having rendered it flexible by the exercise of severe school discipline, can regulate its movements without repressing its flight. As soon as sentiment had impregnated his imagination, he sought to deliver himself of it; but he was frequently on the point of sinking beneath the labor, which was a mixture of delight and pain. He shed so many tears during the composition of the Deserter, that his friends twice found it necessary to take the poem from him. Even after he had completed it, on alluding to the scene where Louisa gradually recovers from her swoon, and recollecting the half-articulated words, interrupted by the strains of the orchestra, he would melt into tears, and fall himself into the distressed situation which he had so forcibly depicted.

1691. MOZART'S MINUET AND THE MENDICANT.

Mozart, walking in the suburbs of Vienna, was accosted by a mendicant of a very prepossessing appearance and manner, who told his tale of woe with such effect as to interest the musician strongly in his favor; but the state of his purse not corresponding with the impulse of his humanity, he desired the applicant to follow him to a coffee-house. Here Mozart drawing some paper from his pocket, in a few minutes composed a minuet, which, with a letter, he gave to the distressed man, desiring him to take it to his publisher. A composition from Mozart was a bill payable at sight; and to his great surprise, the now happy mendicant was immediately presented with five double ducats.

1692. HANDEL AND DR. MORELL.

Dr. Morell, who furnished Handel with the poetry of his oratorios, related that one fine summer morning he (Dr. M.) was roused out of his bed at five o'clock by Handel, who came in his carriage a short distance from London. The doctor went to the window, and spoke to Handel, who would not leave his carriage. Handel was at that time composing an oratorio. When the doctor asked him what he wanted, he said, "What de tevil means de vord billow?" which was in the oratorio the doctor had written for him. The doctor, after laughing at so ridiculous a reason for disturbing him, told him that billow meant a wave of the sea. "O, de wave," said Handel, and bade the coachman return, without addressing another word to the doctor.

1693. GABRIELI'S CAPRICE.

The celebrated Gabrieli, who was so long the admiration of all Italy, was not more remarkable for her great vocal powers than for the caprice of temper by which they may be said to have been in thrall.

When she was in good humor, and chose to exert herself, there was nothing in the whole compass of music that she could not perform. She is said to have sung to the heart, as well as to the imagination; to have touched every chord, and to have moved every passion of the human breast. Such, however, was the unfortunate capriciousness of her temper, that it but rarely permitted her to exert her powers to full advantage. Neither interest, nor flattery, nor threats, nor punishments had the least power over her conduct. To know that she was particularly desired to sing was with her an invincible reason against it.

The Viceroy of Sicily, who was fond of music, one time gave a grand dinner to the principal nobility of Palermo, and sent an invitation to Gabrieli to be of the party. Every other person was there exactly at the appointed time. The viceroy ordered the dinner to be kept back for some time, and sent an express to let her know that the company awaited her arrival. The messenger found her reading in bed. She said she was sorry she had kept the company waiting, but she had really forgot the appointment. Nor was this all. When she came, she sung all her airs with obvious indifference and sullen neglect.

The viceroy was highly offended; but being of a gentle temper, he did not choose to exercise his authority. But still persevering in her sullen and stubborn manner, he was constrained to threaten her with punishment if she any longer refused to sing.

Upon this she grew more obstinate, declaring that force and authority would have no effect with her; that he might make her cry, but he never would make her sing. She was then sent to prison, where she remained twelve days; during which time she gave magnificent dinners every day, paid the debts of all the poor prisoners, and distributed large sums in charity.

It is related that several times the managers of the London Opera were in terms with her to visit England, but she would never agree: the reason she assigned was, that as she could not command her caprice, which for the most part commanded her, she could have no liberty to indulge it in England.

"For," added she, "were I to take it into my head not to sing, I am told the people there would certainly mob me, and perhaps break my bones. Now I like to sleep in a sound skin, although it should be in a prison." She alleged, also, that it was not always caprice or ill humor that prevented her from singing, but that it often depended upon physical causes.

1694. CATALINI'S IRRESOLUTION.

It is little known, and can hardly be credited, that the great singer Catalini, with all her experience of public favor and inevitable consciousness of her own genius, continued to the very end of her career to be exceedingly timid and irresolute on entering upon her theatrical duties. She generally carried a Bible upon the stage along with her, as a kind of charm to insure confidence, and always devoutly crossed herself, and prayed for support, as a soldier might do on going to battle.

1695. GENEROSITY REWARDED.

Haydn, when a boy, was engaged by the organist of the cathedral at Vienna; but when his voice broke, his master discarded him from the choir, and, on account of a boyish trick, most inhumanly turned him into the streets, at seven o'clock one evening in November, with tattered clothes, and without one kreutzler in his pocket.

Driven into the street at such an hour, and without any means of procuring a lodging, he threw himself upon some stone steps, and passed the night in the open air. A poor but friendly musician, of the name of Spangler, discovered him the next morning; and though he himself lodged with his wife and children in a single room, on a fifth story, he offered the outcast Haydn a corner of his garret, and a seat at his table. A miserable bed, a table, chair, and a wretched harpsichord were all that the generous hospitality of his host could offer him, in a garret which had neither windows nor a stove; but this charitable act of the benevolent Spangler was welcome, and most readily accepted by Haydn, who soon was enabled to recompense his generous benefactor by placing him as principal tenor in the chapel of Prince Esterhazy.

Poor, freezing with cold in a miserable garret, he studied by the side of his old broken harpsichord, the ardor of his genius alone left to animate him in contending with the difficulties of the way. At length he was fortunate enough to obtain some lessons in Italian singing, from his introduction to the family of a Venetian nobleman, ambassador at Vienna. The famous Porpora was still retained in his household, and Haydn most eagerly sought his favor, in the hope of obtaining also his instruction. Humiliation, and many a "hope deferred," he had to endure; for Porpora was ill tempered beyond conception, and although poor Haydn rose early every morning to brush his coat and shoes, and arrange his wig in the nicest order, in expectation of propitiating him, he had seldom more than the polite epithet of "fool" bestowed on him for his pains. And this was to the future illustrious author of the Creation. At the age of nineteen, his voice breaking, he was expelled from his class at St. Stephen's Church, where he had sung eleven years, and his only asylum was in the house of a wig-maker, named Keller. Unfortunately, his residence there had a fatal influence on his after life; for his host, too desirous, seemingly, of making ample provision for his young guest, proposed uniting him to one of his daughters, whilst Haydn, engrossed in his studies, having no thoughts of love, made no objections; and afterwards keeping his word with scrupulous honor, the union proved far from happy. On leaving the house of his friend Keller, (we do not know for what reason,) for six long years he endured a bitter conflict against penury so piercing that often, during winter, he was compelled to lie in bed for want of fuel and other necessities. An opportunity at last presented itself of improving his circumstances; for by chance the Prince Esterhazy, a passionate amateur of music, was present at a concert which very opportunely commenced with one of Haydn's pieces. The delight of the prince was unbounded, and he immediately appointed the composer sub-director of his orchestra, and he demanded who he was. Haydn, in fear and trembling, advanced, when the prince exclaimed, "What, is that the little Moor?" (alluding to his complexion;) then, addressing him, added, "Go and dress yourself as my chapel master. You must never appear again in my presence in the plight you are now. You are too little, and have a pitiful looking face. Get a new coat and high-heeled shoes, that your stature may correspond with your mind." Haydn was too happy at his appointment to feel much chagrin at his equivocal style of compliment.

1697. A MUSICAL LANDSCAPE.

"Our nice travelling chariot," says John Waters, "with all its trunks, cases, pockets, down cushions, and delightful appliances, that we had thought such a purchase two days before at Frankfort, gave out just as we approached Heidelberg. One of the axletrees being heated, the wheel refused to turn round; and for two hours we were standing in the road, surrounded by the peasantry that the postillion had assembled together, who were endeavoring to get the wheel off, pouring cold water upon it, and talking to us, and about us, in an unknown tongue. For although my friend and myself mustered five modern languages, German, unfortunately, was not one of them, and we knew nothing whatever of the patois of these honest people.

"After consultation with a mechanic at Heidelberg, and finding that the defect was not to be remedied there without great delay, we resolved upon a partial repair, and to return, as best we might, to Frankfort, and seek redress from the warranty of the party of whom we had bought the vehicle. We paid our visit to the incomparable ruins of the castle, and then proceeded to retrace our steps, and, examining our wheels at every post-house, reached the Hotel d'Angleterre at Frankfort at the close of the day in August.

"It is always depressing to be turned back upon one's path; and these reclamations and bargainings for redress are the most uncomfortable things in the world; so that M. and I looked blank at one another as we entered again the streets of that busy mart. We determined to say nothing of the matter until morning, and I longed heartily for some refreshment, that I should banish it altogether from my mind in the mean time.

"Is there no music in Frankfort to-night?" I inquired. 'I beg your pardon,' was the reply; 'there is the finest. Monsieur Listz, the pianist, performs this evening at the theatre.' 'Is it far from this?' 'Quite the contrary, fortunately, for the performances must have begun.' 'Show me the way.'

"In a few minutes I had passed through the boxes into the pit of a small theatre. It was well filled, and yet the number of performers and amateurs on the stage seemed hardly less than that of the audience. The entertainment had opened, and was continued for some time with alternate instrumental and vocal music. The latter was composed of those strong, brassy voices, that satisfy the ear by their correctness and force, perhaps, but make no approach towards the heart. There was then a pause of some minutes, and a movement of expectation throughout the house; and presently a pale-faced, light-complexioned, loosely-constructed, middle-aged person made his way through the artists and assistants, saluted the audience in a shambling and gauche manner, and seated himself, without notes, at a piano that was near the front of the stage.

"Until he reached the side of this instrument, he seemed like part of a man, wanting support and confidence; but as he took his place, the existence became complete, and joy passed over his countenance as he laid his hand upon the keys. It was one of the faces of Thorwaldsen, an express indication of the deep interior spirit; and expectation rose high when the piano breathed, as it were, under his touch.

"He ran through a delicious voluntary, that there might be no doubt of the exactness of each note, and we all felt the perfection of his fingering; clear, distinct, round, precious, full. — a shower of pearls upon a table of porphyry. It was now all stillness, the intense stillness of watchfulness, throughout the house, for his performance was to commence; and although the moments, if measured by a clock, might have been short, no doubt, we divided time by a different metre; and a wild waste had in our imagination extended itself around him, when he calmly raised his hands to their utmost height, and with blow after blow upon the instrument with his whole force, successively planted large columnar masses of sound over the extended plain, and a scene like that of the Giant's Causeway rose like enchantment before our astonished and delighted senses.

"Hardly had he sketched the vision before us, when a storm began, such as I have seldom witnessed. The instrument rained, hailed, thundered, moaned, whistled, shrieked round those basaltic columns, in every cry that the tempest can utter in its wildest paroxysms of wrath. It was almost too powerful and ungoverned at the last; and at the instant that this thought entered into the mind, the wind lulled, the elements were spent, the calm came; the brooks and watercourses took up their song of exultation; the air was refreshed, the birds chirped, the sun put forth, and 'the young leaf lifted its green head.'

"We now accompanied him through a small valley with precipitous banks, such as one finds in Piedmont, where the large-leaved tree grows beside the mossy rock, and the vine tries vainly to envelop both, and shade, and light, and repose are the glory of the earth. Young clouds were forming on the upper heights, destined to paint the skies of Italy, and struggling hard in their ascent, at every jutting rock and leafy buttress, to remain adhering to their native cliffs, against the repeated bidding of the sun; as if preferring, even to the cerulean heaven, a world so verdant and so fair.

"We were thus borne along by the strain through countless beauties of rock, and sky, and foliage, to a grotto, by the side of which was a fountain that seemed one of the eyes of the earth, so large and darkly brilliant was it, so deep and so serene; reflecting on its retina with magical distinctness every surrounding object, whether distant or near. Here we listened for some moments to the voices, rather than the songs, of birds, when the music by degrees again diminished, and then fluttered, and then ceased.

"It was not immediately that the audience gave forth their demonstrations of rapturous applause; and as I looked round, I saw on all sides that 'eyes, in tears, both smiled and wept.' I walked home almost upon air, and every pulsation on the way was a throb of gratitude to Him who, for our solace and delight, hath 'planted the ear,' and opened all hearts to the inspiration of the truly gifted master of this wonderful art.

Being some days afterwards in the society of an accomplished lady, herself no mean musician, and describing to her the effect produced on my mind by this remarkable performance, she surprised me by saying that she had been present at it, and that the same imagery had passed with slight variation before her, as she listened, that I have here endeavored faintly to preserve. I was charmed at the assurance, for it confirmed me in the belief that this was not a mere flitting of the rainbow spirit across the imagination, rearing in its passage a fabric of happiness,—beautiful at times as a palace of the genii, and alas! as illusory,—but a substantive and truthful joy, to be recalled at will; to be remembered in solitude; to be dwelt upon for the enrichment of the soul; and—may I entertain the hope?—in some degree perhaps even to be imparted."

1698. "THINK OF THY SERVANT."

Josquin, a celebrated composer, was appointed master of the chapel to Louis XII. of France, who promised him a benefice, but, contrary to his usual custom, forgot him. Josquin, after suffering great inconvenience from the shortness of his majesty's memory, ventured, by a singular expedient, publicly to remind him of his promise, without giving offence. Being commanded to compose a motet for the chapel royal, he chose part of the 119th psalm, beginning, "O, think of thy servant as concerning thy word," which he set in so supplicating and exquisite a manner, that it was universally admired, particularly by the king, who was not only charmed with the music, but felt the force of the words so effectually, that he soon after granted his petition, by conferring on him the promised appointment.

1699. THE COMPOSER AND THE WAG.

The celebrated composer Handel had such a remarkable irritation of nerves, that he could not bear to hear the tuning of instruments, and therefore this was always done before he arrived at the theatre. A musical wag, who knew how to extract some mirth from Handel's irascibility of temper, stole into the orchestra on a night when the Prince of Wales was to be present, and untuned all the instruments. As soon as the prince arrived, Handel gave the signal of beginning con spirito; but such was the horrible discord, that the enraged musician started up from his seat, and having overturned a double-bass which stood in his way, he seized a kettle-drum, which he threw with such violence at the leader of the band, that he lost his full-bottomed wig in the effort. Without waiting to replace it, he advanced barcheaded to the front of the orchestra, breathing vengeance, but so much choked with passion that utterance was denied him. In this ridiculous attitude he stood staring and stamping for some moments, amid a convulsion of laughter; nor could he be prevailed upon to resume his seat until the prince went in person, and with much difficulty appeased his wrath.

1700. A VAGABOND WONDER.

There was in London, many years since, a deplorable instance of the waste of fine powers, in the person of John James, an organist in London, a man who possessed, in an eminent degree, the rare talent of extemporizing music. Among those who gave evidence of his vast ability were numbered Handel, Geminiani, Boyd, Green, and other distinguished musical persons, who uniformly expressed equal surprise and delight. But unfortunately for the art and himself, this gifted being found his most agreeable companions in the debased frequenters of the lowest pothouses and taverns. He was not only a capital organist, but an excellent composer; yet he was too idle or too thoughtless to publish any thing more than a few fugitive songs. A life thus unworthily passed terminated in 1745, when he was followed to the grave by a large concourse of musicians and boon companions, who performed on the occasion a funeral hymn of his own composition.

1701. DORIAN'S WIT.

Plutarch speaks of Dorian; and says he changed the style of playing, and that parties were raised to oppose and favor the change. Parties of this kind were not uncommon. Socrates says, when speaking of the advantages of concord in a state, "I mean that the city should agree, not in praising the same poet or flute-player, but in obeying the same laws."

Dorian was both a wit and a voluptuary. His music and poetry are lost, but some of his wit has been preserved. He was once at Milo, in Egypt, and, as he could not find lodgings, he walked about, when, seeing a priest at his sacrifices, he asked him to tell him to whom he was sacrificing. "To Jupiter and Neptune," answered the priest. "How should I expect to find lodging," said Dorian, "when the gods lie double?"

Supping one night with a prince, he admired a gold cup; when the prince observed, "The goldsmith will make you one like it when you please." "He will make one to your order much sooner than mine," said Dorian; "so let me have this, and do you order another."

Upon hearing a description of a tempest in the Nauplius of Timotheus, he said he had seen a better one in a boiling pot. Is not this the original of a "tempest in a teapot"? His wit and humor made him every where a welcome guest, and he often visited Philip of Macedon.

His father was a flute-maker, who had acquired a fortune by his profession, and was able, not only to educate his children in a liberal manner, but to furnish a chorus for his tribe at festivals and religious ceremonies. This, in consequence of the emulation of different tribes, was attended with great expense. However, the profit upon some of the flutes may be supposed to have been large. Ismenias, a musician of Thebes, paid for a flute which he purchased about three thousand dollars.

1702. GRATITUDE FOR TALENTS.

"On one occasion only," says Andersen, "did I hear Jenny Lind express her joy in her talent and her self-consciousness. It was during her residence in Copenhagen. Almost every evening she appeared either in the opera or at concerts; every hour was in requisition. She heard of a society, the object of which was to assist unfortunate children, and to take them out of the hands of their parents, by whom they were misused, and compelled either to beg or steal, and to place them in other and better circumstances. Benevolent people subscribed annually a small sum each for their support; nevertheless the means for this excellent purpose were small. 'But have I not still a disengaged evening?' said she; 'let me give a night's performance for the benefit of these poor children; but we will have double prices!'

"Such a performance was given, and returned large proceeds. When she was informed of this, and that by this means a number of poor children would be benefited for several years, her countenance beamed, and the tears filled her eyes. 'It is, however, beautiful' said she, 'that I can sing so!'"

1703. THE DEVIL'S SONATA.

Tartini dreamed one night that he had made a compact with the devil, who promised to be at his service on all occasions; and, during this vision, every thing succeeded to his mind. His wishes were prevented, and his desires fulfilled, by the assistance of his new servant. At last, he imagined he gave the devil his violin, in order to discover what sort of a musician he was, when, to his great astonishment, he heard him play a solo, so singularly beautiful, and which he executed with such superior taste and precision, that it surpassed all the music he had ever heard or conceived in his life. So great was his surprise, and so exquisite his delight upon this occasion, that it deprived him of the power of breathing; he awoke with the violence of his sensations, and instantly seized his fiddle, in hopes of expressing what he had just heard; but in vain. He, however, composed a piece, which is the best of all his works, and which he called the Devil's Sonata; yet it was so far inferior to what his sleep had produced, that he declared he would have broken his instrument, and abandoned music forever, if he could have found any other means of subsistence.

1704. MOZART'S "REQUIEM."

The great composer Mozart was so absorbed in music, that he was a child in every other respect. Like all weak-minded people, he was extremely apprehensive of death; and it was only by incessant application to his favorite study that he prevented his spirits from sinking totally under the fears of approaching dissolution. At all other times he labored under a profound melancholy, during which he composed some of his best pieces, particularly his celebrated Requiem. The circumstances attending it were remarkable.

One day, when his spirits were unusually oppressed, a stranger, of a tall, dignified appearance, was introduced. His manners were grave and impressive. He told Mozart that he came from a person who did not wish to be known, to request he would compose a solemn mass, as a requiem for the soul of a friend whom he had recently lost, and whose memory he was desirous of commemorating by this solemn service. Mozart undertook the task, and engaged to have it completed in a month. The stranger begged to know what price he set upon his work; and immediately paying him one hundred ducats, he departed. The mystery of this visit seemed to have a very strong effect upon the mind of the musician. He brooded over it for some time, and then, suddenly calling for writing materials, began to compose with extraordinary ardor. This application, however, was more than his strength could support; it brought on fainting fits, and his increasing illness obliged him to suspend his work. "I am writing the requiem for myself," said he one day to his wife; "it will serve for my own funeral service." And this impression never afterwards left him. At the expiration of the month, the mysterious stranger appeared and demanded the Requiem. "I have found it impossible," said Mozart, "to keep my word; the work has interested me more than I expected, and I have extended it beyond my first design. I shall require another month to finish it." The stranger made no objection, but, observing that for this additional trouble it was but just to increase the premium, laid down fifty ducats more, and promised to return at the time appointed. Astonished at his whole proceeding, Mozart ordered a servant to follow this singular personage, and, if possible, to find out who he was; the man, however, lost sight of him, and was obliged to return as he went. Mozart, now more than ever persuaded that he was a messenger from the other world, sent to warn him that his end was approaching, applied with fresh zeal to the Requiem; and, in spite of his exhausted state both of body and mind, he completed it before the end of the month. At the appointed day the stranger returned; the Requiem was finished, but Mozart was no more!

1705. DI TANTI PALPITI.

The anecdote of the Aria del Rizi (the rice air) belongs to Tancredi. Rossini had composed an air which La Malanote, then in the pride of her beauty and talents, refused to sing, signifying her objections only two nights before that of the performance. The poor young man returned pensively to his small inn. Every dinner in Northern Italy commences with a dish of rice; as it is eaten very little done, four minutes before he serves, he sends to ask the important question, "Must the rice be put on the fire?" As Rossini entered his room in despair, the cameriere made the usual demand, and was answered in the affirmative. The rice was put down; and, before it was ready, Rossini had written the air which has since been sung all over Europe, Di tanti palpiti, and which has retained the name of Aria del Risi in Venice.

1706. IRISH MELODY.

When Haydn, the celebrated composer, first heard an Irish melody, he is said to have been deeply affected, and remarked that such music could only originate with an oppressed and unfortunate race.

1707. THE RIVAL OPERAS.

In the year 1787, the Neapolitan composers Piccini and Sacchini were each required to compose an opera for an entertainment at Fontainebleau. Piccini chose the story of Dido; Sacchini that of Chimena. Sacchini soon had his opera ready, and it was deemed a masterpiece. Piccini was late in beginning his task; but when the poetry of his Dido was finished, he repaired to the country residence of M. Marmontel, who wrote it. During his stay there of seventeen days, he composed the whole music of the piece, retaining it in his memory, and only reducing the song part and the bass to notation. "I passed," says M. Ginguene, "a most agreeable morning in going over it with him. We both frequently shed tears."

In that fine scene, particularly in the fifth act, which is followed by the chorus of the priests of Pluto, Piccini melted into tears, and said, "Thus has it been with me for these fifteen days. Even when not composing, I could not but weep to think of poor Dido." Hence, no doubt, arises that strong feeling of sensibility which so predominates throughout this charming piece. In six weeks the whole was ready for performance, and its success was such as to eclipse all rivalry.

"Ope'd the sacred source of sympathetic tears," —

his pretended Lord and Sleeper gave birth to emotions perfectly opposite at the Italian Theatre.

This tune has so long been considered as national property, that most persons have supposed it purely American in its origin. Yet it appears that, previous to the time of Charles I., an air somewhat similar to the one in question was common among the peasantry of England.

The air, during the time of Cromwell, was set to various ditties in ridicule of the Protector. One of these began with the words, "The Roundheads and the Cavaliers." Another set of words was called Nankee Doodle, and has throughout a striking resemblance to some of the popular stanzas which were common in the American colonies from the time of their origin to the revolution, and, in some sections of the country, even to the present day. The song Lydia Locket, or Lucy Locket, has been sung to the same tune from time immemorial. This air seems to have been the foundation of Yankee Doodle.

During the French war of 1755, the provincial army sent against Niagara and Frontenac was commanded by Governor Shirley, of Massachusetts, and General Johnston, of New York. Through the early part of the season the army lay encamped on the Hudson, a little below Albany. While the troops were in this position, they were continually receiving recruits from the New England States in the form of drafts and volunteers. They came in, company after company, just as they had issued from their farms and firesides, and their appearance is said to have equalled any specimen of the ludicrous ever exhibited, save and except the famous company of Sir John Falstaff. Some of them had long hair, some had short, and some wore enormous wigs. Some had black suits, some had blue, and some had gray. Some had long coats, some had short ones, and some had no coats at all. Their accoutrements were equally varied, and all together furnished the most grotesque and amusing spectacle that can well be imagined, and abundance of sport for the British regulars.

The music played by the volunteers was such as had been out of date in the British army for centuries, and assisted finely to add point to the amusement afforded by the whole scene. In the British army, at that time, was one Dr. Shackburg, a surgeon, who was a skillful musician and a great wag. The doctor immediately turned his attention to the Yankee volunteers, and determined to pass off a joke by composing a tune for their particular use. He accordingly remodelled the old air of Nankee Doodle, and called it Yankee Doodle, and with all the gravity imaginable, recommended it to the new comers as one of the most celebrated airs that his country had ever produced.

The volunteers admired the tune; and, notwithstanding the hearty laugh and noisy ridicule of the regulars, it soon became a general favorite through the whole American camp.

Thus originated an air in pure levity and ridicule which many a British soldier in a few years had cause to consider the knell of all his glory. The same soul-stirring strains were heard at a subsequent period on Bunker Hill; the same on the plains of Yorktown; and the same strains will continue to warm the American heart, so long as music hath charms to inspire the breast and rouse the soul to action.

Upon a couch in a small, though neatly-furnished room, in the city of Paris, lay an old man wrapped in deep slumber. Books pregnant with visionary schemes of social reform, and subversive of all the world holds good, either in morals or religion, lay beside him; many of which his fertile mind had conjured up, and his pen and the press had sent forth into the licentious city, to work like leaven in the meal. In different parts of this chamber were piles of manuscript music, which had won for him much applause, among which was his masterly effort of Devin du Village, which so enraptured the volatile French that they almost worshipped him. He sought and coveted the applause of men rather than the favor of his Maker. God was not in all his thoughts, and the future, the mysterious future, the immortality of the soul, and its inevitable state of happiness or misery, were to him as so many chimeras of an overheated imagination.

Rousseau, the infidel, slept. And while he slept, his deathless spirit soared away beyond the boundaries of Beulah, and was permitted to listen to more enrapturing and melodious sounds than earth can ever yield. An innumerable throng with harps of gold swelled the loud chorus of this celestial place, at one moment louder than the diapason of ocean's surge, the next, softer than the softest breathings of the Æolian's trembling strings. Enraptured the dreamer stood, drinking in the sweet melody, until it seemed as if himself were dissolving into the soft cadence, when suddenly an angelic being, beautiful in appearance, stood before him.

"What delightful and enrapturing place is this," said he, "and who are those that are so happy, and whose sweet strains have almost robbed me of my being?"

"This place is called heaven, the paradise of God," was the answer; "and those happy beings you behold are the glorified from earth: and the anthem they are swelling is the song of the redeemed."

The music of the skies awoke the infidel from his dream; and hastily seizing his pen, by the dim glimmer of his midnight lamp he wrote the Song of the Redeemed, ere the echoes of its heavenly strain had died upon his ear.

§ 179. AMUSING INCIDENTS AND JEUX D'ESPRITS.

1710. WANTING A WIDE MOUTH.

Vocalists, nowadays, are obliged to stretch their jaws almost to dislocation, and they roar you like lions. To see them sing, you would think they were of that class mentioned in sacred writ, who "open their mouths wide for the latter rain." They seem to delight in gutturals and grimace, flourishes and falsettos. One of these men, whose vocal orifice extended horizontally almost across his face, applied not long ago to a waggish physician in Philadelphia, to ask his advice as touching the probable success of an operation to which he desired to submit himself.

"I have sung for several years in public," said the minstrel, "and I find that the changes of fashion require louder tones than I am able to utter, while my mouth retains its present dimensions. I am obliged to whistle out many of my long and large notes as a grimalkin cries in a quinsy, cracked and broken. I want volume, and I have called to know whether you can aid me in effecting an alteration which will give my lips a fuller and freer play, and my voice more freedom."

"Perhaps so," responded the physician; "but what do you require? What do you propose?"

"I wish, I say," returned the singer, — who, let it be remembered, had an enormous bouche of his own, — "that my mouth should be enlarged. It is too limited for my purpose."

"O, ho!" said the doctor, "I understand you. We'll see what can be done."

He arose, and placing his hand on the head of the patient, turned it to and fro like a barber's garçon, while an expression of solemn drollery struggled in his features.

"I can do so, sir," he continued, after a short pause, "and easily; but there is a preliminary operation, which may distress and perhaps disfigure you. It is a long job, and you may not consent to it."

"To any thing, my dear doctor, that will effect my object. Pray tell me what is requisite to be done."

"Why, my friend, you wish your mouth widened; it is now uncommonly expansive; and, in order to extend its limits any farther, it will first be necessary to remove your ears, they being obstacles at each corner!"

It may be conjectured that the operation was declined, and that the vocalist quitted his adviser in the sulks. Such was the fact.

1711. THE WAY HANDEL ORDERED DINNER WHEN HE DINED ALONE.

Some folks eat two or three times as much as others; for instance, the incomparable and inspired composer Handel required uncommonly large and frequent supplies of food. Among other stories told of this great musician, it is said that whenever he dined alone at a tavern, he always ordered "dinner for three;" and on receiving an answer to his question, "Is de tinner retty?" "As soon as the company come," he said, con trepito, "Den pring up te tinner, prestissimo. I am de gombaiy."

1712. THE DEVIL OR JOHN BULL.

Dr. John Bull was the first Gresham professor of music, and organist and composer to Queen Elizabeth. John, like a true Englishman, travelled for improvement, and, having heard of a famous musician at St. Omer's, he placed himself under him as a novice; but a circumstance very soon convinced the master that he was inferior to the scholar. The musician showed John a song which he had composed in forty parts! — telling him, at the same time, that he defied all the world to produce a person capable of adding another part to his composition. Bull desired to be left alone, and to be indulged for a short time with pen and ink. In less than three hours, he added forty parts more to the song; upon which the Frenchman was so surprised, that he swore, in great ecstasy, he must be either the Devil or John Bull; which has ever since been proverbial in England.

1713. BILLINGS AND THE WAG'S QUERY.

Billings, the celebrated composer of music, boasted that there was no point in the science that he did not fully understand. A Boston wag, knowing his unbounded vanity, addressed a note to him, requesting an interview with him at the Lamb Tavern on a particular day, stating that he had a question in music to propose to him, which no other man in Boston could answer.

Billings met the gentleman promptly, and with much self-complacency remarked, that he had devoted his life to music, and believed that there was no question on the science which he could not at once answer, and asked what the difficulty was. "The question," said the inquirer, "is one which affects the whole world, and has never been settled." "Let me hear it," exclaimed Billings. "Well, it is this: when a man snores in his sleep, through at least two octaves, and so loud as to be heard throughout the whole house, do you consider these sounds vocal or instrumental music?"

1714. A GENTLE HINT.

If Weber had continued to compose for our theatres, he would probably have succeeded in chastening and improving the style of our singers. On one occasion, at a rehearsal, he said, "I am very sorry you take so much trouble." "O, not at all," was the reply. "Yes," he added, "but I say yes—dat is, for why you take de trouble to sing so many notes dat are not in de book."

1715. TRIBUTE TO MENDELSSOHN

An intelligent American traveller gives the following graphic account of this celebrated musical genius:—

"I have rarely seen a man whose countenance bears so plainly the stamp of genius. He has a glorious dark eye, and Byron's expression of a dome of thought could never be more appropriately applied than to his lofty and intellectual forehead, the marble whiteness and polish of which are heightened by the raven hue of his hair. He is (in 1844) about forty years of age, in the noon of his fame, and the full maturity of his genius. He is now the first living composer of Germany. Moses Mendelssohn, the celebrated Jewish philosopher, was his grandfather: and his father, now living, is accustomed to say, that in his youth he was spoken of as the son of the great Mendelssohn: now he is known as the father of the great Mendelssohn!"

1716. TRANSGRESSION AND SIN.

Handel, having occasion to bring out one of his oratorios in a provincial town of England, began to look about for such material to complete his orchestra and chorus as the place might afford. One and another was recommended, as usual, as being a splendid singer, a great player, &c.

After a while, such as were collectable were gathered together in a room, and, after preliminaries, Handel himself made his appearance, puffing under both arms full of manuscript. "Gentlemen," said he, "you all read music?" "Yes, yes," responded from all parts of the room. "We play in the church," added one old gentleman behind a violoncello. "Very well; play dis," said Handel, distributing the parts. This done, and a few explanations delivered, Handel retired to a distant part of the room to enjoy the effect.

The stumbling, fumbling, and blundering that ensued is said to be indescribable. Handel's sensitive ear and impetuous spirit could not long brook the insult, and clapping his hands to his ears, he ran to the old gentleman of the violoncello, and shaking his fist furiously at those two terrified individuals, said, "You play in de church!—very well; you may play in de church—for we read, 'De Lord is long suffering, of great kindness, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin;' you sal play in de church —but you sal not play for me!" And snatching together his manuscripts, he rushed out of the room, leaving the astonished performers to draw their own conclusions.

1717. BON-MOT OF LORD CHESTERFIELD.

The great Handel, whose admirable music has lately brought such considerable sums, was, several years ago, so much neglected, that his oratorios were frequently performed to empty benches. King George II., however, constantly attended Handel's pieces, though they were abandoned by the rest of the court. This attachment gave occasion to the following bon-mot of Lord Chesterfield, who coming out of the oratorio one night, was met by Lord Delaware. "What," said the latter, "have they dismissed? Is there no oratorio to-night?" "O, yes," replied Lord Chesterfield, "they are now performing," but I thought it best to retire, lest I should disturb the king in his privacies."

1718. SETTING A TUNE TO POLITICS.

Dr. Wise, the musician, being requested to subscribe his name to a petition against an expected prorogation of Parliament in the reign of Charles II., wittily answered, "No, gentlemen, it is not my business to meddle with state affairs; but I'll set a tune to it, if you please."

1719. MOZART PERFORMING WITH HIS NOSE.

A good story is told of Mozart, the great composer, at the time he was a pupil with Haydn. It shows that a long nose is sometimes useful.

Haydn one day challenged his pupil to compose a piece of music which he could not play at sight. Mozart accepted the banter, and a supper and Champagne were to be the forfeit. Every thing being arranged between the two composers, Mozart took his pen, and in five minutes dashed off a piece of music, and, much to the surprise of Haydn, handed it to him, saying,—

"There is a piece of music which you cannot play, and I can. You are to give it the first trial."

Haydn smiled contemptuously at the visionary presumption of his pupil, and placing the notes before him, struck the keys of the instrument. Surprised at its simplicity, he dashed away until he reached the middle of the piece, when, stopping all at once, he exclaimed,—

"How is this, Mozart? How is this? Here my hands are stretched to both ends of the piano, and yet there's a middle key to be touched. Nobody can play such music—not even the composer himself."

Mozart smiled at the half-excited indignation of the great master, and taking the seat he had quitted, struck the instrument with such an air of self-assurance that Haydn began to think himself duped. Running along through the simple passages, he came to that part which his teacher had pronounced impossible to be played. Mozart, as many are aware, was endowed with an extremely long nose—a prodigious nose, which, in modern dialect, "stuck out about a foot." Reaching the difficult passage, he stretched both hands to the extreme end of the piano, and leaning forward, bobbed his nose against the middle key which "nobody could play!" Haydn burst into an immoderate fit of laughter; and, after acknowledging the "corn," declared that nature had endowed Mozart with a capacity for music which he had never before discovered.

1720. SINGING AT SIGHT.

In 1741, Handel, proceeding to Ireland, was detained for some days at Chester, in consequence of the weather. During this time, he applied to Mr. Baker, the organist, to know whether there were any choir men in the cathedral who could sing at sight, as he wished to prove some books, that had been hastily transcribed, by trying the choruses. Mr. Baker mentioned some of the best singers in Chester, and, among the rest, a printer of the name of Janson, who had a good bass voice, and was one of the best musicians in the choir. A time was fixed for this private rehearsal at the Golden Falcon, where Handel had taken up his residence; when, on trial of the chorus in the Messiah,—

"And with his stripes we were healed,"—

—poor Janson, after repeated attempts, failed completely. Handel got enraged, and after abusing him in five or six different languages, exclaimed in broken English, "You schauantrel, tit not you dell me dat you could sing at soite?" "Yes, sir," said the printer; "and so I can, but not at first sight."

1721. HANDEL AND THE DISAPPOINTED CANON.

"During the latter part of Handel's life," says Dr. Miller, "when a boy, I used to perform on a German flute, in London, at his oratorios. About the year 1753, in the Lent season, a minor canon, from the cathedral of Gloucester, offered his service to Mr. Handel to sing. His offer was accepted, and he was employed in the choruses. Not satisfied with this department, he requested leave to sing a solo air, that his voice might appear to more advantage. This request also was granted; but he executed his solo so little to the satisfaction of the audience, that he was, to his great mortification, violently hissed. When the performance was over, by way of consolation, Handel made him the following speech: 'I am sorry, very sorry, for you, indeed, my dear sir; but go back to your church in de country; God will forgive you for your bad singing; dese wicked people in London, dey will not forgive you.'"

1722. WEBER'S COMPARISON.

Weber was invited to dine with Mr. L., the music seller, whose residence and establishment are of a very handsome description. On entering the noble drawing-room, the quiet German opened his eyes, and looking round, said softly, as if to himself, "I see it is better to sell music than to write it."

1723. THE PARSON'S REPLY TO HANDEL.

While Marylebone Gardens were flourishing, about the year 1738, the enchanting music of Handel, and probably of Arne, was often heard there. One evening Handel was walking with a gentleman when a new piece was struck up by the band. "Gomm, Mr. Vontaine!" said Handel, "let us zit down and listen to this piece; I want to know your opinion of it." Down they sat, and after some time the old parson, turning to his companion, said, "It is not worth listening to; it's very poor stuff." "You are right, Mr. Vontaine, it is poor stuff; I thought so when I finished it." The old gentleman, being taken by surprise, was beginning to apologize; but Handel assured him there was no necessity; that the music was really bad, having been composed hastily, and his time for its production limited, and that the opinion was as correct as it was honest.

1724. HAYDN AND THE MUSIC SELLER.

Haydn used to relate, with much pleasure, a dispute which he had with a music seller in London. Amusing himself one morning, after the English fashion, in shopping, he inquired of a music seller if he had any select and beautiful music. "Certainly," replied the shopman; "I have just printed some sublime music of Haydn's." "O," returned Haydn, "I'll have nothing to do with that." "How, sir; you will have nothing to do with Haydn's music! and pray what fault have you to find with it?" "O, plenty; but it is useless talking about it, since it does not suit me; show me some other." The music seller, who was a warm Haydnist, replied, "No, sir; I have music, it is true, but not for such as you;" and turned his back upon him. As Haydn was going away, smiling, a gentleman of his acquaintance entered, and accosted him by name. The music seller, still out of humor, turned round at the name, and said to the person who had just entered the shop, "Haydn! ay, here's a fellow who says he does not like that great man's music." The Englishman laughed; an explanation took place; and the music seller was made acquainted with the man who found fault with Haydn's music.

1725. HANDEL, QUIN, AND MRS. CIBBER.

Dr. Burney informs us that Handel was very fond of Mrs. Cibber, whose voice and manners had softened his severity, and atoned for her want of musical knowledge. At her house on Sunday evenings he used to meet Quin, who, like Handel, in spite of native roughness, was almost as fond of music as of good cheer. Mrs. Cibber, the first time these giants met, prevailed on Handel to sit down to the harpsichord, when he played the overture of Siroe, and particularly delighted the company by the wonderful neatness with which he played the jig at the end of it.

Quin, after Handel was gone, being asked by Mrs. Cibber whether he did not think Mr. Handel had a charming hand, replied, "A hand, madam! you mistake; it is a foot." "Poh! poh!" said she; "has he not a fine finger?" "Toes, madam." In fact his hand was so fat, that the knuckles, which usually appear convex, were like those of a child, dented, or dimpled in, so as to be rendered concave; however, his touch was so smooth, that his fingers seemed to grow to the keys. They were so curved and compact that when he played, no motion, and scarcely the fingers themselves, could be discovered.

"I remember," says Dr. Burney, "at Frasi's, in the year 1748, he brought in his pocket the duet from Judas Maccabæus, 'From these dread scenes,' in which she had not sung, when the oratorio was first performed, in 1746. When he sat down to the harpsichord, to give her and me the time of it, while he sung her part, I hummed, at sight, the second, over.

his shoulder, in which he encouraged me, by desiring that I would sing out; but, unfortunately, something went wrong, and Handel, with his usual impetuosity, grew violent—a circumstance very terrific to a young musician. At length, recovering from my fright, I ventured to say that I fancied there was a mistake in the writing; which, upon examination, Handel discovered to be the case; and then instantly, with the greatest good humor and humility, said, 'I pec your barton; I am a very odd tog: Maishter Schmitt is to plame.' When Frasi told him that she should study hard, and was going to learn thorough-bass, in order to accompany herself, Handel, who well knew how little this pleasing singer was addicted to application and diligence, said, 'O, vaat may we not expect!'"

1726. THE DEVIL AND HIS IMPS.

At one of the rehearsals of Otho, Cuzzoni, the famous singer, insolently refused to sing the beautiful air, Falsa Imagine. Handel, who was presiding at the performance, instantly became enraged.

"Vat!" said he, "you vill not sing my mooshic? I vill throw you out te window, if you vill not sing te mooshic!"

"You sal not vex me, Mr. Handel; I vill raise de dev-vel, when I sal be vex," returned Cuzzoni.

"You are te tevil," said Handel; "but, madame, I am Beelzebub, te brince of tevils, and [seizing her by the waist] I will throw you out te window, if you vill not sing te mooshic!"

"Mr. Kelly," says Leigh Hunt, "was a delicate composer, as the music in Blue Beard evinces; and he selected so happily from other composers, as to give rise to his friend Sheridan's banter, that he was an 'importer of music and composer of wines;' for he once took to being a wine merchant. While in Ireland, during the early part of his career, he adapted a charming air of Martin's to English words, which, under the title of 'O, thou wert born to please me,' he sang with Mrs. Crouch to so much effect, that not only was it always called for three times, but no play was suffered to be performed without it. It should be added that Mrs. Crouch was a lovely woman, as well as a beautiful singer, and that the two performers were in love. I have heard them sing it myself, and do not wonder at the impression it made on the susceptible hearts of the Irish.

"Twenty years afterwards, when Mrs. Crouch was no more, and while Kelly was singing a duet in the same country with Madame Catalani, a man in the gallery cried out, 'Mr. Kelly, will you be good enough to favor us with, 'O, thou wert born to please me?'" The audience laughed; but the call went to the heart of the singer, and probably came from the heart of the honest fellow who made it. The man may have gone to the play in his youth, with somebody he loved by his side, and heard two lovers, as happy as himself, sing what he now wished to hear again."

1728. BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL.

The grand festival in honor of this celebrated composer, and inauguration of the statue erected to his memory, took place at Bonn, in Germany, on the 10th, 11th, and 12th of August. The place was crowded with visitors and professional attendants upon the festival, the anticipated presence of royalty having added to the attractions of the occasion. Her majesty Queen Victoria, the King and Queen of Prussia, and Prince Albert were present.

The most celebrated musical characters of Europe were among the guests and participants of the ceremonies; among them Spohr, Listz, Fetis, Berlois, Fischhoff, Rellstab, the distinguished musical critic from Berlin, Schindler, the author of the Life of Beethoven, &c.

Grand concerts were given on the evenings of the first two days of the festival, led by Spohr and Listz. The orchestra was imposing, the performers being five hundred in number, three hundred in the chorus and two hundred in the instrumental band. The audience was immense. The last was the great day of the festival.

On that day the concert denominated the Kunstler, or artists' concert, attracted an assemblage of three thousand persons in the music hall. The concert was conducted by Dr. Listz, and consisted, in part, of his compositions. His cantata having been performed before the entrance of the royal guests, Queen Victoria sent for the composer, and "graciously expressed a wish" that it should be repeated, which was accordingly complied with without delay. The great feature of the concert was the Concert Stuck, of Weber, interpreted by the celebrated pianist, Madame Pleyell.

The correspondent of the London Times remarks, that, "This lady, who ranks among the foremost artists of the day, is as much remarkable for the brilliancy, certainty, and neatness of her mechanism, as for the roundness of tone, the delicacy of touch, and the poetical beauty of style, which have won for her on the continent the name of la reine du piano." The festivities were concluded by a public dinner, of which hundreds partook, among whom were a host of artists and distinguished personages from almost every part of Europe.

1729. TESTING THE MUSICAL POWERS OF CAROLAN.

The Irish Orpheus, Carolan, seems, from the description we have of him, to have been a genuine representative of the ancient bards. Though blind and untaught, yet his attainments in music were of the highest order. At what period of his life Carolan commenced an itinerant musician is not known; nor is it ascertained whether, like many others, he n'eût abord d'autre Apollon que le besoin, or whether his fondness for music induced him to betake himself to that profession. Dr. Campbell, indeed, seems to attribute his choice of it to an early disappointment in love. But wherever he went, the gates of the nobility and gentry were thrown open to him, and a distinguished place was assigned him at table. Carolan thought the tribute of a song due to every house where he was entertained, and he seldom failed to pay it, choosing for his subject either the head of the family, or the loveliest of its branches. Indeed, on every occasion, the emotions of his heart, whether of joy or grief, were expressed in his harp. Many a favorite fair has been the theme of a beautiful planxty; and as soon as the first excess of grief for the loss of his wife had subsided, he composed a monody on her death, teeming with harmony and poetic beauties.

The fame of Carolan soon extended over Ireland, and, amongst others, reached the ears of an eminent Italian music master in Dublin, who, putting his abilities to a severe test, became convinced how well his reputation was merited. The Italian singled out an excellent piece of music, but in several places either altered or mutilated the piece, although in such a manner as that no one but a real judge could make the discovery. It was then played to Carolan, who bestowed the deepest attention on the performance, although he was not aware of its being intended as a trial of his skill, or that the critical moment was then at hand which was to determine his reputation.

When it was finished, and Carolan was asked his opinion, he declared that it was an admirable piece of music; but, said he, very humorously, in his own language, ta se air chois air bacadhaigh; that is, here and there it limps and stumbles. He was then requested to rectify the errors; and this he did immediately. to the astonishment of the Italian, who pronounced Carolan to be a true musical genius.

The admirers of the celebrated composer Haydn, who were exceedingly numerous, were very desirous of publicly testifying their regard for him in his old age, by performing the Creation, one of Haydn's chief works.

The room contained about one thousand five hundred persons, and was full two hours before he arrived. As soon as it was known that he was coming, the eagerness of the audience could scarcely be restrained. Some of the first rank waited to receive him. The illustrious old man was borne on a chair to the place reserved for him, amidst the acclamations of an enthusiastic audience. Such was the effect of the scene, that, oppressed at once with joy and infirmity, with a faltering voice he exclaimed, "This is more than I have ever felt;

let me die now, and be received among the blessed in another world."

When the performance was ended, he was taken out with the same triumph as he entered. He raised his arms, as it were, to leave a blessing on the assembly, and just two months and a half afterwards he expired, in his seventy-sixth year.

1731. MUTUAL RESPECT OF HAYDN AND MOZART.

Haydn and Mozart, two of the greatest composers of ancient or modern times, had the highest respect for each other. "Mozart," said Haydn, when asked his opinion of Don Juan, "is the greatest composer now existing." And Mozart, hearing a German composer find fault with Haydn, said, "If you and I were both melted down together, we should not furnish materials for one Haydn."

At a concert, where a new piece, composed by Haydn, was performed, a musician present, who never discovered any thing worthy of praise, except in his own productions, criticizing the music, said to Mozart, "There now, why, that is not what I should have done." "No," replied Mozart, "nor should I; but the reason is, that neither you nor I should have been able to conceive it."

After Mozart's death, Haydn was asked by Broderip, in his music shop, whether he had left any manuscript compositions behind him that were worth purchasing, as his widow had offered his inedited papers, at a high price, to the principal publishers of music throughout Europe. Haydn eagerly said, "Purchase them by all means. He was truly a great musician. I have been often flattered by my friends with having some genius, but he was much my superior."

Though this declaration had more of modesty than truth in it, yet, if the genius of Mozart, who died at the early age of thirty-six, had been granted as many years to expand as that of Haydn, the assertion might, perhaps, have been realized.

Mr. Thomas Atwood, who had the honor of being pupil to Mozart, as Mozart was to Haydn, declared, in a judicial proceeding respecting the Opera House, in which he was a witness, that he regarded "Mozart's music as the best in the world, and Don Giovanni as the finest of his compositions."

§ 181. INFLUENCE ON MIND AND BODY.

1732. BONAPARTE AND HIS SOLDIERS.

Napoleon, confessedly the most consummate commander that ever lifted the sword, who by his tactics outgeneralled all Europe, had a strict regard to the pieces of music which were played by the soldiery on particular occasions. Certain tunes were at times prohibited; others used only under peculiar circumstances; and others served for the final charge, retained, perhaps, only to be let loose with the reserve corps; and it is stated that in making the famous passage of the Alps, under circumstances the most appalling and dreadful, if the soldiers at any time hesitated in their march, he ordered the bugles to sound their liveliest notes, and if the obstacle was so great as to bring them to a dead halt, the whole band were ordered to peal forth the charge to battle, which never failed to bear them over the most formidable difficulties. Every individual has doubtless heard of the influence of "home music" on the Swiss soldiers, so touchingly alluded to by the poet.

1733. BOURDELLOT PREPARING FOR GOOD FRIDAY.

When the celebrated Father Bourdelot, who has sometimes been called the French Tillotson, was to preach once on a Good Friday, and the proper officer came to attend him to church, his servants said that he was in his study, and that if he pleased he might go up to him. In going up stairs he heard the sound of a violin; and as the door stood a little ajar, he saw Bourdelot stripped into his cassock, playing a good brisk tune, and dancing to it about his study. He was extremely concerned, for he esteemed that great man highly, and thought he must be run distracted. However, at last he ventured to rap gently at the door.

The father immediately laid down his violin, hurried on his gown, came to him, and, with his usual composed and pleasing look, said, "O sir, is it you? I hope I have not made you stay. I am quite ready to attend you."

The poor man, as they were going down, could not help mentioning his surprise at what he had seen and heard. Bourdelot smiled, and said, "Indeed, you might well be surprised if you don't know any thing of my way on these occasions; but the whole of the matter was this: in thinking over the subject of the day, I found my spirits too much depressed to speak as I ought to do; so I had recourse to my usual method, of music and a little motion. It has had its effect; I am quite in a proper temper, and go now with pleasure to what I should else have gone to in pain."

1734. ALEXANDER AND ANTEGENIDES.

Plato says the music of Olympus was, in a particular manner, adapted to affect and animate the hearers; Aristotle, that it swelled the soul with enthusiasm; and Plutarch, that it surpassed in simplicity and effect all other music then known. According to this biographer, he was author of the Curule song, which caused Alexander to seize his arms when it was performed to him by Antegenides.

1735. A TOBACCO FACTORY AT RICHMOND.

"I went afterwards," says Bryant, in his Letters of a Traveller, "to a tobacco factory, the sight of which amused me, though the narcotic fumes made me cough. In one room a black man was taking apart the small bundles of leaves of which a hoghead of tobacco is composed, and carefully separating leaf from leaf; others were assorting the leaves according to the quality; and others again were arranging the leaves in layers and sprinkling each layer with the extract of liquorice. In another room were about eighty negroes,—boys they are called,—from the age of twelve years up to manhood, who received the leaves thus prepared, rolled them into long, even rolls, and then cut them into plugs of about four inches in length, which were afterwards passed through a press, and thus became ready for market. As we entered the room, we heard a murmur of psalmody running through the sable assembly, which now and then swelled into a strain of very tolerable music.

'Verse sweetens toil,' says the stanza which Dr. Johnson was so fond of quoting; and really it is so good that I will transcribe the whole of it.

'Verse sweetens toil, however rude the sound:
All at her work the village maiden sings,
Nor, while she turns the giddy wheel around,
Revolves the sad vicissitudes of things.'

"Verse, it seems, can sweeten the toil of slaves in a tobacco factory.

"We encourage their singing as much as we can," said the brother of the proprietor, himself a diligent masticator of the weed, who attended us, and politely explained to us the process of making plug tobacco,—'we encourage it as much as we can, for the boys work better while singing. Sometimes they will sing all day long with great spirit; at other times you will not hear a single note. They must sing wholly of their own accord; it is of no use to bid them do it.

"What is remarkable," he continued, 'their tunes are all psalm tunes, and the words are from hymn books; their taste is exclusively for sacred music; they will sing nothing else. Almost all these persons are church members; we have not a dozen about the factory who are not so.'

1736. SENESINO AND FARINELLI.

Senesino and Farinelli, when in England together, being engaged at different theatres on the same night, had not an opportunity of hearing each other, till, by one of those sudden stage revolutions which frequently happen, yet are always unexpected, they were both employed to sing on the same stage. Senesino had the part of a furious tyrant to represent, and Farinelli that of an unfortunate hero in chains; but in the course of the very first song, the latter so softened the heart of the enraged tyrant, that Senesino, forgetting his assumed character, ran to Farinelli and embraced him.

1737. LUTHER RESTORED TO CONSCIOUSNESS.

D'Aubigne, in his History of the Reformation, gives the following narration concerning the effects of music upon Luther. The incident took place while he was in a convent. He was himself a good musician, and exceedingly fond of the art.

"One day, overcome with sadness, he shut himself in his cell, and for several days and nights suffered no one to approach him. One of his friends, Lucas Edemberger, uneasy about him, took with him some young boys, choral singers, and went and knocked at the door of his cell. No one opened or answered. Edemberger broke open the door, and found Luther stretched on the floor, without any sign of life. His friend tried in vain to recall his senses. Then the young choristers began to sing a sweet hymn. Their clear voices acted like a charm on the poor monk, to whom music had always been a source of delight, and by degrees his consciousness returned."

1738. PALMA AND HIS CREDITOR.

It is related that Filippo Palma, the celebrated singer, having been arrested by one of his largest and most enraged creditors, from whom he had been long skulking, made no other reply to his abuse and threats than by sitting down to the harpsichord and singing two or three of his most pleasing and touching airs to his own accompaniments; by which the fury of his creditor was gradually so perfectly subdued, that he not only forgave his debtor, but lent him ten guineas to appease the clamor of other creditors who threatened him with a jail.

1739. UKRAINIAN SINGERS.

The genius for music in the Ukraine is so general, that frequently a woman, while at her work, will modulate her voice, so as to affect the hearer to tears. "Whenever," says a modern traveller, "I saw a group of women sitting at the threshold of a door, or a merry throng of village maidens sporting on the banks of a river, as is the custom, I was certain of hearing those pathetic sounds which never fail to awaken the exquisite pleasure of sensibility."

1740. CURING DISEASES BY MUSIC.

Dr. Rush speaks of an ingenious writer on disease who laid down the broad principle that all the ailments to which mankind were subject could be removed by music.

1741. THE WOUNDED SOLDIER.

A venerable American judge relates the following anecdote: "The morning following the battle of Yorktown, I had the curiosity to attend the dressing of the wounded. Among others whose limbs were so much injured as to require amputation was a musician, who had received a musket ball in the knee. As was usual in such cases, preparations were making to lash him down to the table, to prevent the possibility of his moving. Says the sufferer,—

"Now, doctor, what would you be at?"

"My lad, I am going to take off your leg, and it is necessary you should be lashed down."

"I'll consent to no such thing. You may pluck the heart from my bosom, but you'll not confine me. Is there a fiddle in the camp? If so, bring it to me."

"A violin was furnished, and after tuning it, he said,—

"Now, doctor, begin." And he continued to play until the operation, which took about forty minutes, was completed, without missing a note or moving a muscle."

1742. DEATH FROM THE EFFECTS OF MUSIC.

A Paris paper contains the following extraordinary story:—

A woman twenty-eight years of age, residing at a village in Piedmont, where she was born, had never heard any music until a short time since, when she was taken to a ball, at which there was a very excellent orchestra. During the whole of the performance she remained in a sort of stupor, and when the concert was over, she appeared to be suffering under great emotion. From that time, waking or sleeping, the melodious sounds were continually heard by her, and eventually she could not sleep at all. A state of apathy ensued, which led to a total derangement of the vital functions. Several physicians were called in, who prescribed all sorts of remedies, but without success. Weakness and consumption ensued. The pulse became irregular, and the general effect was the same as that caused by sudden fright. She became, at length, extremely nervous and weak, and died in about a month from the time when she first heard the music. She never ceased, however, to hear the airs, and they seemingly became louder and more powerful as she gradually declined. On one occasion during her illness, a violin was purposely played to her out of tune, and she discovered the circumstance immediately, and putting her head between her hands, asked what unmusical sound it was.

1743. THE HIGHLANDERS AT QUEBEC.

At the battle of Quebec, in 1760, while the British troops were retreating in great disorder, the general complained to a field officer in Fraser's regiment of the bad behavior of his corps. "Sir," said he, with some warmth, "you did very wrong in forbidding the pipers to play this morning; nothing encourages the Highlanders so much in the day of action. Nay, even now they would be of use." "Let them blow then," replied the general, "if it will bring back the men."

The pipers were then ordered to play a favorite martial air; and the Highlanders, the moment they heard the music, returned and formed with alacrity in the van.

1744. A MUSICAL IDIOT.

There is at present in the Salpêtrière (hospital at Paris) a girl idiotic to an extreme degree, who does not speak, and cannot even dress herself. However, her keeper has recently discovered in her a decided taste for music. She often can repeat faithfully a whole passage of music played or sung to her only once; even if the passage is left incomplete, in repeating it she will terminate it in the right key and tone. A first-rate performer on the piano was brought to play to her, and her transports amounted almost to frenzy. At certain passages of rapid transition from flats to sharps, she uttered cries of transport, and commenced eating her fingers to calm her emotions. She is an immense eater, and greedily snatches at fruit; but if at the moment she hears the instrument, she stops until the music has ceased. An able phrenologist has found the bump of music developed.

1745. CURE OF INSANITY BY MUSIC.

"Of the solace of music, nay, more, of its influence upon melancholy," says Sir Henry Hallford, "I need not look for evidence in the universal testimony of antiquity.

"I myself have witnessed its power to mitigate the sadness of seclusion, in a case where my loyalty as a good subject, and my best feelings as a man, were more than usually interested in the restoration of my patient; and I also remember its salutary effects in the case of a gentleman in Yorkshire, who was first stupefied, and afterwards became insane, upon the sudden loss of all his property. This gentleman could hardly be said to live; he merely vegetated; for he was motionless until pushed, and did not speak to nor notice any body in the house for nearly four months. The first indication of a return of any sense appeared in his attention to music played in the street. This was observed, the second time he heard it, to have a more decided force in arousing him from his lethargy; and induced by this good omen, the sagacious humanity of his superintendent offered him a violin. He seized it eagerly, and amused himself with it constantly. After six weeks' hearing the rest of the patients of the house pass by his door to their common room, he accosted them—"Good morning to you all, gentlemen. I am quite well, and desire I may accompany you." In two months more he was dismissed cured.

1746. LEVERBRIDGE AND HIS ACCUSERS.

The Society for the Reformation of Manners was set up in the latter end of King William's reign, and though instituted upon good principles, yet, in many instances, it acted upon refinements as unserviceable to the cause of real morality as to that of common sense. This was exemplified in the case of Leverbridge, the well-known popular vocal performer of that time, whom they prosecuted merely for singing an ode of Dryden's, the subject of which was the praise of love and wine. It would seem that the fanatical spirit of the society infected the public, for the grand jury found a bill against poor Leverbridge.

When the trial came on before Sir John Holt, he at once perceived the narrow spirit of the prosecution; and finding the fact of the singing so fully proved, he thought of the following stratagem to get Leverbridge out of the scrape. He called for the printed song, and, after reading it over very attentively, observed, that as he saw nothing in the words very culpable, he imagined the offence must lie in the manner of singing it; he therefore desired Leverbridge might sing it before the court: the performer readily took the hint, and sung it with so much power of voice and taste, that the jury, without going out of the box, acquitted him, and he was carried home on the shoulders of the mob in triumph.

1747. NOLREGA AND THE BRAZILIAN CHILDREN.

Nolrega (a Jesuit) had a school, where he instructed the native children, the orphans from Portugal, and the mestizoes, or mixed breed. Reading, writing, and arithmetic were taught them; they were trained to assist at mass, and to sing the church service, and frequently led in procession through the town. This had a great effect, for the natives were passionately fond of music; so passionately, that Nolrega began to hope the fable of Orpheus was a type of his mission, and that by songs he was to convert the pagans of Brazil. This Jesuit usually took with him four or five of these little choristers on his preaching expeditions: when they approached an inhabited place, one carried the crucifix before them, and they began singing the Litany. The savages, like snakes, were won by the voice of the charmer; they received him joyfully, and when he departed with the same ceremony, the children followed the music. He set the catechism, creed, and ordinary prayers to sol fa; and the pleasure of learning to sing was such a temptation, that the little Tupis sometimes ran away from their parents to put themselves under the care of the Jesuit.

1748. THE SCOT'S KEY TO THE HEART.

A Presbyterian minister, an American by birth, but of Scottish parentage, once happening to be in New Orleans, was asked to visit an old Scottish soldier who had wandered to this city, sickened, and was conveyed to the hospital.

On his entrance, and on announcing his errand, the Scotchman told him, in a surly tone, that he desired none of his visits—that he knew how to die without the aid of a priest. In vain he informed him that he was no priest, but a Presbyterian minister, come to read him a portion of the Word of God, and to speak to him of eternity. The Scotchman doggedly refused to hold any conversation with him, and he was obliged to take his leave.

Next day, however, he called again, thinking that the reflection of the man on his own rudeness would prepare the way for a better reception. But his tone and manner were equally rude and repulsive; and at length he turned himself in bed, with his face to the wall, as if determined to hear nothing and relent nothing.

The minister bethought himself, as a last resource, of the hymn well known in Scotland, the composition of David Dickerson, minister of Irvine, beginning, "O mother dear, Jerusalem, when shall I come to thee?" which his Scottish mother had taught him to sing to the tune of Dundee. He began to sing his mother's hymn.

The soldier listened for a few moments in silence, but gradually turning himself round, with a relaxed countenance, and the tear in his eye, inquired, "Wha taught you that?" "My mother," replied the minister. "And so did mine," rejoined the now softened soldier, whose heart was opened by the recollections of infancy and of country; and he now gave a willing ear to the man that had found the Scottish key to his heart.

1749. CONQUERED BY SONG.

It is well known what a great share Luther's powerful, soul-stirring hymns and chorals had in the success of the reformation; so much so, that the famous Cardinal Cajetan said, "By his songs he has conquered us." The native city of the writer, Lubeck, furnishes a striking example of it. In the time of the struggle between Popery and Protestantism, mass had been held on a Sunday in St. Mary's Cathedral, in that city, and the people were preparing to leave the church, when two boys began to sing one of Luther's chorals, which had then just become known all over the country:—

"Ach Gott von Himmel, sieh darein!"
("O God of Heaven, look to it!")

And immediately the whole congregation joined in the singing, as though the choral had been regularly given out from the pulpit. The next day the Catholic clergy had to leave the city, and Lubeck stood redeemed to Protestantism.

1750. THE ITALIAN'S WANT OF MAGNANIMITY.

An Italian gentleman at Paris, the firmest item in whose creed was, that none but Italians could possibly sing well, refused to admit that Sontag (whom he had never heard) could at all equal the singers of Italy. With great difficulty he was induced to hear her. After listening five minutes, he rose to depart. "Nay, but do stay," said his friend; "you will be convinced presently." "I know it," said the Italian, "and therefore I go."

1751. THE COSSACK'S INVITATION.

A curious story is told of the effect of sacred music upon a party of Cossacks, who entered a church at Dresden, attracted by the sound of the organ, and while it was playing continued silent and attentive; but no sooner did the music cease, and the clergyman commence his service, than they began to exhibit strong signs of impatience. At length, one of these rude soldiers, stealing softly up the steps of the pulpit, unobserved by the minister, startled him not a little by tapping him on the shoulder, in the midst of his harangue, and inviting him, as well as he could, by signs, accompanied with all sorts of grotesque gestures, to descend, and no longer interrupt the gratification which he and his comrades received from the organ.

1752. THE OLD OFFICER.

History tells us of an old officer, (under the great Duke of Marlborough,) who was naturally so timid as to show the utmost reluctance to an engagement, until he heard the drums and trumpets, when his spirits became raised to such a degree that he became the most ardent to be engaged with the enemy, and would then expose himself to the greatest dangers.

1753. DYING FOR MADMOISELLE GARCIA.

A Paris paper has this story: "Our readers doubtless remember the wonderful cure effected some time ago on the unfortunate Lord M., who had been mad ever since the death of Madame Malibran, by Mlle. Pauline Garcia, (now Madame Viardot,) who, by the power of her voice, restored the poor maniac to reason.

"We have now to relate the following mournful catastrophe: Lord M., on being taken by his talented medical attendant to see Otello, was so powerfully affected by hearing Pauline Garcia sing the 'Willow' scene, that he had a violent nervous attack, which terminated in the recovery of his intellect. He instantly besought Mlle. Garcia to complete the wonderful cure, and laid at her feet the homage of his heart, hand, and large fortune; but Mlle. Garcia gave the preference to M. Viardot, a literary gentleman, and ex-director of the Theatre Italien.

"On the day after the solemnization of her marriage, at the municipality of the third arrondissement, Lord M.'s valet, hearing the report of a pistol, hastened to his master's apartment, and found him suspended by a Cashmere scarf, and his head shattered by a couple of bullets. The tapestry and walls were covered with the brains of the deceased nobleman. It has been discovered that the pistol was wadded with the song of the 'Willow.' The scarf had been Madame Malibran's, and had been purchased from her femme de chambre at an exorbitant price by Lord M."

1754. JESUIT MISSIONARIES AND THE INDIANS.

At an early period in the history of America, it is related by one of the Jesuit missionaries, that once coming into the company of certain ignorant and fierce Indians, he met with a rude and menacing reception, which foreboded no very favorable termination. As it was not his design, however, to enter into any contention, if it could possibly be avoided, he immediately commenced playing on a stringed instrument. Their feelings were softened at once, and the evil spirit of jealousy and anger which they exhibited on his first approach to them fled from their minds.

1755. EFFECTS OF MUSIC ON CASPAR HAUSER.

Many of Caspar Hauser's senses appeared at first to be in a state of stupor, and only gradually to open to the perception of external objects. It was not before the lapse of several days that he began to notice the striking of the steeple clock and the ringing of the bells.

This threw him into the greatest astonishment, which was at first expressed only by his listening looks, and by certain spasmodic motions of his countenance; but it was soon succeeded by a stare of benumbed meditation.

Some weeks afterwards the nuptial procession of a peasant passed by the tower, with a band of music, close under his window. He suddenly stood listening, motionless as a statue; his countenance appeared to be transfigured, and his eyes, as it were, to radiate his ecstasy; his ears and eyes seemed continually to follow the movements of the sounds, as they receded more and more; and they had long ceased to be audible, while he still continued immovably fixed in a listening posture, as if unwilling to lose the least vibration of these, to him, celestial notes, or as if his soul had followed them, and left his body behind it in torpid insensibility.

1756. THE HIGHLAND BAGPIPER ENCOURAGING HIS COMRADES.

"In one of our battles in Calabria," says an English writer, "a bagpiper of the seventy-eighth Highland regiment, when the light infantry charged the French, posted himself on their right, and remained in his solitary situation during the whole of the battle, encouraging the men with a famous Highland charging tune; and actually upon the retreat and complete rout of the French, changed it to another, equally celebrated in Scotland, upon the retreat of, and victory over, an enemy. His next hand neighbor guarded him so well that he escaped unhurt. This was the spirit of the 'Last Minstrel,' who infused courage among his countrymen, by possessing it in so animated a degree, and in so venerable a character."

1757. CLAUDE DE JEUNE.

Claude de Jeune, when at the wedding of the Duc de Joyeuse, in 1581, caused a spirited air to be sung, which so animated a gentleman present, that he clapped his hand upon his sword, and said it was impossible for him to refrain from fighting the first person he met: upon this Le Jeune caused another air to be performed, of a more soothing kind, which soon restored him to his natural good humor.

1758. FARINELLI BEFORE THE MAD KING.

Farinelli, the famous singer, was sent for to Madrid to try the effect of his magical voice on the King of Spain. His majesty was buried in the profoundest melancholy; nothing could raise an emotion in him; he lived in a total oblivion of life; he sat in a darkened chamber, entirely given up to the most distressing kind of madness. The physicians ordered Farinelli at first to sing in an outer room; and for the first day or two this was done, without any effect on the royal patient. At length, it was observed, the king, awaking from his stupor, seemed to listen; on the next day tears were seen starting in his eyes; the day after he ordered the door of his chamber to be left open; and at length the perturbed spirit entirely left our modern Saul, and the medicinal voice of Farinelli effected what no other medicine could.

1759. REVERENCE OF THE "FATHERS" FOR SACRED MUSIC.

Hood, in his History of Music in New England, speaking of the early part of the eighteenth century, says, "Singing psalms at that day had not become an amusement among the people. It was used, as it ever ought to be, only as a devotional act. So great was the reverence in which their psalm tunes were held, that the people put off their hats, as they would in prayer, whenever they heard one sung, though not a word were uttered."

1760. ST. VITUS'S DANCE CURED.

A Goffstown (N. H.) correspondent of the Medical and Surgical Journal mentions an extraordinary instance of the effect of music on the nervous system. A lady in that town, forty-five years of age, has been afflicted with St. Vitus's dance ever since she was a young girl. By strict attention to diet, and avoiding causes of excitement, years have intervened between the occurrence of the paroxysms. Latterly, however, spasmodic contraction of the muscles to some extent may be observed after the patient has experienced either pleasant or painful emotions. One of the most interesting of the exciting causes in this case is music. Any rapid tune—a dancing tune, for instance—will throw the voluntary muscles into the most uncontrollable and disassociated action imaginable; but by changing the tune to "Home, Sweet Home," the spasmodic twitching of the muscles gradually subsides, until she becomes calm again.

1761. WRATH OF THEODOSIUS APPEASED.

The citizens of Antioch, irritated by some exactions which the Emperor Theodosius had imposed on them, broke out into open revolt, and, among other excesses, pulled down the statues of the emperor and empress, and dashed them to pieces.

Shortly after, when the heat of their fury was past, they began to repent their indiscretion, and to be filled with alarm for the danger into which they had brought themselves and their city. Flavianus, their bishop, took a journey to Constantinople, in order to appease Theodosius; but the emperor repelled indignantly all his supplications, and vowed that nothing but the most signal vengeance would satisfy him for the insult which they had put upon his crown and dignity.

The good bishop was in despair at the danger which seemed impending over his flock; but being a man of lively fancy, and learning that the emperor was in the habit, while feasting, of having a number of young boys sing to him, he conceived the idea of making yet another appeal, through the medium of music's mighty influence, to the sensibility of the emperor's heart. He prevailed with those who had the charge of the songsters to place them under his direction for a short time, during which he taught them to sing, in mournful strains, the woes of the Antiochians, the sorrow they felt for their transgressions, and their despair at having fallen under the displeasure of their prince.

A day was at length fixed, on which they were to try the effect of their lesson on the ear of the emperor. The attention of Theodosius was instantly arrested by the peculiar pathos of the strains addressed to him; he soon discerned the import of the supplication which they conveyed, yet continued to listen to them with undiminished fascination; and such at last was the effect they produced, that, watering the cup of wine which he held in his hand with his warm tears, he forgot all the displeasure he had conceived against the Antiochians, and called aloud, that "the city of Antioch was forgiven."

1762. MR. BUSHNELL'S SONG.

Mr. Bushnell, of Utica, having business in a neighboring town, was obliged in consequence to see the landlord of the village inn; so he stopped at his house. When he entered the bar-room, he saw about twenty men in it, most of whom were in a state of intoxication. After a while one of the company said something to Mr. Bushnell, who replied in a courteous manner, and spoke of the subject of temperance. The attention of the assembly was arrested, and the cause was denounced as the work of priests and politicians.

Mr. Bushnell, finding it impossible to stem the current of abuse by an appeal to their reason, proposed singing a temperance song, and accordingly commenced the "Stanch Teetotaller." On glancing around the room after he had concluded, he observed the tear trickling down the cheek of almost every man. The sentiment of the song, and the melodious, touching manner in which it was sung, had awakened their purest sensibilities; had carried their thoughts back to their families and firesides, surrounded as they once were with plenty, happiness, and affection; and then the contrast of a drunkard's home, its dark wretchedness and misery, were wisely presented to their minds, and those hardened men could not resist the appeal, but acknowledged its truth by tears.

Soon after, the landlord came in, and he was requested to repeat it for his special benefit. After Mr. Bushnell had concluded, he grasped him by the hand, and exclaimed, "I will never sell another glass of liquor as long as I live."

1763. THE POWER OF MUSIC.

Shakespeare says, music can

"—ravish savage ears,
And plant in tyrants mild humility."

The truth of this assertion is abundantly shown, both in ancient and modern history. Pythagoras instructed a woman, by the power of music, to arrest the fury of a young man who came to set her house on fire; and his disciple, Empedocles, used his lyre with such success as to prevent another person from murdering his father, when the sword was unsheathed for that purpose.

The fierceness of Achilles was allayed by playing on the harp, on which account Homer gives him nothing else out of the spoils of Actium.

With the same instrument Damon quieted wild and drunken youths; and Asclepiades, in a similar manner, brought back seditious multitudes to temper and reason.

Clinias, a man of virtuous manners, who had embraced the Pythagorean philosophy, used to take up his harp and play upon it directly on passion rising within his breast, that he might allay its ebullition. If asked at such moments why he played, he pleasantly replied that it was with a view to compose himself.

Mr. Roland, a missionary at Bethelsdorp, South Africa, more than twenty years ago, made the following statement concerning the effects of music on the minds and hearts of the children in an infant school under his care: "They go to school with joy, and at their own free will; even the youngest, forgetting the bosom of their mothers, cry to go and join their little companions. And in leaving the school, not contented with what they have done during their lessons, they cheer the village with their songs."

Gainesborough's love of music was constant; and he seemed to have been kept under a spell by all kinds of melodious sounds. Smith relates, in his Life of Nollekins, that he once found Colonel Hamilton playing so exquisitely to Gainesborough on the violin, that he exclaimed, "Go on, and I will give you the picture of the Boy at the Stile, which you have so often wished to purchase of me."

The colonel proceeded, and the painter stood in speechless admiration, with the tears of rapture on his cheek. Hamilton then called a coach, and carried away the picture. This gentleman was a first-rate violin player.

1765. CAT, DOG, HORSE, AND OTHER ANIMALS.

Marville has given us the following curious anecdote. He says, "Doubting the truth of those who say it is natural for us to love music, especially the sound of instruments, and that beasts themselves are touched with it, being one day in the country I inquired into the truth; and, while a man was playing on the trump marine, made my observations on a cat, a dog, a horse, an ass, a hind, cows, small birds, and a cock and hens, who were in a yard under a window on which I was leaning. I did not perceive that the cat was the least affected, and I even judged, by her air, that she would have given all the instruments in the world for a mouse, sleeping in the sun all the time; the horse stopped short, from time to time, before the window, raising his head up now and then, as he was feeding on the grass; the dog continued for above an hour seated on his hind legs, looking steadfastly at the player; the ass did not discover the least indication of his being touched, eating his thistles peaceably; the hind lifted up her large wide ears, and seemed very attentive; the cows slept a little, and after gazing, as though they had been acquainted with us, went forward; some little birds that were in an aviary, and others on the trees and bushes, almost tore their little throats with singing; but the cock, who minded only his hens, who were solely employed in scraping a neighboring dunghill, did not show in any manner that they took the least pleasure in hearing the trump marine."

1766. CATCHING LIZARDS AND CHARMING SERPENTS.

A modern traveller assures us, that he has repeatedly observed in the Island of Madeira, that the lizards are attracted by the notes of music, and that he has assembled a number of them by the powers of his instrument. He tells us, also, that when the negroes catch them, for food, they accompany the chase by whistling some tune, which has always the effect of drawing great numbers towards them. Stedman, in his Expedition to Surinam, describes certain Sibleys among the negroes, who, among several singular practices, can charm or conjure down from the tree certain serpents, who will wreathe about the arms, neck, and breast of the pretended sorceress, listening to her voice. The sacred writers speak of the charming of adders and serpents; and nothing, says he, is more notorious than that the Eastern Indians will rid the houses of the most venomous snakes, by charming them with the sound of a flute, which calls them out of their holes. These anecdotes, which may startle some, seem to be fully confirmed by Sir William Jones, in his curious dissertation on the musical modes of the Hindoos.

1767. EFFECTS OF MUSIC UPON TWO MICE.

"Music has charms to soothe the savage breast,
To soften rocks, or bend the knotted oak."

CONGREVE.

Dr. Archer, of Norfolk, in Virginia, says, "On a rainy evening in the winter of 1817, as I was alone in my chamber, I took up my flute and commenced playing. In a few minutes my attention was directed to a mouse that I saw creeping from a hole, and advancing to the chair in which I was sitting. I ceased playing, and it ran precipitately back to its hole. I began again shortly afterwards, and was much surprised to see it reappear and take its old position. The appearance of the little animal was truly delightful; it crouched itself on the floor, shut its eyes, and appeared in ecstasy. I ceased playing, and it instantly disappeared again."

"This experiment I repeated frequently with the same success, observing that it was always differently affected, as the music varied from the slow and plaintive to the brisk or lively. It finally went off, and all my art could not entice it to return."

A more remarkable instance of this fact appeared in the Philadelphia Medical and Physical Journal, in the year 1817. It was communicated by Dr. Cramer, of Jefferson county, who states that, "One evening in the month of December, as a few officers on board a British man-of-war, in the harbor of Plymouth, were seated round the fire, one of them began to play a plaintive air on the violin. He had scarcely performed ten minutes, when a mouse, apparently frantic, made its appearance in the centre of the floor."

"The strange gestures of the little animal strongly excited the attention of the officers, who with one consent resolved to suffer it to continue its singular actions unmolested. Its exertions now appeared to be greater every moment. It shook its head, leaped about the table, and exhibited signs of the most ecstatic delight. It was observed that in proportion to the gradation of the tones to the soft point, the feelings of the animal appeared to be increased, and vice versa.

"After performing actions which an animal so diminutive would at first seem incapable of, the little creature, to the astonishment of the delighted spectators, suddenly ceased to move, fell down, and expired without evincing any symptoms of pain."

Deacon Hunt, who was naturally a high-tempered man, used to beat his oxen over the head, as all his neighbors did. It was observed that when he became a Christian, his cattle were remarkably docile. A friend inquired into the secret. "Why," said the deacon, "formerly, when my oxen were a little contrary, I flew into a passion, and beat them unmercifully; this made the matter worse. Now, when they do not behave well, I go behind the load, sit down, and sing Old Hundred. I don't know how it is, but the psalm tune has a surprising effect upon my oxen."

1769. THE ABBE AND THE SPIDER.

The Abbé Olivet has described an amusement of Pelisson during his confinement in the Bastille, which consisted in feeding a spider, which he discovered forming its web in the corner of the small window. For some time he placed his flies at the edge, while his valet, who was with him, played on a bagpipe. Little by little the spider used itself to distinguish the sound of the instrument, and issued from its hole to run and catch its prey. Thus calling it always by the same sound, and placing the flies at a still greater distance, he succeeded, after several months, to drill the spider by regular exercise, so that it at length never failed appearing at the first sound to seize on the fly provided for it, even on the knees of the prisoner.

1770. THE COBRA DA CAPELLO.

The power of music upon certain serpents seems well established. An honorable and distinguished officer in the East India Company's service relates the following curious story:—

"A travelling fakir called one day at my house, with a beautiful large snake, in a basket, which he caused to rise up and dance, as well as keep excellent time to the tune of a pipe, on which he played. Having been greatly annoyed by numerous snakes about my farm-yard, who contrived to destroy my poultry, and even attacked the animals, one of my servants inquired of the man whether he could pipe these snakes out of their holes and catch them; to which he hastily replied in the affirmative, and, being led to place where a snake had recently been seen, began to play upon his pipe.

In a short time a snake came gliding towards him, and was instantly caught; he commenced again, and had not continued five minutes, when a huge cobra da capello, the most venomous kind of serpent, thrust his head from a hole in the room. The magician approached him fearlessly, and played with more spirit, until the snake was half out of his hole, and ready to dart at him. He then played with one hand only, and advanced the other under the reptile as it was raising itself up to spring; the snake then darted at him, when, dexterously seizing it by the tail, he held it firmly until my servant despatched it. In the space of an hour, he destroyed no less than five large snakes, close about the house."

1771. TAKING THE RATTLESNAKE.

Mr. Neale, a French gentleman, residing for some time in North Carolina, having made a collection of Rattlesnakes, and imagining it possible to render them tame, made various experiments for the purpose, and at length fully succeeded. His means to effect this purpose are no further known than that the operation is musical, and that soft and tender melodies will subdue their highest irritations. Mr. Neale exhibited his living curiosities at Richmond and other American cities. If the writer of this has not been grossly misinformed, the above snake-subduer at last lost his life in an inconsiderate attempt to show his unlimited power over the reptiles, one of which wounded him so severely as to cause his death in about two hours.

1772. THE OFFICER'S EXPERIMENT.

A French officer, during his confinement in the Bastille, used to amuse himself with playing on the lute. He had thus for a long time diverted his melancholy, when, playing one day, he observed, to his great astonishment, a number of mice issuing from their holes, and even spiders creeping forth. He repeated the experiment with the same effect several times, and even found some entertainment in observing the attentive audience which he could assemble whenever he pleased. We have no reason to suppose this officer an Orpheus; yet it is certain that his lute captivated animals which might be supposed insensible to "the concord of sweet sounds."

1773. ALMOST TOO LARGE.

In a curious manuscript work by William Den-nis, who wrote in the middle of the eighteenth century, the author says, "Of all beasts, there is no one that is not delighted with harmony except the ass. H. Stephens avows that he saw a lion in London leave his prey to hear music; and Mr. Playford informs us that as he once travelled in Hertfordshire, he met a herd of stags upon the road, following a bagpipe and violin; that while the music played they went forward, but when it ceased they stood still; and in this manner they were brought from Yorkshire to the park of Hampton Court." Who will venture, after this, to call the story of Orpheus a fable?

§ 183. MUSIC PERFORMERS. EARLY HISTORY.

1774. SCENE IN AN ATELIER.

We extract from a German paper the following:—

Some time ago, a man of martial appearance went every morning regularly to the atelier of the celebrated sculptor Pradier, took off his cravat, and then sat immovably upon a chair while the artist modelled his well-marked features. During his visits no one was admitted into the atelier. One day, however, Pradier heard the voice of a friend, whom he had not seen for some time, at the door; and, after obtaining the permission of his sitter, he introduced the celebrated pianist Zimmermann into the room. The latter did not know the sitter, spoke a few words with his friend, and then took a seat at the piano.

"My dear Zimmermann," said Pradier, continuing at his work, "in the next room you will find a young girl who sits for me occasionally, and who has a very beautiful voice. If you will let her sing something, it will entertain this gentleman while he poses."

Zimmermann fetched in the pretty girl, and, when she had sung a song, said delightedly,—

"You have an excellent voice and great talent; why do you not attend the Conservatoire?"

The girl answered, "It is my most ardent wish, but my parents are old and feeble. To support them I have to pose in the ateliers and sing in the cafés. If I were to gain admittance into the Conservatoire, my parents would starve."

"You may enter the Conservatoire," interrupted the deep bass voice of the man who was sitting to Pradier; "I will take charge of your parents."

The girl looked surprised and doubtingly at the speaker. Pradier smiled; and Zimmermann, who rejoiced in the girl's good fortune, was profuse in his thanks, and said,—

"May I ask with whom I have the honor of speaking?"

"With General Cavaignac," replied the sitter, laconically, without moving a feature.

1775. EARL OF MORNINGTON'S FIRST EFFORTS.

The late Earl of Mornington furnished a striking instance of an early disposition to music, as well as early attention to musical instruments.

His father played well, for a gentleman, on the violin, which always delighted the child whilst in the nurse's arms, and long before he could speak. Nor did this proceed merely from a love, common to other children, of a sprightly noise, as may appear by the following proof. Dubourg, who was, thirty-four years ago, a distinguished performer on that instrument, happened to be at the family seat; but the child would not permit him to take the violin from his father till his little hands were held. After having heard Dubourg, however, the case was altered, and there was then much more difficulty to persuade him to let Dubourg give the instrument back to his father. Nor would the infant ever afterwards permit the father to play whilst Dubourg was in the house.

At the same period he beat time to all measures of music, however difficult; nor was it possible to force him to do otherwise, the most rapid changes producing as rapid an alteration in the child's hands.

Though passionately fond of music, from indolence he never attempted to play on any instrument till he was nine years old. At that time an old portrait painter came to the family seat, who was a very indifferent performer on the violin, but persuaded the child, that if he tried to play on that instrument, he would soon be able to bear a part in a concert.

With this inducement, he soon learned the two old catches of "Christ Church bells," and "Sing one, two, three, come follow me;" after which, his father and the painter accompanying him with the two other parts, he experienced the pleasing effects of a harmony to which he himself contributed.

Soon after this he was able to play the second violin in Corelli's Sonatas, which gave him a steadiness in time that never deserted him. For the next musical stage he commenced composer, from emulation of the applause given to a country dance made by a neighboring clergyman. He accordingly set to work, and by playing the treble on the violin, whilst he sung a bass to it, he formed a minuet, the bass of which he wrote in the treble clef, and was very profuse of his fifths and octaves, being totally ignorant of the established rules of composition.

This minuet was followed by a duet for two French horns, whilst the piece concluded by an andante movement, thus consisting of three parts; all of which, being tacked together, he styled a serenata. At this time he had never heard any music but from his father, sisters, and the old painter.

He practised on the violin till he was fourteen, but had always a strong inclination to the harpsichord; from which his sister drove him continually, saying that he spoiled the instrument; notwithstanding which he sometimes stole intervals of practice.

About this time the old Lord Mornington declared his intention of having an organ for his chapel; telling his son that he should have been the organist had he been able to play on the instrument. On this the son undertook to be ready as soon as the organ could be finished; which being accomplished in less than a year and a half, he sat down at the maker's, and executed an extempore fugue, to the astonishment of the father, as well as others, who did not conceive that he could have executed a single bar of any tune.

It is well known that this instrument is more likely to form a composer than any other; and his lordship, in process of time, both read and studied music, whilst he at the same time committed his ideas to writing. As he had, however, never received the least instruction in this abstruse though pleasing science, he wished to consult both Rosengrave and Geminiani; who, on examining his compositions, said they could not be of the least service to him, as he had himself investigated all the established rules, with their proper exceptions.

Though simple melodies commonly please most in the earlier stage of life, he had always a strong predilection for church music and full harmony, as also for the minor third; in which, for that reason, he made his first composition.

In process of time his lordship was so distinguished for his musical abilities, that the University of Dublin conferred upon him the degree of doctor and professor of music.

1776. ONLY TRY.

The following has been translated from a French paper:—

"They used to say that every soldier carried in his cartridge box a marshal's baton. Might not one say, in these days, that every chorister carries in his windpipe a fortune? Here is one example at least.

About thirty years ago, in a little city of Italy, at Bergamo, by a singular contrast, the company at the Opera House was quite indifferent, while the choristers were excellent. It could scarcely have been otherwise, since the greater part of the choristers have since become distinguished composers. Donizetti, Cruvelli, Leodoro, Bianche, Mari, and Dolci commenced by singing in the choruses at Bergamo. There were, among others, at that epoch, a young man, very poor, very modest, and greatly beloved by his comrades. In Italy, the orchestra and the choristers are worse paid than in France, if possible. You enter a bootmaker's shop,—the master is the first violin. The apprentices relax themselves after a day's work by playing the clarionet, the hautboy, or the timbrels, in the evening at the theatre. One young man, in order to assist his old mother, united the functions of chorister to the more lucrative employment of journeyman tailor.

One day, when he had taken to Nozari's house a pair of pantaloons, that illustrious singer, after looking at him earnestly, said to him, very kindly,—

"It appears to me, my good fellow, that I have seen you somewhere."

"Quite likely, sir; you may have seen me at the theatre, where I take a part in the choruses."

"Have you a good voice?"

"Not remarkably, sir; I can, with great difficulty, reach sol."

"Let me see," said Nozari, going to the piano; "begin the gamut."

Our chorister obeyed; but when he reached sol he stopped short, out of breath.

"Sound la—come, try."

"Sir, I cannot."

"Sound la, you fool."

"La, la, la."

"Sound si."

"My dear sir, I cannot."

"Sound si, I tell you, or I'll —"

"Don't get angry, sir; I'll try — la, si, la, si, do."

"I told you so," said Nozari, with a voice of triumph; "and now, my good fellow, I will say only one word to you. If you will only study and practise, you will become the first tenor in Italy."

Nozari was right. The poor chorister, who, to gain his bread, had to mend breeches, possesses now a fortune of two millions, and is called Rubini.

1777. MADAME PARADIES AND PIERRE WINTER.

Madam Paradies, a Viennese, blind from her fifth year, discovered extraordinary musical abilities. Before she reached her twelfth year, such was the delight excited by her performances on the piano, that the Empress Maria Theresa commanded her attendance at the palace, where the wonderful power of her ear and execution so enraptured the empress, that she immediately settled upon her a pension of two hundred and fifty florins — a beggarly sum, by the way, on such an occasion. Even this paltry amount was lost on the death of the princess, and poor Paradies compelled to try her fortunes in England. In the year 1795, she gave performances in London, and numbered among her hearers the celebrated William Pitt, who was so much affected by her execution of a pathetic concerte, that he burst into tears.

The leader of the royal band, and chapel master to the King of Bavaria, was Pierre Winter, whose amazing acquirements, at the early age of twelve years, obtained him these high and honorable appointments.

At the same early age, the place of organist at Turin was supplied by the famous Blangini; and Henrietta Sophia Nowry, at the age of fourteen, produced the well-known romance of Bonjour, which has become so universally popular by the aid of Auber, who set it to music.

1778. HUMMEL.

Hummel, a distinguished name in musical annals, at a very early age discovered surprising talents. While quite a child, his wonderful progress on the piano-forte induced his father to place him, at seven years of age, under the care of Mozart, in whose house he lived for two years, after which he travelled, with his father, through various parts of Europe, and at length reached London, where his public performances were heard with admiration and delight. One of Haydn's finest piano-forte sonatas, written at this period, is dedicated to Master Hummel. He soon acquired great celebrity as a composer, as well as performer, and became, in 1820, maestro di capella to the Duke of Wiemar, thus proving an exception to the general deterioration so frequently noticed in precocious genius, musical as well as histrionic, and strongly instanced in the cases of Masters Betty, Payne, and Burke.

1779. THE RUSSIAN BOY.

In 1841 arrived in London a Russian boy, called Antoine Rubenstein, not twelve years of age, whose performances on the piano have excited wonder and delight among the musical amateurs. He was equally skilled in the ancient as well as modern style of playing, and gave with wonderful effect the most difficult passages of Bach or Thalberg. All this too was done with the utmost apparent ease, and in the most difficult passages he frequently indulged himself in grotesque imitations of the peculiar trickeries of the composer upon whose music he was engaged.

1780. BRIGIDA GEORGI BANTI.

The successor of Mara was the daughter of a Venetian gondolier, and in her youth nothing more than a street singer in Georgi, her native town, where a noble amateur, having noticed the brilliancy of her voice, had instructed her in singing at his expense. It is probable she was advised shortly after to try her fortune in a foreign country, for she soon left Venice on her road to Paris, not, however, as it would seem, in prosperous circumstances, since she sang at coffee-houses and inns at Lyons and other towns, for small sums collected from the guests.

M. de Visnes, then manager of the Opera at Paris, relates that in the year 1778 he stopped one evening at a coffee-house in the Boulevards, being struck by the sound of a beautiful voice. It was Banti whom he heard, as she was singing in the coffee-room. He put a louis d'or in her hand, desiring her to call on him next morning. The result was, that Monsieur de Visnes engaged her immediately for the opera buffa, where she made her début by an air sung between the second and third acts of Iphigénie en Aulide, and created a universal sensation of delight.

After the departure of Agujari from London, the managers of the Pantheon engaged Madame Banti for three years, upon condition that one hundred pounds a year should be deducted from her salary for the payment of a instructor to cultivate her voice. She, however, often changed her masters, all of them declaring it impossible to conquer her idleness and inattention; but with her, genius supplied the place of science.

After the conclusion of her engagement she left the country, and sang with brilliant success in Germany and Italy. In 1790 she returned to England, and made her first appearance at the King's Theatre, in the opera of Sceniramide, and from that period until 1802, when Mrs. Billington rose to eminence, held unrivalled sway over the public mind. Previous to her final departure, she delighted once more the audience she had so long held enraptured by her singing, in conjunction with Mrs. Billington, in the opera of Merope.

1781. INFANT LYRA.

One of the most extraordinary instances of early talent appeared in the person of a child of three years and six months of age, who astonished the people of Dublin and Liverpool by her performances on the harp. She was called the infant Lyra, and was brought to England from her native place, Dublin, about twenty years ago. She executed with perfect ease the difficult achievement of a shake on the harp—an accomplishment rarely reached by performers of a mature age.

1782. JENNY LIND AND GARCIA.

Jenny Lind was born in Stockholm, in 1820, and made her first appearance in public in that city, in 1838. At thirteen years of age Jenny lost her quality of voice, and with it vanished the young girl's hopes. She bravely supported this misfortune, and unremittingly pursued her musical studies. Garcia was reckoned the most finished of vocal professors, and it was to place herself under him at Paris that she aspired. To carry this project into execution, the young songstress made the tour of Sweden and Norway in her father's company, gave numerous and productive concerts, and, when her purse was sufficiently lined, she repaired to Paris.

Arrived at the master's residence, she sang several pieces in different styles. Garcia listened in silence, without expressing approbation or disapproval. He at length uttered these awful words: "My dear child, you have no voice, or, rather, you have one that you labor with your whole strength to ruin. Perhaps you sung when too young; for your voice is fatigued, or, rather, used up. My only recommendation at present is, that you do not articulate a note again for three months. You will then call again upon me."

At the expiration of the three months, the songstress returned to the master, who acknowledged that her voice had improved, and commenced giving her lessons.

On her return to Stockholm, she was received by her countrymen with the greatest enthusiasm.

From that time Jenny Lind became the delight and admiration of the musical world.

1783. BRAHAM.

"With Billington," says Leigh Hunt, "Braham, who is still in some measure before the public, used to perform, from whose wonderful remains of power in his old age we may judge what he must have been in his prime. I mean with regard to voice; for as to general manner and spirit, it is a curious fact, that, except when he was in the act of singing, he was a remarkably insipid performer; and it was not till he was growing elderly, that he became the animated person we now see him. This, too, he did all on a sudden, to the amusement as well as astonishment of the beholders. When he sang he was always animated.

The probability is, that he had been bred under masters who were wholly untheatrical, and that something had occurred to set his natural spirit to reflecting on the injustice they had done him; though, for a reason which I shall give presently, the theatre, after all, was not the best field for his abilities.

He had wonderful execution as well as force, and his voice could also be very sweet, though it was too apt to betray something of that nasal tone which has been observed in Jews, and which is, perhaps, quite as much, or more, a habit in which they have been brought up, than a consequence of organization.

Mr. Braham at length quitted the Italian stage, and devoted himself to his popular and not very refined style of bravura singing on the English stage. It was what may be called the loud-and-soft style. There was admirable execution; but the expression consisted in being very soft on the words love, peace, &c., and then bursting into roars of triumph on the words hate, war, and glory.

To this pattern Mr. Braham composed many of the songs written for him; and the public were enchanted with a style which enabled them to fancy that they enjoyed the highest gusto of the art, while it required only the vulgarest of their perceptions. This renowned vocalist never did himself justice except in the compositions of Handel. When he stood in the concert-room or the oratorio, and opened his mouth with plain, heroic utterance in the mighty strains of "Deeper and deeper still," or "Sound an alarm," or "Comfort ye my people," you felt indeed that you had a great singer before you. His voice, which too often sounded like a horn vulgar, in the catchpenny lyrics of Tom Dibdin, now became a veritable trumpet of grandeur and exaltation; the tabernacle of his creed seemed to open before him in its most victorious days; and you might have fancied yourself in the presence of one of the sons of Aaron, calling out to the host of people from some platform occupied by their prophets.

1784. MADAME CATALANI.

"Madame Catalani," says Leigh Hunt, "was also one of the singers I first remember. I first heard her at an oratorio, where, happening to sit in a box directly opposite to where she stood, the leaping forth of her amazingly powerful voice absolutely startled me. Women's voices on the stage are apt to rise above all others, but Catalani's seemed to delight in trying its strength with choruses and orchestras; and the louder they became, the higher and more victorious she ascended. In fact, I believe she is known to have provoked and enjoyed this sort of contest.

"I suspect, however, that I did not hear her when she was at her best or sweetest. My recollection is, that with a great deal of taste and brilliancy, there was more force than feeling. She was a Roman, with the regular Italian antelope face,—if I may so call it,—large eyes, with a sensitive, elegant nose, and lively expression."

We find the following anecdote in the Gazette Musicale: "The principal singer of the great theatre at Lyons one day observed a poor woman with her four children begging in the street. Her decent and respectable appearance, in the midst of extreme poverty, interested the kind-hearted vocalist. He desired the poor woman to follow him into the place Bellcour, where, placing himself in a corner, with his back to the wall, his head covered with his handkerchief, and his hat at his feet, he began to sing his most favorite opera airs. The beauty of his voice drew a crowd round him; the idea of some mystery stimulated the generosity of the bystanders, and five-franc pieces fell in showers into the hat. When the singer, who had thus, in the goodness of his heart, transformed himself into a street minstrel, thought he had got enough, he took up the hat, emptied its contents into the apron of the poor woman, who stood motionless with amazement and happiness, and disappeared among the crowd. His talent, however, betrayed him, though his face was concealed; the story spread, and the next evening, when he appeared on the stage, shouts of applause from all parts of the house proved (says the French journalist) that a good action is never thrown away."

1786. NERO'S VANITY AND CRUELTY.

This man was truly a monster musician. In A. D. 60 he instituted music and other exercises to be performed once in five years. In the year 63 he mounted the stage at Naples as a public singer, his first appearance as a strolling minstrel. In the year 66 he visited Greece, and entered the lists as a player and singer, and contended for the prize in all the games. Of course he was always the victor. At each place he visited, he caused the statues which had been erected to other victors to be pulled down, dragged through the streets, and either broken to pieces or thrown into the common sewers.

Upon his return from Greece, he entered Naples, Antium, and other cities, through breaches in the walls, as an Olympic victor. He carried with him to Rome eighteen hundred prizes, which he had extorted from the judges at musical contests.

In the same car in which kings who had been vanquished by Roman generals used to be borne in triumph, with the same pomp, splendor, and solemnity, was seated Diodorus, a celebrated Greek performer upon the cithara, who, with other eminent musicians, was carried through Rome; so that it was doubtful which was the greater, the vanity of Nero in imagining himself superior to the professed musicians, or their adulation in confessing themselves vanquished by him.

Amid all this folly and vanity there was little harm done. Never, in his reign, did the tyrant cause so little misery as he did this year. Honor to fiddles! Would to God all tyrants would fiddle more and tyrannize less!

The care which he took to preserve his voice was excessive, and shows what was the practice of singers in his time. He used to lie upon his back, with a thin plate of lead upon his stomach. He took frequent emetics and cathartics, and abstained from all kinds of fruit, and all such meats as were not good for the voice. He ceased to harangue his troops, and gave his orders either by writing or by some of his officers.

When he returned from Greece, he appointed an officer to take care of his voice. He would never speak but in the presence of this person, who was to admonish him when he spoke too loud; and if Nero, upon some sudden emotion, would not listen to remonstrance, it was the duty of the officer to stop his mouth with a napkin. His voice was thin and husky; yet the easiest way to win his favor was to praise it, and to appear enraptured while he was singing.

He appeared upon the stage almost every day, inviting the whole populace to hear him at his theatre in his palace, where he often kept them all day and night: until he was tired no one was allowed to retire. Women even gave birth to children there. Some became so tired and disgusted, that they leaped the walls at the risk of their lives or bones, or counterfeited death that they might be carried out to be buried. Some, from being obliged to remain in the same posture so long, contracted mortal distempers. He even employed many persons to watch the countenances and behavior of his audiences, who set down the names of those who appeared dissatisfied. The common people were instantly punished for such an offence, while upon persons of higher rank his vengeance was wreaked in the most dreadful manner.

Vespasian, who was afterwards emperor, once provoked his anger by leaving the theatre. Fearing his displeasure, he returned, but fell asleep while Nero was singing, and his life was only saved by the prayers of his powerful friends. Nero sang while Rome ached, if he did not fiddle while it burned.

1787. ROSINGRAVE'S PASSION FOR MUSIC.

"Rosingrave's sweetness of temper," says Dr. Burney, "and willingness to instruct young persons who were eager in the pursuits of knowledge, tempted me frequently to visit him at Mrs. Bray's, at Hampstead, where he resided. His conversation was very entertaining and instructive, particularly on the subject of music. Indeed, his passion for the art never quitted him to the day of his death, which happened in Ireland, about the year 1750.

"The instrument on which he had exercised himself in the most enthusiastic part of his life bore very uncommon marks of diligence and perseverance, for he had worn the ivory covering of many of the keys quite through to the wood. In his younger days, when his intellect was unimpaired, he was regarded as having the power of seizing the parts and spirit of a score, and of executing the most difficult music at sight, beyond any musician in Europe."

1788. JENNY LIND.

Jenny Lind.

"There was once," says Frederika Bremer, "a poor and plain little girl, dwelling in a little room in Stockholm, the capital of Sweden. She was a poor little girl indeed then; she was lonely and neglected, and would have been very unhappy, deprived of the kindness and care so necessary to a child, if it had not been for a peculiar gift. The little girl had a fine voice, and in her loneliness, in trouble or in sorrow, she consoled herself by singing. In fact, she sung to all she did; at her work, at her play, running or resting, she always sang."

"The woman who had her in care went out to work during the day, and used to lock in the little girl, who had nothing to enliven her solitude but the company of a cat. The little girl played with her cat, and sang. Once she sat by the open window, and stroked her cat, and—sang, when a lady passed by. She heard the voice, and looked up and saw the little singer. She asked the child several questions, went away, and came back several days later, followed by an old music master, whose name was Crelius. He tried the little girl's musical ear and voice, and was astonished. He took her to the director of the Royal Opera at Stockholm, then a Count Puho, whose truly generous and kind heart was concealed by a rough speech and a morbid temper. Crelius introduced his little pupil to the count, and asked him to engage her as 'élève' for the Opera. 'You ask a foolish thing,' said the count, gruffly, looking disdainfully down on the poor little girl. 'What shall we do with that ugly thing? See what feet she has! And then her face! She will never be presentable. No, we cannot take her! Away with her!'

"The music master insisted, almost indignantly. 'Well,' exclaimed he at last, 'if you will not take her, poor as I am, I will take her myself, and have her educated for the scene; then such another ear as she has for music is not to be found in the world.'

"The count relented. The little girl was at last admitted into the school for élèves at the Opera, and with some difficulty a simple gown of black bombazine was procured for her. The care of her musical education was left to an able master, Mr. Albert Berg, director of the song school of the Opera.

"Some years later, at a comedy given by the élèves of the theatre, several persons were struck by the spirit and life with which a very young élève acted the part of a beggar girl in the play. Lovers of genial nature were charmed, pedants almost frightened. It was our poor little girl, who had made her first appearance, now about fourteen years of age, frolicsome and full of fun as a child.

"A few years still later, a young débutante was to sing for the first time before the public in Weber's Freischtüz. At the rehearsal preceding the representation of the evening, she sang in a manner which made the members of the orchestra once, as by common accord, lay down their instruments to clap their hands in rapturous applause. It was our poor, plain little girl here again, who now had grown up, and was to appear before the public in the rôle of Agatha.

"I saw her at the evening representation. She was then in the prime of youth, fresh, bright, and serene as a morning in May, perfect in form,—her hands and arms peculiarly graceful,—and lovely in her whole appearance through the expression of her countenance, and the noble simplicity and calmness of her manners. In fact she was charming. We saw not an actress, but a young girl full of natural geniality and grace. She seemed to move, speak, and sing without effort or art. All was nature and harmony.

"Her song was distinguished especially by its purity, and the power of soul which seemed to swell her tones. Her mezzo voce was delightful. In the night scene where Agatha, seeing her lover come, breathes out her joy in a rapturous song, our young singer, on turning from the window, at the back of the theatre, to the spectators again, was pale for joy. And in that pale joyousness she sang with a burst of outflowing love and life that called forth, not the mirth, but the tears of the auditors.

"From that time she was the declared favorite of the Swedish public, whose musical taste and knowledge are said to be surpassed nowhere. And year after year she continued so, though, after a time, her voice, being overstrained, lost some of its freshness, and the public, being satiated, no more crowded the house when she was singing. Still, at that time, she could be heard singing and playing more delightfully than ever in Pamina (in Zauberflöte) or in Anna Bolena, though the Opera was almost deserted. (It was then late in the spring, and the beautiful weather called the people out to nature's plays.) She evidently sang for the pleasure of the song.

"By that time she went to take lessons of Garcia, in Paris, and so give the finishing touch to her musical education. There she acquired that warble in which she is said to have been equalled by no singer, and which could be compared only to that of the soaring and warbling lark, if the lark had a soul.

"And then the young girl went abroad, and sang on foreign shores and to foreign people. She charmed Denmark, she charmed Germany, she charmed England. She was caressed and courted every where, even to adulation. At the courts of kings, at the houses of the great and noble, she was feasted as one of the grandees of nature and art. She was covered with laurels and jewels. But friends wrote of her — 'In the midst of these splendors she only thinks of her Sweden, and yearns for her friends and her people.'

"One dusky October night, crowds of people — the most part, by their dress, seeming to belong to the upper classes of society — thronged the shore of the Baltic Harbor at Stockholm. All looked towards the sea. There was a rumor of expectation and pleasure. Hours passed away, and the crowds still gathered, and waited, and looked out eagerly towards the sea. At length a brilliant rocket rose joyfully, far out at the entrance of the harbor, and was greeted by a general buzz on the shore — 'There she comes! there she is!'

"A large steamer now came thundering on, making its triumphant way, through the flocks of ships and boats lying in the harbor, towards the shore of the Skeppsbro. Flashing rockets marked its way in the dark as it advanced. The crowds on the shore pressed forward as if to meet it. Now the leviathan of the waters was heard thundering nearer and nearer; now it relented; now again pushed on, foaming and splashing; now it lay still. And there, on the front of the deck, was seen, by the light of lamps and rockets, a pale, graceful young woman, with eyes brilliant with tears, and lips radiant with smiles, waving her handkerchief to her friends and countrymen on the shore.

"It was she again — our poor, plain, neglected little girl of former days — who now came back in triumph to her fatherland. But no more poor, no more plain, no more neglected. She had become rich; she had become celebrated; and she had in her slender person the power to charm and inspire multitudes.

"Some days later, we read in the papers of Stockholm an address to the public written by the beloved singer, stating, with noble simplicity, that, 'as she once more had the happiness to be in her native land, she would be glad to sing again to her countrymen, and that the income of the operas in which she was this season to appear would be devoted to raise a fund for a school, where élèves for the theatre would be educated to virtue and knowledge.' The intelligence was received as it deserved, and of course the Opera House was crowded every time the beloved singer sang there.

"The first time she again appeared in the Somnambula, (one of her favorite rôles), the public, after the curtain was dropped, called her back with great enthusiasm, and received her, when she appeared, with a roar of hurrahs. In the midst of the burst of applause, a clear, melodious warbling was heard. The hurrahs were hushed instantly. And we saw the lovely singer standing with her arms slightly extended, somewhat bowing forward, graceful as a bird on its branch, warbling, warbling as no bird ever did, from note to note. — and on every one a clear, strong, soaring warble, — until she fell into the rétonnelle of her last song, and again sang that joyful and touching strain — 'No thought can conceive how I feel at my heart.'

"She has now accomplished the good work to which her latest songs in Sweden have been devoted, and she is again to leave her native land to sing to a far remote people. She is expected this year in the United States of America, and her arrival is welcomed with a general feeling of joy. All have heard of her whose history we have now slightly shadowed out. The expected guest, the poor little girl of former days, the celebrated singer of now-a-days, the genial child of Nature and Art is — JENNY LIND!"

1789. THE LAWYER TURNED MUSICIAN.

Thomas Augustine Arne was the son of Arne, the celebrated upholsterer of King Street, Covent Garden, at whose house the Indian kings lodged in the reign of Queen Anne, as mentioned in the Spectator, No. 50.

Arne had a good education, having been sent to Eton by his father, who intended him for the law. But even when he was at school his love for music operated upon him too powerfully for his own peace or that of his companions; for, with a miserable, cracked, common flute, he used to torment them night and day, when not obliged to attend school. And he himself told Dr. Burney, when he left Eton, such was his passion for music, that he used to avail himself of the privilege of a servant by borrowing a livery, and going into the upper gallery of the Opera House, which was then appropriated to domestics. At home he had contrived to secrete a spinet in his room, upon which, after muffling the strings with a handkerchief, he used to practise in the night, when the rest of the family were asleep; for had his father discovered how he spent his time, he would probably have thrown the instrument out of the window.

This young votary of Apollo was at length compelled to serve a three years' clerkship to the law, without ever intending to make it his profession; but even during this servitude he dedicated every moment he could obtain, fairly or otherwise, to the study of music. Besides practising on the spinet, and studying composition by himself, he contrived, during his clerkship, to acquire some instruction, on the violin, of Festing; upon which instrument he had made so considerable a progress, that soon after he had quitted the attorney's office, his father, accidentally calling at a gentleman's house in the neighborhood upon business, found him engaged with company; but sending in his name, he was invited up stairs, where there was a large company and a concert, in which, to his great astonishment, he caught his son in the very act of playing the first fiddle! Finding him more admired for his musical talent than knowledge of the law, he was soon prevailed upon to forgive his unruly passion, and allow him to turn it to some account.

1790. THE MALIGNANT MUSICIAN.

Musical sensitiveness and irritable jealousies among men of the musical profession are fully illustrated by the following fact: Two celebrated vocalists in Waterford, Ireland, in 1834, gave a public exhibition of their skill. An umpire of disinterested men awarded the right of victory to one over the other; upon which the vanquished vocalist coolly drew a pistol and shot his rival through the heart! We have known musical men who felt malignant enough for all this. They would not hold pistols to each other's breast, 'tis true, but they carried "razors under their tongues," and allowed no favorable opportunity to pass without using them.

1791. MUSICAL HUMBUGGERY.

The celebrated Indian chief Okah Tubbee, noted for his performances on the flute, is said to be none other than Carey, a negro, or rather mulatto, who lived in Louisville some ten or twelve years since! He was an excellent performer on the fife, flute, and other musical instruments, and belonged to the band of the old Louisville Guards, and when this fine company paraded he discoursed his music to the infinite delight of the crowds of urchins who "followed the sogers." Carey thought it would prove more profitable to turn Indian, and for several years he has been "starring" it through the country as Dr. Okah Tubbee, giving concerts, &c. He has shown himself to be a worthy rival of the prince of humbugs. He claims to be an Indian chief, and that his wife, who assists at his concerts, is an Indian princess.

In the Examiner of 1812, Leigh Hunt luxuriated in the following rapturous eulogium on Catalani:—

"The heaving gentleness of Tramianni's voice is full of sensibility, and plays very agreeably with a turn, or little wandering of notes, before conclusion; but when compared with Madame Catalani's warmth of feeling and vividness of execution, it is mere feebleness and timidity, and a stealing about in the dark. She occasionally throws out a note which reaches us at a distance, like vocal lightning, and makes us wonder what her voice would be if she exerted it through a whole song; but this vehemence and swell she can control with the utmost delicacy and the tenuity of warbling; her shake on the upper notes is pure crystal quivering like water in sunshine, and seems as if it would be as perpetual; and when she suddenly springs aloft, from a low note to one of inconceivable height and fineness, dropping down from thence a few still small utterances, you might shut your eyes and fancy a fairy being who had shot up to the music of the spheres, and with one finger and another touches them to our distant ears."

With all due allowance for musical enthusiasm, as well as the large price paid for a puff of this kind, one can scarcely conceive it possible that a man of Leigh Hunt's mind should condescend to write such hyperbolical stuff.

Of the origin of this extraordinary woman little is known; her family was certainly obscure, if not low, and her vocal talents were developed by mere accident. As an artist, she stood in her day as far beyond all competitorship as did Paganini in instrumentation, and artists were contented to look up with admiration at her powers, without any expression of envy or malignity, for she was far aloof from such small feeling. In her conduct she was unexceptionable, as in talent she was great, and has lived respected by all who knew her.

Her eminence took its rise in Lisbon, the Opera of which city she adorned for a considerable time. From thence she went to the Opera House in London, where her fame rose to its zenith, and where she acquired much wealth. She married an extravagant man named Vallebregue, who wasted much of her earnings for several years; latterly, she became prudent, and restrained his prodigality. Those who have had the good fortune to hear Catalani sing "God save the king," "Rule, Britannia," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," assuredly will not forget them.

Catalani has been charged with extorting most extravagant terms for her services, and this has never been denied; but as a set-off, numerous instances are recorded of judicious and well-timed generosity on her part. When she performed for the benefit of musicians, or for public charities, she frequently returned the whole, or a large portion, of the sum for which she was engaged. When a great musical performance took place for the Westminster Hospital, in 1821, she was solicited to contribute her services, but declined on the ground that her own concerts, then announced, might be injured by her previous appearance elsewhere. But on the day after her first concert, she transmitted to the committee the whole proceeds of that performance, amounting to about three hundred pounds, as a gift to the hospital.

When she visited Cracow, in the height of her fame, she was engaged for a very large sum to sing in the theatre. When the amount was tendered to her, she returned more than half of it towards the fund for erecting a statue to Kosciuszko. At Bangor she heard the Welsh harp for the first time, and gave two guineas to the old blind harper. On one occasion, Catalani received from the late George IV. a magnificent diamond ring.

Catalani was almost entirely uneducated, even in music. Her want of literary attainments, joined to her vivacity in conversation, sometimes produced ludicrous scenes. When at the court at Weimar, she was placed, at a dinner party, by the side of Goethe, as a mark of respect to her from her royal host. The lady knew nothing of Goethe, but, being struck by his majestic appearance, and the great attention of which he was the object, she inquired of the gentleman on the other side what was his name.

"The celebrated Goethe, madame," was the answer.

"Pray, on what instrument does he play?" was the next question.

"He is no performer, madame; he is the author of Werter."

"O, yes, yes, I remember," said Catalani; and turning to the venerable poet, she addressed him,—

"Ah, sir, what an admirer I am of Werter!"

A low bow was the acknowledgment for so flattering a compliment.

"I never," continued the lively lady, "read any thing half so laughable in my life. What a capital farce it is, sir!"

"Madame," said the poet, looking aghast, "the Sorrows of Werter a farce?"

"O, yes; never was any thing so exquisitely ridiculous!" rejoined Catalani, laughing heartily as she enjoyed the remembrance.

And it turned out that she had been talking all the while of a ridiculous parody of Werter, which had been performed at one of the minor theatres of Paris, and in which the sentimentality of Goethe's tale had been unmercifully ridiculed.

The poet did not get over his mortification the whole evening; and the fair singer's credit at the court of Weimar was sadly impaired by the display of her ignorance of the Sorrows of Werter.

1794. GREAT MUSICAL ARTIST.

One of the greatest, if not the very first, of French musical artists was Larivee, who, from the humble station of a barber's boy, attained the nearest approach to the perfect standard of excellence, as established by the French critics. It was his peculiar good fortune to attract the notice, and soon after to receive the invaluable instructions, of the celebrated Gluck, under whose anxious care he acquired "a more impressive manner of delivering recitative" than had been known to the French before, and which approached nearer than had been conceived possible to the genuine style of French declamation. He is said to have united in a surprising degree all the qualities of a singer and actor; his voice was full and melodious; his taste and judgment pure and sound; and as his figure and countenance were noble and striking, his looks and attitudes were impassioned and expressive.

1795. MUSICAL ASTRONOMER.

Sir William Herschel was a good musician; yet such was his ardor for astronomical discovery, that at some benefit concert which he gave, he had his telescope fixed in the window, and made his observations between the acts.

1796. BACH AND THE DISCORD.

John Sebastian Bach entered a parlor where a large party were assembled, while an amateur was extemporizing upon the piano. The performer had just struck a dissonant chord, as he caught sight of the great master, and he immediately sprang from the piano without touching another note. The host was advancing to greet Bach, when, to the surprise of the whole company, the latter, unable to endure such a painful termination, ran past him, and reaching the piano before the keys had ceased vibrating, resolved the discord, closed with a popular cadence, and then turned and made to the host his entrance compliments.

1797. MOZART'S INFANCY AND DEATH.

John Chrysostome Wolfgang Theophilus Mozart, one of the greatest of modern composers, was born at Salzburg, Germany, in 1756, and was the son of an able musician. He began to display his musical abilities when he was only three years of age, and by the time he was twice as old, he was listened to as a prodigy in various parts of Germany. He next visited France, England, and Italy, and was every where received with enthusiasm. In his tenth year he applied himself strenuously to the study of composition, forming his taste on the works of the most celebrated masters. His first serious opera, Mithridates, which ran for twenty nights, was produced in his fifteenth year. After having made a second journey to Paris, he entered into the service of the Emperor of Germany, in which he remained until his decease, on the 5th December, 1792. His last production was his celebrated Requiem. Of his operas, of which he composed twelve, the principal are Idomene, the Clemency of Titus, Don Juan, the Marriage of Figaro, and the Enchanted Flute.

1798. MOZART'S CHILDHOOD.

When Mozart, at six years of age, made his first musical tour through Germany, the Elector of Bavaria, by way of encouraging the boy, told him that he had nothing to fear from his august presence. "O," said the child, with great smartness, "I have played before the empress." Her majesty was one of the first who took notice of his extraordinary talents, and used to place him upon her knees while he played at the harpsichord.

When Mozart, two years afterwards, visited England, he published at London some sonatas for the harpsichord, which he dedicated to the queen, subscribing himself, "Tres humble et très obéissant petit serviteur."

Mr. Daines Barrington having been informed that this youthful prodigy was often visited with musical ideas, to which, even in the midst of the night, he would give utterance on the harpsichord, told M. Mozart, the father, that he would be glad to hear some of the child's extemporary compositions. "The father," says Mr. Barrington, "shook his head at this, saying that it depended entirely upon his being, as it were, musically inspired; but that I might ask him if he was in the humor for such a composition.

"Happening to know that little Mozart was much taken notice of by Manzoli, the famous singer, who came over to England in 1764, I said to the boy that I should be glad to hear an extemporary love song, such as his friend Manzoli might choose at the Opera.

"The boy, on this, (who continued to sit at the harpsichord,) looked back with much archness, and immediately began five or six lines of a jargon recitative, proper to introduce a love song. He then played a symphony, which might correspond with an air played to the single word Affetto. It had a first and second part, which, with the symphonies, was of the length that opera songs generally last. If this extemporary composition was not amazingly capital, yet it was really above mediocrity, and showed most extraordinary readiness of invention. Finding that he was in humor, and as it were inspired, I then desired him to compose a song of rage, such as might be proper for the Opera stage. The boy again looked back with much archness, and began five or six lines of a jargon recitative, proper to precede a song of anger. The word he pitched upon for his second extemporary composition was Perfido. This lasted also about the same time with the song of love; and in the middle of it he had worked himself up to such a pitch, that he beat his harpsichord like a person possessed."

After leaving England, young Mozart visited, among other courts, that of the Prince of Salzburg. His highness, not believing that such masterly pieces as those which Mozart played to him, as of his own composition, could really be the production of so mere a child, shut him up for a week, during which he was not permitted to see any one, and was left only with music paper and the words of an oratorio. In that short space of time, he composed a very capital oratorio, which completely set at rest every doubt as to his extraordinary talents.

1799. A MODEST MUSICIAN.

Christian Urban, the musician, who lately died at Paris, was a devout man, and endeavored to gain a livelihood, in his younger days, by sacred music.

Failing in the attempt, he became a theatrical musician; but although he played in the orchestra of the Opera upwards of a quarter of a century, he never saw a dance or looked upon the face of a singer. He invariably averted his eyes, that he might not behold the wickedness of the stage.

§ 185. HONORS AND VARIOUS FORTUNES.

1800. TARTINI AND HIS PUPILS.

The style of Tartini, in executing an adagio, has been represented by his contemporaries as inimitable, and was almost, in their idea, supernatural. He formed the greatest school that the musical world had then known.

His favorite pupils were Bini and Nardini, who, in their turn, formed scholars of great abilities, and contributed to spread his reputation and manner of playing all over Europe. Ferrari, of Cremona, was also the immediate disciple of Tartini, but afterwards established a style of his own. Tartini's first master was an obscure musician of the name of Giulio di Terni, who afterwards changed places with Tartini, and became his scholar. This circumstance Mr. Wiseman had from Tartini himself, who used to say that he had studied very little till after he was thirty years of age. Tartini changed his style, in 1744, from extreme difficulty to grace and expression.

Bini was recommended to him at the age of fifteen, by Cardinal Olivieri. Tartini, finding him not only a youth of a happy disposition for music, but also of excellent morals, had a very great affection for him. This young musician practised with such assiduity, that in three or four years he vanquished the most difficult of Tartini's compositions, and executed them with greater force than the author himself. When he had finished his studies, his patron, Cardinal Olivieri, took him to Rome, where he astonished all the professors by his performance, particularly Montagnari, at that time the principal performer on the violin in that city; and it was generally believed that Montagnari was so mortified by the superiority as to have died of grief.

Corelli was not only a distinguished composer, but so eminent as a player on the violin that his fame reached throughout Europe; and wherever he went, persons were ambitious of becoming his disciples, and learning the practice of the violin from the greatest master of the art that had ever lived. And yet when Handel composed his serenata entitled Il Trionfo del Tempo, Corelli, who at that time regulated the Musical Academy at the palace of Cardinal Ottoboni, found the overture in a style so new and singular, that he was confounded in his first attempt to play it.

Corelli, though remarkable for the mildness of his temper, and the modesty of his deportment, was not insensible of the respect due to his skill and exquisite performance. When he was once playing a solo at the house of his great patron and friend, Cardinal Ottoboni, he discovered the cardinal and another person engaged in discourse, on which he laid down his instrument, and, being asked the reason, gave for answer, that he feared the music interrupted their conversation.

The compositions of Corelli are celebrated for the harmony resulting from the union of all the parts. They are also equally intelligible to the learned and unlearned, while the impressions made by them have been found durable and universal. His music is the language of nature, and all that hear it become sensible of its effects. Of this there cannot be a stronger proof than that amidst all the innovations which the love of change has introduced, it continued to be performed, and was heard with delight in churches, in theatres, at public solemnities and festivities, in all the cities of Europe, for nearly forty years.

1802. FARINELLI AND THE KING'S PRESENT.

In 1735, his late majesty's father, then Prince of Wales, made a present of a fine wrought gold snuff-box, richly set with diamonds and rubies, in which was enclosed a pair of diamond knee-buckles, as also a purse of one hundred guineas, to the famous Signior Farinelli. Returning to Italy, he raised, out of a small part of the sum he had acquired in England, a very superb building, in which he dwelt, and chose to dignify it with the significant appellation of the English folly.

1803. THE WONDER OF HER AGE.

The most celebrated female flute-player of antiquity was Lamia. She was regarded as a prodigy of excellence. Her abilities in her profession, united with wit and beauty, rendered her the wonder of her age. The honors she received, which are recorded by several authors, and particularly by Athenæus and Plutarch, are sufficient testimonies of her unlimited power over the passions of her hearers. Her claim to admiration from her personal attractions does not, even now, entirely depend upon the fidelity of historians; since an exquisite engraving of her head, upon an amethyst, is preserved in the royal collection of France, and authenticates the accounts of her external charms.

1804. PAGANINI'S DECLINE.

"An extraordinary change," says a London paper of 1833, "seems to have taken place in the public mind with respect to Paganini. His concerts, on his first visit to England, were so well attended, that frequently his receipts exceeded one thousand pounds, and on one occasion fourteen hundred pounds were received, (of which he had two thirds, leaving M. Laporte to pay the whole expenses out of the remaining third.) On his arriving here, about two months ago, he was advised to defer giving any concert until the anger caused by his refusal to play for the distressed English actors in Paris should have blown over. It being supposed, however, finally, that this affair had been forgotten, and that there was every prospect of obtaining full houses, Paganini announced a concert for Friday evening. On Thursday, so few boxes and stalls had been taken that Paganini despaired of an attendance that would compensate him for his trouble, and dreading, perhaps, that there would be some disturbance arising out of the Paris affair, on Friday advertised that there would be no performance.

1805. JENNY LIND AND THE CLERGY.

A somewhat distinguished clergyman of Brooklyn, N. Y., the Rev. S. H. Cox, well known in this city, pays a very beautiful compliment to the really Christian aspirations and sentiments of the charming songstress. A volume had been presented for his autograph in which appeared the signature of Jenny Lind, with some lines, which the reverend gentleman furnishes for publication with an introduction, of which the following are the concluding passages:—

"Pleased with the lines, I copied them by permission; and finding them suitable, I quoted them in a sermon last Lord's day. The result was, that many remembered, and rehearsed, and wrote them, each in a peculiar way; and hence I resolved to publish them as in this communication. I quote them with perfect correctness, as I copied them with care. I think they show the characteristic purity of their source, and reveal our incomparable cantatrice in a way that might well engage for her a place in the affections and the prayers of the people of God, especially in this country of her transient sojourn. I have no personal acquaintance with her; having never heard nor seen her. Still, I admire her character.

"After this long portico to a small but beautiful temple, begging pardon for its violations of symmetry, I will introduce the poetry:—

"In vain I seek for rest
In all created good;
It leaves me still uneasy,
And makes me cry for God.
And sure at rest I cannot be Until my heart finds rest in Thee."

"We add, that if adulation or wealth could satisfy Jenny Lind, she need not 'cry for God' at all. It is grace and communion with God, by faith in his dear Son Jesus Christ, that keeps her steady and upright, sober, conscientious, and honorable, where others would become intoxicated with vanity."

1806. MADAME CATALANI'S FIRST APPEARANCE IN LONDON.

It was a night on which Semiramide, that masterly tragedy of the Italian stage, was announced for the leading text-piece. Catalani, with her brow all diamonded from foreign favor, was to appear for the first time in your Babylonian London. Catalani, as Semiramide, stood foremost on the stage. She was always handsome, and at this moment her noble cast of features, under the excitement of her part, was lit up with peculiar majesty; her form, too, tall and commanding, though less muscular, was almost like that of our own Siddons; and the whole blazing theatre, with its thousand eyes, was fixed upon her there. Her voice at first was grave and beautiful, a rich and tunable soprano, laden with noble Italian words. "Son Regina," her soul, as if fired at the thoughts of her regality, at the glory on her brow, and the grandeur at her feet, poured out a peal of rapture so majestic, shook the whole house with so towering a harmony, that the walls seemed absolutely to act as a constraint and the roof as a confinement to her powers. Never, before, had its like been heard in London.

Malibran received in London three thousand five hundred pounds for two months' acting, (two or three nights a week,) besides two thousand pounds more for concerts, and her carriage followed by hundreds daily. At the Milan Theatre, she was called out by the audience seventeen times on one evening, to receive shawls, bouquets, garlands, and presents. On one of her visits to the British capital, she frequently realized the following comfortable sums: At Covent Garden her nightly salary was one hundred and twenty-five pounds. After the play, she repairs to the Hanover Square rooms, where, for one song, which occupies nine minutes, she receives twenty-five guineas. At a quarter past ten, she sometimes goes to Rothschild's, or some of the nobility's houses, sings another song, or perhaps two, for twenty-five guineas more. And several times lately she has attended morning benefit concerts at the King's Theatre, for each of which she receives an additional two hundred guineas, making three hundred and seventy-five pounds ten shillings in one day! At the Milan Theatre, her pay was, from the theatre alone, forty thousand dollars for the season, besides innumerable valuable presents. At Venice she was allowed the privilege of a white gondola, while the law ordains that all these vessels shall be black.

On one occasion, at Aix-la-Chapelle, at which she had been performing in an opera with the German artistes, by command of the king, the soldiers on duty, at her departure, presented arms, and gave the salute, (hitherto alone observed to members of the royal family,) as a mark of respect to her talents.

Malibran's last appearance was at the Manchester festival. On this occasion seven thousand tickets had been disposed of, and in the afternoon of that day she was to sing an air from the Redemption of Haniel. As she did not appear promptly at the conclusion of the previous piece, a quartet was introduced, to give her a moment to rally, as she evidently appeared quite unwell. She then came forward, and commenced in a tremulous vein, and gaining strength as she proceeded, finished with the well-known air, in the words, "Holy, holy, Lord God Almighty." It was remarked that what she lacked in power was made up in sweetness. In the course of the morning she sang, from Cimarosa's Sacrificio di Abramo, the air, de parlato, but not in her usual style. In the evening she sang again with some spirit from Don Giovanni, but her great effort was in a duet with Lablache, from La Prava, a serious opera by Gnecco. This is described as an astonishing performance, exciting the greatest enthusiasm in the audience, and producing an encore, which was followed by a still more extraordinary exhibition. On Wednesday morning, she again exerted herself in a duet with Clara Norvello. She executed this brilliant piece so much to the delight of the audience, that she was encored. Turning round to Sir George Smart, she said,—

"If I sing it again, I shall die!"

He answered that nothing remained but for her to leave the orchestra, and he would address the audience. She said, with renewed energy, —

"No, I will do it; but I shall die!"

In the evening she made her appearance in a canon from Beethoven's Fidelio, "What joy doth fill my breast!" And in this, her last piece, her efforts were almost supernatural. One of her shakes was given at the very top of her voice, with a fearless enthusiasm which filled every heart, and brought down thunders of applause. But nature and art gave way before the illness which now increased upon her: she sank exhausted under the effort, and being removed to the greenroom, was bled, and, as soon as possible, carried in a chair to her own lodgings. All the ensuing night she was in great agony, and her groans and shrieks resounded through the hotel. On the following day, notwithstanding, she insisted on going to church to sing, but was totally incapable of making the effort, when her friends insisted on her returning home. It appears, from the statement of her medical attendant, that she had a terrible fall from her horse about two months previous to her death, when she was dragged along the ground for the space of several yards. This caused a great shock of mind and body, contusions on the head, and an impossibility of moving the left arm at the shoulder. The same evening, she insisted on singing at Drury Lane Theatre — a circumstance which, of course, much retarded her recovery. It was hoped that she had entirely recovered from the effect of the accident, as she only experienced a slight pain in the head from time to time, on the spot where she received the blow. During her last illness, the pains at the shoulder, the arms, and at the several contusions, returned severely. She continued, in defiance of all advice, to pursue her professional labors, when suddenly, while she was singing, she felt a violent pain in her head, and was taken very ill. A tumor had been formed on the brain, which explains the cause of her premature death.

1808. MADAME MALIBRAN AND THE KING.

At Naples, the rule is, that when an actress is about to make her début, she waits and solicits the honor of his majesty's presence or her first appearance. In compliance with this regulation, Madame Malibran went to the king: she said, hesitatingly, "Sire, if it be agreeable to your majesty, I have come to request that your majesty will be graciously pleased not to appear at the theatre to-morrow evening." The king, not a little astonished, demanded the reason of a request so singular. "May it please your majesty, I have heard that it is the etiquette in Naples not to applaud in presence of royalty; that is to say, unless you graciously set the example." The king, perceiving that she was embarrassed, desired her to speak out. "Sire, as you are good enough to command me to speak, I will. The fact is, I am so much in the habit of being applauded the instant I appear on the stage, that I am sure, if I were received in silence, I couldn't sing a note." "Very well," said his majesty, "I will set the example. Fear not; you shall be abundantly applauded." Madame Malibran returned home highly satisfied by having thus secured powerful protection. In the evening, just before she had made her appearance on the stage, she got between the side scenes, where she might be seen from the royal box, and having caught the eye of the king, reminded him of his promise by clapping her hands. His majesty, pleased with her freedom and originality, failed not to be as good as his word, and the whole house loudly responded to the royal signal.

1809. SARDINI'S DEBUT IN NORMA.

A curious circumstance occurred at the Opera at Leghorn. The opera season opened with Norma. The principal tenor having fallen sick, and the managers not being able to supply his place, the theatre was closed. This circumstance was considered a serious affliction to the inhabitants, at the commencement of the carnival, too; and an amateur undertook to learn the part in three days. As a forlorn hope, the proposal was accepted, and at the time appointed, Signor Giuseppi Sardini, the amateur alluded to, made a most brilliant début in Norma, and has since sung in the Sonnambula, with the same success. Thus Sardini, who, a month previous, could not get an engagement as a common chorus singer, is now considered to be one of the first vocalists in Italy, and the directors are outbidding each other in offering him extravagant terms.

1810. THE RICH HARPER AND EUPOLUS.

A rich man of Tarentum once took it into his head to distinguish himself at the Pythian games. Not having strength enough to shine as a wrestler, nor agility enough for running, he chose to be considered as a musical candidate. He made his appearance at Delphos, dressed in cloth of gold, with a crown, in the shape of a laurel, the leaves of which were of gold, adorned with the finest emeralds. His harp exhibited a proportionable grandeur; it was loaded with jewels, and decorated with figures of Orpheus, Apollo, and the Muses. The splendor of his appearance drew all eyes upon him, and every one expected something wonderful from one who had taken such pains to attract their notice. How great was their disappointment, when, on the magnificent harper's attempting to exert his powers, his voice and instrument both equally failed him, and all his efforts produced only the most jarring discords. Shouts of laughter rent the assembly, and the judges of the game whipped him out of the theatre, covered with confusion.

The next candidate was one Eupolus of Elis. Although he was meanly dressed, and his harp was but of homely fabric, he drew forth sounds from it which charmed and delighted the whole assembly, and he was universally pronounced worthy of the prize. After receiving the laurel, Eupolus is said to have thus addressed his Tarentine competitor: "You came crowned with gold and jewels, because you were rich; I, because I am poor, am only rewarded with laurel. But I am well satisfied. With that laurel I have the applause of all Greece, while your crown serves only to make you ridiculed and despised."

1811. MADAME MARA AT THE FESTIVAL.

Madame Mara, when in the height of her reputation, attended a musical festival at Oxford, (about 1784,) and not being accustomed to join in the choruses abroad, sat still during the performance of the first chorus; but when she rose to sing a solo, she was greeted with loud hisses, upon which she walked out of the orchestra, and went to her lodgings. A deputation was sent after, to appease and bring her back; but on her remaining seated during the second chorus, the cry became universal, "Turn Mara out." Not understanding this, she smiled, which provoked the audience further. The vice chancellor then told her it was a rule for every vocal performer to join in the chorus. On this being explained to her by Miss George, afterwards Mrs. Oldmixon, Mara replied,—

"O, me does not know his rules; me will go home."

And home she went.

1812. USEFUL HINT TO LEARNERS.

Madame Mara, one of the most distinguished of public singers, was, unfortunately, a person of expensive habits, and utterly without any prudent system of living. After retiring more than once from public life, her imprudent expenditures forced her, when no longer fit for the stage, to undertake the painful and laborious drudgery of teaching music, vocal as well as instrumental. The terms she exacted were considered extravagant by many, and elicited from the teacher the following sensible card:—

"When I teach, I sing with my pupils, by which they learn twice as much as they would by the usual mode of instruction. My scholars are not taught by precept alone; they have the advantage of example. Instead of having to follow the piano-forte, they hear my voice. Singing, I am convinced, can be only taught by singers; and the fatigue of the vocation of vocal tuition is so great, that only those should attempt to teach others to sing who have done with singing in public themselves."

1813. LABLACHE AND HIS TWO HATS.

"Few there are in the world," says the Courrier Français, "who are not acquainted with the talent of Lablache; but his occasional absence of mind is not so universally known. The following is an instance:—

"When last at Naples, he was sent for to the palace,—an honor frequently conferred upon him,—his Neapolitan majesty being much delighted with the drolleries and unalterable good humor of the celebrated singer. On arriving, he entered the waiting-room, and, till called in to his majesty, conversed with the courtiers in attendance. Having a cold in his head, he requested and obtained permission to keep on his hat. Getting into full discourse with those around, he was suddenly startled by the gentleman in waiting crying out, 'His majesty demands the presence of Signor Lablache.'

"In his eagerness to obey the royal summons, he forgot the hat he had on his head, and, snatching up another, he entered the king's cabinet. Being received with a most hearty laugh, Lablache was confounded, but at length recovered himself, and respectfully asked his majesty what had excited his hilarity. 'My dear Lablache,' replied the king, 'pray tell me which of the two hats you have now with you is your own, that on your head or that in your hand? Or perhaps you have brought both as a measure of precaution, in case you should leave one behind you.' 'Ah, maledetto!' cried Lablache, with an air of ludicrous distress, on discovering his étourderie, 'two hats are indeed too many for a man who has no head.'"

We remember a story of Incledon, the once famous vocalist, that fits an "affair of honor" most capitally. Poor Incledon was one of the unsophisticated, and said and did a great many things out of sheer simplicity, that had been much better left unsaid and undone.

Something of this kind gave offence to a gentleman with whom Incledon happened to fall in company, and the offended party resolved upon satisfaction. He sought out the singer accordingly, and was lucky enough to find him enjoying his bottle of Port, one fine afternoon at a noted hotel. "Mr. Incledon," says the waiter, "a gentleman wishes to see you, sir." "Show him up, then," says Incledon. "Sir," said the visitor, in a towering passion, "I'm told that you have been making free with my name in a very improper manner, and I've come to demand satisfaction."

After some parleying, Incledon rose, put on his hat, and planting himself at one side of the room, began warbling Black-eyed Susan, in his most delicious style. When he had finished, "There, sir," said he, "that has given complete satisfaction to several thousands, and if you want any thing more, I've only to say, you're the most unreasonable fellow I ever met with."

1815. HONESTY EXEMPLIFIED.

A set of parish officers, in a country village, applied to Snetzler, a celebrated organ builder, to examine their organ, and make improvements in it. "Gentlemen," said the honest Swiss, "your organ be wort von hundred pound just now. Vell, I will spend you von hundred pound upon it, and it shall then be wort fifty."

1816. TRICKS OF PUBLIC PERFORMERS.

The first solo violin player in England was a "Signor Eastpirini, lately arrived from Rome, who will play singly on the violin, at Hickford's Dancing School," according to a newspaper of November, 1702. It is by no means certain that this Signor E. was not a north country Englishman, who had brains enough to discover at that early period that John Bull's nationality did not extend to music, or matters of taste, and that a foreign title would prove an advantageous passport.

This same disreputable game has been played since, in almost innumerable instances. Signora Storace was an English woman. So were Mara, Madame Vestris, and a score more of Signoris and Signoras. It is laughable to find the trick resorted to even by tumblers and dwarfs. Monsier Gouffé, the great monkey performer, was entitled only to the humble designation of Jim Guffey, the potboy; while Hervio Nano, the half man, translated his New England title of Hervey Leach into Nano, indicative of his calling. In the early part of the seventeenth century, this ruse was adopted very successfully by a certain John Cooper, an admirable performer on the viol da Gamba, an excellent lutist, and respectable composer. He conceived the advantage of assuming a foreign title, and adopted the sounding cognomen of Giovanni Coprario, by which he was known through life. The imposition was effectual; he was universally regarded as a native of Italy, and his compositions were esteemed accordingly.

1817. THE DEAF MAN'S ADMIRATION.

Litz, returning from abroad to Paris, was besieged instantly by a crowd of admirers—worshippers. One of these latter, an old man, made himself very remarkable by his phrenetic transports. Suddenly he began to cut his way through the crowd, and to exclaim,—

"Let me pass; let me pass, I say; I want to kiss the hand of the piano man."

Litz, touched with sympathy, advanced towards the old man, and kindly said,—

"I am profoundly agitated by so much kindness; it is a gentle homage that touches me nearly. Monsieur is a musician, doubtless."

"No," replied some one in the crowd, "he is deaf."

1818. GETTING A STAVE OUT OF HIM.

A young gentleman, being pressed very hard in company to sing, even after he had solemnly assured them that he could not, observed, testily, they intended to make a lutt of him. "No, my good sir," said Colman, "we only want to get a stave out of you."

1819. FOOTE'S REQUEST OF THE FIDDLER.

Foote, being once annoyed by a poor fiddler, "straining harsh discord" under his window, sent him a shilling, with a request that he would play elsewhere, as one scrapper at the door was sufficient.

1820. SIMPLIFYING INSTRUCTION.

A Highland piper, having a scholar to teach, thus initiated him into a knowledge of semibreves, minims, crotchets, and quavers: "Here, Donald," quoth he, "tak ye're pipes, mon, and gie us a blast." But as we cannot make him in character speak Erse, we may as well make him talk English, and his lesson will be better understood. "Here, Donald," said he, "take your pipes, my lad, and give us a blast. So! very well blown indeed! But what is sound, Donald, without sense? You may blow on to all eternity without making a tune of it, if I do not tell you how the queer things on that paper must help. You see that fellow, with the white, round, open face, (pointing to a semibreve between the two lines of a bar;) he moves slowly from that line to this, while you beat one with your foot, and take a long blast; if, now, you put a leg to him, you make two of him, and he'll move twice as fast. If you blacken his face thus, he'll run four times faster than the first fellow, with the white face. And what think ye, after blackening his face thus, if you bend his knee, or tie his legs? he will hop you still eight times faster than the white-faced fellow I showed you first. Now, whenever you blow your pipes, Donald, remember this; the tighter those fellows' legs are tied, the faster they will run, and the quicker they are sure to dance."

1821. ISMENIAS DELIGHTING THE GODS.

Plutarch relates the following story of Ismenias: Being sent for to accompany a sacrifice, and having played some time without the appearance of any good omen in the victim, his employer became impatient, and, snatching the flute out of his hand, began playing in a very ridiculous manner himself, for which he was reprimanded by the company; but the happy omen soon appearing, "There," said he, "to play acceptably to the gods is their own gift!" Ismenias answered with a smile, "While I played, the gods were so delighted that they deferred the omen in order to hear me the longer; but they were glad to get rid of your noise upon any terms." Thus we find that neither prodigality, vanity, nor impiety, is peculiar to modern musicians.

1822. PSALM SINGING IN OLDEN TIMES.

When line-by-line was sung in olden times in the meeting-houses, sad work was often made with the meaning of the Psalmist. For instance, "The Lord will come and he will not." After that line, the next is, "Keep silence, but speak out." Each line is a contradiction of itself separately; but by a proper union of these two lines, it becomes a truthful expression.

1823. A WOFUL PREDICAMENT.

In the olden times, when it was the custom in many parts of New England to sing the psalms and hymns by "deaconing" them, as it was called,—that is by the deacon's reading each line previous to its being sung,—one of these church dignitaries, after looking at his book some time, and making several attempts to spell the words, apologized for the difficulty he experienced in reading, by observing,—

"My eyes, indeed, are very blind."

The choir, who had been impatiently waiting for a whole line, thinking this to be the first of a common metro hymn, immediately sang it. The good deacon exclaimed, with emphasis,—

"I cannot see at all."

This, of course, they also sung, when the astonished pillar of the church cried out,—

"I really b'lieve you are bewitched!"

Response by the choir: "I really b'lieve you are bewitched."—The deacon added,—

"The mischief's in you all."

The choir finished the verse by echoing the last line, and the deacon sat down in despair.

1824. AN INGENIOUS EXPEDIENT.

A young man at a social party was vehemently urged to sing a song. He replied that he would first tell a story, and then, if they still persisted in their demand, he would endeavor to execute a song. When a boy, he said, he took lessons in singing; and one Sunday morning he went up into his father's garret to practise alone by himself. While in full cry, he was suddenly sent for by the old gentleman.

"This is pretty conduct," said the father,—"pretty employment for the son of pious parents, to be sawing boards in the garret on a Sunday morning, loud enough to be heard by all the neighbors. Sit down and take your book."

The young man was unanimously excused from singing the proposed song.

1825. SINGING SUPERLATIVELY.

A lady, who had an excellent voice and great taste in singing, on being one day entreated to oblige the company with a proof of her ability, declared that she could not sing; she could not, positively. "That we are all very well aware of," said Miss Edgeworth, who was present, "for we know, my dear madam, you do not sing positively, but superlatively."

1826. MERELY A SQUALL.

A lady who had not been favored with the most harmonious voice would nevertheless attempt to sing. A gentleman, one of the company, said to another, "What does she call that?" He replied, "The tempest, I think." On which a seafaring gentleman present exclaimed, "Don't be alarmed; it is no tempest; it is merely a squall, and will soon be over."

1827. IN THE WRONG BOX.

John Hart was a musical genius of the first water, and, like many others of the same stamp, was somewhat erratic withal.

One night, at Newburyport, after being engaged in a serenade, where divers strong potations had been dealt out without stint, our hero stowed himself away under a friendly cart to sleep off the fumes caused by the many libations in which he had indulged. He was soon espied, by one in authority, and marched or lugged off to the almshouse, and there put to bed. As soon as morning came, John turned out, and thinking he had got into some tavern, hunted about for the bar, to get his morning dram. He soon came athwart Mr. Johnson, the master of ceremonies there, and asked of him if he was the landlord, as he would like some bitters, that morning. "I'll bitter you!" replied the great Sanheidran, taking our son of harmony by the collar, and dragging him towards the breakfast hall; "sit you down in there, and eat your breakfast; then come back to me." "Rather a queer tavern, and rough landlord," said our Festin to himself, as he sat down to his frugal meal; "never mind, I'll eat and be off, and make the best of it; he don't know me, I reckon."

Soon as breakfast was over, John goes up to the superintendent again, and asks him for his bill, as he wished to be going. "I'll bill you!" roared forth the boss, as he took poor Jack by one ear, and dragged him into the "silk factory;" that is, the oakum room, and told him to go to work, or he'd fare worse. "Look you here," replied our hero; "let me tell you that this is rather out of my line of business. Now, if you would like a solo on the key bugle, a tune upon a clarionet, trombone, French horn, or almost any instrument; any particular song set to music or music arranged: in short, almost any thing in the music line I can do; but I do not like to meddle with another man's business; so you'll please excuse me." Mr. Johnson found, by a little inquiry, that his guest could do better than pick oakum, and, after a little salutary advice, was set at liberty.

1828. UNMUSICAL PITCHFORK.

When those aids to singing, called musical pitchforks, were first introduced, the precentor of Carnock parish, a few miles from Dunfermline, thought he might not be the worse for one, and accordingly ordered the Edinburgh carrier to bring it over. The honest carrier, who never heard of any other pitchfork but that used in the barnyard, purchased one at least ten feet long. It was late in the Saturday evening before he came home, and as a message had been left to bring it up when he came to church next day, he marched into the churchyard before the bell rung, where the master of song was standing amid a group of villagers. "Awcel, John, here's the pitchfork you wanted; but I can tell you, I ne'er thought muckle o' your singing before, and I'm sair mista'en if ye'll sing any better now!"

1829. DR. EMMONS AND THE BASS VIOL.

Dr. Emmons, it is said, was a great lover of sweet sounds, and religiously excluded from his meeting-house all instrumental music except a little mahogany-colored wooden pitch-pipe of the size of an "eighteen mo." book. A member of his choir had learnt to play the bass viol, and, anxious to exhibit his skill, early one Sunday morning, most unadvisedly, introduced his big fiddle into the singing gallery. After the first prayer was ended, and the doctor began to handle his "Watts," the bass violer lifted up his profanation, and, trying his strings, instantly attracted the doctor's attention. He paused, laid down his hymn book, took his sermon from the cushion, and proceeded with his discourse, as if singing was no part of public worship, and finally dismissed the congregation without "note or comment." The whole choir was indignant. They staid after "meeting," and all the girls and young men resolved not to go into the "singing seats" at all in the afternoon, and the elders who did go there bore the visages of men whose minds were made up.

Services began as usual in the afternoon. The doctor took his book in his hand, looked over his spectacles at the gallery, and saw only a few there, but, nothing daunted, read a psalm, and sat down. No sound followed, no one stirred; and the "leader" looked up in utter unconsciousness. After a long and most uneasy silence, the good man, his face somewhat overflashed, his manner rather stern, read the psalm again, paused, then re-read the first verse, and, pushing up his spectacles, looked interrogatively at the gallery. The leader could bear it no longer, and, half rising, said decidedly, "There won't be any singing here this afternoon." "Then there won't be any preaching," said the doctor, quick as thought; and taking his cocked hat from its peg, he marched down the pulpit stairs, through the broad aisle, and out of the house, leaving his congregation utterly astounded. We need not inform our readers that the big fiddle was not used in the "singing seats" afterwards.

1830. SINGING AND WHISTLING.

The Courrier des Etats Unis gives this good 'un. "A feeble tenor singer lately made his appearance on the stage at Moulins, (Alliere.) He was received on his entrance with hisses. Without appearing to be moved by this stormy reception, the artist advanced to the front, and addressed himself to the pit.

"Gentlemen," said he, 'it is a pity to hear you whistle so badly; allow me to give you a lesson.'

"And with that the singer began to whistle, with the most harmonious modulations, the varied airs of the Musquetaires of Halevy. At this unexpected concert, applauses succeeded the whistle, and from that the Bourbonese public, parodizing the form of the conversation of the Thousand and One Nights, say every night to this actor,—

"Sir, if you do not sing, whistle us one of those airs you whistle so well." And the manager makes a good profit out of his nightingale."

The lamented Henry Finn used to give all the notes he could to a song, and, pointing upward with his finger, whistle the balance up the scale.

1831. IMITATING THE NIGHTINGALE.

A famous musician, who had made his fortune by marriage, being requested to sing in company, "Permit me," said he, "to imitate the nightingale, who never sings after he has made his nest."

1832. THE CLEAR OBSCURE.

It is said of Weber, that so completely conscious was he of his want of personal attractions, that when he had a song to sing between the play and farce, as is the custom in country theatres, he always contrived to have the stage partially darkened. "For," says he, "if they see my ugly phiz, they will hiss me, to a dead certainty."

1833. ABELL'S ALTERNATIVE.

John Abell, a celebrated English singer, distinguished himself by singing in public in Holland, at Hamburg, and other places; where, acquiring considerable wealth, he set up a splendid equipage, and affected the man of quality, though at intervals he was so reduced as to be obliged to travel through whole provinces with his lute slung at his back. In rambling he got as far as Poland, and at Warsaw met with a very extraordinary adventure. He was sent for to court, but, evading to go by some slight excuse, was commanded to attend. At the palace he was seated in a chair, in the middle of a spacious hall, and suddenly drawn up to a great height; and the king, with his attendants, appeared in a gallery opposite to him. At the same instant a number of wild bears were turned in, when the king bid him choose whether he would sing or be let down among the bears. Abell chose to sing, and declared afterwards that he never sung so well in his life.

A correspondent of a contemporary says that the origin of a difficulty, which resulted at last in the dismissal of a clergyman in a neighboring town, can be traced to a very trivial affair, which is as follows:—

At the meeting of the church, the pastor gave out the hymn, "I love to steal away," when the chorister commenced singing, but, owing to some difficulty in recollecting the tune, could proceed no farther than "I love to steal," which he did three or four times successively, when the clergyman, in order to relieve him from the dilemma, waggishly remarked that "it was very much to be regretted," and added, "Let us pray."

1835. AN INGENIOUS TRICK.

An English paper relates the following ingenious mode of "raising the wind," practised by a musician on the credulity of the inhabitants of a country town, not long since:—

"A foreigner, named Vogel, a celebrated flute player, advertised a concert for his benefit, and in order to attract those who —had no music in their souls,

And were not moved by concord of sweet sounds,"

he announced that between the acts he would exhibit an extraordinary feat, never before witnessed in Europe. He would hold in his left hand a glass of wine, and would allow six of the strongest men in the town to hold his arm, and, notwithstanding all their effort to prevent him, would drink the wine.

"So novel and so surprising a display of strength, as it was naturally regarded, attracted a very crowded house, and expectation was on the tiptoe, when our hero appeared on the stage, glass in hand, and politely invited any half dozen of the audience to come forward to put his prowess to the test. Several gentlemen, amongst whom was the mayor of the place, immediately advanced to the stage, and, grasping the left arm of Vogel, apparently rendered the performance of his promised feat quite out of the question.

"There was an awful pause for a moment, when our arm-bound hero, eyeing the gentlemen who had pinioned him, said, in his broken English, Jonteelmen, are you all ready? Are you quite sure you have got fast hold? The answer having been given in the affirmative by a very confident nod from those to whom it was addressed, Vogel, to the infinite amusement of the spectators, and to the no small surprise of the group around him, advancing his right arm, which was free, very coolly took the wine glass from his left hand, and bowing very politely to the half dozen gentlemen, said, 'Jonteelmen, I have de honor to drink all your goot health,' at the same time quaffing off the wine, amidst a general roar of laughter, and universal cries of 'Bravo, bravo! Well done, Vogel!'

It cannot be denied that Vogel literally redeemed his pledge. The condition was, that his arm should be held, but not a word was said about his hand. He very ingeniously availed himself of the oversight, nor could he be fairly charged with resorting to trick or subterfuge.

1836. PHILIPS'S SECRET.

The absurd but common prejudice in favor of foreign productions was pleasantly illustrated by Philips, on his return to Dublin from this country. He took home with him several songs, composed by Charles Gilfert, a man as remarkable for musical talent as notorious for prodigality and mismanagement of his theatre. The song alluded to was an old, well-known German air, to which Gilfert had appended some little graceful embellishments, and Philips sang it delightfully. Quite an impression was made by it, and, when published as the composition of Carl von Gilfert, the critics of London and Dublin united in the most unbounded praise of this piece, which, it was confidently asserted, must be Italian, as it was marked by all the peculiar excellences of that style of music.

Philips kept his secret for a while, but was never forgiven after he had confessed the trick.

1837. AMENDING HANDEL'S MUSIC.

Charles Dibdin, in one of his entertainments, used to relate a laughable story of some Cornishmen, whom he met as he was travelling to the Land's End, bearing music-books and instruments.

"Where are you going?" said Charles.

"To church, to practise our music for Sunday," was the reply.

"Whose music do you sing?" asked the poet.

"O, Handel, Handel," answered the men.

"Don't you find Handel's music rather difficult?" said Dibdin.

"Yees, it war at first, but we alter'd un, and so we does very well with un now."

This was conclusive. The Bard of the Ocean threw them a crown piece, and bade them drink the health of the author of Poor Jack.

1838. THE SULTAN'S GAUGE FOR A MUSICIAN.

A well-known pianist recently played some of his most astonishing pieces before the grand seignior.

At the conclusion of the performance, the sultan, who had been observing him with great apparent admiration, said to him,—

"I have heard Thalberg, [a low bow of the artist and a modest smile;] I have also heard Listz, [a still lower bow and devout attention;] but not one of all that have played before me perspired as much as you do."

1839. LIND'S RETORT TO LABLACHE.

On the occasion of Mademoiselle Lind's second rehearsal at the Opera House, the celebrated Lablache was so delighted with her singing, that he came up to her, and said, enthusiastically, "Give me your hand; every note in your voice is a pearl." "Give me your hat," was the reply of the fair singer; and then, putting it up to her mouth, and giving one of her incomparable roulades, "Here," said she, "is a hatful of pearls for you."

1840. PAT BLOWING THE ORGAN.

A correspondent of the Troy Budget tells the following good story: "It seems that the person who blows the bellows of the organ at St Luke's Church also attends to the furnace for warming the building; and having occasion, during the service, to 'mind the fires,' he left the bellows in charge of a man lately imported, and 'green' as the Emerald Isle of his nativity before the potato rot.

"During his absence, the Gloria in Excelsis came, in the order of exercises, to be chanted, and Patrick was directed to furnish the organic element. A short time elapsed, but no music followed the touch of the lady who presided at the instrument. 'Blow,' whispered the fair organist. 'Blow,' repeated the leader; and 'Blow, blast you, blow,' echoed the entire choir; but not a puff found its way into the vacant pipes, to wake the slumbering harmony.

"An investigation took place, and Patrick was found behind the organ, with both his hands tightly clinched around the bellows handle,—a stick of some five feet long and two inches thick,—the end stuck in his mouth, his cheeks swelled to the utmost expansion, his eyes distended, and the perspiration streaming from his face, engaged in the vigorous but vain attempt to force his breath through the pores of the wood into the body of the instrument.

"It is, perhaps, unnecessary to say that some little time passed before the choir were able to scrow up their mouths into that serious pucker requisite to the proper performance of the musical exercises."

1841. A PUZZLE FOR PHRENOLOGISTS.

A Paris paper contains a curious account of the musical capacity exhibited by an old woman of sixty, who had, from an early age, been an inmate of Salpêtrière—a receptacle for lunatics. A young actress of one of the minor theatres of Paris, having become an inmate of the asylum, was impressed with the idea that she was representing some character, and sung, danced, and recited by turns. One day the old woman, upon hearing the actress sing, beat time with wonderful precision, and appeared highly delighted. The moment she heard an air, she was able to retain it, and could hum it over when asked, although she could not speak; and what is still more extraordinary, an individual having sung over an air, which he had composed off hand, she caught it instantly and repented it. An air having been played to her upon the piano, she seemed quite enraptured, and appeared to appreciate the most striking passages with the taste of a finished musician.

The head of this woman is said to puzzle the phrenologists; for, so far from having the organ of music strongly marked, she is totally destitute of it.

a proof of the general principle from the analogy between colors and sounds.

1842. MUSICAL MIMICRY.

It is related of a gentleman who resided in London some years ago, that he possessed such extraordinary musical talents, that he could play upon two violins at one time, and imitate the French horn, clarinet, organ, and trumpets, in so astonishing a manner as to make them appear a whole band, with the sound of different people singing at the same time. The pieces of music which he played were principally from Handel's oratorios. His imitative faculty was not confined to musical instruments. He could imitate a carpenter sawing and planing wood, the mail coach horn, a clap of thunder, a fly buzzing about a window, a flock of sheep with dogs after them, a sky-rocket going off, the tearing of a piece of cloth, the bagpipes, and the hurdy-gurdy. He generally finished his performance with the representation of beating a dog out of the room, which was accounted the most difficult, and, at the same time, the most natural imitation of all.

Sir Isaac Newton.

1843. MUSICAL INFANT.

In 1788, a musical prodigy of the name of Sophia Hoffman attracted the notice of the scientific and the curious. This child, when only nine months old, discovered so violent an attachment to musical sounds, that if taken out of a room where any person was playing on an instrument, it was frequently impossible to appease her but by bringing her back. The nearer she was carried to the performer, the more delighted she appeared, and would often clap her little hands together in accurate time. Her father, who was a musician, cultivated her infantine genius so successfully, that when she was a year and three quarters old, she could play a march, a lesson, and two or three songs, with tolerable correctness; and, when two years and a half old, she could play several tunes. If she ever struck a wrong note, she did not suffer it to pass, but immediately corrected herself.

From a number of experiments made on a ray of light with the prism, he found that the primary colors occupied spaces exactly corresponding with those intervals which constitute the octave in the division of a musical chord; and hence he has obviously shown the affinity between the harmony of colors and musical sounds.

Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, Mason, and other eminent poets, all seem to favor the Pythagorean system. The first of these, whose vast mind grasped the whole creation, with its internal mechanism, at once, thus happily alludes to the subject in his play of the Merchant of Venice:—

"There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st,
But in his motion like an angel sing's;
Still choiring to the young-eyed cherubims;
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it."

1844. THE MUSIC OF THE SPHERES.

The imaginary music of the spheres is a doctrine of great antiquity, since we find allusion to it in the Holy Scriptures. Job, chapter 38, speaks of the creation, "when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy."

Among the ancient writers, this was a favorite subject of philosophical inquiry. Pythagoras and Plato were of opinion that the Muses constituted the soul of the planets in our system; and the disciples of both these celebrated philosophers supposed the universe to be formed on the principles of harmony. The Pythagoreans maintained an opinion, which many of the poets have adopted, that music is produced by the motion of the spheres in their several orbits; that the names of sounds, in all probability, were derived from the seven stars.

Pythagoras says that the whole world is made according to musical proportion. Plato asserts that the soul of the world is conjoined with musical proportion.

Sir Isaac Newton was of opinion that the principles of harmony pervade the universe, and gives 1845. JEAN BAPTISTE AND HIS CHILDREN.

Jean Baptiste Raisin, a native of Troyes, in the province of Champagne, and by profession an organist, was burdened with a numerous family, besides a coquetish, extravagant wife, whose want of economy had brought him into distressed circumstances, though himself prudent and economical, and possessing considerable ability in his art.

Necessity sharpening his industry, he carefully instructed his children in music. Among the number was one who showed remarkable aptness and capacity; it was the youngest—a boy, whom, at the early age of three years, he taught to touch the harpsichord; and the tiny performer made a very rapid progress within a few months.

Astonished at the application and success of young Raisin, his father now conceived the project of giving a different complexion to his future fortune. He built his chief hopes on that child; nor was he disappointed in his expectations. The organist first contrived a spinet of novel construction; it was furnished with three sets of keys, was about three feet in length, and fifty-two inches in breadth. The belly was double the usual size, for a reason which will appear in the sequel of the story.

When the artiste had completed his contrivance, he quitted his native place, and repaired to Paris with his wife and children, having taken good care not to forget his newly-invented spinet. Having presented himself at the office of the police, he declared his intention of giving to the public a most curious and extraordinary exhibition, and readily obtained permission to perform at the fair of St. Germain.

To fix the attention of a fickle public, it frequently becomes necessary to call in the aid of the marvellous. Jean Baptiste printed and circulated handbills, in which he promised that his wonderful instrument should, on his pronouncing certain words, play any tunes that were called for.

His first exhibition attracted an audience so numerous as far to surpass the most sanguine expectations of the musician. His second was still more encouraging; and his astonishing spinet was considered as a prodigy of mechanism. Its fame rapidly spread through the extensive capital, and people eagerly flocked from all quarters, to hear, admire, and applaud. In the first place, the eldest of Raisin's children, a boy not exceeding the age of five years and a half, sat down with his sister Babet, and his father, each to his own range of keys, and the three musicians together played a concert in the presence of the public. When the piece was finished, they raised their hands above their heads, when another row of keys, moving without hands, repeated the whole symphony from beginning to end, and with a degree of correctness and melody which astonished and delighted the audience.

The better to deceive his auditors, the cunning and ingenious organist had recourse to a most excellent stratagem, which deceived the most knowing among them, and puzzled the very best instrument makers in the whole city. After the prelude above described, he pretended to wind up his famous instrument, which he did by turning a denticulated wheel, that made a most dreadful and discordant noise. He appeared to labor very hard at the winch; and the late pleasure of the company was succeeded by sensations of a terrific kind; for the sounds produced by this manœuvre were so grating and frightful that one would have suspected a chorus of demons to lie concealed in his magical spinet.

"Pooh!" said many persons present. "there's no such mighty conjuration in the business; 'tis only a simple, foolish contrivance; nothing more than a barrel organ, with some weights or springs to turn the barrel."

Such was the very idea which the organist wished to encourage, and in which he triumphed. For, suddenly calling away his two children from the instrument, and addressing it in an authoritative tone, "Spinet," he cried, "play such a tune;" when immediately the obedient spinet paid punctual attention to his command, and performed the piece that had been called for. Again he said, "Spinet, be silent;" and the spinet ceased to play. "Spinet, go on;" and the spinet began anew. "Spinet, give us a light flourish;" and the spinet poured forth frolic sounds of sportive melody, which wafted delight and rapture to the hearts of all the audience.

Naturally struck with just surprise, and no less delighted, the company alternately stared at the instrument and at each other, exclaiming, "Astonishing! The fellow must certainly be a magician."

Although the supposed magician understood as little of the black art as any one of his auditors, he collected, in less than five weeks, above twenty thousand crowns, which now enabled him to live in comfort, and compensated the poverty and distress which he had before suffered.

Meantime, the fame of the magical spinet, and of its contriver, hourly increased, till at length it reached the ears of the reigning monarch, who wished to see the organist and his instrument, and to regale the queen and the whole court with a specimen of his performance. The musician accordingly repaired to Versailles, resolved to exert every effort to support his lately-acquired reputation. Military marches, tender airs, complex pieces, of the best composers, were well executed by the two children, but still more excellently by the invisible performer.

But the organist, too punctually observant of his usual trick, and not reflecting that, on a change of scene, he ought also to have changed his plan, took care, as usual, to set his great wheel in motion. The hideous noise with which it filled the royal apartments was so dreadfully grating to the delicate ears of her majesty and the attending ladies, that they shuddered at the din. The queen in particular, more affected than the others, immediately ordered him to open the instrument, and discover what it contained.

The disconcerted musician at first declined obeying, under pretence that he had lost the key. "Well," said the king, "can't somebody break it open?" Hereupon, Raisin, seized with terror, stammered out some apology, but was forced to comply with the royal will.

When the interior of the spinet was exposed to view, how great was the astonishment of all present to behold a little puppet concealed in the hollow of the instrument, and seated before a row of keys contrived inside! This discovery explained the mystery of this magical performance, which had tortured the sagacity of so many persons in vain attempts to account for it.

The poor little prisoner was speedily released from his confinement, where he was, by this time, nearly suffocated, having remained much longer shut up than usual in that close box, where the air had no circulation. He was, moreover, quite terrified by the adventure, and ready to faint with terror; but he was gradually revived by the application of the ladies' smelling bottles.

When the young musician had perfectly recovered from the effects of his confinement and fright, he singly performed for the entertainment of their majesties and the court. While his eldest brother beat time, he touched the keys, and played to the entire satisfaction of all present. He was loaded with well-merited encomiums; and such a shower of sweetmeats and louis d'ors was poured around him that he and his father were together scarcely able to pick them up.

Finding that the discovery of his secret had not produced an effect so adverse to the success of his project as he had apprehended, the organist conceived new hopes of yet being able to gain a few more thousands of crowns by means of his little performer and his spinet. He therefore made his appearance again at the fair of St. Germain in the following year; he distributed new handbills, in which he set forth the brilliant success which he had experienced at court, and concluded by promising a disclosure of his secret.

He accordingly made the disclosure, amid the reiterated applause of the public, whose admiration was equally excited by the ingenious industry of the father, and by the extraordinary talents of the children. With unsatisfied curiosity every eye gazed on the youthful performers, but more particularly on the youngest, who, though scarcely exceeding in dimensions a large-sized doll, executed pieces of music as elegant as difficult. The ladies fondled and caressed him; and each mother wished to possess a child so pretty and engaging, and who already displayed such talents and abilities at so tender an age.

In many cases drinking increases thirst; the thirst for money, in vulgar souls, is inflamed by the acquisition; and they seldom are satisfied. Such was the temper of Jean Baptiste Raisin. He now had it in his power to rear his family with decency, and to place himself in a respectable situation, to pass the remainder of his life in comfort and ease, since he was already possessed of above a hundred thousand livres, which his youngest child had enabled him to acquire in less than fifteen months. But he knew not how to set bounds to his avaricious desires, and suffered himself to be urged on by the lust of accumulation.

Founding his greedy calculations on the avidity of mankind in general for pleasure and amusement, and daily discovering in his children an increasing aptitude, correspondent to the culture which he bestowed on them, the organist felt no shame or scruple to convert them into a company of actors. They soon became qualified for that new profession, and the youngest particularly distinguished himself in it as much as he had already done in music.

Among the pieces which the young company performed, there was one which afforded considerable diversion to the mob, by whom it was very much admired. It was a kind of farce, called the Live Pudding. The youngest of the organist's children, who acted the chief part in it, played such a number of laughable tricks, that the crowd burned with insatiable curiosity to see and hear him.

The little comedian was slim and supple as an eel, which circumstance suggested to his ingenious father the extraordinary idea of encasing him, from head to foot, in a sheath of light black silk, and giving him the shape and appearance of a large black pudding, which was served up in a dish at a feast that took place about the conclusion of the third act. The other performers, seated round the table, showed themselves well provided with a good appetite, and heartily did honor to the banquet. After having plentifully eaten of the other dishes, one of the party attacked the black pudding, cut off several slices from one end, and helped the rest of the company.

After the preliminaries, another of the party proposed to cut the pudding into halves; which proposition being immediately approved by all present, he set his knife on the middle of it, when, lo! a miracle was performed: the pudding uttered a shrill, piercing shriek; the feasters turned pale, trembled, and stared at each other with every demonstration of astonishment. While they sat thus amazed, the pudding began to move, rolling itself over the plates and dishes, fell to the ground, and was converted into a young suckling pig, which ran up and down the stage, biting the legs of every person who came in its way.

"Egad, gentlemen," cries one of the company, trembling all the while, "we are no better than ar-rant fools and cowards. After all, 'tis only a little pig. We have nothing to do but to attack him, and put him on the spit; he will make a nice savory morsel. Let us roast and eat him."

So saying, he advanced one step, and recoiled two. He advanced again; but, at the moment when he was stooping and stretching out his hand to catch the pigling by the tail, a new metamorphose took place: the pigling was transformed into a little devil, whose countenance was black and hideous, and whose head was ornamented with a large pair of horns. At his side he wore a cutlass, which he suddenly drew from the scabbard, and, running about the stage, inflicted repeated blows on the black pudding eaters, who, seized with horror, tumbled all together in a heap, begging ten thousand pardons of the little devil.

On a certain occasion, one of the young actors, exceeding the part allotted to him, concealed under his coat a very sharp iron skewer, which he suddenly drew forth at the moment when he was pursued by the little devil, and, putting himself into a posture of defence, made several violent thrusts at him. But the comedy was now converted into tragedy: for, in the violence of his action, he twice plunged the skewer into the body of his opponent, and mortally wounded him.

"O," cried the poor little sufferer, "I am undone." He was instantly carried off: every possible assistance was procured for him; but, alas! every effort to save him proved ineffectual. He died the next morning; and his last words were, "I am not angry with him; he did not intend to hurt me; but, O, what will become of my poor sister?" Here his voice failed him; and that extraordinary child expired in the sixth year of his age, deservedly admired and beloved by all who knew him.

Nor was this the whole of the calamity; for, at the moment when the sad accident happened, his sister, seeing her brother fall mortally wounded, received so violent a shock that she immediately fainted away. On recovering her senses, the affectionate child abandoned herself to lamentations and tears; her grief would admit no consolation; she incessantly repeated her brother's name. By degrees her intellect was impaired, and she died delirious at the age of thirteen years and a half.

A modern traveller in Germany gives an amusing account of the manner in which grain is threshed there—a business to be expert in which, one would think, must require a master for instruction as much as any other art or accomplishment. It is not unusual for pedagogues, in threshing idle urchins, to lay on the blows in a regular crescendo, running up through all the gradations to the loftiest staccato, but we never heard of musical harmony being introduced into grain-threshing before. Yet, after all, what is the story of Amphion building Thebes by the shakes of his hurdy-gurdy but an allegorical illustration of the same benefit of lightening labor by music?

But to our extract. "The Germans," says the writer, "thresh with a perfect regard to time, in all the alternations of triple and common measure, making the transition from one to the other with the greatest exactness. There are sometimes no fewer than seven or eight flails in concert: when it is a simple quarter, and one of the performers happens to drop out, which is frequently the case, the transition is immediately, and without the least interruption, into triplets. Occasionally the effect is graced by some very delicate gradations of forte and piano, rallentando, crescendo, morendo, accelerando, and the whole executed with as much precision as if a note-book lay before each. When the piano is to be particularly delicate, the tips of the flails are used, which affords an opportunity of combining grace with dexterity; it is then the merest, scarcely audible tap, and costs the least possible effort. Then comes the crescendo, swelling into a tremendous barn-echoing staccato—down-right threshing, in fact; and what I particularly wish to enforce upon the farmer,—the flail, the whole movement, is never raised higher than the head, which I could not help especially taking a note of, for the good of our practical agriculturists, when I recollect how much unnecessary brawn is expended on our threshing floors to no purpose. Thus we see his genius for music never forsakes the German in any situation or occupation of life; it follows him into his commonest employments; and no doubt is to his advantage, on the principle of studio fallere laborem, in making it in all similar exertions an arithmetical operation."

1847. EXTREME SUSCEPTIBILITY.

A very singular and melancholy circumstance occurred at Paris, at the general rehearsal of Persiani's opera, Inez de Castro. The day before its performance, Madame Mattei, a young singer to whom one of the principal parts had been allotted, having made some trifling mistake in one of the pieces, had a nervous attack of so violent a description that she was struck totally blind. Her place was immediately supplied by Madame Albertazzi. "We do not believe," says the Quotidienne, "that there has been a similar instance of such deplorable susceptibility on the part of an artist, and we know nothing but the suicide of Vatel to which it can be compared." Vatel was the celebrated cook of Louis XIV., who shot himself on the day of a great banquet, on account of being disappointed in his supplies of fish, which arrived half an hour after.

We have heard of something approaching to it in the case of a distinguished young performer in an opera band, in London, who, in accompanying Catalani at a rehearsal, struck a false note, and received from that queen of song a look which made him drop from his seat in a fit, from which he was with some difficulty recovered.

1848. THE ITALIAN'S SUPERIORITY OVER THE FRENCH.

In proof that the Italians are more susceptible of the passions than the French, and by consequence express them more strongly in music, the French author of a Parallèle des Italiens et des François, en ce qui regarde la Musique, refers to a symphony in a performance at the Oratory of St. Jerome at Rome, on St. Martin's day, in 1697, upon these two words—mille saette. The air, he says, consisted of disjointed notes, like those in a jig, which gave the soul a lively impression of an arrow, and that wrought so effectually upon the imagination that every violin appeared to be a bow, and their bows like so many flying arrows darting their pointed heads upon every part of the symphony.

1849. VOCAL PHENOMENON.

Says a gentleman, writing from Sicily, "We have here a vocal phenomenon, which is perhaps unprecedented. It is a girl, only eighteen years old, gifted with a bass voice, which for extent and power rivals that of Lablache. Her name is Clorinda Senganelli. When she made her début at the opera of Messina, in the part of Orovisto, in Bellini's Norma, she was received with great favor. Her success is, however, solely ascribed to the extraordinary nature of her voice, for the method of singing is as yet very imperfect. Mlle. Senganelli, who was born in the village of Galbi, near Syracuse, may be termed a rustic beauty: she is tall and broad-shouldered, and her features, with her large black eyes, and long and thick hair of the same hue, denote a masculine and energetic temper."

1850. THE BLIND MUSICIAN.

James Watson, a native of Dundee, in Scotland, lost his sight by the small-pox when five years of age. About thirteen he was admitted into the Asylum for the Blind, at Edinburgh, where he soon distinguished himself by his knowledge of mechanics, and the improvements which he was able to make upon any piece of machinery submitted to him. He also showed a talent for music, which, however, from the necessity of gaining a livelihood by the labor of his hands, he was unable to cultivate for some time.

He played on the violin and violoncello at the same time. The stops, says the relater of this anecdote, by which he shortens the strings of his violoncello, have been fitted with more elegance and precision, additional springs having been added, to assist and relieve his leg in the operation of bowing; and the bow has been fastened to his foot by new machinery, which insures more powerful and steady execution. Indeed, the whole of this machinery is now so constructed, that he can play both instruments for a very great length of time, without more fatigue than if he played only upon one. Nor is this all; for, by the very nice and accurate application of mechanism, wholly invented by himself, he can perform upon two violoncellos at the same time; and the one upon which he plays the principal strain is so contrived as to have the power and tone of two played by different performers; so that he may be said to play three violoncellos—the principal strain upon two, and the bass upon a third. Nor is this compass limited, for the instrument upon which he plays the principal has a range of sixty-four semitones, and more could be added if necessary. Mr. Watson is now in London, (1821,) with the view of exhibiting his wonderful inventions.

1851. FRANCESCA MARGARITA DE L'EPINE.

From the days of Orpheus down to those of Ole Bull, an incessant line of musical prodigies has continued to flourish from time to time. Many of these may have been somewhat overrated; but from the wonders we constantly see achieved by modern artistes, we are warned against falling into the vulgar error of doubting what we are not able to comprehend. From the great fame-roll of musical excellence, a few remarkable instances shall be selected, some of which may not be familiar to general readers.

The first Italian lady singer who ever appeared in England was Francesca Margarita de l'Epine, who went there with a German musician, named Greber, in 1692, when she announced a musical entertainment, to be given by "the Italian lady so famous for her singing," at the Yorkshire buildings. In some of the squibs of the day, she was called "Greber's Peg." She sang in Italian operas, and concerts, (Italian,) as well as other musical entertainments, until the year 1718, when she retired, and married the celebrated Dr. Pepesch. She was an admirable player on the harpsichord, as well as an accomplished singer, but, unfortunately, so swarthy and ill favored that her husband used to call her Hecate, to which she answered with perfect good humor. Nor did the plainness of De l'Epine prevent her from enjoying the uninterrupted favor of the public. She brought her husband a fortune of ten thousand pounds, which, relieving him from the daily cares and toils of his profession, enabled him to follow his favorite pursuit of learned researches into the history and antiquities of his art.

1852. THE PRINCE OF DRUMMERS.

Jan Henri, the famous tambour major of the Emperor Napoleon, exhibited his extraordinary talents at the London Lyceum Theatre, about twenty years since. Avoiding the noisy and monotonous sound of the drum, he raised the exercise of beating it to a musical art, by playing at one time on fifteen surrounding and different toned drums, in a soft and harmonious style, forming in effect a novel and complete instrument. He accompanied a full military band, and went through several such extraordinary evolutions as to astonish the audience, particularly in beating one rapid march. Among other unprecedented feats, he caused twenty-eight drumsticks to fly in the air in all directions, catching them in a peculiar manner under his arms and between his legs. Playing on his various drums, he passed from one to the other with such amazing rapidity, that the eyes of the spectators could scarcely follow the motion of his body and hands, and were left to wonder how the very novel effect was produced.

1853. THE BRAVEST SOLDIER.

Frederic the Great, after a very terrible engagement, asked his officers, "Who behaved most intrepidly during the contest?" The preference was unanimously given to himself. "You are mistaken," replied the king: "the boldest fellow was a fifer, whom I passed twenty times during the engagement, and he did not cease or vary a note the whole time."

1854. THE INVALID'S DREAM.

A daughter of Sir George Mackenzie, who died at an early age, was endowed with a remarkable genius for music, and was an accomplished organist. This young lady dreamed, during an illness, that she was at a party, where she had heard a new piece of music, which made so great an impression on her by its novelty and beauty, that, on awaking, she besought her attendants to bring her some paper, that she might write it down before she had forgotten it—an indulgence which, apprehensive of excitement, her medical attendant unfortunately forbade; for, apart from the additional psychological interest that would have been attached to the fact, the effects of compliance would probably have been soothing rather than otherwise. About ten days afterwards, she had a second dream, wherein she found herself at a party, where she described on the desk of a piano-forte, in a corner of a room, an open book, in which, with astonished delight, she recognized the same piece of music, which she immediately proceeded to play, and then awoke. The piece was not of a short or fugitive character, but in the style of an overture.

1855. PRISONERS AT OLMUTZ.

When the Marquis de la Fayette and several general officers quitted the French army, then in insurrection, after the famous 10th of August, they were seized by the King of Prussia; from him transferred to the custody of Austria, and long confined in the Castle of Olmutz. To the honor of Madame de la Fayette, she desired and obtained leave to share the captivity of her husband; but other wives were less fortunate.

To maintain some intercourse with his family, M. de Pusy, one of the imprisoned party, concealed a toothpick, and mingling his spittle (and often his tears) with soot, he contrived to write in the blank pages and margin of some pious works, which he hired from a bookseller in the town, such information as he desired should reach his wife. That the bookseller had weighty reasons for tolerating the destruction of his treatises, need not be doubted.

But a much more remarkable circumstance attended this imprisonment, and which displays a singular instance of ingenuity. Although each of the prisoners was kept solitary, yet their apartments were so constructed, that they were within hearing of each other, when standing at the windows of their respective chambers. To improve this advantage, they thought of the following plan: There is at Paris a number of tunes, called airs of the Pont Neuf, or those popular ballads that were sung at corners of the streets, and at other public places. The words belonging to these airs were so well known, that to strike up a few of the notes was to recall to memory the words that accompanied them. The captives at Olmutz gradually composed for themselves a vocal vocabulary, by whistling these notes at their windows; and this vocabulary, after a short time, became so complete, and even rich, that two or three notes from each air formed their alphabet, and effected their intercourse. By this means they communicated news to each other concerning their families, the progress of the war, &c.; and when, by good fortune, one of them had procured a gazette, he whistled the contents of it to his partners in suffering.

The commander of the fortress was constantly informed of those unaccountable concerts. He listened, he set spies; but the whole being a language of convention, the most practised musician would have failed in detecting the intention and real expression of the notes he heard. In vain was whistling prohibited. At length the Austrian, weary of conjecture, interposed no further to prevent what he could not comprehend.

1856. CONCERT OF SWINE.

The Abbot of Baigne, a man of wit, and skilled in the construction of new musical instruments, was ordered by Louis XI., King of France, more in jest than in earnest, to procure him a concert of swine's voices. The abbot said that the thing could doubtless be done, but that it would take a good deal of money. The king ordered that he should have whatever he required for the purpose. "The abbot," says Bayle, "then wrought a thing as singular as ever was seen; for out of a great number of hogs of several ages, which he got together, and placed under a tent or pavilion, covered with velvet, before which he had a table of wood painted, with a certain number of keys, he made an organical instrument, and as he played upon the said keys with little spikes, which pricked the hogs, he made them cry in such order and consonance that he highly delighted the king and all his company."

1857. THE CLERGYMAN AND 'MAGGY LAUDER.'

Mr. Combe, describing the functions of the organ of tune, mentions a curious case of a morbid excitement of that organ in a pious and exemplary clergyman, who resided near Edinburgh, and who was fond of music. One Sunday morning he awoke, and began to hum the tune of Maggy Lauder. He recollected that it was on the Sabbath, and endeavored to turn his thoughts into a graver channel. This, however, was very difficult, as the tune of Maggy Lauder was still uppermost in his mind. It haunted him through the forenoon, and during his services in the church he was often tempted to break off from his serious and important duties, and sing Maggy Lauder. After the services were closed, he adopted the only remedy for the disease which his reason suggested. He took a walk to a secluded and lonely spot on his estate, and indulged the instinctive feeling which he so strongly experienced. He sang Maggy Lauder at the top of his voice, till the fields rang again, returned home, and was no longer troubled by a morbid excitement of the organ of tune.

1858. IMITATIONS.

Imitations, by musical notes, of certain effects in nature have been carried, by various composers, to a most extravagant and ridiculous extent. Froberger, organist to the Emperor Ferdinand III., is said to have represented the passage of Count Thum over the Rhine. Kuhnau, a musician of celebrity, composed six sonatas, in which he attempted to give a lively picture of David combating Goliath. Buxtehude, of Luba, composed a suite of lessons descriptive of the motions of the planets. Vivaldi, in his Concentus, strove to depict the four seasons. Geminiani translated a whole episode of Jerusalemme liberata into musical notes! Handel, in his Israel in Egypt, affected to represent the sun standing still, and Haydn, in his Creation, has imitated light with sound, in order, it is presumed, to inform the blind what light really is. Can human folly or absurdity go beyond this? Winter, in his opera of Tamerlane, describes by notes the entry of Tamerlane into Adrianople, with such wonderful effect, that some of his enthusiastic admirers insisted that it was impossible to listen to it and not fancy we are spectators of the triumph of the Tartar!

All these efforts, however, sink into insignificance before the master effort of "the great violinist" (Ole Bull) to express, by musical sounds, not only the appalling external effects of Niagara Falls, but also, if we comprehend the programme correctly, the effect of this sublime scene upon the feelings of the performer. After this, we no longer dare question the virtues of Orpheus, Amphion, and other musical marvels.

Perhaps the first attempt in this country to describe, by musical instruments, the wonders of nature, as well as the workings of human passion, was made in the city of New York many years since. A complete band was imported from England, some fifty years ago, for the old theatre in New York, from which great anticipations were formed. In order to give the public a taste of their talents, as well as to repay themselves a part of their voyage expenses, a grand concert was announced, in the course of which was promised "a vivid representation," by music, of "preparations for a voyage, parting from friends, leaving home, a storm, a calm, escape from danger, safe arrival, welcome to America," &c., &c. Of this large promise, so little was performed, that utter disappointment and angry disgust exhibited themselves boldly before half the failure had been yawned over.

A late able critic writes, "All attempts at improving music by the gross imitation of material objects have been failures, from the piping nightingale of the stage to the idea of Napoleon's band-master, of a discharge of cannon for a military fortissimo."

1859. A CONCERT WITH GREAT BELLS AND CANNON.

The French leaders of the grand orchestra had long urged the introduction of bells and ordnance, in order to complete certain grand musical effects, and, on the occasion of inaugurating the Cassino at Ghent in 1835, the experiment was made on a grand scale, and with perfect success. Among other performances, a song of the fifteenth century, found in manuscript in the library at Cambrai, and attributed to the composer Ghrarkin de Hiondt, was given as an introduction to a triumphal march, with accompaniments of the chimes and great bells of the church, and the explosions of real cannon.

1860. FRANKLIN AND LEIGH HUNT'S MOTHER.

Leigh Hunt, in his autobiography, tells the following anecdote of Franklin, which shows him to have been a far different person than we should suppose by the staid look and sober dress of his portraits. "My mother had no accomplishments but the two best of all—a love of nature and of books. Dr. Franklin offered to teach her the guitar; but she was too bashful to become his pupil. She regretted this afterwards, possibly from having missed so illustrious a master. Her first child, who died, was named after him."

1861. FRANKLIN'S HARMONICA.

It is said that when Dr. Franklin invented the harmonica, he concealed it from his wife till the instrument was fit to play, and then awoke her with it one night, when she took it for the music of the angels.

1862. REMARKABLE ORGAN.

A correspondent of the New York Observer says, in one of his letters, that the famous organ at Freyburg, in Switzerland, has seven thousand three hundred pipes, some of them thirty-five feet long, and sixty-four stops. It is an instrument of tremendous power, and though the traveller is compelled to pay eleven francs to hear it on a week day, it is worth the money. At first, one imagines a trick is played upon him, and that a full orchestra accompanies the organ. The mellow tones melt in and float away with the heavier notes, as if a band of musicians were playing out of sight. Many refuse to believe it is not a deception till they go up and examine every part of the instrument. The effect is perfectly bewildering. There is the trombone, the clarinet, the flute, the fife, and ever and anon the clear ringing note of the trumpet. The performance is closed with an imitation of a thunder storm, in which the wonderful power of the instrument is fully tested. At first, you hear the low, distant growl swelling up, and then slowly dying away. The next peal breaks on the ear with a more distinct and threatening sound. Nearer and nearer rolls up the thunder cloud, sending its quick and heavy discharges through the atmosphere, till clap follows clap with stunning rapidity, rolling and crashing through the building till its solid arches tremble as if the real thunders of heaven were bursting overhead. Who could have dreamed that a single instrument possessed so much power?

1863. EXTRAORDINARY MUSICAL MECHANISM.

A beautiful clock was constructed by M. Droy, an ingenious mechanic of Geneva, in Switzerland, capable of the following surprising movements: There were seen on it a negro, a dog, and a shepherd. When the clock struck, the shepherd played six tunes on his flute; and the dog, as if delighted with the music, jumped up and fawned upon him. This musical machine was exhibited to the King of Spain, who was greatly struck with its wonderful powers.

"The playful gentleness of my dog," said Droy, "is his least merit; if your majesty will be pleased to touch one of the apples which are in the shepherd's basket, you will admire his fidelity."

The king took an apple, and the dog, in a musical tone, barked so loud, that the king's dog began also to bark. At this, the attendant courtiers, not doubting that the whole was a musical witchcraft, immediately left the room, devoutly crossing themselves as they went out.

Ingenuous as this machine undoubtedly was, it has been fully equalled by Maelzel, well remembered for his extraordinary skill in musical mechanics particularly. Not many years since, in 1809 or '10, he exhibited a masterpiece of art. From a tent Mr. Maelzel led out a fine, manly, martial figure, in the uniform of an Austrian dragoon trumpeter, with his instrument to his mouth; the figure, being pressed on his shoulder, played not only the Austrian cavalry march, and the different signals for the manœuvres of the army, but also a march and an allegro, which was accompanied by the whole orchestra. After this, the dress of the figure was completely changed into that of a French trumpeter of the guard. It then began to play the French cavalry march, with the signals for cavalry manœuvres, and lastly a march of Dussck's, and an allegro of Pleyel, also accompanied by a full orchestra.

This figure produced a clear and perfect tone, and only required to be wound up twice during the programme; and this was effected on the left hip. This very curious figure was exhibited in various cities of the United States, and is by many well remembered.

Some years previous, the same mechanist constructed an instrument, which, by the descent of a weight, attached to a revolving wheel, performed a variety of Turkish compositions, and comprised within itself all the powers of a complete military band. It was purchased by an Hungarian nobleman for three thousand guineas; and in 1806, he produced an improvement on his original plan, in the panharmonicon, which produced the large sum of five thousand dollars.

1864. DRYING WOOD FOR VIOLINS.

Some amusing instances are related of the efficiency of "the application of heated currents to manufacturing and other purposes," lately patented by Davison and Symington. Thus a violin had been in the owner's possession for upwards of sixteen years; how old it was when he first had it is not known. Upon being exposed to this process, it lost in eight hours no less than five sixths (nearly five and two thirds) per cent. of its weight. This, there is every reason to believe, was owing to the blocks glued inside, for the purpose of holding the more slender parts together. Instrument makers would do well to see that all parts, however mean their position in the instrument, are properly seasoned, or divested of moisture; for surely water cannot improve sound.

A violin maker of high reputation, having an order to make an instrument for one of the first violinists of the day, was requested to have the wood seasoned by the new process; only three days were allowed for the experiment, in which the wood was seasoned and sent home. The two heaviest pieces were reduced in weight two and one half pounds, which is equal to two pints of water.

It is ascertained that, by this means of drying, the effect of age has been given to the instrument made from the above wood; and it is now the first fiddle in the orchestra of Her Majesty's Theatre. The wood had been in the possession of its owners for eight years; and it was sent from Switzerland, in the first instance, as dry wood.

In proof of the economy of Messrs. Davison and Symington's invention applied to the manufacture and cleansing of brewers' casks, it is stated that since its adoption at Truman's brewery, Spitalfields, a saving of three hundred tons of coals has been effected annually.

1865. THE PHONOMIME.

An ingenious mechanic of Vienna, some years ago, invented a new instrument, to which he has given the name phonmime, (from the Greek phonimino, signifying to imitate the human voice.) In outward appearance, the instrument resembles a cabinet piano-forte; but the key-board is not more extensive than that of the old clavichord. The tone, which is produced by means of pipes, presents an exact similarity to the human voice—an effect which has never yet been produced so perfectly by any musical instrument.

The phonmime has four registers; bass, baritone, tenor, and soprano, or, as it may properly be demonstrated, falsetto; for the inventor has, by some ingenious contrivance, avoided any approximation to the tone of the flute or the female voice.

Every chord performed on the phonmime produces an effect similar to the harmony of sonorous male voices, and the hearer can scarcely persuade himself that he is not listening to a fine chorus executed by men. This effect may be said to be perfect when a vocal composition is performed on several phonmimes played together.

An experiment of this effect was tried in the house of a distinguished dilettante of Vienna. The instruments and performers were placed in an apartment adjoining the drawing-room in which the company were assembled. The illusion was complete. All present imagined they were listening to a chorus of excellent singers, and bestowed high praise on their fine voices and accurate execution.

1866. COLEMAN'S IMPROVED PIANO.

The readers of the Saturday Courier will remember our having described to them, a few months ago, an improvement made to the common piano by our young and respected friend and townsman, Ovid M. Coleman; which consisted in an Æolian or wind attachment, more than doubling the sweetness and effect of the plain instrument. Mr. C. subsequently placed in our hands evidence of his almost incredible success, in disposing of the right to attach them in this country, and signified his intention to visit Europe with the invention. We now find the following in the New York Republic, which, we are sure, will be read with great interest by all who take pride in the success of "our arts and sciences."

The extract is somewhat florid, but doubtless the writer is an enthusiast on the subject.

"We can give no stronger proof of the high estimate put upon this extraordinary invention than stating the remarkable price at which the patent was sold in this city. Reynolds and Clarke, of this city, bought it for the enormous sum of one hundred thousand dollars, granting, besides, a certain amount on all pianoes manufactured of this description. It may justly be inferred that the improvement is indeed a remarkable one to command such a purchase, nor is it to be doubted nor denied. There are certain jealous parties who would seek, from interested motives, to depreciate the merit of this striking demonstration of the inventor's musical genius; but the rapidly-spreading favor of this great novelty will soon triumph over all cavil or unfair comment.

"The past summer Mr. Coleman displayed the power of this marvellous instrument at his beautiful residence in Saratoga, and his house was literally run down with curious and enthusiastic visitors. The effect upon all was marked and irresistible. Many were moved to tears by the touching sweetness of its liquid tones, that seemed to come down from some heavenly sphere, rather than to be evoked by mortal hand. The constant excitement of his mind had such a pernicious effect upon the overstrained nerves of young Coleman, who was reduced to a mere shadow by his previous devotion to his musical studies, that he was compelled to fly precipitately from his home, to seek that calm and tranquillity which was necessary to preserve his life. On his arrival at London, he for a while escaped the dreadful stimulus he had undergone here; but no sooner was his piano opened than its fame spread like wildfire. We cannot forbear to notice the kind, almost paternal attentions that Coleman received at the hands of that distinguished and amiable gentleman, who, to the honor of himself and the credit of his native country, presides with such ability and ease over the vast operations of the greatest commercial house in London. Mr. Bates no sooner heard this wonderful instrument, and finding young Coleman alone and friendless in London, than he determined at once to lend his valuable aid and influence in procuring a just fame for so remarkable an invention. He had the piano that Coleman brought with him, made by Reynolds and Clarke, — and a superb one it is, — transported to his beautiful house, and invited some distinguished members of the diplomatic corps and nobility to listen to it; and the effect was, as always, to interest and enchant them.

"The pianists of the queen, Madame Duclaken and Bendick, heard it afterwards, and they went into ecstasies — into downright musical paroxysms."

1867. GUZIKOW'S NOVEL INVENTION.

Mr. Guzikow was a Polish Jew, a shepherd in the service of a nobleman. From earliest childhood, music seemed to pervade his whole being. As he tended his flocks in the loneliness of the fields, he was forever fashioning flutes and reeds from the trees that grew around him. He soon observed that the tone of the flute varied according to the wood he used. By degrees he came to know every tree by its sound; and the forests stood round him a silent oratorio.

The skill with which he played on his rustic flutes attracted attention. The nobility invited him to their houses, and he became a favorite of fortune. Men never grew weary of hearing him. But soon it was perceived that he was pouring forth the fountains of his life in song. Physicians said he must abjure the flute, or die. It was a dreadful sacrifice, for music to him was life.

His old familiarity with trees of the forest came to his aid. He took four round sticks of wood, and bound them closely together with bands of straw; across these he arranged numerous pieces of round, smooth wood, of different kinds. They were arranged irregularly to the eye, though harmoniously to the ear; for some jutted beyond the straw-bound foundation at one end, and some at the other, in and out, in apparent confusion. The whole was lashed together with twine, as men would fasten a raft. This was laid on a common table, and struck with two small ebony sticks.

Rude as the instrument appeared, Guzikow brought from it such rich and liquid melody, that it seemed to take the heart of man on its wings, and bear it aloft to the throne of God. They who have heard it describe it as far exceeding even the marvellous warblings of Paganini's violin.

The Emperor of Austria heard it, and forthwith took the Polish peasant into his own especial service. In some of the large cities he now and then gave a concert, by royal permission; and on such an occasion he was heard by a friend of the writer at Hamburg.

The countenance of the musician was very pale and haggard, and his large dark eyes wildly expressive. He covered his head, according to the custom of the Jews; but the small cap of black velvet was not to be distinguished in color from the jet black hair that fell from under it, and flowed over his shoulders in glossy, natural ringlets. He wore the costume of his people, an ample robe, that fell about him in graceful folds. From head to foot all was black as his own hair and eyes, relieved only by the burning brilliancy of a diamond on his breast. The butterflies of fashion were of course attracted by the unusual and poetic beauty of his appearance; and ringlets à la Guzikow were the order of the day.

Before this singularly gifted being stood a common wooden table, on which reposed his rude-looking invention. He touched it with the ebony sticks. At first you heard a sound as of wood; the orchestra rose higher and higher, till it drowned its voice; then, gradually subsiding, the wonderful instrument rose above other sounds, clear, warbling, like a nightingale; the orchestra rose higher, like the coming of the breeze; but above them all swelled the sweet tones of the magic instrument, rich, liquid, and strong, like a sky-lark piercing the heavens! They who heard it listened in delightful wonder, that the trocs could be made to speak thus under the touch of genius.

1868. THE STRANGE MUSICAL MACHINE.

The organ has been appropriately called "the glory of music," from the sublimity of its subject, the extent and magnificent union of vocal with instrumental power, and a strange command over the human feelings wholly unattainable by any other instrument.

The first mention of an organ is by a French writer, about the year 757, when the Eastern Emperor Constantine Cupronymus sent to Pepin, King of France, among other rich presents, a musical machine, which the French writers describe to have been composed of pipes and large tubes of tin, and to have sometimes imitated the roaring of thunder, and sometimes the warbling of a flute. A lady was so affected, on first hearing it performed upon, that she fell into a delirium, and could never afterwards be restored to her reason.

In the reign of the Emperor Julian, these instruments had become so popular, that Amianus Marcellinus complained that they occasioned the study of the sciences to be abandoned.

1860. A GREAT FIDDLE.

There was, in the time of Charles IX., at the French court, a viol so large that several boys could be placed within it, who sang the air, while the man who played upon it sang the tenor. It was often thus used at the concerts which were given to amuse Queen Margaret.

Some years since, an instrument of the fiddle kind was used at concerts in Boston, which was so large, that, to play upon it, the performer was obliged to be mounted upon a table. It obtained the name of the Grandfather of Fiddles. The French instrument would, it seems, as well deserve the appellation of Grandmother of Fiddles.

1870. THE PYTHAGOREAN LYRE.

Pythagoras considered music not only as an art to be judged of by the ear, but as a science to be reduced to mathematical maxims and relations, and nearly allied to astronomy. Tradition makes him the inventor of a musical instrument, called the octochordum Pythagoræ, or Pythagorean lyre, which, after his death, was engraved on brass, and preserved in the temple of Jupiter at Samos.

The invention of the harmonic canon or monochord—an instrument of a single string, which served for the measurement of musical intervals—has been also ascribed to him, both by ancient and modern writers.

1871. THE DIVINE HARMONICA.

Pythagoras, moreover, had much to say of the "music of the spheres." He believed that the heavenly circuits in which the planets move, dividing the ether in their course, produced tones, and that the tones must be different according to their size, velocity, and distance. That these relations were in concord,—that these tones produced the most perfect harmony,—he necessarily believed, as a consequence of his notions of the supreme perfection of the universe. The real meaning of this doctrine was, that he regarded the world as an harmonically arranged whole,—a cosmos,—in which the relations of numbers were realized. His followers took occasion to say, from this doctrine of their master, that he was the only mortal whom the gods had permitted to hear "the harmony of the spheres."

§ 189. DESTITUTION OF MUSICAL TASTE AND TALENT.

1872. POPE'S OPINION OF HANDEL.

Handel used frequently to meet Pope at the Earl of Burlington's. The poet one day asked his friend Arbuthnot, of whose knowledge in music he had a high opinion, what he really thought of Handel as a musician. Arbuthnot replied, "Conceive the highest you can of his abilities, and they are far beyond any thing you can conceive." Pope, nevertheless, declared, that Handel's finest performances gave him no more pleasure than the airs of a common ballad singer.

1875. JOHNSON'S REPLY TO BURNEY.

Although Dr. Johnson had no ear for music, yet he was sensible that to many persons it was a source of exquisite delight, and, in his opinion, all such enjoyed an additional sense. The doctor, when one day at Mrs. Thrale's, listened very attentively while Miss Thrale played upon the harpsichord. Dr. Burney, who was present, observing it, said, "I believe, sir, we shall make a musician of you at last." Johnson, with great complacency, replied, "Sir, I shall be glad to have a new sense given to me."

1873. JOHNSON, FOX, AND OTHERS.

Sir James Mackintosh.

Dr. Johnson, Fox, Pitt, Burke, and Sir James Mackintosh, had all an antipathy to music. The latter has frequently been dragged to the Italian Opera; and a more woful figure in the pit of that theatre was never seen. Richard Sharpe once proposed as a thesis for the physiological schools of Edinburgh, "What was the precise effect of music on the sensorium of Mackintosh?"

1874. DR. JOHNSON'S WISH.

Dr. Johnson was observed by a musical friend of his to be extremely inattentive at a concert, whilst a celebrated solo player was running up the divisions and subdivisions of notes upon his violin. His friend, to induce him to take greater notice of what was going on, told him how extremely difficult it was. "Difficult, do you call it, sir?" replied the doctor; "I wish it were impossible."

1876. ANY ONE CAN SING.

One of the most distinguished schoolmasters of which this country can boast is at the same time an excellent reader. Both his reading and conversation are musical—highly so; and his various and beautiful intonations might be graduated by a scale. Yet he has never learned to sing, having been early led to believe himself destitute of the necessary taste and talent.

We have seen a little girl who appeared to be as destitute of an ear for music, or a power to execute, as was this schoolmaster. Yet her parents, being determined she should sing, contrived to set her a daily example. This example, though not the most perfect, aided by the custom of singing in the day school and Sabbath school which she attended, at length wrought a change on her, and she is now, and long has been, a good singer.

A friend of ours—a plain, common-sense man—was accustomed to say, in his quaint and vulgar way, "Any one who can call hogs can sing." The remark has truth in it, even though we should admit a somewhat wide diversity in natural character. Every one can read and speak with more or less of accuracy, and of music, too: why cannot every one sing?

1877. STORY OF THEMISTOCLES.

Themistocles, the Greek, though he appears to have been without taste, or ear, in regard to music, was, nevertheless, not wholly destitute of good qualities. The law of compensation often obtains in these cases. What is lost on one side, or in regard to one particular quality, is often made up on another.

It is said that the people of Athens, on a certain occasion, took it in their heads to laugh at Themistocles, and openly revile him in the streets, because he was ignorant of the accomplishments of fashionable society. When they were through, Themistocles replied to these ignorant and thoughtless railers with the keenest asperity. "It is true," said he, "I never play upon the lute; but I know how to raise a small and inconsiderable city to greatness and glory."

1878. THE EMPEROR'S ADMONITION.

When Farinelli was at Venice, he was honored with the most marked attention from the Emperor Charles VI., but of all the favors he received from that monarch, he used to say that he valued none more than an admonition which he received from him on his style of singing. His imperial majesty condescended to tell him one day, with great mildness and affability, that his singing was, indeed, supernatural; that he neither moved nor stood still like any other mortal; but "these gigantic strides," continued his majesty, "these never-ending notes and passages, only surprise, and it is now time for you to please; you are too lavish of the gifts with which nature has endowed you. If you wish to reach the heart, you must take a more plain and simple road." These few words brought about an entire change in Farinelli's manner of singing; from this time he mixed the pathetic with the spirited, the simple with the sublime, and by these means delighted as well as astonished every hearer.

1879. HANDEL'S LABORS DURING BLINDNESS.

Handel not only continued to perform in public after he was afflicted with blindness, but to compose in private. The duet and chorus in Judas Maccabæus, "Sion now his head shall raise," were dictated to Mr. Smith by Handel, after the total privation of sight. Handel not only exhibited great intellectual ability in the composition of his duet and chorus, but manifested his power of invention, in extemporaneous flights of fancy, to be as rich and rapid a week before his decease as they had been for many years. Subsequent to his privation of sight, he was always much disturbed and agitated, whenever the affecting air in Samson, "Total Eclipse," was performed. The last oratorio at which he attended and performed was on the 6th of April, and he expired on Friday, the 13th, 1759.

1880. CHARACTER OF BEETHOVEN'S GENIUS.

One of the most celebrated of modern composers is Beethoven, whose style is decidedly different from that of Haydn. The symphonies of Haydn may be compared to little operas, formed upon natural occurrences, all within the verge of probability; those of Beethoven are romances of the wildest invention, exhibiting a supernatural agency, which powerfully affects the feelings and imagination.

The genius of Beethoven is of that character which is scarcely likely to receive justice from his contemporaries; it seems to anticipate a future age. In one comprehensive view, he surveys all that science has hitherto produced, but regards it only as the basis of that superstructure which harmony is capable of raising. He measures the talents and resources of every preceding artist, and, as it were, collects into a focus their scattered rays. In sacred music he is preëminently great. The dark tone of his mind is in unison with that solemn style which the services of the church require; and the gigantic harmony which he wields enables him to excite by sounds a terror hitherto unknown.

This sublimity is fully displayed in the "Mount of Olives." The movement which describes the march of the Roman soldiers, when they go out in search of Jesus, is remarkable for novelty and effect. The passage, "He came towards this mountain; he'll not escape our search," partakes of the solemnity of a march, yet possesses a character of activity and enterprise. The mutations of the harmony are constantly turning the course of the melody into every direction.

The last chorus may be quoted as a specimen of the true sublime. The sinfonia which introduces it, when performed in a spacious church, is a continued clash of sounds, so tremendous as to awaken the sentiment of danger in the highest degree. During the solemn enunciation of the words, "Hallelujah to the Father, and the Son of God," a succession of vivid and appalling shocks of sound proceeds from the accompaniment, the effect of which is truly electrical.

1881. DUPREZ AND THE CHORISTER.

The distinguished tenor Duprez, whilst performing at the great theatre of Nantes, was struck by a peculiarly rich and harmonious voice proceeding from the choir.

The moment the curtain fell, the artiste inquired who the singer was. A young private of diminutive size immediately answered, —

"I am he."

"My friend," said Duprez, "fame and fortune await you. Nature never intended you to remain in the choir of a provincial theatre. Your place is among the highest, and with a little study you will soon attain it. Come with me to Paris, and I will get you admitted to the Conservatoire."

"Impossible!" answered the chorister.

"Why impossible?"

"I am engaged for seven years."

"To the theatre?"

"No; to my regiment."

The young man then explained that he was corporal in one of the regiments of the line, garrisoned at Nantes, and that it was only through the favor and with the permission of his colonel that he came occasionally to sing in the theatre.

Duprez immediately sought the colonel, and obtained a congé of two years for the little corporal, who accompanied his patron to Paris, and entered the Conservatoire, where his voice, naturally rich and powerful, has been greatly improved by study and cultivation. He sung at a concert given very recently by the élite of the Parisian dilettanti, which was attended by the most celebrated artistes and composers. His success was complete. De-laurens, the young soldier, has also sung at several other assemblies, and always with great applause. There are in him all the materials for a great artiste — an incomparable vocalist; but, unfortunately, the artiste is not as yet fully formed. The vocalist needs further study and preparation, and the leave of absence will soon expire, when the little corporal will be obliged to join his regiment under penalty of being punished as a deserter.

Would it not be well to obtain his full dismissal? Soldiers, even corporals, are plenty, whilst great artistes are rare.

1882. A DAY IN JENNY'S LIFE.

Many suppose that Jenny Lind's tour in America is, and is to be, one of uninterrupted pleasure and profit; but we opine they will change their opinion when they read the following report of the experience of a single day in New York—the day previous to her leaving for this city, and after she had given away in charity to thousands of deserving objects no less than thirty thousand dollars. We extract from the Home Journal:—

But while all these sufferers were receiving her bounty, and she was settling with banks and managers for the payments,—what else was her life made up of on that day?

It was half past nine in the morning, and three servants of the hotel, and two of her own servants, had been ordered to guard her rooms till she could eat her breakfast. Well-dressed ladies cannot be stopped by servants, in this country, however, and her drawing-room was already half full of visitors, "on particular business," who had crowded past, insisting on entrance. Most of them were applicants for charities, some for autographs, some to offer acquaintance, but none, of course, with the least claim whatever on her pocket or her time. A lady friend, who was admitted by her servant, saw the onslaught of these intruders, as she rose from her breakfast, (fatigued and dispirited as she always is after the effort and nervous excitement of a concert;) and this friend was not a little astonished at her humble and submissive endurance.

First came a person who had sent a musical box for her to look at, and, "as she had kept it," he wanted the money immediately. Jenny knew nothing of it; but the maid was called, who pointed to one, which had been left mysteriously in the room, and the man was at liberty to take it away, but would not do it, of course, without remonstrance and argument. Then advanced the lady beggars, who, in so many instances, have "put the screw to her," in the same way, that, without particularizing, we must describe them as a class. To such unexamined and unexpected applications Miss Lind has usually offered twenty or thirty dollars as the shortest way to be left to herself. In almost every instance, she has had this sum returned to her, with some reproachful and disparaging remark, such as, "We did not expect this pittance from you." "We have been mistaken in your character, madam, for we had heard you were generous." "This, from Miss Lind, is too little to accept, and not worthy of you." "Excuse us—we came for a donation, not for alms"—these, and similar speeches, of which, we are assured, Jenny Lind has had one or more specimens every day of her visit to New York. With one or two such visitors, on the morning we speak of, were mingled applicants for musical employment; passionate female admirers, who had come to express their raptures to her; a dozen ladies with albums; one or two with things they had worked for her, for which, by unmistakable tokens, they expected diamond rings in return; one who had come indignantly to know why a note containing a poem had not been answered; and constant messages, meantime, from those who had professional and other authorized errands requiring answers. Letters and notes came in at the rate of one every other minute.

This sort of "audience" lasted at Miss Lind's rooms all day! To use her own expression, she was "torn in pieces;" and it was by those whom nothing would keep out. A police force would have protected her, but, while she habitually declined the calls and attentions of fashionable society, she was in constant dread of driving more humble claimants from her door. She submitted, every day, to the visits of strangers, as far as strength and her professional duties would any way endure; but as her stay in the place drew to a close, the pressure became so pertinacious and overwhelming as to exceed what may be borne by human powers of attention, human spirits and human nerves.

1883. CARISSIMI'S REPLY TO A COMPLIMENT.

Carissimi, a celebrated composer of music, being complimented for the extraordinary grace and ease of his music, answered, "Ah, questo facile quanto e difficile!"—Ah, with what difficulty is this ease acquired!

1884. PROCEEDS OF A MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

A great musical festival was given in Westminster Abbey, in 1838, when the enormous profit of five thousand pounds sterling was realized for the funds of Westminster Hospital, after deducting compensation to all performers, (except Madame Grisi, who declined receiving any.) Braham received fifty pounds, and Laporte one hundred pounds for his chorus people and assistants from the Opera House.

1885. CHARLES V. AND HIS CHOIR.

Charles V., after his abdication, often retired to an apartment near the high altar, where he sung and beat the time during the performance of *mass*s. If any of his singers sang out of time or tune, he could be overheard calling them names, as "red-headed blockhead."

He selected about fifteen friars, who were good singers, for his choir, and if one ever sang wrong, he would cry out and mark him. He would allow no singers but those of some religious order in his choir. One day a layman with a contralto voice sang a part well, but all the thanks he got for his pains was an order from Charles to leave, or to hold his tongue.

1886. COUNT FORBIN AND THE FRENCH CONSUL.

Count Forbin, in his travels, gives the following account of the manner in which he was entertained at Damietta, by the French consul, Vasili Fackre. "Good cheer," he says, "presided at his board; the breakfast was often spread on the banks of the Nile, and we quaffed the exhilarating vines of Champagne under the shade of the citron groves of the Delta. Arabian music, the identical sounds which regaled the ears of the caliphs of Bagdad, gave a zest to the entertainments of this hospitable mansion, where our slightest wishes were anticipated by a numerous train of slaves.

"The Arab musicians are always accompanied by a buffoon, who skips about, ridicules the musicians, throws himself into the most singular postures, and never fails to gratify the company."

1887. MUSICAL TASTE IN CHINA.

There are upwards of five hundred journals in China consecrated exclusively to the musical art, and almost all the considerable capitals contain two or more theatres for operas.

1888. NAPOLEON AND MUSIC.

When Napoleon was cross, he walked about with his hands behind him, humming a tune as falsely as possible, and then few dared to approach him. "If you have any thing to ask of the general," said Junot to M. Arnault one day, "I advise you not to go near him just now, for he is singing."

1889. HERSCHEL AND WAINWRIGHT.

Dr. Herschel, the celebrated astronomer, was originally brought up to his father's profession, that of a musician, and accompanied a German regiment to England, as one of the band performing on the hautboy. While acting in this humble capacity in the north of England, a new organ was built for the parish church of Halifax, by Snetzler, which was opened with an oratorio by the well-known Joah Bates. Mr. Herschel and six other persons became candidates for the organist's situation. A day was fixed on which each was to perform in rotation; when Mr. Wainwright, of Manchester, played, his finger was so rapid, that old Snetzler, the organ builder, ran about the church, exclaiming, "He run over de key like one cat; he will not give my pipes time to speak."

During Mr. Wainwright's performance, Dr. Miller, the friend of Herschel, inquired of him what chance he had of following him. "I don't know," said Herschel, "but I am sure fingers will not do." When it came to his turn, Herschel ascended the organ loft, and produced so uncommon a richness, such a volume of slow harmony, as astonished all present; and after this extemporaneous effusion, he finished with the old hundredth psalm, which he played better than his opponent. "Ay, ay," cries old Snetzler, "'tish is very goot — very goot intee. I will luf tis man; he gives my pipes room for to speak."

Herschel, being asked by what means he produced so astonishing an effect, replied, "I told you fingers would not do;" and producing two pieces of lead from his waistcoat pocket, said, "One of these I laid on the lowest key of the organ, and the other upon the octave above; and thus, by accommodating the harmony, I produced the effect of four hands, instead of two." This superiority of skill obtained Herschel the situation; but he had too many other and higher objects in view to suffer him long to retain it.

1890. DR. COOKE AND THE NOBLEMAN.

Dr. Cooke was giving lessons on the flute to a young man of a noble family. The young man was beginning to play; but, in the common impetuosity of a novice, he passed over all the rests, and therefore soon left his master far behind him. "Stop, stop, sir," said the doctor; "just take me with you."

This was a very unpleasant check to one who fancied he was "going on famously;" and it required to be more than once enforced, till at length it was necessary to argue the point, which the doctor did with his usual candor, representing the necessity of these observances. The pupil, instead of showing any sign of conviction, replied, rather coarsely, "Ay, ay, it may be necessary for you, who get your living by it, to mind these trifles, but I don't want to be so exact."

1891. ABUSE OF MUSIC.

A London critic, speaking of Thalberg's execution in instrumental performance, says, "He puts on a twenty-finger power, flies over the keys like lightning, and produces a complication of sounds which were never before heard from a single instrument, and straightway the room is in a tumult of applause. This, we have often said, and we say it again, is the abuse of music. It is the perversion of the most captivating of the arts into an exhibition of equal value to that of tight-rope dancing." So much for English criticism in matters of music.

But the abuse of a good thing is no valid objection to its use. Besides, the love of rhythm is one of the most general or universal principles of the human soul.

1892. MUSICAL AND MILITARY.

Frederic the Great was a celebrated musician, both as a composer and performer; and his productions are very numerous, having composed, for his own use only, one hundred solos on the flute, on which he played skilfully, until within a few years of his death, when, by the loss of several of his fore teeth, he was unable to practise his favorite instrument. When he was not in the field, he dedicated four hours every day to the study or practice of music. Quants, his favorite, composed three hundred concertoes for him, one of which he performed every night.

1893. CAROLAN, THE IRISH BARD.

The celebrated Irish bard Carolan, who lived towards the close of the seventeenth century, and was blind from his infancy, had, from an error in his education, at an early period of his life, contracted a fondness for spirituous liquors, which he retained even to the last stage of it. But inordinate gratifications bear their own punishment; nor was Carolan exempt from this general imposition. His physicians assured him that, unless he corrected this vicious habit, he would soon put an end to his mortal career. He obeyed with reluctance, and seriously resolved upon never tasting that forbidden, though to him delicious, cup. The town of Boyle, in the county of Roscommon, was at that time his principal place of residence. There, while under so severe a regimen, he walked, or rather wandered, about in a reverie; his usual gayety forsook him; no sallies of a lively imagination escaped him; every moment was marked by a dejection of spirit approaching to the deepest melancholy; and his harp, his favorite harp, lay in some obscure corner of his habitation, neglected and unstrung.

Passing one day by a grocer's shop in the town, our Irish Orpheus, after a six weeks' quarantine, was tempted to step in; undetermined whether he should abide by his late resolution, or whether, he should yield to the impulse which he felt at the moment. "Well, my dear friend," cried he to the young man who stood behind the counter, "you see I am a man of constancy; for six long weeks have I refrained from whiskey: was there ever so great an instance of self-denial? But a thought strikes me, and surely you will not be cruel enough to refuse one gratification which I shall earnestly solicit. Bring hither a measure of my favorite liquor, which I shall smell to, but indeed shall not taste." The lad indulged him on that condition, and no sooner did the fumes ascend to his brain than every latent spark within him was rekindled. His countenance glowed with an unusual brightness; and the soliloquy which he repeated over the cup was the effusion of a heart newly animated, and the ramblings of a genius which a Sterne would have pursued with raptures of delight. At length, to the great peril of his health, and contrary to the advice of his medical friends, he once more quaffed the forbidden draught, and renewed the brimmer, until his spirits were sufficiently exhilarated, and until his mind had fully resumed its former tone. He immediately set about composing his much-admired song, which goes by the name of Carolan's (and sometimes Stafford's) Receipt. For sprightliness of sentiment, and harmony of numbers, it stands unrivalled in the list of our best modern convivial songs. He commenced the words, and began to modulate the air, in the evening at Boyle, and before the following morning he sang and played this noble offspring of his imagination in Mr. Stafford's parlor at Elfin.

It is somewhat remarkable that Carolan, in his gayest mood, and even when his genius was most elevated by "the flowing bowl," never could compose a planxty for a Miss Brett in the county of Sligo, whose father's house he frequented, and where he always met with a reception due to his exquisite taste and mental endowments. One day, after an unsuccessful attempt to compose something in a sprightly strain for this lady, he threw aside his harp with a mixture of rage and grief, and addressing himself in Irish, of which he was a pleasing and elegant speaker, to her mother, "Mudam," said he, "I have often, from my great respect to your family, attempted a planxty, in order to celebrate your daughter's perfections, but to no purpose. Some evil genius hovers over me; there is not a string in my harp that does not vibrate a melancholy sound when I set about this task. I fear she is not doomed to remain long among us; nay," said he, emphatically, "she will not survive twelve months." The event verified the prediction, and the young lady died within the period limited by the unconsciously prophetic bard.

1894. FREDERIC THE GREAT AND HIS FLUTES.

The king's chief amusement was playing on the flute, on which he performed very well for an amateur, though, compared with the professional performers, he necessarily made rather an unkindly figure. Frederic, who was afraid of nothing else, was so much afraid of failure in his flute playing, that, whenever he had a new piece of music, he shut himself up in his closet some hours beforehand to practise it; and although no one was permitted to be present at those concerts except a very few select friends, he was always observed to be remarkably nervous at the commencement. He had a fine collection of flutes, all made by the same man, and for which he paid one hundred ducats apiece. He had an attendant, whose sole office was to keep those flutes in order. During the war, when his finances were reduced to so low an ebb that he paid bad coin to every one, he took care that his flute maker should be paid in good coin, lest for bad money he should give him bad flutes.

1895. A MUSICAL PRODIGY.

The son of Sir Gore Ouseley is said to have composed an opera at eleven years of age. He was one of the greatest musical prodigies of his time.

1896. SIR WALTER SCOTT'S LOVE FOR MUSIC.

"Pleased," says Moore, "as my illustrious friend appeared really to be when I first sung for him at Abbotsford, it was not till an evening or two after, at his own hospitable supper table, that I saw him in his true sphere of musical enjoyment. No sooner had the quagh taken its round, after our repast, than his friend, Sir Adam, was called upon, with the acclaim of the whole table, for the song of Hey tuttie tattie, and gave it out to us with all the true national relish. But it was during the chorus that Scott's delight at this festive scene chiefly showed itself. At the end of every verse, the whole company rose from their seats, and stood round the table, with arms crossed, so as to grasp the hand of the neighbor on each side. Thus interlinked, we continued to keep measure to the strain, by moving our arms up and down, all chanting vociferously, 'Hey tuttie tattie, hey tuttie tattie.' Sir Walter's enjoyment of the old Jacobite chorus, a little increased, doubtless, by seeing how I entered into the spirit of it, gave to the whole scene, I confess, a zest and charm in my eyes such as the finest musical performance could not have bestowed on it."

1897. A GOOD BARGAIN.

Mr. L., a well-known professional singer in the metropolis, one day entered a cheesemonger's shop, or grocer's shop, to make a purchase.

"Have you any more of this paper?" said he to the master, regarding with curiosity and astonishment that in which his purchase was wrapped.

"Plenty, sir; a great pile of it."

Mr. L. requested to see it, and followed the tradesman into a little back room, where many reams of waste paper were collected, to be used in his business.

"Well," said Mr. L., after inspecting the pile from whence the wrapper of his parcel had been taken, "will you sell this? what would you ask for it?"

"Twopence halfpenny per pound," answered the man, much astonished at the uncommon greenness of his customer; "you can have it as waste paper at that price, if you like."

Mr. L. readily assented, and thus purchased for a few shillings thirty-three complete oratorios and operas of Handel, besides fragments of the best, viz., Arnold's edition. Henceforth let no one despise the literature that may find its way to the trunkmaker's and chandler's, &c.

1898. VALUE OF MUSICAL EDUCATION.

Horace Walpole, writing to the Countess of Ossory, says, "Had I children, my utmost endeavors would be to breed them musicians. Considering I have no ear, nor yet thought of music, the preference seems odd; and yet it is embraced on frequent reflection. In short, madam, as my aim would be to make them happy, I think it the most probable method. It is a resource which will last their lives, unless they grow deaf; it depends on themselves, not on others; always amuses and soothes, if not consoles; and of all fashionable pleasures, it is the cheapest."

1899. A BEAUTIFUL IDEA.

"'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark
Our coming, and look brighter when we come."

In the mountains of the Tyrol, hundreds of the women and children come out when it is bedtime, and sing their national song until they hear their husbands, fathers, or brothers answer them from the hills on their return home. On the shores of the Adriatic, the wives of the fishermen come down about sunset, and sing a melody. They sing the first verse, and then listen for some time; they then sing the second verse, and listen until they hear the answer come from the fishermen, who are thus guided by the sounds to their own village.

1900. BEAUTIFUL SWISS CUSTOM.

It was formerly the usage of the Swiss peasantry to watch the setting sun, until he had left the valleys, and was sinking behind the ever snow-clad mountains, when the mountaineers would seize their horns, and sing through the instrument, "Praise the Lord." This was caught up from Alp to Alp by the descendants of Tell, and repeated until it reached the valleys below. A solemn silence then ensued, until the last trace of the sun disappeared, when the herdsman on the top sang out, "Good Night," which was repeated as before, until every one had retired to his resting-place.

The Swedish mountaineers, since the days of the great Gustavus, have been extravagantly fond of music. The female mountaineers blow on an instrument called a lar, a sort of long trumpet, sometimes twelve feet in length. Its sound is strong, and at the same time sharp, yet by no means unpleasant. When supported by one and played on by another, it presents a very odd appearance, and may be heard at a very great distance.

1901. ACADEMIC AND ARCADIAN TITLES.

THE Italians are a fanciful people, who have often mixed a grain or two of pleasantry, and even folly, with their wisdom. This fanciful character betrays itself in their architecture, in their poetry, in their extemporary comedy, and their improvisatori; but an instance not yet accounted for of this national levity appears in those denominations of exquisite absurdity given by themselves to their academies. Who could have suspected that the most eminent scholars and men of genius were associates of the Oziosi, the Fantastici, the Insensati? Why should Genoa boast of her "Sleepy," Viterbo of her "Obstinates," Sienna of her "Insipids," her "Block-heads," and her "Thunderstruck," and Naples of her "Furioso," while Macerata exults in her "Mad-men chained"? The consequence of having adopted ridiculous titles for these academies suggested to them many other characteristic fopperies. At Florence every brother of the "Umidi" assumed the name of something aquatic, or any quality pertaining to humidity. One was called "the Frozen," another "the Damp;" one was "the Pike," another "the Swan;" and Grazzini, the celebrated novelist, is known better by the cognomen of La Lasca, "the Roach," by which he whimsically designates himself among the "Humids." I find among the Insensati one man of learning taking the name of Stordito Insensato, another Tenebroso Insensato. The famous Florentine Academy of La Crusca, amidst their grave labors to sift and purify their language, threw themselves headlong into this vortex of folly. Their title, the Academy of "Bran," was a conceit to indicate their art of sifting; but it required an Italian prodigality of conceit to have induced these grave scholars to exhibit themselves in the burlesque scenery of a pantomimical academy, for their furniture consists of a mill and a bakehouse; a pulpit for the orator is a hopper, while the learned director sits on a millstone; the other seats have the forms of a miller's dossers, or great panniers, and the backs consist of the long shovels used in ovens. The table is a baker's kneading-trough, and the academician who reads has half his body thrust out of a great bolting sack, with we know not what else for their inkstands and portfolios. But the most celebrated of the Italian academies is that of the deglì Arcadia, at Rome.

The Arcadian Society derived its title from a spontaneous conceit. It first held its meetings on summer evenings, near the Tiber; for the fine climate of Italy promotes such assemblies in the open air. In the recital of an eclogue, an enthusiast, amidst all he was hearing and all he was seeing, exclaimed, "I seem at this moment to be in the Arcadia of ancient Greece, listening to the pure and simple strains of its shepherds." Enthusiasm is contagious amidst susceptible Italians, and this name, by inspiration and by acclamation, was conferred on the society! Whoever aspires to be curiosity." The Gateshead Observer says, "We take Mr. Carson to be a Doctor of Medicine; Bachelor of Arts of Trinity College, Dublin; Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland; and Chief Trumpeter to the Prince of Wales."

1911. M. D. F. R. S.

The keeper of a paltry Scotch alehouse having on his sign, after his name, the letters M. D. F. R. S., a physician, who was a fellow of the Royal Society, asked him how he presumed to affix these letters to his name. "Why, sir," said the publican, "I have as good a right to them as you have." "What do you mean, you impudent scoundrel?" replied the doctor. "I mean, sir," returned the other, "that I was Drum-Major of the Royal Scots Fusiliers."

1912. "DUN."

Some have derived this word from the French word donnez, signifying give, implying a demand of something due; and others, amongst whom is the celebrated Dr. Johnson, from the Saxon word dunon, to clamor. Both are wrong. The origin of the word is simply this: In the reign of Henry VII., a famous bailiff, named Joe Dun, lived in the town of Lincoln. This man was so extremely dexterous in his rough business, that it was usual, when a person refused to pay his debts, to say, "Why don't you DUN him?"—that is, Why don't you send DUN to arrest him? And hence the custom of calling a person who presses another for the payment of money a Dun.

1913. THE CHOICE OF A FRENCH QUEEN.

Herrera, the Spanish historian, records an anecdote in which the choice of a queen arose entirely from her name. When two French ambassadors negotiated a marriage between one of the Spanish princesses and Louis VIII., the names of the royal females were Urraca and Blanche. The former was the elder and the more beautiful, and intended by the Spanish court for the French monarch; but they resolutely preferred Blanche, observing that the name of Urraca would never do; and for the sake of a more mellifluous sound, they carried off, exulting in their own discerning ears, the happier named, but less beautiful princess.

1914. THE TERM "PURITANS."

In the days of bloody Mary, when the fires of Smithfield blazed, and the bodies of the pious Protestants of England became fuel to the flames, many fled to foreign countries to enjoy the liberty denied them at home. Some settled at Frankfort, and were allowed the use of the French church. A new liturgy was prepared, and the use of the surplice laid aside. But upon the arrival of Dr. Cox, who had also abandoned his native country, the harmony which existed was interrupted, and the responses of the English liturgy were introduced. One party agreed, and another disagreed, and that party which could not, with a good conscience, submit to the superstitious inventions and impositions of men in the worship of God, and exerted their zeal, their labors, and their influence to promote a purer reformation, obtained the appellation of Puritans, which has been retained as a distinguishing mark ever since.

1915. CAPTAIN SILK.

On it being reported, in a party of ladies, that a Captain Silk had arrived in town, they exclaimed, with one exception, "What a name for a soldier!" "The fittest name in the world," rejoined a witty female; "for silk never can be worsted."

1916. CHANGING NAMES.

In the barbarous age of Louis XI., they felt a delicacy respecting names which produced an ordinance from his majesty. The king's barber was named Oliver le Diable. At first the king allowed him to get rid of the offensive part, by changing it to Le Malin; but the improvement was not happy, and for a third time he was called Le Mauvais. Even this did not answer his purpose; and as he was a great racer, he finally had his majesty's ordinance to be called Le Dain under penalty of law if any one should call him Le Diable, Le Malin, or Le Mauvais. According to Platina, Sergius II. was the first pope who changed his name in ascending the Papal throne, because his proper name was Hog's mouth—very unsuitable to the pomp of the tiara. The ancients felt the same fastidiousness; and among the Romans, those who were called to the equestrian order, having low and vulgar names, were new named on the occasion, lest the former one should disgrace the dignity.

1917. SOPHI AND PHILOSOPHI.

The masters of olden times at Athens, and afterwards at Oxford, were called Sophi, and the scholars Sophistæ; but the masters, taking it in scorn that the scholars should have a larger name than they, called themselves Philosophi,—that is, lovers of science,—and so got the advantage of the scholars by one syllable. Every body has heard of Foote's celebrated motto for a tailor friend of his, about to sport his coat of arms—"List, list, O, list!" But every body has not heard, probably, though it is noticed in his memoir, that the learned Cambridge divine and antiquary, Dr. Cocks Macro, having applied to a Cambridge acquaintance for an appropriate motto to his coat of arms, was pithily answered with, "Cocks may crow."

1918. "BEEN TO KILL-MANY, AND GOING TO KILLMORE."

During the civil wars in Ireland, a watchword was required of every passenger, after a certain hour, with liberty for the sentinel to interrogate at will.

A poor, harmless Irishman, travelling from Killmainey to Killmore, being asked concerning his place of departure and place of destination, answered, to the astonishment of the inquirer,—

"I have been to Kill-many, and am going to Kill-more."

"That you shall not," said the sentinel, and immediately run him through with a bayonet.

1919. FATAL MISTAKE.

It is not in the work of translating the New Testament alone that there has been a great degree of negligence—to give it no worse a name—in regard to the auxiliaries shall and will. Ignorance, if not carelessness, has sometimes outdone even the Saxon translators themselves.

A Welshman one day fell into the Thames. Unable to swim, he cried out, "I will be drowned; nobody shall help me." This was the saddest misapplication of words we remember to have heard of.

1920. THE WORD "RACE."

The Arabs call their thorough-bred horses race-horses, or horses of a family or race, because they can trace their families or breeds as high as a Welsh pedigree. The imaun is at once both priest and civil magistrate, and it is equally his duty to register the birth of children and the foaling of blood mares. On the sale of one of these horses, the imaun delivers a certificate of the pedigree, carefully copied from his register, to the buyer, of which an Arab is as proud as if it were his own pedigree. As these horses of race or family were, in Europe, bred only for the course, we evidently, in preserving the French expression, cheval de race, or race-horse, gave the name of race to the course itself, being a contest between race-horses, from whence the expression became popular to denote any contest in running.

1921. WOLFE AND THE SUBALTERN.

General Wolfe, happening to overhear a young officer talk of him in a very familiar manner, as, "Wolfe and I drank a bottle of wine together," and so on, appeared, and said, "I think you might say General Wolfe." "No," replied the subaltern, with a happy presence of mind, "did you ever hear of General Achilles, or General Julius Cæsar?"

1922. A BUMPER.

When the English were good Catholics, they usually drank the pope's health in a full glass after dinner: au bon père; whence the word bumper.

1923. ORIGIN OF THE WORD "WHIG."

In the sixteenth century, there arose in England a party opposed to the king, and in favor of a republican form of government, in which the people would have a voice. This party adopted as their motto, "We Hope In God." The initials, or first letter of each word combined, read Whig, and were used to name or designate the party. Thus the word Whig originally meant opposition to kings and monarchies, and friendship for the very form of government under which we exist. It originated in England, a century and a half before our revolution.

1924. "MINISTERS."

The hall of the School of Equity at Poitiers, where the Institutes were read, was called La Ministerie; on which head, Florimond de Remond, speaking of Albert Babinot, one of the first disciples of Calvin, after having said he was called "the good man," adds, that because he had been a student of the Institutes at this Ministerie of Poitiers, Calvin and others styled him Mr. Minister; from whence, afterwards, Calvin took occasion to give the name of MINISTERS to the pastors of his church.

1925. THE EMPEROR AND THE SULTAN.

It would fill three columns of the present pages to transcribe the titles and attributes of the grand seignior, which he assumes in a letter to Henry IV. Selden, in his Titles of Honor, first part, p. 140, has preserved it. This "emperor of victorious emperors," as he styles himself, at length condescended to agree with the Emperor of Germany, in 1606, that in all their letters and instruments they should be only styled father and son; the emperor calling the sultan his son; and the sultan the emperor, in regard of his years, his father.

1926. CHRISTIAN NAMES OF THE PURITANS.

The Puritans, in the reign of Elizabeth, among other objects of reformation which they laid down in their discipline, as it was called, had this article: "Let persuasions be used that such names as do savor either of paganism or Popery be not given to children, but principally those whereof there are examples in the Scriptures." They were not content with the plain scriptural names of Abraham, Obadiah, Zechariah, Ruth, and Rebecca; they adopted phrases, and sometimes sentences, for their children, such as "The Lord is near," "More tryall," Reformation," "Discipline," "Joy again," "Sufficient," "From above," "Heavenly mind," "Free gifts," "More fruit," "Dust," &c.; and one of the Puritanical ministers was so bigoted in this respect, that he refused to christen a man's child because he insisted on having him called Richard.

This ridiculous superstition continued to prevail till the reign of Charles II., as may be seen by examining the accounts of many persons of eminence, who were born about the period of the great rebellion, as, for instance, Accepted Frewen, Archbishop of York, Offspring Blackhall, Bishop of Exeter.

Praise God Barebone, a respectable leather-seller in Holborn, was one of the most active members of the Parliament assembled by Cromwell, and which took its denomination from his surname. It is said there were three brothers of this family, each of whom had a sentence to his name, viz.: "Praise God Barebone," "Christ came into the world to save, Barebone," and "If Christ had not died, thou hadst been d—d, Barebone." But this last name was so long, that many persons took the liberty of abridging it, and called the owner only "D—d Barebone."

Mr. Brome, in his Travels over England, gives the following list of a jury impanelled in Sussex about the same time:—

Accepted Trevor, of Horsham; Redeemed Compton, of Battle; Faint-not Hewet, of Heathfield; Make Peace Horton, of Hare; God-reward Smart, of Fivehurst; Stand-fast-on-high Stringer, of Crowhurst; Earth Adams, of Warbleton; Called Lower, of the same; Fight-the-good-fight-of-faith White, of Emer; More Fruit Fowler, of East Hadley; Hope for Bending, of the same; Graceful Harding, of Lewes; Weep-not Billing, of the same; Meek Brewer, of Okeham.

1927. DULL, DUNSE, AND DRONE.

The equivocality of many of the names of places in Scotland has given occasion to a very amusing saying regarding a clergyman. "He was born in the parish of Dull, brought up at the school of Dunse, (quasi Dunce,) and finally settled minister in the parish of Drone!"

1928. JOHN CUTS AND THE SPANISH AMBASSADOR.

We almost hesitate to credit what we know to be true, that the length or the shortness of a name can seriously influence the mind. The Spaniards have long been known for cherishing a passion for dignified names, and are marvellously affected by long and voluminous ones: to enlarge them they often add the places of their residence.

The Spaniards then must feel a most singular contempt for a very short name, and on this subject Fuller has recorded a pleasant fact. An opulent citizen of the name of John Cuts (what name can be more unluckily short?) was ordered by Elizabeth to receive the Spanish ambassador; but the latter complained grievously, and thought he was disparaged by the shortness of his name. He imagined that a man bearing a monosyllabic name could never, in the great alphabet of civil life, have performed any thing great or honorable; but when he found that honest John Cuts displayed a hospitality which had nothing monosyllabic in it, he groaned only at the utterance of the name of his host.

1929. KNIGHTING A LOIN OF BEEF.

The surloin of beef is said to owe its name to King Charles II., who, dining upon a loin of beef, and being particularly pleased with it, asked the name of the joint. On being told, he said, "For its merit, then, I will knight it, and henceforth it shall be called Sir-Loin."

In a ballad of the New Sir John Barleycorn, this circumstance is thus mentioned:—

"Our second Charles, of fame factée,
On loin of beef did dine;
He held his sword, pleased, o'er the meat —
'Arise, thou famed Sir-Loin.'"

§ 192. NEWSPAPERS, ANNUALS, AND OTHER PERIODICALS.

1930. ORIGIN OF NEWSPAPERS.

HUMANITY are indebted to the wisdom of Queen Elizabeth, and the prudence of Burleigh, for the first printed newspaper. It was entitled the English Mercurio, and was, by authority, "imprinted at London by her highness's printer, 1588." The earliest number is preserved in the British Museum Library, dated July 23, in that year, and contains the usual intelligence, given after the fashion of the London Gazette of the present day. In these Mercuries we meet with advertisements of books, and they differ not very much from the announcements of our own time. During the civil wars, periodical papers, the champions of the two parties, became more generally circulated, and were edited by writers of ability. Among the principal we may notice Marchmont Needham, Sir John Birkenhead, and Sir Robert L'Estrange. At the restoration, the proceedings of Parliament were interdicted to be published, unless by authority; and the first daily paper after the revolution took the popular title of the Orange Intelligencer. In the reign of Queen Anne, there was but one daily paper, the Daily Courant. The first provincial journal in England was the Orange Postman, started in 1706, at the price of a penny, "but a halfpenny not refused." The earliest Scottish newspaper made its appearance under the auspices of Cromwell, in 1652.

1931. THE FIRST MAGAZINE.

The Gentleman's Magazine unaccountably passes for the earliest periodical of that description; while, in fact, it was preceded nearly forty years by the Gentleman's Journal of Motteux, a work much more closely resembling our modern magazines, and from which Sylvanus Urban borrowed part of his title, and part of his motto; while on the first page of the first number of the Gentleman's Magazine itself, it is stated to contain "more than any book of the kind and price."

1932. ORIGIN OF GAZETTES.

M. de Saintfoix, in his Historical Essays on Paris, gives this account of their introduction:—

"Theophrastus Renaudot, a physician of Paris, picked up news from all quarters to amuse his patients: he presently became more in request than any of his brethren; but as the whole city is not ill, or at least does not imagine itself to be so, he began to reflect, at the end of some years, that he might gain a more considerable income by giving a paper every week, containing the news of different countries. A permission was necessary: he obtained it, with an exclusive privilege, in 1632.

Such papers had been in use a considerable time at Venice, and were called gazettes, because a small piece of money, called gazetta, was paid for the reading of them.

This is the origin of our gazette, and its name. About ten years afterwards, they were common in England by the name of mercuries.

1933. THE PATRIARCH OF NEWSPAPER WRITERS.

Marchmont Needham, the great patriarch of newspaper writers, was a man of versatile talents and more versatile politics; a bold adventurer, and most successful, because the most profligate of his tribe. We find an ample account of him in Anthony Wood. From college he came to London: was an usher in Merchant Tailors' School; then an under clerk in Gray's Inn; at length studied physic, and practised chemistry; and finally he was a captain, and in the words of honest Anthony, "siding with the rout and scum of the people, he made them weekly sport by railing at all that was noble, in his Intelligence, called Mercurius Britannicus, wherein his endeavors were to sacrifice the fame of some lord, or any person of quality, and of the king himself, to the beast with many heads." He soon became popular, and was known under the name of Captain Needham, of Gray's Inn; and whatever he now wrote was deemed oracular. But whether from a slight imprisonment for aspersing Charles I., or some pique with his own party, he requested an audience on his knees with the king, reconciled himself to his majesty, and showed himself a violent royalist in his Mercurius Pragmaticus, and galled the Presbyterians with his wit and quips. Some time after, when the popular party prevailed, he was still further enlightened, and was got over by President Bradshaw as easily as by Charles I. Our Mercurial writer became once more a virulent Presbyterian, and lashed the royalists outrageously in his Mercurius Politicus. At length, on the return of Charles II., being now conscious, says our friend Anthony, that he might be in danger of the halter, once more he is said to have fled into Holland, waiting for an act of oblivion. For money given to a hungry courtier, Needham obtained his pardon under the great seal. He latterly practised as a physician among his party, but lived universally hated by the royalists, and now only committed harmless treasons with the College of Physicians, on whom he poured all that gall and vinegar which the government had suppressed from flowing through its natural channel.

1934. THE ENGLISH MERCURIE.

Newspapers began to appear in England during the civil war. The paper called the English Mercury, which gave the first example of this kind of publication, scarcely deserves to be mentioned in a general estimate. It seems to have been established by Queen Elizabeth, in times of great difficulty and danger, in order to communicate such intelligence as she felt interested in making known, and counteracting such rumors as her enemies were anxious to propagate. Of this publication there are to be seen three printed numbers in the collection of state papers in the British Museum. The earliest number preserved is No. 50, dated July 23, 1588. It is entitled "The English Mercurie, published by authority, for the prevention of false reports;" and is said at the end to be "imprinted by Christopher Barker, her highness's printer." It would appear not to have been published at regular periodical intervals, but as occasion required, or events of importance occurred. We observe, for instance, the publication of No. 50, on the 23d of July, and No. 51, on the 26th; while subsequently more than a month elapsed without a new number. The first article in number 50, dated Whitehall, July 23, 1588, contains advices from Sir Francis Walsingham, that the Spanish Armada was seen on the 20th in the Chops of the Channel, making for the entrance of the Channel with a favorable gale. An account is then given of her majesty's fleet, which consisted of eighty sail, divided into four squadrons, commanded by the lord high admiral, in the Ark Royal, Sir Francis Drake, Admirals Hawkins and Forbisher. By the best computation, it is added, the enemy could not have fewer than one hundred and fifty ships; but as soon as they were seen from the top-mast of the English fleet, instead of exciting any fear of the result, they were hailed by the English sailors with acclamations of joy. An account is then given of the attack made on the Armada on the 21st of July, after which it fled.

1935. ORIGIN OF JOHNSON'S IDLER.

Dr. Johnson's Room in Pembroke College.

When the late Mr. John Newberry, of St. Paul's Churchyard, projected the publication of a weekly newspaper, in 1758, now ninety years ago, to be called the Universal Chronicle, he employed the celebrated Dr. Johnson to furnish a short essay on such subjects of a general or temporary kind as might suit the taste of newspaper readers, and distinguish the new paper from its contemporaries.

The reason assigned for printing this essay is not only extremely curious to caterers of public news of the present day, but is a remarkable fact in the history of newspapers. The printer stated that the occurrences of the week were not sufficient to fill its columns. Those who now publish weekly newspapers find it not only difficult, but impossible, to insert half the articles which have entertained other readers during the intervals of publication, and which, from the common impulses of domestic or public curiosity, their readers think they have a right to expect. It is also worth mentioning, that the essays written for the purpose of filling a vacant column in the above-mentioned paper, by Dr. Johnson, were afterwards collected into a volume, and form the well-known work called the Idler.

1936. JOHNSON AND THE CREDULOUS LADY.

On a question, one day, at Miss Porter's, concerning the authority of a newspaper for some fact, Johnson related that a lady of his acquaintance implicitly believed every thing she read in the papers; and that, by way of curing her credulity, he fabricated a story of a battle between the Russians and Turks, then at war; and "that it might," he said, "bear internal evidence of its futility, I laid the scene in an island at the conflux of the Borysthenes and the Danube—rivers which run at the distance of a hundred leagues from each other. The lady, however, believed the story, and never forgave the deception; the consequence of which was, that I lost an agreeable companion, and she was deprived of an innocent amusement." And he added, as an extraordinary circumstance, that the Russian ambassador sent in great haste to the printer to know from whence he had received the intelligence.

1937. DRAKE'S OPPOSITION TO THE NEWS-PAPER TAX.

When the tax on newspapers, proposed by William Pitt, in 1789, was under discussion in the House of Commons, Mr. Drake said that he disliked the tax, and would oppose it from motives of gratitude. "The gentlemen concerned in writing for them had been particularly kind to him: they had made him deliver many well-shapen speeches, though he was convinced he had never spoken so well in his whole life."

1938. LARGE PERIODICAL CIRCULATION.

The American Messenger, a religious paper, issued monthly, at New York, is said to have nearly two hundred thousand subscribers—a circulation which many believe unparalleled. Yet Moore's Almanac, published by the Stationers' Company, in England, and edited by Henry Andrews, who died in 1820, had a circulation of four hundred and thirty thousand copies annually.

1939. MANSFIELD'S PROPHECY.

The Duke of Northumberland, in conversation one day with Lord Mansfield, spoke of the comfort of reading the newspapers at breakfast. "The comfort of reading the newspapers!" said Lord Mansfield; "mark my words: you and I shall not live to see it, but sooner or later these newspapers, if they go on as they now do, will most assuredly write down the Dukes of Northumberland out of their titles and possessions, and the country out of its king. Mark my words, for this will happen."

1940. NEWS CORRESPONDENTS.

The desire of the English for news from the capital, on the part of the wealthier country residents, and probably the false information, and the impertinence of the news writers, led, anciently, to the common establishment of a very curious trade—that of a news correspondent, who, for a subscription of three or four pounds per annum, wrote a letter of news every post day to his subscriber in the country. This profession probably existed in the reign of James I.; for in Ben Jonson's play, the Staple of News, written in the first year of Charles I., we have a very curious and amusing description of an office of news manufacturers.

"This is the outer room where my clerks sit,
And keep their sides, the register i' the midst:
The examiner, he sits private there within;
And here I have my several rolls and files
Of news by the alphabet, and all put up
Under their heads."

The news thus communicated appears to have fallen into as much disrepute as the public news. In the advertisement announcing the first number of the Evening Post, September 6, 1709, it is said, "There must be three or four pounds per annum paid by those gentlemen who are out of town, for written news, which is so far generally from having any probability of matter of fact in it, that it is frequently stuffed up with, We hear, &c.; or, An eminent Jew merchant has received a letter, &c.; being nothing more than downright fiction." The same advertisement, speaking of the published papers, says, "We read more of our own affairs in the Dutch papers than in any of our own." The trade of a news correspondent seems to have suggested a sort of union of written news and published news; for towards the end of the seventeenth century, we have news letters printed in type to imitate writing. The most famous of these was that commenced by Ichabod Dawks, in 1696, the first number of which was thus announced: "This letter will be done upon good writing paper, and blank space left, that any gentleman may write his own private business. It does undoubtedly exceed the best of the rewritten news, contains double the quantity, is read with abundantly more ease and pleasure, and will be useful to improve the younger sort in writing a curious hand."

1941. ELEVEN TONS OF NEWS.

The weight of newspapers from London which, in 1844, passed by the mails on every Saturday night, was not less than eleven tons.

1942. SINGULAR DEVICE.

One afternoon, a great deal of interest and curiosity was excited by the fact of a tall, fine-looking man being seen leisurely promenading along Second Street, Philadelphia, wearing a coat, on the back of which, in large, staring gilt letters, were the words, "Newspaper Dun." As a matter of course, he was the "observed of all observers," and a train of the curious followed at his heels, wondering at the sight, and unable to comprehend the mystery.

On inquiry, we ascertained he was employed by an association of newsmen, for the purpose of collecting hopeless bills, and shaming debtors into the payment of their debts. He operates in this manner when he has a bill to collect: He stops at the house of the debtor, and the large letters on his back tell to all passers by what his errand is, and, at the same time, give a timely caution against trusting the occupant of the house. Any person thus harassed would sooner pay the bill than have the "Dun" calling upon him continually, with the great letters upon his back. If he has a bill against a person whom he cannot catch any where except in the street, he presents his account, much to the shame of the debtor, who is perceived and shunned by every one as a person not to be trusted. The "Dun" appears to be a determined man, possessed of the greatest sang froid, and not to be frightened at trifles. Those who owe had better take warning and pay immediately, or the "Dun" may give them a call.

1943. NAPOLEON'S DEFINITION OF A JOURNALIST.

The worst recommendation that any man could have, in Napoleon's eyes, was to be a newspaper writer. Shortly after the 18th Brumaire, Fabre de l'Aude, who was always a favorite with Napoleon, solicited, in hearing, an appointment for one of his acquaintance. "What has he done?" "He has been a journalist." "A journalist!" repeated the first consul. "That means a grumbler, a censurer, a giver of advice, a regent of sovereigns, a tutor of nations. The cabanons of Bicetre are the fittest places for people of that stamp."

1944. CHINESE GAZETTE.

In China, the Official Gazette, which is published daily, is considered as the organ of government in every thing connected with the religion, laws, manners, and customs of the country. In its plan, it totally differs from the gazettes of Europe, wherein articles of a miscellaneous description are inserted for money. No article appears in the gazette of China which has not first been submitted to the inspection of the emperor; and having received his approbation, not a syllable can be added to it.

In 1818, an officer in a court of justice, who was also employed in the post-office, suffered death for having published some false intelligence through the medium of this gazette. The reason assigned by the judges in passing sentence was, that the party culpable had been wanting in respect to his imperial majesty.

1945. BOSTON NEWS LETTER AND NEW ENGLAND COURANT.

The first newspaper printed in the British colonies was the Boston News Letter, in 1704. It was printed weekly, by Nathaniel Greene, for the proprietor, John Campbell, postmaster of Boston. No other paper was required, until 1719, a period of fifteen years, when William Brooker, then at the head of the post-office, published the Boston Gazette, and employed, as printer, James Franklin, an elder brother of the celebrated Benjamin Franklin. In 1721, James began the publication of another journal, the New England Courant. Its patrons formed themselves into a club, and furnished it with short, original essays, in imitation of the Spectator, which soon brought the Courant into notice. It was warmly opposed by the rigid Puritans, whilst it was, with equal ardor, supported by men of more liberal opinions. But the press was then, as it had been during more than fifty years, in Massachusetts, under a rigorous censorship. Nothing could, with impunity, be published, unless pleasing to the colonial government. Franklin was soon imprisoned, and ordered to discontinue his paper, unless he would submit it to a previous supervision; but, not inclining to yield submission, he conducted it, for some years, in the name of Benjamin, who had been one of its ablest contributors.

1946. FIFTY DOLLARS PER ANNUM FOR A NEWSPAPER.

The first newspaper published in Virginia was established in 1780. The subscription was fifty dollars a year. Price for advertising, ten dollars the first week, and seven dollars for each subsequent insertion. The paper was issued weekly.

1947. BEGINNINGS OF THE PENNY PAPER SYSTEM.

Fifteen years ago, two journeymen printers commenced the New York Sun, writing and setting up their own editorials, &c. They issued seven hundred copies daily, which they sold to the news boys for sixty-two and a half cents a hundred, and the boys sold them for a cent each. An old Ramage press was worked with their own hands. As their edition increased, the printing was done on a Napier press. Afterwards they employed a steam press. One of the partners sold his interest for ten thousand dollars, and became a lawyer and a candidate for Congress at the west. Now, some twenty-five thousand copies of the Sun are issued daily, and a brood of penny papers are rivaling the original penny daily in their enterprise and the extent of their circulation.

1948. SERVED HIM RIGHT.

A long-winded subscriber to a newspaper, after repeated dunnings, promised that the bill should be paid by a certain day, if he were then alive. The day passed over, and no money reached the office.

In the next number, therefore, of the newspaper, the editor inserted among the deaths a notice of his subscriber's departure from this life. Pretty soon after this announcement, the subject of it appeared to the editor—not with the pale and ghastly countenance usually ascribed to apparitions, nor like them did he wait to be spoken to, but broke silence with—"What, sir, did you mean by publishing my death?" "Why, sir, I mean what I mean when I publish the death of any other person, viz., to let the world know that you are dead." "Well, but I am not dead." "Not dead! then it is your own fault; for you told me you would positively pay your bill by such a day, if you lived to that time. The day passed, the bill is not paid, and you positively must be dead; for I will not believe that you would forfeit your word." "O, ho! I see you have got round me, Mr. Editor; but say no more about it; here's the money. And harkee, my wag, you'll contradict my death next week?" "O, certainly, sir, just to please you; though upon my word I can't help thinking you were dead at the time specified, and that you have really come back to pay this bill on account of your friendship to me."

1849. NEWS BOY WIT.

A gentleman crossing one of the New York ferries was accosted by one of those peripatetic vendors of cheap literature and weekly newspapers, who are to be found in shoals about all our public places, with "Buy Bulwer's last work, sir? Only two shillin." The gentleman, willing to have a laugh with the urchin, said, "Why, I am Bulwer myself!" Off went the lad, and whispering to another, at a little distance, excited his wonderment at the information he had to impart. Eyeing the pretended author of Pelham with a kind of awe, he approached him timidly, and, holding out a pamphlet, said, modestly, "Buy the Women of England, sir? You're not Mrs. Ellis, are you?" Of course, the proposed sale was effected.

1950. TELLING THE "BIGGEST LIE."

"We received on Saturday last," says the Washington Commonwealth, "the name of an individual, who directed us to enter it upon our subscription list, on condition that we would 'tell a bigger lie than either of the other town papers.' We have accordingly entered the name, and in compliance with the 'condition,' have only to say that our new subscriber is a perfect gentleman."

1951. "SO MANY WAYS FOR HIS MONEY."

"Travelling one day in the country," says a writer in the Erie Observer, "we fell in company with a man whom we soon ascertained to be a well-to-live-in-the-world farmer. In the course of conversation upon various subjects, principally agricultural, we found that he was just returning from our town, where he had that day contracted for the sale of five hundred bushels of wheat at seventy-five cents per bushel. From this our conversation passed to that of newspapers; and upon ascertaining that he was not a subscriber to any paper, we offered him ours. But the man had 'so many ways for his money' he could not afford it. We then asked him if he would become a subscriber in case we would convince him that, if he had taken the paper, he would have saved, in one bargain alone, five times the cost of it for a year. He agreed to this, and we took from our pocket one of our latest papers, in which was an advertisement, offering to contract for any quantity of wheat at eighty-one cents per bushel. Thus we illustrated to our farmer friend that if he had been a reader of our paper, he might have saved six cents on each of his five hundred bushels of wheat; making a total of thirty dollars—sufficient to pay for the paper fifteen years. He paid us two dollars, and left us, growling at himself for having been so negligent of his true interest."

1952. EDITORIAL COURTESY.

Courtesy in public as well as private life is a mark of the gentleman. We sometimes see editors quarrelling, and there is nothing we regret more, for neither is raised in the estimation of the public, which generally laughs at both as fools. A noble instance of such courtesy, almost chivalric in its character indeed, lately transpired in Europe. It seems that the messenger of the London Morning Herald, while on his way from Marseilles to Paris, was striving to distance the courier of the Times, with the intelligence by the latest mail from Calcutta. But unfortunately he was killed by a fall from his carriage, just as he was entering Roans. With true generosity, the courier of the Times took the despatches of his rival and carried them on to London. More than this, the Times caused the despatches to be immediately remitted to the office of the Herald, thus waiving all the advantages to be derived from the accident that befell its rival.

1953. REV. MR. CALHOUN'S STATEMENT.

At a public meeting, held at the American Tract House, the Rev. Mr. Calhoun, from Mt. Lebanon, said that in all Syria, with a population of a million and a half, not a single newspaper is published. And in the entire region in which the Arabic language is spoken, comprising Syria, Arabia, Egypt, and the Barbary States, including a population of forty millions, there is believed to be only one, if indeed one, newspaper in that language, and only three or four in English or French. There is but one in the Turkish language, in all the Turkish dominions, (including a population of sixty millions,) and that conducted by an Englishman. Such facts, he said, afforded an illustration of Mohammedanism, a religion which has no tendency to improvement, either of intellect, morals, or economies.

The first newspaper in the Turkish dominions, as well as in several of the heathen countries, he said, was started by American missionaries. But they are multiplying, and it is an interesting fact, that Armenian, Greek, and Judea journals, as also those of China, Africa, and the Sandwich Islands, are now copying religious, as well as political intelligence from American daily papers. And it is surely a consummation devoutly to be wished, that the impress of pure Christianity be stamped upon all these numberless channels of intelligence, as an example to the nations among whom newspapers are extending.

1954. COWPER'S POSTBOY.

In Cowper's Task we find the following highly amusing description of a postboy as he appeared in those days in England:—

"Hark! 'tis the twanging horn o'er yonder bridge,
That with its wearisome but needful length
Bestrides the wintry flood, in which the moon
Sees her unwrinkled face reflected bright;
He comes, the herald of a noisy world;
With spattered boots, strapped waist, and frozen locks;
News from all nations lumbering at his back.
True to his charge, the close-packed load behind,
Yet careless what he brings, his one concern
Is to conduct it to the destined inn;
And having dropped the expected bag, pass on.
He whistles as he goes, light-hearted wretch,
Cold, and yet cheerful; messenger of grief,
Perhaps, to thousands, and of joy to some;
To him indifferent whether grief or joy.
Houses in ashes, and the fall of stocks,
Births, deaths, and marriages, epistles wet
With tears that trickled down the writers' cheeks
Fast as the periods from his fluent quill.
Or charged with amorous sighs of absent swains,
Or nymphs responsive, equally affect His horse and him, unconscious of them all."

1955. A LEGACY DISCOVERED.

A poor aged woman, who had long earned her livelihood by knitting, one day coming to the end of her worsted ball, found it to be wound on a piece of an old newspaper, which she had the curiosity to read; when, to her astonishment and delight, she discovered it to contain an advertisement respecting herself, as the heir of a large property, which, had she been unable to read, she might never have possessed.

§ 193. OBSCURITY AND PERSPICUITY OF STYLE.

1956. HAMANN.

Hamann, the German author, belonged to that class of writers who love the shade and lose more by obscurity than they gain by originality—who repel, by the uncouth shapes in which their thoughts are disguised, more readers than they attract by the rarity and pickiness of the thoughts themselves. He is a humorist, but of a sombre complexion, with a strong dash of cynicism.

"The kernel of his works," says Herder, "contains many seed-corns of great truths, new observations, and the results of wonderfully extensive reading; the shell is a laborious texture of strong expressions, allusions, and word-flowers. He read much and with taste, (multum et multa), but the balsam odors from the ethereal table of the ancients, mixed with occasional vapors of Gaul and the steam of British humor, formed a perfect cloud around him. His observations often combine a whole view in a single view-point; but let the reader stand at that view-point, otherwise he will see every thing askew, and common mould instead of microscopic forests. Every thought of his is an unstrung pearl; every thought is wrapped in the very word without which it could neither have been thought nor spoken."

"The great Hamann," says Jean Paul, "is a deep sky full of telescopic stars, with many a nebula which no eye can resolve." And again, "Hamann's style is a river which the storm drives back towards its source, making it innavigable for Dutch market-boats."

But the best account of Hamann is that given by Goethe in his autobiography.

"Since I was tempted to the sibylline character which I gave to these leaves, as well as to the publication of them, by Hamann, this seems to me a proper place to speak of that worthy and influential man, who was to us then as great a mystery as he has been to his country ever since. His Socratic Memorabilia excited attention, and were especially dear to those who could not adjust themselves to the dazzling spirit of the times. They seemed to reveal a deep-thinking, thorough man, who, while he was well acquainted with the public world and literature, still held to something secret and inscrutable, and expressed himself in a very peculiar way concerning it."

1957. LYCOPHRON'S POEM.

Lycophron was an advocate for obscurity. He declared publicly he would hang himself if he found a person who could understand his poem of the Prophecy of Cassandra. He succeeded to the utmost of his wishes. His poem was the stumbling-block of all the grammarians, scholiasts, and commentators, and it is at this period equally inexplicable as when it first appeared.

This work may be compared to those subterraneous places, where the air is so thick, that whatever light is carried there is extinguished. It is useless endeavoring to develop such obscurity; the greatest mental powers are not adequate to the penetration of such darkness.

1958. THE STATUE OR THE SPEAR.

Want of perspicuity in writing may lead to serious evils, of which a curious example is given by Quintilian. "A curious man ordered in his will that his heir should erect for him a statue holding a spear made of gold." A question of great consequence to the heir arose from the ambiguity of the expression; as it admitted of doubt whether the words "made of gold" were to be applied to the statue or to the spear.

1959. THE RHETORICIAN AND HIS PUPILS.

We are told that, in the time of Titus Livius, there was a rhetorician so great a partisan for obscurity, that he made his scholars correct those passages in their works which appeared intelligible. The greatest praise that could be bestowed on the eloquence of that school was to say, "I do not comprehend the smallest portion of it."

194. ORATORY AND ORATORS.

1960. CONTRAST OF MIND AND BODY.

Curran, the Irish advocate, possessed talents of the highest order. His wit, his drollery, his eloquence, and his pathos were irresistible, and the splendid daring style of his oratory inimitable; and yet, strange contrast! his personal appearance, like Paul's, was mean and diminutive.

1961. DESTRUCTION OF ROBESPIERRE.

The celebrated Jean Lambert Tallien had formed a tender friendship with the beautiful Madame Ca-barus, so celebrated in revolutionary history; but at the period in question, mutual jealousy had interrupted their happiness. She was thrown into a dungeon by order of Robespierre; and when it was conceived that she had been sufficiently terrified by imprisonment, and the prospect of the guillotine, she was offered life and liberty if she would betray the counsels of Tallien, and enable his enemies to ruin him. Although her lover had been faithless, and had deserted her, she refused the offer with indignation; and, with great difficulty, had the following letter sent to Tallien:—

"The minister of police has announced to me that to-morrow I am to appear at the tribunal, that is to say, I am to ascend the scaffold. I dreamed last night that Robespierre was no more, and that my prison doors were opened. A brave man might realize my dream; but, thanks to your notorious cowardice, no one remains who is capable of its accomplishment."

Tallien wrote back to her, —

"Be prudent as I shall prove brave; and above all, be tranquil." The next day he hurried to the tribunal, and, regardless of danger, accused the miscreant Robespierre in his own presence.

The eloquence of Tallien had always been commanding and impressive; but on this occasion it was compared to the impetuous flowing of a river, whose course had been prematurely stopped. He portrayed the vices of Robespierre and his companions; the cruelty and other excesses of their government, which had deprived France of her most illustrious citizens. Then, taking a dagger from his bosom, he rushed towards the statue of Brutus, his own immortal prototype, and swore that he himself would stab the tyrant to the heart, if his countrymen did not deliver themselves from their disgraceful bondage. His language, his action, and his animated eye were irresistible; for they recalled the Roman hero to the minds of all the auditors. Robespierre was astounded, and attempted to defend himself. The moment was critical; the life of Tallien hung upon a thread; but his eloquence prevailed, and the tribunal regained its lost character. The tyrant was sent to the scaffold. Madame Cabarus and other intended victims were saved, and the reign of terror was abolished.

1962. LORD NORTH'S OPPONENT.

A dog, having one day got into the House of Commons, by his barking interrupted Lord North, who happened to be opening one of his budgets. His lordship pleasantly inquired by what new oppositionist he was attacked. A wag replied, "It was a member from Bark-shire."

§ 195. ORIGIN OF GREAT MEN.

1963. THE FATHER OF GOLDSMITH.

Some families seem to inherit kindness and incompetency, and to hand down virtue and poverty from generation to generation. Such was the case with the Goldsmiths. "They were always," according to their own accounts, "a strange family; they rarely acted like other people; their hearts were in the right place, but their hands seemed to be doing any thing but what they ought." "They were remarkable," says another statement, "for their worth, but of no cleverness in the ways of the world." Oliver Goldsmith will be found faithfully to inherit the virtues and weaknesses of his race.

His father, the Rev. Charles Goldsmith, with hereditary improvidence, married when very young and very poor, and starved along for several years on a small country curacy and the assistance of his wife's friends. His whole income, eked out by the produce of some fields which he farmed, and of some occasional duties performed for his wife's uncle, the rector of an adjoining parish, did not exceed forty pounds, —

"And passing rich with forty pounds a year."

Goldsmith himself says, "My father, the younger son of a good family, was possessed of a small living in the church. His education was above his fortune, and his generosity greater than his education. Poor as he was, he had his flatterers poorer than himself; for every dinner he gave them, they returned him an equivalent in praise; and this was all he wanted."

1964. EPICTETUS, ABBÉ HAUY, AND OTHERS.

Epictetus, the celebrated stoic philosopher, was born a slave, and spent many years of his life in servitude. This was the fact also with Æsop, Publius, Syrus, and Terence.

The Abbé Haury, who died in Paris a few years since, celebrated for his writings and discoveries in crystallography, attained his distinguished elevation in spite of every disadvantage of birth.

Winckelmann, one of the most distinguished writers on classic antiquities and the fine arts that modern times have produced, was the son of a shoemaker. He contrived to keep himself at college, chiefly by teaching some of his younger fellow-students, while at the same time he, in part, supported his poor father at a hospital.

Arnigio, an Italian poet of the sixteenth century, of considerable genius and learning, followed his father's trade, that of a shoemaker, and in the course of his life published a very elaborate work on the shoemaking of the ancients.

The celebrated Italian writer Gelli, when holding the high dignity of council of the Florentine Academy, still continued to work at his original profession of a tailor.

Metastasio was the son of a common mechanic, and used, when a little boy, to sing his extemporaneous verses about the streets.

The father of Haydn, the great musical composer, was a wheelwright, and filled also the humble occupation of a sexton; while his mother was at the same time a servant in the establishment of a neighboring nobleman.

The father of John Opie, the great English portrait painter, was a working carpenter in Cornwall. Opie was raised from the bottom of a sawpit, where he was employed in cutting wood, to the professorship of painting, in the Royal Academy.

The parents of Castalio, the elegant Latin translator of the Bible, were poor peasants, who lived among the mountains of Dauphiny.

1965. THE JOURNALIST'S COLLECTION.

At a political meeting in the north of England, a noble lord and his adherents ventured to speak disrespectfully of several distinguished individuals of opposite principles, because either they or their forefathers had been concerned in trade.

This unwarranted aspersion excited the just indignation of a neighboring journalist, and called forth from him a spirited article, wherein he asserted that the origin of many of the most illustrious characters could be traced to tradesmen, mechanics, and farmers. To prove this, he submitted the next week a formidable list of names, that might have put the revilers of obscure parentage to the blush. We submit the journalist's list, with a different arrangement and several additions.

Euripides was the son of a fruiterer, and Terence in early life was a slave. Virgil's father was a potter or brick maker, and Horace's a freedman. Plautus was a baker.

Greathead, Bishop of Lincoln, in the thirteenth century, began his career as a beggar; but his powerful talents adorned his brow with a mitre.

Luther was the son of a poor miner, Zuinglius of a shepherd, and Calvin's father was not distinguished either for "affluence or learning."

Boccaccio was the natural son of a merchant. Columbus was the son of a weaver, and originally a weaver himself. Bunyan was the son of a travelling tinker. Bloomfield, Gibbon, Gifford, Linnæus, Lackington, Dr. Carey, Roger Sherman were shoemakers; so is Whittier; and Shakspeare was the son of a wool stapler and butcher, Cowley of a grocer, Milton of a scrivener, Ben Jonson of a mason, Fletcher of a chandler, Pope of a linen draper, Collins of a hatter, Gray of a notary, Beattie and Butler of farmers, Akenside of a butcher, Whitehead of a baker, Henry Kirke White of a butcher, and Thomas Moore of a grocer. Gay was apprenticed to a silk mercer; Sir Edward Sugden, Lord Tenterden, and Jeremy Taylor were sons of barbers. Dr. Maddox, Bishop of Worcester, was the son of a pastry cook. Dr. Milner was a weaver, and Sir Samuel Romilly was the son of a goldsmith. Richardson, the gifted writer, and Franklin, the philosopher, were printers. John Hunter was the son of a carpenter, and Scott, the commentator, of a grazier. Ferguson, the astronomer, was a shepherd in his youth. Defoe was a hosier, and son of a butcher; and Dymond, author of Principles of Morality, was a linen draper, and traded or wrote, according as he had, or had not, customers. Woods, Curran, Jeffrey, Brydges, Atkins, and Lord Ellenborough were all the sons of humble tradesmen.

Turning to France, we find that Amyot was the son of a currier, Rabelais of an apothecary, Voiture of a tax-gatherer, Lamothe of a hatter, Massillon of a turner, Griennault of a baker, Molière of a tapestry maker, Rousseau of a watchmaker, and Rollin of a herdsman. Claude Lorraine was bred a pastry cook. Quintin Matsys was a blacksmith.

Linnæus, the founder of the science of botany, was apprenticed to a shoemaker in Sweden, but afterwards taken notice of, in consequence of his ability, and sent to college.

David Pareus, the elder, who was afterwards a celebrated professor of theology at Heidelberg, Germany, was at one time apprenticed to a shoemaker.

Joseph Pendell, who died some time since at Gray's Buildings, London, and who was a profound and scientific scholar, leaving an excellent library, was bred to, and pursued through life, the trade of a shoemaker.

Hans Sachs, one of the most famous of the early poets, was the son of a tailor, served an apprentice-

Benedict Baddouth, one of the most learned men of the sixteenth century, was a shoemaker, as likewise was his father. This man wrote a treatise on the shoemaking of the ancients, which he traced up to the time of Adam himself. Thus Adam was a shoemaker, and Eve a tailoress. She "sewed fig leaves together," proving truly the antiquity of these two branches of industry and skill.

To these may be added those ornaments of literature, Holcroft, the author of the Critic and other works; Gifford, the founder, and for many years the editor, of the London Quarterly Review, one of the most profound scholars and elegant writers of the age; and Bloomfield, the author of the Farmer's Boy and other works; all of whom were shoemakers, and the pride and admiration of the literary world.

John Brand, secretary of the London Antiquarian Society, and author of several learned works, was originally a shoemaker, but fortunately found means to complete his studies at Oxford.

Winckelmann, the learned German antiquary, was the son of a shoemaker, and was for some time engaged in the same employment, but finally burst from his obscurity, and became a professor of belles-lettres. He was the friend and correspondent of the most learned men of his time.

Fox, the founder of the sect called Quakers, was the son of a weaver, and apprenticed to a shoemaker and grazier.

Roger Sherman, the American statesman, was apprenticed to a shoemaker, and found ample time, during his minority, to acquire a stock of knowledge that assisted him in the acquisition of fame and fortune.

1967. TOOKE AND THE ETONIAN.

Tooke was the son of a poulterer, which he alluded to when called upon by the proud striplings of Eton to describe himself. "I am," said young Horne, "the son of an eminent Turkey merchant."

1968. INSOLENCES REBUKED.

Baumarchais, the author of the Marriage of Figaro, was the son of a Parisian watchmaker, but raised himself to fame, wealth, and rank by the mere force of his talents. A young nobleman, envious of his reputation, once undertook to wound his vanity and pride by an allusion to his humble origin — handing him his watch, and saying, "Examine it; sir; it does not keep time well; pray ascertain the cause." Baumarchais extended his hand awkwardly, as if to receive the watch, but contrived to let it fall on the pavement. "You see, my dear sir," replied he, "you have applied to the wrong person; my father always declared that I was too awkward to be a watchmaker."

1969. MICHAEL ANGELO.

The husband and father of the woman that nursed Michael Angelo were stone masons, and the chisel was often put into the hands of the child as a plaything.

1970. MULCASTER'S FAILURE.

The learned Mulcaster, in his zealous labor to the "right writing of the English tongue," failed, though his principle seems one of the most obvious in simplicity. This scholar, a master of St. Paul's school, freed from collegiate prejudices, maintained that "words should be written as they are spoken." But where were we to seek for the standard of our orthoepy? Who was to furnish the model of our speech, in a land where the pronunciation varied from the court, the capital, or the county, and was mutable from age to age? The same effort was made among our neighbors. In 1570, the learned Joubert attempted to introduce a new orthography, without, however, the aid of strange characters. His rule was only to give those letters which yield the proper pronunciation; thus he wrote, œuvres, uvres; françoise, fransaise; temps, tems.

1971. CURIOUS RELIC.

A curious instance of the monstrous anomalies of our orthography in the infancy of our literature, when a spelling-book was yet a precious thing which had no existence, appears in this letter of the Duchess of Norfolk to Cromwell, Earl of Essex:—

"My ffray gode lord: her I sand you in toky n hoff neweyer a glasse hof Setyl set in Sellfer gyld I pray you tak hit (in) wort An hy wer habel het shlowide be bater I woll hit war wort a m crone."

These lines were written by one of the most accomplished ladies of the sixteenth century, "the friend of scholars and the patron of literature." Dr. Nott, who has supplied this literary curiosity, has modernized the passage word by word; and though the idiom of the times is preserved, it no longer wears any appearance of vulgarity or of illiteracy.

"My very good lord: Here I send you, in token of the New Year, a glass of Setyll set in silver gilt; I pray you take it (in) worth. An I were able it should be better. I would it were worth a thousand 1972. SMITH'S FAILURE.

The learned Sir Thomas Smith, under Elizabeth, composed his treatise on the English Commonwealth, both in Latin and in English—the worthy companion of the great work of Fortescue. Not deterred by the fate of his friend, the learned Cheke, he projected even a bolder system, to correct the writing of English words. He designed to relieve the ear from the clash of supernumerary consonants, and to liquefy by a vowelly confluence. But though the scholar exposed the absurdity of the general practice, where, in certain words, the redundant letters became mutes, or do not comprehend the sounds which are expressed, while in other words we have no letters which can express the sounds by which they are spoken, he had only ascertained the disease, for he was not equally fortunate in the prevention. An enlargement of the alphabet, ten vowels instead of five, and a fantastical mixture of the Roman, the Greek, and the Saxon characters, required an Englishman to be a very learned man to read and write his maternal language. This project was only substituting for one difficulty another more strange.

Were we to course the wide fields which these early "rackers of orthography have run over," we should start at every turn some strange "winged words;" but they would be fantastic monsters, neither birds with wings, nor hares with feet. Shakspeare sarcastically describes this numerous race: "Now he is turned ORTHOGRAPHER; his words are a very fantastical banquet; just so many strange dishes."

1973. VARIOUS WAYS OF SPELLING THE SAME WORD.

In such disorder lay our orthography in early times, that writers, however peculiar in their mode of spelling, did not even write the same words uniformly. Elizabeth herself wrote one word, which assuredly she had constantly in her mind, seven different ways; for thus has this queen written the word sovereign. The royal mistress of eight languages seemed at a loss which to choose for her command.

The orthography of others, eminent for their learning, was as remarkable, and sometimes more crudely whimsical, either in the attempt to trace the etymology, or to modify exotic words to a native origin; or, finally, to suit the popular pronunciation. What system or method could be hoped for at a time when there prevailed a strange discrepancy in the very names of persons, so variously written not only by their friends but by their owners? Lord Burleigh, when secretary of state, daily signing despatches with the favorite Leicester, yet spelt his name Lecester; and Leicester himself has subscribed his own name eight different ways.

At that period down to a much later, every one seems to have been at a loss to write his own name. The name of Villers is spelt fourteen different ways in the deeds of that family. The simple dissyllabic but illustrious name of Perey, the bishop found in family documents, they had contrived to write in fifteen different ways.

Noah Webster, our great lexicographer, says the proper pronunciation of the name of a place is that which prevails—he probably means in good society—in and about the place. If a similar rule were applied to the orthography, both of persons and names,—that is, if the true mode of spelling names and places was that which was adopted by the best society, and by the best informed individuals, who are most immediately concerned,—and if such a mode were adopted and practised, it would lead to just such a condition of things in this particular as we now see.

The evil is probably irremediable. The law of freedom of opinion and action has gone out, and is not likely soon to be changed. Indeed, the frequency of legislation on this subject has done much to render confusion, in this respect, still more confounded than before. And the end of these things can hardly now be predicted. However, it is, after all, one of the smaller evils of our fashionable republicanism, and we may as well submit to it, believing that, according to the old adage, "What cannot be cured must be endured."

PAINTING AND PAINTERS.

1974. THE DARK AGE FOR ARTISTS.

It is curious to reflect that mistaken views of religion have, in all times, been the prime cause of the ruin of art. It was not Alaric or Theodoric, but an edict from Honorius, that ordered the early Christians to destroy such images, if any remained.

Flaxman says, "The commands for destroying sacred paintings and sculpture prevented the artist from suffering his mind to rise to the contemplation or execution of any sublime effort, as he dreaded a prison or a stake, and reduced him to the lowest drudgery in his profession. This extraordinary check to our national art occurred at a time which offered the most essential and extraordinary assistance to its progress." Flaxman proceeds to remark, that "the civil wars completed what fanaticism had begun; and English art was so completely extinguished that foreign artists were always employed for public or private undertakings."

In the reign of Elizabeth, it became a fashionable taste to sally forth and knock pictures to pieces; and in the State Trials is a curious trial of Henry Sherfield, Esq., recorder of Salisbury, who concealed himself in the church, and with a long pike knocked a window to pieces. As he was doing this, he was watched through the door, and seen to slip down, headlong, where he lay groaning for a long time, and a horse was sent for to carry him home. He was fined five hundred pounds, and imprisoned in the Fleet; and the attorney general for the crown (1632) said there were people, he verily believed, who would have knocked off the cherubim from the ark. By the witnesses examined, it was evidently a matter of religious conscience in Sherfield, who complained that his pew was opposite the window, and that the representation of God by a human figure disturbed him at prayer.

Queen Elizabeth was the bitterest persecutor; she ordered all walls to be whitewashed, and all candlesticks and pictures to be utterly destroyed, so that no memorial might remain of the same.

In Charles I.'s time, on the Journals of the House is found, (1645, July 23,) "Ordered, that all pictures having the second person in the Trinity shall be burnt." Walpole relates, that one Blessie was hired at half-a-crown a day to break the painted glass window at Croydon Church. There is extant the journal of a parliamentary visitor, appropriately enough named Dowsing, appointed for demolishing superstitious pictures and ornaments of churches, &c.; and by calculation, he and his agents are found to have destroyed about four thousand six hundred and sixty pictures, from June 9, 1643, to October 4, 1644, evidently not all glass, because when they were glass he specifies them.

The result of this continued persecution, says Haydon, was the ruin of "high art;" for the people had not taste enough to feel any sympathy for it independently of religion, and every man who has pursued it since, who had no private fortune, and was not supported by a pension, like West, became infallibly ruined.

Historical painters, left without employment, began to complain. In the time of Edward VI. and Elizabeth, we find them petitioning for bread. They revived a little with Charles I. and II. Thornhill got employed in the early part of the last century; then came the Society in St. Martin's Lane, 1760; and in 1768 was established the Royal Academy, to help high art; but there being still no employment for it, the power in art fell into the hands of portrait painters, who have wielded it ever since, with individual exceptions, to the further decay and destruction of this eminent style.

1975. AN ANTIQUE OIL PAINTING.

The oldest oil painting now in existence is believed to be a Madonna and Child in her arms, with an Eastern countenance. It has marked on it the date, which is thus expressed: DCCCLXXXVJ. If we express these with Arabic characters, it would make 886; and the period of this piece would fall about the time of Basilus or Charlemagne. This singular and valuable painting formed part of the treasures of art in the old palace of the Florentine republic; and was purchased by the director, Benicivanni, from a broker in the street for a few livres.

1976. THE YOUNG INDIAN.

About the year 1830, a Catholic priest established a school for the children of a remnant of the Penobscot tribe of Indians at Oldtown, on the Penobscot River, in Maine, a little above Bangor. Besides spelling, reading and writing, he also taught them vocal and instrumental music.

One of the pupils of this school, by the name of Paul Joseph Osson, had distinguished himself by unusual intelligence and proficiency. After leaving the school, he returned, for a year or two, to his Indian habits and manners. But at the end of this time, being on a visit to Bangor, he happened to fix his eye on some engravings in the shops, which made a very strong impression on his mind. This bent of his mind soon attracted notice, and he was taken to the room of a painter, and shown a considerable collection of portraits and other paintings. From that time painting seemed to take possession of his whole soul. He employed himself continually in sketching figures upon wood and bark. The priest who had been his teacher encouraged and assisted him; and he commenced drawing and painting flowers, animals, miniature likenesses of his fellow-Indians, and landscapes of considerable compass. Several of these were so handsomely executed, and he made such improvement, that the painter above mentioned consented to take him under his tuition. His progress in the art has been highly respectable.

1977. THE OLDEST PAINTING IN ENGLAND.

Chaucer.

The oldest picture in England is the portrait of Chaucer, who died in 1402, and which was probably painted in the Low Countries about twenty years before his death. It was discovered in a lumber garret in the house in which Cromwell was born, at Huntingdon, by Sir Richard Phillips, in 1802. The celebrated collector, Count Truchsess, conceived that it was first painted in water colors, and oiled afterwards for preservation; and he certified that the name Chaucer, in the background, was laid on with the painting.

The next portrait, in point of antiquity, is that of King Henry IV., who began his reign in 1400, and is the property of the Earl of Oxford, and kept at Hampton Court, in Herefordshire.

1978. MONOCHROMATIC PAINTING.

A very delicate experiment, yet a very natural one, which Buffon appears to have first noticed, led, in all probability, to the invention of the monochromatic mode of painting, or painting with a single color. If, at the moment which precedes sunset, at the close of a cloudless day, a body is placed near a wall, or against another polished body, or on a smooth, chalky soil, the shadow caused by this body is blue, instead of being black or colorless.

This effect is produced by the light of the sun being so weakened that the blue rays, which are reflected from the sky, which has always this color on a clear day, fall, and are again driven back, or reflected on that part of the wall which the dying light of the sun cannot strike; for, even at its last moment, the light which falls straight and direct is sufficiently strong to destroy that of the heavens, which is only reflected wherever they meet.

The first profile taken, as recorded, was that of Antigonus, who, having but one eye, had his likeness so taken, 330 B. C.

1980. SIGN PAINTING IN THE TIME OF GEORGE III.

Before the change which took place in the general appearance of London, soon after the accession of George III., the general use of signs, not only for taverns and alchouses, but also for tradesmen, furnished no small employment for the inferior rank of painters, and sometimes even for the superior professors. Mr. Canton painted several good signs; but among the most celebrated practitioners in this branch was a person by the name of Lamt, who possessed a considerable degree of ability. His pencil was bold and masterly, and well adapted to the subjects on which it was generally employed.

Mr. Wale, who was one of the founders of the Royal Academy, and appointed the first professor of perspective in that institution, also painted some signs, the principal of which was a whole length of Shakspeare, above five feet high, which was executed for and displayed before the door of a public house, at the north-west corner of Little Russel Street, Drury Lane. It was enclosed in a sumptuously carved gilt frame, and suspended by rich iron work. But this splendid object of attraction did not hang long, before it was taken down, in consequence of the act of Parliament which was passed for removing signs and other obstructions from the streets of London. Such was the total change of fashion, and the consequent disuse of signs, that this representation of the immortal Shakspeare was sold for a trifle to a broker, at whose door it stood for several years, until it was totally destroyed by the weather and other accidents.

1981. MOSAIC PAINTING.

Mosaic, as Wotton describes it in his work on architecture, is a kind of painting in small pebbles, cockles, or shells of sundry colors; and in recent times likewise with pieces of glass figured at pleasure. It is used chiefly for pavements and floorings.

The term mosaic is derived from the Latin musivum; and a noble lord ought not to have been laughed at in the House of Peers, when he pronounced the word, as it ought to be pronounced, musaic. It is odd enough that many persons have really conceived it to originate from the name of the great Jewish legislator!

Pliny shows that the Greeks were the first who practised this art, and notices a curious work of the kind, which was called "an unswept piece." This singular performance exhibited to the eye crums of bread, and such other things as fall from a table, which were so naturally imitated, that observers were completely deceived into the belief that "an unswept" pavement lay before them. It was formed of small shells painted with different colors.

Mosaic has been practised in Italy for these two thousand years. The manner of working it is by copying, with morsels of marble of different colors, every thing which a picture can imitate. Instead of common stones, difficult to be collected for works of magnitude, and requiring much time to prepare and polish, the Mosaic artists have sometimes recourse to a paste composed of glass and enamel, which, after passing through a crucible, takes a brilliant color. All the pieces are inlaid, and very thin, and their length is proportioned to their slenderness. They sometimes inlay a piece not thicker than a hair. They are easily fixed in a stucco or plaster of Paris placed to receive them, and soon dry and harden. Such works are so solid that they are capable of resisting the assaults of time through many ages. The mosaic of St. Mark at Venice has existed above nine hundred years, in perfect splendor and beauty.

The Church of St. Dominico at Siena has to boast of a peculiarly elegant mosaic pavement. Duccio, of Siena, in 1350, began that part of it which is beneath the altar of St. Ausano. In 1424, the pavement under the three steps of the high altar, representing David, Samson, Moses, Judas Macchabæus, and Joshua, was completed; and forty years afterwards, Matteo de Siena proceeded to embellish the part under the altar of the crucifix with the history of the martyrdom of the Innocents. The twelve Sibyls were added in 1483; and in 1500, Dominico Beccafumi, alias Maccarino, completed this magnificent pavement, by executing the middle part, next the pulpit.

How much is it to be lamented that the mosaic art was not in ancient Rome practised with the perfection it has obtained there in modern times. Had mosaic been applied to exact imitations of the pictures of Apelles, Zeuxis, and other great artists, they might still have remained to us; a new polish would have renewed their fading beauties, and restored them to immortal youth.

Some curious and playful effects have been produced in mosaic. A piece of this kind, when viewed standing, exhibited the head of a Satyr, but, seen another way, displayed a beautiful landscape; another, observed on one side, showed a bundle of herbs, and on the other the head and face of a man. It is not, however, supposed to require much skill to copy in mosaic a picture with the utmost faithfulness. The artists of this class are often persons quite ignorant of the art of painting; the chief things wanted are patience and a good eye. When the picture is finished, it appears at first in a most rude state, so rough and full of inequalities that one can scarcely trace the subject; but by close polishing, it becomes as smooth and lustrous as glass.

1982. LOST CHANCE OF A NATIONAL GALLERY.

George IV., when regent, proposed to connect Carlton House, in Pall Mall, with Marlborough House and St. James's Palace, by a gallery of portraits of the sovereigns and other historic personages of England; but, unfortunately, Mr. Nash's speculation of buying Carlton House and Gardens, and overlaying St. James's Park with terraces, prevailed; and this magnificent design of an historical gallery was abandoned, although the crown of England possesses materials for an historical collection, which would be infinitely superior to that of Versailles.

§ 198. SHORT BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

1983. RUSSELL, THE CRAYON PAINTER.

This ingenious man was a native of Guildford, and the eldest son of Mr. John Russell, bookseller, of that town. In early youth he evinced a strong predilection for drawing, and was placed under the tuition of Mr. Francis Coates, an academical of great talent, after whose decease "he enjoyed the reputation of being the first artist in crayon painting, in which he particularly excelled in the delineation of female beauty." In 1789, Russell was chosen a member of the Royal Academy, and soon after appointed crayon painter to the King, the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of York. Notwithstanding this constant succession of professional employment, he devoted considerable attention to astronomical pursuits; and his Selenographia, or Model of the Moon, which occupied the whole of his leisure from the year 1785 until 1797, affords a remarkable instance of his ingenuity and perseverance. At the time of his decease he had finished two other drawings, which completed his plan, and exhibit an elaborate view of the moon in a full state of illumination. Mr. Russell died at Hull in 1806. He published, in 1772, a small quarto tract on the Elements of Painting in Crayons, a work now exceedingly scarce.

We remember seeing two very clever portraits (large ovals) in crayons, by this artist, in the cabinet of Mr. Newland, of Guildford. They are, John Palmer, in the character of Comus, and Mrs. Wells, as Anne Page, in the Merry Wives of Windsor, and both have been engraved. Mr. Wilberforce sat to Russell for his portrait when young, and in recording this in his Diary, he characterized the painter as "high church, very high."

1984. BENJAMIN WEST IN ITALY.

Messrs. Jackson and Rutherford, on whom West had a letter of credit for the amount of his little fortune, furnished him with recommendations to Cardinal Albani and some other persons of talent and large consideration in Rome. He arrived in that city on the 10th of July, 1760, being then nearly twenty-two years old. Almost fifteen years had passed since his first childish attempts at drawing, and six years since he had devoted his whole time to the profession of painting with unremitting application.

A mistaken report having spread that an American savage had crossed the Atlantic to study the arts in Italy, he was at once an object of general curiosity and interest. The Irish gentry in Rome, on hearing his name, at first mistook him for West, the chief director of the Dublin Academy, who had obtained the prize for drawing the human figure when a student in the Academy at Paris. But when Mengs, the painter, requested to see a sketch of his drawing, he was obliged to own to an English gentleman, his friend, that his want of practice from the naked model and antique statues rendered him incapable of producing a drawing like those of other students.

This fact shows that his progress in America had been made upon canvas, and with the oil pencils only, excepting the mere chalking in the outlines of his sitters. We may presume that in perspective and anatomy, as well as in drawing the living model, he had little or no opportunity of acquirement. Dr. Shippen did not deliver the first lecture on anatomy and surgery, in Philadelphia, until 1764, four years after West had sailed for Italy. The merits of his Death of Socrates, and Trial of Susannah, must have been confined to character, expression, and composition; the two former being to be acquired by painting portraits, and observations on nature; the latter, by good taste and practice in sketching with the pen and ink, or any other material.

In attempting to paint history in Philadelphia, he might be compared to a man of genius, who, having acquired his language by the ear, and only used it orally, risks, under the powerful impulse of nature, to address a public assembly on some great occasion. The "thoughts that breathe and words that burn" may show his courage and the powers of his mind; but his want of method and of grammatical construction will also show the orator's want of intellectual cultivation. A genius for historical painting is born with the man. The power of telling a story impressively on canvas, which constitutes the high classical language of the pencil, is an artificial acquirement.

West's natural endowments impelled him to paint history before he had acquired the knowledge or skill of a draughtsman. He felt his want; but he knew that the latter alone is only the cold and empty learning of a pedant, which can never make a painter. In the arts of war and peace it is the same. The courage of the soldier, the soul of the hero, exists before he has learnt the use of arms. The coward when locked up in steel is only more exposed; and the fool who acquires the power of speaking a hundred tongues will only utter his mother tongue of folly in them all. A mere draughtsman, with a strong faculty of eye, a practised hand and sterile mind, in the midst of his noisy pretensions, is a fac-similist, not a painter.

Mr. West's first specimen of his art in Rome was a portrait of Mr. Robinson, afterwards Lord Grantham. This picture, having been privately painted, was afterwards mistaken, when submitted to the inspection of artists and amateurs, for a performance by Mengs, and spoken of as one of his best colored pictures. This was no ordinary compliment; for although Mengs was a man of cold fancy, and no great natural endowments, he was an artist of intense meditation, great practice, and great acquirements. At first, Mr. West was diverted from study by the various spectacles in the capital. This continual excitement of his sensations, the change of air, and different mode of living, produced a nervous affection, attended by a feverish debility, which compelled him to leave Rome, and return to Leghorn for quiet and retirement. He was there soon enabled, by the use of the baths, to return to Rome; but the same causes occasioned a relapse, which drove him back again to Leghorn. Although speedily relieved from his fever, he was long afflicted with a painful swelling in one of his ankles. To obtain the advice of Nanoni, a surgeon famous for his successful treatment of diseased joints, he was obliged to go to Florence, where he lingered for eleven months in confinement, before he was completely cured. During this melancholy period his enthusiasm was active. He had a drawing desk made, which enabled him to sketch and compose historical subjects in bed, and thus contrived to amuse and improve himself during his illness. Messrs. Jackson and Rutherford corresponded with him; and Sir Horace Mann, (the British minister at the court of the grand duke,) Mr. Dundas, (afterwards Lord Dundas,) Lord Cooper, Sir John Thorold, and many more of the English nobility and gentry, then resident there, were unsparing in their kind attentions. The Cardinal Albani wrote to him from Rome; the Marquises of Pandolphini, Mozzi, Ricardi, and Gerini, with several more of the Florentine nobles, were equally flattering in their civilities. These circumstances served to animate his professional ambition, and no doubt contributed to his recovery.

As soon as he was able to travel, pursuant to a former advice of Mengs, he visited Bologna, Parma, Verona, and Venice. He staid in each of those cities long enough to inspect the chief works of the celebrated masters. His course of study was necessarily hurried, but marked by intense application. Part of each day was devoted to inspecting the works of art, and a portion to attending dissections and lectures on anatomy, studying perspective, and drawing regularly from the human figure and best antique statues. He made slight drawings and sketches of the groups, or single figures, in the pictures of the old masters, which he most admired. In some instances, he sketched the entire composition. He painted but a few finished copies in oil, and these, principally with a view to acquire the method of impasting, pencilling, and coloring. Titian, Tintoretto, and Correggio, were his models for execution, chiaro-oscuro, and color. In this tour he was accompanied by a Mr. Matthews, of the house of Jackson and Rutherford, who united pleasure and business, and had affairs to settle and connections to extend, in the cities which they visited. This gentleman possessed classical attainments and a taste for the arts, and was delighted with the opportunity of acquiring further improvement and gratification by accompanying Mr. West in his visits to view the pictures and sculpture in the churches and palaces. The latter had been enabled to pursue his studies, and travel at his ease, by the public spirit of some American merchants. His enthusiastic application, the estimation in which he was held, and his success in his profession, had reached Mr. Allen, in Philadelphia. That gentleman received the letter which communicated this intelligence from Messrs. Jackson and Rutherford, on a day when he gave a dinner to Mr. Hamilton, the governor of Pennsylvania, and the principal magistrates of Philadelphia. Mr. Allen, justly considering Mr. West an honor to America, communicated his intention, before the company, to remit him the means of prosecuting his studies. In this, Mr. Hamilton, with equal pride and patriotism, begged leave to join; and the result was, that Mr. West, when setting out on his journey for improvement, was met by a letter of unlimited credit at Messrs. Jackson and Rutherford's. This is not mentioned as a piece of good fortune, but as one among many proofs, that if West had not preferred historical painting in England, his country was proud of him as the first American who had studied painting, and would have welcomed him home with public patronage as a portrait painter, had he chosen to recross the Atlantic.

On his return to Rome, he pursued the same course of study, and painted, about this time, a picture of Cymon and Iphigenia, which surprised Mengs. That artist, although he was weak enough to be flattered by some ignorant parasites, who spoke of his own works as being superior to those of Raphael, had the candor to praise this picture highly to Mr. Robinson. "If this young man," said he, "in his very first composition is superior to Battoni, what will he be by and by?" Battoni himself, on seeing the Cymon and Iphigenia, advised Mr. West to quit painting portraits, for that "history and poetry were his proper province."

He next paints a picture of Angelica and Medoro. This was received with equal applause, and proved the astonishing advance he had made in correctness of drawing, and the sense of beautiful forms. He painted many other studies, and made a number of sketches from the best pictures in Rome, and chiefly from those of Raphael. He had, just then, the good fortune to be introduced to Mr. Wilcox, the author of that admirable work, the Roman Conversations, and derived important advantages from his immense stores of knowledge in every thing relative to the costume and manners of the ancients.

Nearly three years had now passed, and the time approached of his engagement to revisit America; but his own wish, and a letter from his father, determined him to see the best collection of pictures in England, prior to his return. He, therefore, availed himself of an opportunity to accompany Mr. Patoune, a Scotch physician and amateur of the fine arts, who was for travelling homeward. West took leave of his friends at Florence, and finished, in Parma, a copy in oil colors, which he had begun when formerly in that city, from Correggio's famous Marriage of St. Catharine. That picture is generally called the St. Jerome, from a conspicuous figure of that saint, and is well known to collectors by the fine prints engraved from it by Cornelius Cort and Agostino Carracci.

Mr. Patoune, in the mean time, visited Florence, and then met Mr. West at Parma, from whence they journeyed to Genoa and Turin, and passed through Lyons to Paris. In each of these cities West found some hours daily to make pen and ink and chalk sketches from groups and figures in the fine works of art, which he passed his whole time in examining. He every where compared the differences of style, and formed solid conclusions of his own direction. His accomplished fellow-traveller frankly communicated his own opinions, and reaped a pleasure and instruction from his observations. In August, 1763, they both arrived in London.

1765. JOHN ASTLEY.

John Astley, the painter, was born at Wem, in Shropshire. He was a pupil of Hudson, and was at Rome about the same time with Sir Joshua Reynolds. After his return to England, he went to Dublin, practised there as a painter for three years, and in that time earned three thousand pounds. As he was painting his way back to London, in his own post chaise, with an outrider, he loitered in his neighborhood, and, visiting Nutsford Assembly, he there saw Lady Daniel, a widow, who was so captivated by him, that she contrived to sit to him for her portrait, and then offered him her hand, which he at once accepted. Poor Astley, in the decline of life, was disturbed by reflections upon the dissipation of his early days, and was haunted with apprehensions of indigence and want. He died at his house, Duckenfield Lodge, Cheshire, November 14, 1787, and was buried at the church of that village.

The Spanish painter Ribera, known by the name of Spagnoletto, was of very humble parentage; but, though suffering the extreme of poverty, he felt within himself such powers of genius as were superior to depression. After being some time with Ribalta, he went to Rome, and, enlisting himself in the Academy, pursued his studies with an industry which knew no remission, even whilst he was in the pursuit of the scanty necessities of life, which he obtained by the sale of drawings and sketches in the Academy. Without friends, and, at times, almost without food or raiment, he persisted in his course with a stubborn perseverance, which nothing could divert from its object.

One day, a cardinal, passing in his coach, observed a tattered figure employed in painting a board affixed to the outside of one of the ordinary houses in the streets of Rome. The youth and wretchedness of the spectacle excited his pity, and the singular attention with which he pursued his work attracted his notice. It was Ribera, in the act of earning his bread, of which his appearance showed he was absolutely in want. The cardinal called him to his coach, and, ordering him to his palace, immediately domiciliated the lucky youth.

Here he lived in ease and affluence; but that virtue which the frowns of fortune could not shake was not proof against her caresses. Young Ribera became a slave to pleasures of which he had not before even speculative enjoyment. At length the ruin which his genius was menaced with alarmed his pride. With one gallant effort he burst the shackles of temptation, and, rallying out of the palace of the cardinal, reassumed his dignity of soul and poverty at once.

He had now all his former mannerisms to encounter, with the aggravated contrast of experienced delights. The slender encouragement he met with at Rome determined him to go to Naples. He set out in a ragged jacket, having pledged his cloak to make provision for the journey. In Naples he engaged himself to a common painter for hire. This man, however, had some science and much humanity; the abilities of Ribera surprised him, he clearly saw how superior his talents were to the low occupation in which he was engaged. He employed him on better subjects; and a further acquaintance opening to him his good qualities, he gave him his only daughter in marriage.

It was now that Ribera's genius was enabled to display itself. A new choice of subjects presented themselves to the world; and people saw, with a terror partaking of delight, martyrdoms, executions, and torments, expressed with a truth and fidelity hitherto unknown. Ribera selected all that sacred or classic history afforded in the terrible, for "horror was not displeasing to him." All that the pagan theology, or the poetical hell, had represented to appall the guilty, was to be found on the canvases of Ribera. A martyred St. Bartholomew, stripped to the muscles, became a study for anatomists. Cato of Utica, in the act of tearing out his bowels, brought the horror of self-murder to the eyes and hearts of men. Hercules, struggling in the throes of death, and all tortured in the fabulous realm of Pluto, were now exhibited like Eschylus's Furies on the stage of Athens, and in some instances with the same effects. His pictures were, from that time, eagerly sought after, and adorned the best collections in Europe.

1697. SHORT SKETCH OF GAINSBOROUGH.

Gainsborough was born at Sudbury, in Suffolk, in 1727, and had the good fortune to take Nature for his mistress in art, and to follow her through life. His place of nativity will be long remembered. A beautiful wood, of four miles' extent, is shown, whose ancient trees, winding glades, and sunny nooks inspired him, while yet a schoolboy, with the love of art. Scenes are pointed out where he used to sit and fill his copy-books with pencillings of flowers and trees, and whatever pleased his fancy. No fine clump of trees, no picturesque stream nor romantic glade, no cattle grazing, nor flocks reposing, nor peasants pursuing their work, nor pastoral occupations, escaped his diligent pencil. He received some instruction from Gravelot, and from Hayman, the friend of Hogarth. Having married, he settled in Ipswich, but in his thirty-first year removed to Bath, where he was appreciated as he deserved, and was enabled by his pencil to live respectably.

He then removed to London, where he added the lucrative branch of portrait painting to his favorite pursuit of landscape. The permanent splendor of his colors, and the natural and living air which he communicated to whatever he touched, made him at this time, in the estimation of many, a dangerous rival of Sir Joshua himself.

Gainsborough was quite a child of nature, and every thing that came from his easel smacked strongly of that raciness, freshness, and originality the study of nature alone can give. The Woodman and his Dog in the Storm was one of his favorite compositions; yet, while he lived, he could find no purchaser at the paltry sum of one hundred guineas. After his death, five hundred guineas were paid for it by Lord Gainsborough, in whose house it was subsequently burnt. The Shepherd's Boy in the Shower, and the Cottage Girl with her Dog and Pitcher, were also his prime favorites. Although he had the good taste to express no contempt for the society of literary or fashionable men, unlike the courtly Sir Joshua Reynolds, Gainsborough cared little for their company.

1698. THE PAINTER OPIE.

When Opie was ten years old, he saw Mark Oates—an elder companion, and now a captain of marines—draw a butterfly; and, looking anxiously on, he exclaimed, "I think I can draw a butterfly as well as Mark Oates." Accordingly he took a pencil, tried, succeeded, and ran breathless home to tell his mother what he had done.

Soon afterwards, he saw a picture of a farm-yard, in a house in Truro, where his father was at work. He looked and looked, went away, returned again and looked, and seemed unwilling to be out of sight of this prodigy. For this forwardness, his father, whose hand seems to have been ever ready in that way, gave him a sharp chastisement; but the lady of the house interposed, and indulged the boy with another look.

On returning home, he procured cloth and colors, and made a tolerable copy of the painting, from memory alone. He likewise attempted original delineations from life, and, by degrees, hung the humble dwelling round with likenesses of his relatives and companions, much to the pleasure of his uncle, a man of sense and knowledge above his condition, but greatly to the vexation of his father, who could not comprehend the merit of such an idle trade.

"Dr. Wolcot," (better known as Peter Pindar,) says Smith, "compassionately took him as a lad to clean knives, feed the dog, &c., purposely to screen him from the beating his father would now and then give him for chalking the sawpit all over."

"He always staid a long time when he went to the slaughter-house for paunches for the dog. At last, the doctor was so wonderfully pleased by John's bringing him home an astonishing likeness of his friend the carcass butcher, that he condescended to sit to him, and the production was equally surprising."

How long he remained with Wolcot has not been mentioned. When yet very young, we find him commencing portrait painting by profession, and wandering from town to town in quest of employment. "One of these expeditions," says Prince Hoare, "was to Padstow, whither he set forward, dressed, as usual, in a boy's plain short jacket, and carrying with him all necessary apparatus for portrait painting. Here, among others, he painted the whole household of the ancient and respectable family of Prideaux, even to the dogs and cats of the family."

"He remained so long absent from home, that some uneasiness began to arise on his account, but it was soon dissipated by his returning dressed in a handsome coat, with very long skirts, laced ruffles, and silk stockings. On seeing his mother, he ran to her, and taking out of his pocket twenty guineas, which he had earned by his pencil, he desired her to keep them, adding that in the future he should maintain himself."

For his mother he always entertained the deepest affection, and neither age nor the pressure of worldly business diminished his enthusiasm in the least. He loved to speak of the mildness of her nature and the tenderness of her heart—of her love of truth and her maternal circumspection. He delighted to recall her epithets of fondness, and relate how she watched over him when a boy, and warmed his gloves and great-coat in the winter mornings, on his departure for school. This good woman lived to the age of ninety-two, enjoyed the fame of her son, and was gladdened with his bounty.

1699. HENRY HOWARD.

Mr. Howard, the well-known secretary and professor of painting to the Royal Academy, died October 5, 1847, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. He was born in 1770, and was at Rome in 1794. When in his twenty-fourth year, he forwarded his first work, the Death of Cain, to the Royal Academy exhibition. In 1807, he painted the Infant Bacchus brought by Mercury to the Nymphs of Nysa; and in the autumn of the same year he was elected a royal academician.

Of his fellow-academicians, in 1848, only two out of forty survived—Sir Martin Archer Shee and Mr. J. M. W. Turner. Others, however, elected after him, have died before him — Callcott and William Daniell, for instance; Wilkie, Dawe, Raeburn, Hilton, Collins, Jackson, Chantrey, Constable, and Newton. His diploma picture on his election was the Four Angels, loosed from the River Euphrates. For fifty-three years, from 1794 to 1847, Mr. Howard never missed sending to a Royal Academy exhibition. It would be difficult, perhaps, to find another example of such assiduity; yet, where his pictures went — for he had few or no patrons, so called — it is hard to say. Banks and Flaxman, the two great sculptors, took notice of Howard's early efforts, gave him friendly encouragement in all he did, and suggested, it is said, new subjects for his pencil. Yet his pictures were not very popular; they are classically cold; his place, therefore, in the history of art is not likely to be high or lasting.

1990. GETTING OVER A DIFFICULTY.

A countryman brought a piece of board to an artist, with the request that he would paint upon it St. Christopher, as large as life. "But," returned the artist, "that board is much too small for that purpose." The countryman looked perplexed at this unexpected discovery. "That's a bad job," said he; "but lookee, sir, ye can let his legs hang down over the edge of the board."

1991. PICTORIAL ABSURDITIES.

Janfranc has thrown Churchmen in their robes at the feet of our Savior, when an infant; and Algarotti relates, that Paul Veronese introduced several Benedictines among the guests at the feast of Cana.

An altar piece, in a church at Capua, painted by Chella delle Puera, representing the Annunciation, is a curious collection of absurdities. The Virgin is seated in a rich arm-chair of crimson velvet, with gold flowers; a cat and parrot placed near her seem extremely attentive to the whole scene; and on a table are a silver coffee-pot and cup.

A modern Italian has painted the same subject in a way equally absurd. The Virgin is on her knees near the toilet: on a chair are thrown a variety of fashionable dresses, which show that, in the painter's opinion at least, she must have been a practised coquette; and at a little distance appears a cat, with its head lifted up towards the angel, and its ears on end to catch what he has to say.

Paulo Mazzochi painted a piece representing the four elements, in which fishes marked the sea, moles the earth, and a salamander the fire. He wished to have represented the air by a chameleon; but not knowing how to draw that scarce animal, he contented himself, from a similarity of sounds, to introduce a camel, who, extending his long neck, snuffs up the breezes around him.

Anachronisms of this description have been so often noticed, that they are now scarcely worth collecting; but there are others, of a rarer sort, which owe their existence to the barbarous transformations which pictures, originally correct, have undergone, to please the passions and prejudices of the day; and which it is well to treasure up as marks of the impotence of power, when it would torture genius into a violation of sincerity and truth.

In the chapel of one of the principal colleges in Paris, there was a picture representing the general-in-chief of the army of Egypt, attended by some of his aides-de-camp, paying a visit to the plague hospitals. Since the restoration of the Bourbon family to the throne of France, Bonaparte has been converted into Christ, and his aides-de-camp into apostles. The artist who has made these alterations has not, however, thought it necessary entirely to change the costume, and our Savior appears in the boots of Napoleon.

An instance of similar absurdity occurred at Naples, where, to preserve Gros's magnificent picture of the battle of Aboukir, a Neapolitan general, who never set foot in Egypt, has been substituted for Murat.

1992. BARRETT'S CATS.

The anecdote of the two cats, which has been told of many learned men, originated with the painter Barrett. His only pets were a cat and a kitten, its progeny. A friend, seeing two holes in the bottom of his door, asked him for what purpose he made them there. Barrett said it was for his cats to go in and out.

"Why," replied his friend, "would not one do for both?"

"You silly man," answered the doctor, "how could the big cat get into the little hole?"

"But," said his friend, "could not the little one go through the big hole?"

"Egad," said Barrett, "and so she could; but I never thought of that."

§ 200. FIRST DEVELOPMENTS AND EFFORTS OF GENIUS.

The Blacksmith of Antwerp, or Quintin Matsys.

1993. ALL FOR LOVE.

Quintin Misius or Matsys, was a blacksmith at Antwerp. When in his twentieth year, he became enamored of a young woman of his condition in life, who was at the same time sought in marriage by a painter of some repute. The damsel confessed to Quintin that she had a greater inclination for him than for the painter, but that she and her friends had an unconquerable aversion to his trade.

Quintin, who from his childhood had evinced a strong taste for designing, instantly resolved to be on equal terms with his rival, and to abandon the hammer for the brush. He applied to his new art with so much liking and assiduity, that in a short time he produced pictures which gave a promise of the highest excellence. He gained for his reward the fair hand for which he sighed; and rose ere long to a high rank in his profession. We shall give his story more fully, and even with "poet license," on page 457.

Among other productions of Quintin's pencil were the portraits, in one piece, of the two friends, Erasmus and Egidius, which afterwards formed part of the collection of Charles I. of England. Sir Thomas More, in some lines which he wrote on his painting, apostrophized the artist in terms which show the high estimation in which he was held, both by his countrymen and foreigners.

*"Quintine, Ouerteris Novat artis
Magno non minor artifex Apelle
Mire composito frotens colore," &c.*

Quintin died in 1529. A hundred years afterwards a monument was erected to his memory in the cathedral of Notre Dame, at Antwerp, the inscription on which records, in a few expressive words, the singular story of his life:—

"Connubialis amor de muliebri fecit Appellen."

1994. OPIE'S EARLY TRAINING.

"I first discovered Opie," said Dr. Wolcot, "in a little hovel in the parish of St. Agnes, in Cornwall.

He was the son of a poor sawyer. I was first led to notice him by accidentally seeing some little rude drawings which he had made, and, finding that he had a genius that way, I used to give him little paints, brushes, money, and at length, finding that he was a youth of promise, I boarded and lodged him in my house gratuitously, during which time I instructed him in drawing; for I used to draw tolerably well myself, before my sight became so bad.

"Opie soon excelled his master, and began to paint portraits in Devonshire, at seven shillings and sixpence a head; when he was not a little proud of his success." He further observed, his "powers in landscape painting were so great, that, had he devoted his mind alone to that study, he would have been second only to Wilson.

"In a short time, Opie sprung into notice, and being invited to dine at the mansion of a rich country squire, I thought it right to give him the following advice how to deport himself under this distinguished honor; for Opie was as rough a cub as was ever turned out from the wilderness. I told him, 'Be sure, now, not to blow your beer before you drink; do not pick your teeth with your fork; and take care not to turn round and drink the servant's good health.'

"His celebrity having attracted the notice of the royal family, he was commanded to repair to Buckingham House with some of his pictures. Accordingly, he went, and the subject of that which pleased the king most was a man struck blind by lightning. This picture the king purchased for ten guineas, having previously told Mr. West that he could only afford to pay a gentleman's price for any of Opie's pictures which he might purchase. Opie flew back on the wings of delight to tell me what a liberal sum the king had promised him for his picture. I soon threw a wet blanket over Opie's ardor, by dryly saying, 'Thou art a raw fellow, to let the king make such a bargain with thee; for do you not remember that I offered to give you as much for it without the frame, which is of itself worth two guineas more?' 'So you did,' said Opie; 'I will go back to the king, and tell him I cannot let him have the frame at that money; so I will.' Upon which he took his hat, and I had the greatest difficulty to prevent his carrying his intention into execution."

1995. FIRST ATTEMPTS IN ART OF SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

This excellent painter, at an early period of his life, made some trifling attempts at drawing from common prints; but they were not such as to give much promise of future excellence. There is now one of these very early essays in the possession of his family. It is a perspective view of a book-case, under which his father has written, "Done by Joshua, out of pure idleness."

1996. ANECDOTES OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

When only seventeen, Michael Angelo executed for Lorenzo a basso rilievo in bronze: the subject was the Battle of Centaurs. When very old, the great painter once came to see this work of his early youth, and was heard to say that he regretted that he had not entirely devoted himself to sculpture. His next work was a Sleeping Cupid. The wise of that age thought it impossible for modern art to produce any thing equal to the antique; and they were not far wrong, for Michael Angelo had not then arisen. So the dealer who purchased his Cupid had the cunning adroitness to stain it in imitation of the defacements of time, and bury it in a vineyard. He afterwards pretended to discover it by accident, and sold it as an antique statue of Cardinal San Giorgio. The praise it obtained induced him to reveal the secret; the deceived public generously forgave the trick, and the artist was invited to Rome.

1997. SIR JOHN SINCLAIR THE CAUSE OF WILKIE'S BECOMING A PAINTER.

Sir John Sinclair happening once to dine in company with Mr. Wilkie, the painter, that distinguished artist was asked, in the course of conversation, if any particular circumstances had led him to adopt his profession. Sir John inquired, "Had your father, mother, or any of your relations a turn for painting? or what led you to follow that art?" To which Mr. Wilkie replied, "The truth is, Sir John, that you made me a painter." "How, I!" exclaimed the baronet; "I never had the pleasure of meeting you before." Mr. Wilkie then gave the following explanation: "When you were drawing up the Statistical Account of Scotland, my father, who was a clergyman in Fife, had much correspondence with you respecting his parish, in the course of which you sent him a colored drawing of a soldier, in the uniform of your Highland Fencible Regiment. I was so delighted with the sight, that I was constantly drawing copies of it, and was thus insensibly transformed into a painter."

1998. THE GARLAND TWINER.

Pausius, the celebrated painter of Sicily, in his youth became enamored of a beautiful female of the name of Glycera, who had a singularly elegant taste in the arrangement of flowers into chaplets. Pausius, painting after nature and his mistress, became highly distinguished for his skill as a painter of flowers. The last effort of his pencil was a picture of Glycera herself, seated, and in the act of arranging a chaplet. A production, in the creation of which, love, genius, and gratitude equally assisted, necessarily became a masterpiece; it was called the Garland Twiner, and a copy of it sold for no less a sum than two talents.

1999. THE CAT RAPHAEL.

Gottfried Mind, a celebrated Swiss painter, was called the Cat Raphael, from the excellence with which he painted that animal. This peculiar talent was discovered and awakened by chance. At the time when Frendenberger painted his picture of the Peasant cleaving Wood before his Cottage, with his wife sitting by and feeding her child with pap out of a pot, round which a cat is prowling, Mind cast a broad stare on the sketch of this last figure, and said, in his rugged, laconic way, "That is no cat!" Frendenberger asked, with a smile, whether he thought he could do it better. Mind offered to try; went into a corner, and drew the cat, which Frendenberger liked so much that he made his new pupil finish it out, and the master copied the scholar's work; for it is Mind's cat that is engraved in Frendenberger's plate. Prints of Mind's cats are now very common.

2000. HOGARTH.

Hogarth was bound apprentice to a mean engraver of arms on plate, but did not remain long in this occupation before an accidental circumstance discovered the impulse of his genius, and that it was directed to painting. One Sunday, he set out with two or three of his companions on an excursion to Highbury. The weather being hot, they went into a public house, where they had not remained long before a quarrel arose between two persons in the room, one of whom struck the other on the head with a quart pot, and cut him severely. Hogarth drew out his pencil, and produced an extremely ludicrous picture of the scene. What rendered this piece the more pleasing was, that it exhibited an exact likeness of the man, with the portrait of his antagonist, and the figures, in caricature, of the persons gathered round him.

2001. GENIUS IN BOYHOOD.

There was once, in the Franklin school, Boston, an exceedingly dull boy. One day the teacher, wishing to look out a word, took up the lad's dictionary, and on opening it found the blank leaves covered with drawings. He called the boy to him.

"Did you draw these?" said the teacher.
"Yes, sir," said the boy, with a downcast look.
"I do not think it is well for boys to draw in their books," said the teacher; "and I would rub these out if I were you; but they are well done. Did you ever take lessons?"

"No, sir," said the boy, his eyes sparkling.
"Well, I think you have a talent for this thing. I should like you to draw me something when you are at leisure at home, and bring it to me. In the mean time, see how well you can recite your lessons."

The boy felt he was understood. He began to love his teacher. He became animated, and fond of his books. He took delight in gratifying his teacher by his faithfulness to his studies; while the teacher took every opportunity to encourage him in his natural desires. The boy became one of the first scholars, and gained the medal before he left school. After this he became an engraver, laid up money enough to go to Europe, studied the works of old masters, sent home productions from his own pencil, which found a place in some of the best collections of paintings, and is now one of the most promising artists of his years in the country.

2002. MORLAND.

The unfortunate George Morland gave very early indications of his genius. He used to draw objects on the floor; and when his father, who was a painter on crayons, stooped to pick up the scissors or the crayons which appeared on the floor, the laugh was often enjoyed against him. These, and a thousand other monkey tricks, made George the favorite child; his father saw the germ of future excellence in his own favorite art, and at the age of fourteen, he had him apprenticed to himself for seven years, during which his application was incessant. His days were devoted to painting, his summer evenings to reading, and those of winter to drawing by lamp light. It was during this period that he gained nearly his whole knowledge, acquired correctness of eye, with obedience of hand, and those principles which laid the foundation of his future excellence.

2003. ALLSTON'S DECISION ON HIS OWN PICTURE.

There is something inimitably touching, simple, and beautiful in the following fact: Some years after Allston had acquired a considerable reputation as a painter, a friend showed him a miniature, and begged he would give a sincere opinion upon its merits, as the young man who drew it had some thoughts of becoming a painter by profession. Allston, after much pressing, and declining to give an opinion, candidly told the gentleman he feared the lad would never do any thing as a painter, and advised his following some more congenial pursuit. His friend then convinced him that the work had been done by Allston himself, for this very gentleman, when Allston was quite young.

2004. ALLSTON AT COLLEGE.

"My leisure hours at college," says Allston, "were chiefly devoted to the pencil, to the composition of figures and landscapes. I do not remember that I preferred one to the other; my only guide in the choice was the inclination of the moment. There was an old landscape at the house of a friend in Cambridge (whether Italian or Spanish, I know not) that gave me my first hints in color in that branch: it was of a rich, deep tone, though not by the hands of a master—the work perhaps of a moderate artist, but of one who lived in a good age, when he could not help catching something of the good that was abroad. In the coloring of figures, the pictures of Pine in the Columbian Museum, in Boston, were my first masters. Pine had certainly, as far as I can recollect, considerable merit in color. But I had a higher master in the head of Cardinal Bentivoglio, from Vandyke, in the college library, which I obtained permission to copy one winter vacation. This copy from Vandyke was by Smybert, an English painter, who came to this country with Dean, afterwards Bishop Berkeley. At that time, it seemed to me perfection; when I saw the original, some years afterwards, I found I had to alter my notions of perfection. However, I am grateful to Smybert for the instruction he gave me—his work rather. Deliver me from kicking down even the weakest step of an early ladder."

2005. JARVIS SPENCER.

Jarvis Spencer was a miniature painter of much celebrity, contemporaneous with Hogarth. He was originally a gentleman's servant; but, having a natural turn for art, he amused himself with drawing. It happened that one of the family with whom he lived sat for a portrait to a miniature painter, and when the work was completed, it was shown to Spencer, who said he thought he could copy it. He was allowed to make the attempt, when his success was so great, that the family he lived with at once patronized him, and by their interest he became a fashionable painter of the day.

2006. INMAN'S EARLY HISTORY.

About the year 1814, Wertmuler's celebrated picture of Danaë was exhibited at Mr. Jarvis's rooms in Murray Street, New York: and thither, as to other exhibitions, the father of the young Inman took him. His second visit to the studio of Jarvis he has thus described:—

"On a second visit, when I went alone, I saw Mr. Jarvis himself, who came up from his painting room into the apartment in which the Danaë, with other works of art, was placed. On observing his entrance, with a maul-stick in his hand, and palette on his arm, I removed my hat and bowed, presuming that he was the proprietor of the establishment. At that time, I regarded an artist with peculiar reverence. Without noticing my salutation, he walked rapidly towards me, and, with his singular look of scrutiny, peered into my face. Suddenly he exclaimed, 'By Heavens! the very head for a painter!' He then put some questions to me, invited me below stairs, and permitted me to examine his portfolios.

"He shortly after called upon my father, and proposed to take me as a pupil. I was at this time preparing for my entrance to the West Point institution as a cadet, for which I had already obtained a warrant. My father left the matter to myself, and I gladly acceded to Mr. Jarvis's proposal. I accordingly entered upon a seven years' apprenticeship with him.

"Notwithstanding his phrenological observations upon my cranium, a circumstance connected with my first effort in oil colors would seem to contradict the favorable inference it contained. Another of his students and myself were set down before a small tinted landscape, with instructions to copy it. Palettes and brushes were put into our hands, and to work we went. After much anxious looking and laborious daubing, Mr. Jarvis came up to see what progress we had made. After regarding our work some moments in silence, he astounded us with these words: 'Get up! Get up! These are the worst attempts I ever saw. Here, Philip, (turning to a mulatto boy, who was grinding paints in another part of the room,) take the brushes, and finish what these gentlemen have begun so bravely.' All this took place in the presence of several strangers, who had come to look at the gallery. You can imagine what a shock our self-love received. Such mortifications are the most enduring of all remembrances. Notwithstanding this rebuff, I managed to make other and more successful efforts."

Inman was in the studio of Jarvis seven years, under steady and thorough training. His improvement was so rapid, that ere long Jarvis used to put him "upon his own canvases."

For several years after Fuseli came to England, he devoted himself mainly to literature, and wrote largely, particularly for the Analytical Review. At length he found his way to the studio of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and submitted several of his drawings to the president's examination, who looked at them for some time, and then said, "How long have you studied in Italy?" "I never studied in Italy. I studied at Zurich. I am a native of Switzerland;—do you think I should study in Italy? and, above all, is it worth while?" "Young man," said Reynolds, "were I the author of these drawings, and were there offered me ten thousand a year not to practise as an artist, I would reject the proposal with contempt."

This very favorable opinion, from one who considered all he said, and was so remarkable for accuracy of judgment, decided the destiny of Fuseli; he forsook forever the hard and thankless trade of literature, refused a living in the church from some patron who had been struck with his talents, and addressed himself to painting with heart and hand.

2008. MICHAEL ANGELO IN BOYHOOD AND OLD AGE.

This great man showed from his infancy a strong inclination for drawing, and made so early a proficiency in it, that, at the age of fourteen, he is said to have corrected the drawings of his master, Domenico Gilhandai. When Michael Angelo was an old man, one of these drawings being shown to him, he said, "In my youth I was a better artist than I am now."

2009. LOVE MAKES A PAINTER.

Matsys was a blacksmith at Antwerp, but dared to love the beautiful daughter of a painter. The damsel returned his passion—but meekly, hesitatingly; as is the way of young damsels, at an age when the heart one moment trembles before that mythological child with whom it plays the next. The father was inexorable.

"Wert thou a painter," said he, "she should be thine; but a blacksmith!—never!"

The young man mused and mused; the hammer dropped from his hand; the god stirred within him; a thousand glorious conceptions passed like shadows across his brain.

"I will be a painter," said he. But again his soul was cast down as he reflected on his ignorance of the mechanical part of the art, and genius troubled at his own fiat. His first efforts reassured him. He drew, and the lines that came were the features of that one loved and lovely face engraved on his heart.

"I will paint her portrait!" cried he. "Love will inspire me!" And he made the attempt. He gazed upon her till his soul became drunken with beauty. In the wild inspiration of such moments, his colors flashed fast and thick upon the canvas, till they formed what one might have imagined to be the reflection of his mistress.

"There!" said he, showing the work to the astonished father,— "there! I claim the prize; for I am a painter!"

He exchanged his portrait for the original; continued to love and to paint; became eminent among the sons of art in his day and generation; and dying was buried honorably in the cathedral of his native city, where they wrote upon his tomb, "Connubialis amor de muliere fecit Apellen!"

2010. SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE'S BOYHOOD.

When Lawrence was but ten years old, his name had flown over the kingdom; he had read scenes from Shakspeare in a way that called forth the praise of Garrick, and drawn faces and figures with such skill as to obtain the approbation of Prince Hoare. His father, desirous of making the most of his talents, carried him to Oxford, where he was patronized by heads of colleges, and noblemen of taste, and produced a number of portraits, wonderful in one so young and un instructed. Money now came in. He went to Bath, hired a house; raised his price from one guinea to two; his Mrs. Siddons, as Zara, was engraved; Sir Henry Harpur desired to adopt him as his son; Prince Hoare saw something so angelic in his face, that he proposed to paint him in the character of Christ; and the artists of London heard with wonder of a boy who was rivaling their best efforts with the pencil, and realizing, as was imagined, a fortune.

The Hon. Daines Barrington has the following record of Lawrence's precocious talent in his Miscellanies: "This boy is now, (viz., February, 1780,) nearly ten years and a half old. But at the age of nine, without the most distant instruction from any one, he was capable of copying historical pictures in a masterly style, and also succeeded amazingly in compositions of his own, particularly that of Peter denying Christ. In about seven minutes he scarcely ever failed of drawing a strong likeness of any person present, which had generally much freedom and grace."

Among the many legends respecting this illustrious artist, it is said that when young he looked long and earnestly on one of the pictures of Raphael, his brow colored, his eye brightened, and he exclaimed, "I also am a painter!" Titian, when he first saw his works, exclaimed, "Were I not Titian, I would wish to be Correggio."

2012. BENJAMIN WEST.

The first display of talent in the infant mind of Mr. West was curious, and still more so from its occurring where there was nothing to excite it.

America, his native spot, had scarcely a specimen of the arts, and, being the son of a Quaker, he had never seen a picture or a print; his pencil was of his own invention; his colors were given to him by an Indian savage; his whole progress was a series of invention; and painting to him was not the result of a lesson, but an instinctive passion.

When only seven years of age, he was one day left in charge of an infant niece in the cradle, and had a fan to flap away the flies from the child: after some time, it happened to smile, and its beauty attracted his attention. He looked at it with a pleasure which he never before experienced; and observing some paper on a table, together with pens and red and black ink, he seized them with agitation, and endeavored to delineate a portrait; although at this period he had never seen an engraving or a picture. Hearing the approach of his mother and sister, he endeavored to conceal what he had been doing; but the old lady, observing his confusion, inquired what he was about, and asked him to show her the paper. He obeyed, entreating her not to be angry. Mrs. West, after looking some time at the drawing with evident pleasure, said to her daughter, "I declare he has made a likeness of little Sally;" and kissed him with much fondness and satisfaction. This encouraged him to say, that if it would give her any pleasure, he would make pictures of the flowers which she held in her hand; for his genius was awakened, and he felt that he could imitate the forms of any of those things which pleased his sight.

Young West continued to make drawings with pen and ink, until camel hair pencils were described to him, when he found a substitute in the tapering fur of a cat's tail. In the following year, a cousin sent him a box of colors and pencils, with several pieces of canvas prepared for the easel, and six engravings.

The box was received with delight, and in the colors, the oils, and the pencils, young West found all his wants supplied. He rose at the dawn of the following day, and carried the box to a room in the garret, where he spread his canvas, prepared a palette, and began to imitate the figures in the engravings. Enchanted with his art, he forgot the school hours, and joined the family at dinner without mentioning the employment in which he had been engaged. In the afternoon, he again retired to his study in the garret; and for several days successively he thus withdrew, and devoted himself to painting. Mrs. West, suspecting that the box occasioned the neglect of school, went into the garret, and found him employed on a picture. Her anger was soon appeased by the sight of the performance. She saw not a mere copy, but a composition from two of the engravings. She kissed him with transports of affection, and assured him that she would intercede with his father to pardon him for absenting himself from school. Sixty-seven years afterwards, this piece, finished when the artist was in his eighth year, was exhibited in the same room with the sublime painting of Christ rejected; and Mr. West declared, that there were inventive touches in his first and juvenile essay, which all his subsequent experience had not enabled him to surpass.

2013. TALL OAKS FROM LITTLE ACORNS

Dr. Johnson informs us that Sir Joshua Reynolds had the first fondness of his art excited by the perusal of Richardson's Treatise.

2014. TRICK OF CRAASBECK.

Craasbeck, a Flemish painter, entertaining some doubts as to the affection of his wife, who was a modest and agreeable woman, and being anxious to ascertain if she really loved him, one day stripped his breast naked, and painted the appearance of a mortal wound on his skin; his lips and cheeks he painted of a livid color, and on his palette near him he placed his knife, painted on the blade with a blood-like color. When every thing was prepared, he shrieked out, as if he had been that instant killed, and lay still. His wife ran in, saw him in that terrifying condition, and showed so many tokens of unaffected natural passion, and real grief, that he rose up convinced of her affection, dissuaded her from grieving, and freely told her his motive for the whole contrivance, which he would not have violated truth by describing as a very despicable trick.

§ 201. VARIOUS STYLES, HABITS IN PAINTING, &c.

2015. ARTISTICAL RAPIDITY.

Weenix, the Dutch painter, called the Old, frequently sketched and finished a picture, five or six feet high, in the course of a single day, and particularly one representing a bull baited by dogs, painted after nature in that space of time. It is also asserted that, in one summer's day, he began and finished three portraits, on canvas, of a three quarter size, and the heads were full as large as life.

2016. DOMENICHINO.

Domenichino, the painter, was accustomed to act the characters of all the figures he would represent on his canvas, and to speak aloud whatever the passion he meant to describe could prompt. Painting the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, Carracci one day caught him in a violent passion, speaking in a terrible and menacing tone. He was at that moment employed on a soldier who was threatening the saint. When this fit of enthusiastic abstraction had passed, Carracci ran and embraced him, acknowledging that Domenichino had been that day his master; and that he had learnt from him the true manner to succeed in catching the expression—that great pride of the painter's art.

Thus different are the sentiments of the intelligent and the unintelligent on the same subject. A Carracci embraced a kindred genius for what a Le Clerc or a Selden would have ridiculed.

2017. GERARD DOUW'S NICETY.

Douw was the most wonderful of all the Flemish masters in the nicety of his finishing. Sandrart gives a striking proof of his inexhaustible patience in this respect. He says that, having once, in company with Bamboccio, visited Douw, they could not forbear expressing their admiration of the prodigious neatness of the finishing of a minute object. Douw told them he could spend three days more in working on that broom, before he should account it entirely complete.

The same author says, that in a family picture of Mrs. Spiering, the lady had sat days for the finishing of one of her hands, that leaned on an arm-chair. For this reason, not many would sit to him for their portraits; and he therefore indulged himself mostly in works of fancy, in which he could introduce objects of quiet life, and employ on them as much time as suited his inclination.

2018. DOUW'S PATRON.

Houbraken affirms that Douw's great patron, Mr. Spiering, allowed him a thousand guilders a year, and paid, besides, whatever he demanded for his pictures, and purchased some of them for their weight in silver. But Sandrart, with more probability, assures us that the one thousand guilders were paid to Gerard on no other consideration than that he should give his benefactor the option of every picture he painted, for which he was immediately to receive his utmost demand.

2019. REYNOLDS'S DESIRE FOR IMPROVEMENT.

"The earnest desire," says Northcote, "which Sir Joshua Reynolds had to render his pictures perfect, to the utmost of his ability, and in each succeeding instance to surpass the former, occasioned his frequently making them inferior to what they had been in the course of the process; and when it was observed to him, 'that probably he never had sent to the world any one of his paintings in as perfect a state as it had been,' he answered, that he believed the remark was very just, but that, notwithstanding, he certainly gained ground by it on the whole, and improved himself by the experiment; adding, 'If you are not bold enough to run the risk of losing, you can never hope to gain.'

"With the same ardent wish of advancing himself in his art, I have heard him say that whenever a new sitter came to him for a portrait, he always began it with a full determination to make it the best picture he had ever painted; neither would he allow it to be an excuse for his failure, to say, 'The subject was a bad one for a picture.' 'There was always nature,' he would observe, 'which, if well treated, was fully sufficient for the purpose.'

The youthful reader of the foregoing anecdote may learn from it a lesson of greater worth than all Sir Joshua Reynolds's reputation or money. He who means to excel in any department must continually strive to do better than ever he did before; he must strive to excel himself. Paul had taught this doctrine eighteen hundred years ago.

2020. YEARS OF STUDY.

Titian, whom Sir Joshua Reynolds valued so highly that he used to say he would be content to ruin himself to possess one genuine production of his pencil, devoted no less than eighty years of his patriarchal term of life to the prosecution of the art. He was but ten years of age when he became a scholar of Bellini, of whose style he was soon able to present imitations, which excited universal astonishment. Happening afterwards to see the works of Bellini's pupil Giorgione, he found that he had been excelling in the imitation of a very inferior model, and for some time made it a rule to copy after the elegant, but gaudy, style of Giorgione. At length, abandoning the trammels of example altogether, he gave himself up to the study of nature alone, and thus arrived at that pitch of perfection which has procured him so enviable an immortality.

2021. OBSERVATIONS OF SIR D. WILKIE.

Sir D. Wilkie, in his Remarks on Portrait Painting, says, "No representations of female character have equalled in sweetness and beauty the female portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds; yet a contemporary has remarked, that this was accomplished greatly at the expense of likeness. Hoppner, who was himself distinguished for the beauty with which he endowed the female form, remarked, that even to him it was a matter of surprise that Reynolds could send home portraits with so little resemblance to the originals. This indeed, in his day, occasioned portraits to be left on his hands, or turned to the wall, which, since the means of comparing resemblances have ceased, have blazed forth in all the splendor of grace and elegance which the originals would have been envied for, had they ever possessed them.

"I may add to this what is remarked of Sir Thomas Lawrence: his likenesses were celebrated as the most successful of his time; yet no likenesses exalted so much or refined more upon the originals. He wished to seize the expression, rather than copy the features. His attainment of likeness was most laborious: one distinguished person, who favored him with forty sittings for his head alone, declared he was the slowest painter he had ever sat to, and he had sat to many."

"This distinguished person," says Burnet, in his Practical Essays, "I believe, was Sir Walter Scott. The picture was painted for his majesty, and Lawrence was most anxious to make the picture the best of any painted from so celebrated a character. At other times, however, Sir Thomas was as dexterous with his pencil as any artist. I remember his mentioning that he painted the portrait of Curran, the celebrated Irish barrister, in one day: he came in the morning, remained to dinner, and left at dusk; or, as Lawrence expressed it, quoting his favorite author,—

'From morn till noon,

2022. PETER JONES

Peter Jones, a pupil of Hudson, may be considered a portrait painter, though his chief excellence was in painting draperies. In this branch of the art, so useful to a fashionable face painter, he was much employed by Reynolds, Cotes, and West. Many of Sir Joshua's best whole lengths are those to which Jones painted the draperies. Among them was the portrait of Lady Elizabeth Keppell, in the dress she wore as bridesmaid to the queen. For this Jones was paid twelve guineas; but Sir Joshua was not remarkably liberal on such occasions, of which Jones did not neglect to complain. When the Royal Academy was founded, he was chosen one of its members.

2023. LOGAN, THE FAN PAINTER

Mr. Logan, the fan painter at Tunbridge, was an odd, diminutive figure, but a most sensible, honest, and ingenious man; and for some years kept a shop at the extreme end of the parade; from whence he could see the whole company, and constantly delineated any particular character among them in his fans, so as to be immediately known by their forms, which he introduced in his views of the parade, the cold bath, the fish ponds, &c., and for which he had constant employ.

But his character, good sense, jokes, and smart repartees were better remembered at the Hot Wells, at Bristol, where he died much respected. He was originally dwarf to the Prince of Wales. One of his drawings, containing forty-seven portraits, was, in 1822, in possession of Sir Richard Phillips, the only one known to be in existence.

2024. GERARD DOUW'S METHOD OF PAINTING.

Gerard Douw was the son of a glass painter, which profession he also followed for some time. During the three years he was under Rembrandt, he made extraordinary progress; but seemed more taken with his master's earlier and more finished manner than with his latter mode of rapid execution. He evidently had a mind naturally turned to precision and exactness, and would have equally shown this quality in any other profession which he might have happened to have fallen into.

It is a fact well known that, in a portrait which he made of a certain Madam Spiering, he consumed no less than five days' labor on one of the hands alone. Methodical and regular in all his movements, he ground his colors, and made his brushes, all with his own hand, and kept them always locked up in his box, made for that purpose, that they might be free from soil. Scarcely ever was a breath of air allowed to ventilate his painting-room, for fear of its raising the dust. He entered it as softly as he could tread, and, after taking his seat, waited some moments, till the air was settled, before he opened his box, and set to his work.

Into this sanctum, as may be imagined, few persons ever were admitted. Sandrart and Peter de Laer were, however, of this number, and seem to have been astonished at the extreme attention he paid to detail, which, though conversant with his works, was more even than they were prepared to expect. He had then been three days employed in painting a single broom.

Gerard Douw was in the habit of using a very ingenious artifice to assist his eye in representing the minutiae of objects. This consisted of a concave mirror, in which his model was reflected, and on its front was placed a screen, divided by threads into several square compartments; then, by tracing corresponding marks on his canvas, he transferred the objects to it, according to the usual rules adopted for reduction.

His assiduity and skill were paid by the extreme high prices at which his pictures sold, and he well deserved it; for with all his minuteness, he makes no sacrifice of other excellences in order to attain it. One of his chief patrons, M. Spiering, (the Swedish minister at the Hague,) made him an annual present of a thousand florins, merely to be allowed the first choice of all his pictures painted within the year, paying for them afterwards the regular fixed price.

The scale upon which he regulated the value of these does not appear exorbitant; being, it is said, an allowance only of twenty sous for each hour's labor. One of his pictures, the subject of which was a woman, with a child on her knees playing with a little girl, was purchased by the Dutch East India Company, and thought worthy to be made a present by them to Charles II., as a congratulatory offering upon his return to take possession of the throne of England.

2025. VANDYKE.

This distinguished painter, whose works adorn so many galleries of the fine arts in England, was indefatigable in his studies; and although he died at the age of forty-two, his works are equal in number to those of Rubens.

He was much addicted to pleasure and expense, and kept an excellent table, often detaining the persons he had invited to dinner, for an opportunity of studying their countenances, and retouching their pictures in the afternoon.

Vandyke would not suffer any portrait to go from his pencil until he was convinced that it was a good likeness. Laurens sat seven entire days, taking morning and evening; and notwithstanding all his time and pains, Vandyke would not let him look at the picture till he was satisfied with it himself. It was this portrait that induced Charles I. to invite him to England.

2026. PAINTINGS FOR IMMORTALITY.

Pliny the elder bestowed upon Zeuxis that extraordinary and judicious praise which conveys to us a high idea of his talents. Speaking of the picture which Zeuxis painted of Penelope, Pliny says, "He painted the manners of that queen."

Zeuxis never attempted to finish his works with rapidity; and when a person reproached him for his tardiness, he said, the reason of his slow progress was, "that he painted for immortality."

His last picture was an old woman: it was so comical and ridiculous, that he is said to have died with laughing at it.

2027. RICHARDSON STUDYING VANDYKE.

When Richardson was a very young man, in the course of his practice he painted the portrait of a very old lady, who, in conversation at the time of her sitting to him, happened to mention, that when she was a girl about sixteen years of age, she sat to Vandyke for her portrait. This immediately raised the curiosity of Richardson, who asked a hundred questions, many of them unimportant. However, the circumstance which seemed to him, as a painter, to be of the most consequence in the information he gained, was this: she said she well remembered that, at the time when she sat to Vandyke for her portrait, and saw his pictures in his gallery, they appeared to have a white and raw look, in comparison with the mellow and rich hue which we now see in them, and which time alone must have given to them, adding much to their excellence.

§ 202. STRATAGEMS, RUSES, AND INGENIOUS DEVICES.

2028. MICHAEL ANGELO AND THE NOBLEMAN.

Michael Angelo, the famous painter, in order to be revenged on a cardinal who had vexed him, be thought himself to draw his picture to the life, and to put him among the damned in the representation of the last day, to be seen in the chapel of Pope Sixtus V., in St. Peter's Church at Rome.

The cardinal, nettled at this grievous affront, complained of it to his holiness, who, having a greater esteem for the painter than for the prelate, gravely answered him, "Sir, if you were in purgatory, I might indeed take you from thence; but as you are unfortunately in hell, you know my power does not reach that place." So that the poor cardinal was forced to be in hell before his death, and there to remain.

2029. SIMON HEMMI'S WIT.

Simon Hemmi, who flourished at Siena in the beginning of the fourteenth century, was the first painter who, by way of explanation, put written scrolls in the mouths of his figures—a practice which afterwards became common. There is a piece of his now in existence, wherein the devil, almost expiring from the severe pursuit of a saint, exclaims, "Ohime! non posso piu." "O! O! it is all over with me."

2030. SEYMOUR AND THE DUKE OF SOMERSET.

Seymour, the celebrated painter of horses, having been affronted by Charles, the old haughty Duke of Somerset, in consequence of having intimated that he believed he had the honor to belong to his grace's family, when he was afterwards requested to return to Petworth to complete a picture which no other painter of the day was able to finish, haughtily answered, "My lord, I will now prove that I am of your grace's family; for I won't come." Upon receiving this laconic reply, the duke sent his steward to demand repayment of a loan of one hundred pounds. Seymour briefly replied that he "would write to his grace." He did so, and directed his letter, "Northumberland House, opposite the trunk-maker's, Charing Cross." Enraged at this additional insult, the duke threw the letter into the fire unopened, ordering his steward at the same time to have him arrested. But Seymour, struck with an opportunity of evasion, carelessly observed, that "it was hasty in his grace to burn his letter, because it contained a bank note for one hundred pounds, and that therefore they were now quits."

2031. SIR GODFREY KNELLER.

This eminent artist, having painted a whole-length portrait of the Duke of Hamilton, requested that, before it was sent home, his grace would come to inspect it, and see if he wished any alteration. The duke examined it closely, looked serious, went to the glass and looked at himself, then returned and looked at the picture, and with some appearance of ill humor, returned to the glass. Sir Godfrey, rather piqued at this strange behavior, asked him if any thing was wrong. "Why, yes," said the duke; "when I look at the picture I feel myself a man of rank; when I return to the glass I look like a paltrion: however, for making me so the same picture; you have overpaid it already."

2032. AN ARTIST'S STRATAGEM.

One of the most distinguished artists in Paris painted for a lady, occupying a brilliant position in society, her portrait, with the intention of placing it in an exhibition, soon afterwards. The lady, although for a long time celebrated for her beauty, had arrived at that age which is never admitted, (forty years,) notwithstanding which she dissimulated, and was as amiable and as graceful as in her younger days. Paris is full of resources, and ointments are to be obtained there to heal even the wounds of time.

Our heroine had her portrait taken in the most graceful attitude, with all possible advantages, splendidly dressed, and leaning on an arm-chair, smiling in the looking-glass, which should return her the most amiable compliments. The painter made a most striking likeness; but this was a great mistake—a flattering one was expected, and the lady consequently declared that she did not recognize herself in this painting, and the portrait was left in the painter's hands.

This was a double injury. Attacked in his pride of talent, and in his finances, he had not philosophy enough to see a portrait worth three thousand francs left coolly on his hands, and an idea of vengeance presented itself to his mind, which he put into execution at once.

A few days before the one fixed for the final reception of pictures at the Louvre, the lady was secretly informed that her portrait was ornamented with certain accessories rather compromising her. She went immediately to the artist, and there was the portrait, the same striking likeness certainly; but the painter had thinned the hair on the head of the picture, and the lady so faithfully painted held in her hand two large tresses of false hair. On the toilet were several flacons of small bottles, labelled thus: "Whitewash," "Vegetable Red," "Cosmetic to efface Wrinkles," "Blonde Water to dye the Hair in a minute."

"It is abominable," said the lady, greatly excited.

"Of what do you complain?" coldly replied the artist. "Have you not declared that it is not your portrait. You are right; it is a mere fancy sketch, and it is with that view I shall present it to the public."

"What, sir, you intend to exhibit this painting?"

"Certainly, madame; but as a tableau de genre, (cabinet picture,) as the catalogue will indicate it, under the title of the 'coquette at forty-five years.'"

At this last word the lady fainted, and on her recovery immediately paid for the portrait. The accessories were effaced in her presence, the portrait restored to its original state, and the three thousand francs transferred to the purse of the painter.

2033. HOGARTH'S PICTURE OF THE RED SEA.

Hogarth was once applied to, by a miserly old nobleman, to paint on his staircase a representation of the destruction of Pharaoh's hosts in the Red Sea. In attempting to fix upon the price, Hogarth became quite dissatisfied. The miser was unwilling to give more than half the real value of the picture. At last Hogarth, out of all patience, agreed to his patron's terms.

Within a day or two the picture was ready. The nobleman was surprised at such expedition, and immediately called to examine it. The canvas was painted all over red.

"Zounds!" said the purchaser, "what have you here? I ordered a scene of the Red Sea."

"The Red Sea you have," said Hogarth, still smarting to have his talents undervalued.

"But where are the Israelites?"

"They are all gone over."

"And where are the Egyptians?"

"They are all drowned."

The miser's confusion could only be equalled by the haste with which he paid his bill. The bitter was bit.

2034. SUCCESSFUL EXPEDIENT OF HOGARTH.

A nobleman, who was uncommonly ugly and deformed, sat for his picture, which was executed in his happiest manner, and with singular and rigid fidelity. The peer, disgusted at this counterpart of his dear self, was not disposed very readily to pay for a reflection that would only insult him with his deformities. After some time had elapsed, and numerous unsuccessful attempts had been made for payment, the painter resorted to an expedient which he knew must alarm the nobleman's pride. He sent him the following card:—

"Mr. Hogarth's dutiful respects to Lord ——. Finding he does not mean to have the picture drawn for him, Lord —— is informed again of Mr. Hogarth's pressing necessity for money. If, therefore, his lordship does not send for it in three days, it will be disposed of, with the addition of a tail, and some other appendages, to Mr. Pare, the famous wild beast man; Mr. H. having given that gentleman a conditional promise of it for an exhibition picture, on his lordship's refusal." This intimation had the desired effect; the picture was paid for and committed to the flames.

2035. REYNOLDS AND HAYDN'S PORTRAIT.

When Haydn was in England, one of the princes commissioned Sir Joshua Reynolds to take his portrait. Haydn went to the painter's house, and sat to him, but soon grew tired. Sir Joshua, careful of his reputation, would not paint a man of acknowledged genius with a stupid countenance, and deferred the sitting till another day. The same weariness and want of expression occurring at the next attempt, Reynolds went and communicated the circumstance to his royal highness, who contrived the following stratagem: He sent to the painter's house a pretty German girl, in the service of the queen. Haydn took his seat for the third time, and as soon as the conversation began to flag, a curtain rose, and the fair German addressed him in his native language, with a most elegant compliment. Haydn, delighted, overwhelmed the enchantress with questions; his countenance recovered its animation, and Sir Joshua rapidly seized its traits.

2036. THE CONNOISSEURS.

A painter was censured for not taking good likenesses when he painted portraits. He was piqued at the censures of his friends, and wished to ascertain whether the fault imputed to him was real or not. He informed them he had finished a portrait of a person they knew perfectly well, which he flattered himself was nature itself. They all hastened to see the picture; and all, without hesitation, pronounced it to be one of the very worst attempts he had ever made at a likeness. "You are mistaken, friends," said a voice from the head of the picture, "it is myself." These words were spoken by the person who had entered into the stratagem of the painter, and put his head through the canvas.

2037. SKILFUL FRAUD.

It is related of Cross, an English painter, who was remarkable for his talent in copying correctly, that, being employed by King Charles I. to copy some of the works of the best Italian masters, and being permitted by the state of Venice to copy a famous Madonna of Raphael, in the Church of St. Mark, he executed his commission so happily that he brought away the original, and left the copy in its stead. The deception was not immediately perceptible, and the discovery was made too late to regain it; for, although several messengers pursued him expeditiously, they were all disappointed.

2038. MARC WILLEMS AND ONE OF HIS SISTERS.

Every one has heard of Hogarth threatening to convert into a monkey the portrait of a person who refused him his price. The following stratagem of Marc Willems may serve as a companion to it:—

He had a scholar and brother-in-law named Jacques de Foindro, whose pursuits were history and portrait painting, but chiefly the latter. A curious and amusing tale is related by Deschamps of this last, who, like many professional men, had sometimes found those who sat to him much less solicitous than he could have desired about the recompense of his labors.

Having observed that an English officer, named Peter Andrew, whose likeness he had painted, was in this way remiss in the performance of his promises, he conceived the idea of painting a grating of iron bars, in distemper, upon the surface of the portrait, so that the poor man appeared as if literally placed in limbo. Having done this, he exposed it in a conspicuous part of a window looking towards the street, when, from the fidelity of the resemblance to its original, it was immediately recognized by all his acquaintances; and he was constantly rallied upon the subject. He appears to have been greatly annoyed at the circumstance, and the painter's scheme succeeded to perfection; Mr. Peter Andrew making what haste he could to pay down his money and redeem his effigy from disgrace. When this was done, one stroke with a wet sponge restored the appearance of the picture, and gave the prisoner his liberty.

2039. CUTTING SHORT THE DEBATE.

Jarvis, the painter, was one day engaged in painting Bishop —; and during the progress of the sitting, the venerable prelate began to remonstrate with him upon the dissipated course into which he had fallen. Jarvis made no reply; but, dropping his pencil from the forehead of his portrait to the lower part of the face, he said, with a slight motion to the reverend sitter, "Just shut your mouth, bishop!" By painting upon that feature he "changed the subject."

2040. MABUSE.

The Emperor Charles V. once paid a visit to the Marquis de Veren, who made magnificent preparations for his reception, and, among other expenses, ordered all his household to be dressed in white damask. Mabuse, the painter, who was in the service of the marquis, always wanted money to waste in extravagance; and when the tailor came to take his measure, he desired to have the damask, under the pretence of inventing a singular habit. He sold it immediately, spent the money, and then painted a suit of paper so like damask that it was not distinguished as he marched in the procession between a philosopher and a poet, other pensioners of the marquis, who, being informed of the trick, asked the emperor which of the three suits he liked best. The emperor pointed to that of Mabuse, as exceeding in whiteness and beauty of the flowers; nor did he, until convinced by the touch, doubt of its being genuine silk.

2041. DISLIKE TO HANGING.

A painter at Bologne had painted the portrait of an English lady, who refused to pay for it, under the pretext that it was not a likeness. The picture would have remained a long time on his hands, if one of his friends had not undertaken to disencumber him of it. By his means the portrait was exposed to the gaze of the passers by in the town, and underneath was written a vendre, (to be sold;) but the writer had constructed his letters so ill that the v resembled p, and the inscription, therefore, appeared to some to be a pendre, (to be hanged.) The countrymen of the young English lady did not fail to stop before this little exhibition, and instantly recognized the original. The interpreters, whom they consulted to explain the writing, read no better than the writer had written; and some odd mistakes occurred. At last, the family of the young lady, being informed of what was passing, hastened to possess themselves of the picture by paying the painter the price of the work.

2042. GAINSBOROUGH AND THE FRUIT THIEF.

Gainsborough was making a sketch of his father's garden, when he observed a country fellow looking over the wall at a pear-tree: he immediately sketched him in, and the likeness was so striking, that it was recognized by several neighboring farmers, who had had their orchards robbed; and upon the countryman being taxed with being the depredator, he admitted the fact, and, to avoid a prosecution, at once enlisted in the army.

2043. A PAINTER'S JOKE.

In the western part of this city live and flourish two jolly young fellows who follow sign painting for a livelihood, and who are sometimes in the habit of cutting up what are termed "high shins."

It so occurred that one of the painters had some out-door business to attend to, and left the shop in charge of his partner and a little boy who was employed to grind paints. During his absence, the partner remaining went to work and painted the boy's neck so as to represent a large gash, and a cut over the eye. He then took red paint, bespattered it over the floor, and clotted the boy's hair, and made him lie down in a corner. He then painted a great gash on his own cheek, bared his bosom, disordered his dress, dipped a long-bladed knife in the red paint pot, and patiently awaited the coming of his partner.

Directly afterwards he heard him at the door, and the performance commenced. The partner stuck his head into the room door: one glance was sufficient—the boy was prostrate on the floor, with his throat cut, groaning and crying murder; chairs, tables, benches, jugs, and paint pots were strewed around the room in dire confusion, while the murderous-looking partner, with the bloody-looking knife in his uplifted hand, was running through the room and uttering wild and incoherent expressions.

It was evident to the partner at the door that his partner had killed the boy.

The thought was horrid. Swift as lightning he flew to his father, and informed him of the circumstances. A number of friends were mustered, who repaired forthwith to the scene of action. The crowd augmented as it neared the shop, and in walked the whole posse; but what was their astonishment to find the boy, without a mark of any kind, the room in perfect order, no marks of blood perceptible, and the partner engaged in lettering a sign! and utter ignorance of any transaction of the kind avowed by both him and the boy, to the other partner's great mortification—more especially as the persons he brought there hinted to one another that during his absence he might have indulged too freely in "fire water."

2044. SWARTZ, THE GERMAN ARTIST.

Swartz was a drunkard. He was once engaged to ornament the ceiling of a public building, and was to be paid so much per day for his work; but he was so fond of tipping that his employers were obliged to hire another man to watch the tipsy painter. Finding he could not go to the tavern as often as he wished, he resolved upon practising a little piece of deception. He stuffed a pair of stockings and shoes similar to those he was in the habit of wearing, and hung them down from his stinging whenever he left his work. The watchman called in two or three times every day, but seeing a pair of legs hanging down, suspected nothing, and reported to his employers that Swartz had reformed.

The roguish painter did not go near his work for a fortnight.

2045. THE MILLER'S PORTRAIT.

A worthy miller, wishing for a portrait of himself, applied to a painter to have it accomplished. "But," said he, "as I am a very industrious man, I wish to be painted, as looking out of the window of my mill; but when any one looks at me, I wish to pop my head in; so as not to be thought lazy, or as spending too much time at the window."

"Very well," said the painter, "it shall be done so." He painted the mill, and the mill window. The miller looked at it, and inquired, "Where is myself looking out?" "O," said the painter, "when-ever one looks at the mill, you know you pop in your head to preserve your credit for industry." "That's right," said the miller; "I'm content; that's right; that will do!"

§ 203. FRAUDS AND IMPOSTURES IN THE SALE OF PAINTINGS.

2046. NAMING OF PICTURES.

A very fine picture by Agostino Carracci—the Baptist of our Savior in Jordan—was imported into England by one Arthur Champernown, Esq., and sold by him as a fine work by that master. Domenichino happened to be the fashion of the day; for the St. John of Domenichino had been recently imported, and sold to Mr. Hart Davis, at a large price; and, from a strong similarity which existed in the picture by Agostino to the compositions of Domenichino, it was afterwards resold as a work of the latter, although always known at Rome to have been a celebrated picture by Agostino; thus, in order to humor the caprice of the day, and without a good and sufficient cause, robbing the true master of his just honors.

2047. STORY OF A MINIATURE.

M. Averani, a young French artist at Florence, had extraordinary talent for copying miniatures, giving them all the force of oil. "I had frequently," says Mr. Gordon, "seen him at work in the gallery, and I purchased of him a clever copy of the Fornarina of Raphael, and one of the Venus Vesita of Titian, in the Pitti Palace, said to be the only miniature painted by this great man. It had a good deal of the character of Queen Mary Stuart, was painted on a gold ground, had great force, and was highly finished. I gave the artist his price, (six sequins,) and brought it to England.

"When I disposed of my vertu, in Sloane Street, previous to my settling in Scotland, this miniature made a flaming appearance in the catalogue. The gem was bought by a gentleman for fifty-five guineas. I thought I had done very well by this transaction, until I saw it advertised in the Morning Chronicle, stating that 'an original portrait of Mary, Queen of Scotland, the undoubted work of Titian, value one thousand guineas, was to be seen at No. 14, Pall Mall; price of admission, 2s. 6d.' The bait took; the owner put three or four hundred pounds into his pocket by the exhibition, and sold the portrait for seven or eight hundred pounds.

"Here was I an innocent accessory to the greatest imposition that was ever practised on the public. As a work of art, it was worth all I got for it; and I was offered nearly that sum by a friend who knew its whole history. I understand that a nobleman was the purchaser of this beautiful miniature."

2048. STUDENTS BOUND FOR ITALY.

There is much truth in the sarcastic admonition of Northcote to his pupils on departing for Italy: "Go, my lads, go, and remember you cross the Alps to steal."

2049. DYING IN VAIN.

Rembrandt, being in want of money, and finding his work went off heavy, put into the newspapers that he was dead, and advertised a public sale of the finished and unfinished paintings in his house.

Crowds flocked to the auction, eager to possess one of the last efforts of so great a master. The meanest sketch sold at a price which entire pictures had never brought before. After collecting the proceeds, Rembrandt came to life again; but the Dutch, who resent improbity even in genius, never would employ him after his resurrection.

2050. HANNIBAL AND THE PAINTERS.

Two painters undertook a portrait of Hannibal: one of them painted a full likeness of him, and gave him two eyes, whereas disease had deprived him of one. The other painted him in profile, but with his blind side from the spectators. He severely reprimanded the first, but handsomely rewarded the second.

§ 204. VANITY, HAUGHTINESS, AND SELF-IMPORTANCE.

William Gandy was at all times totally careless of his reputation as a painter, and more particularly so if any thing happened in the course of his business to displease him.

He was once employed to paint the portrait of a Mr. John Vallack, an apothecary of Plymouth, who had amassed a large fortune in that town; and as Gandy had no room of his own fit for receiving his patrons, he always attended at the houses of his employers to execute his work. Among his gratifications was a good dinner; and now, thought he within himself, I shall be well entertained.

But it was Mr. Vallack's custom to have a certain fixed dinner for each day of the week, and by ill luck it happened to be a Saturday when the portrait was begun, and the dinner on that day was nothing more than pork and peas, to the utter mortification of the artist, who at his return to his lodgings vented his rage in curses on his employer's meanness, and, not having good nature enough to be thoroughly reconciled to him afterwards, totally neglected the picture.

This anecdote, says Northcote, is certified by the performance itself, which I have seen, and a very indifferent performance it is.

2052. GENIUS versus NOBILITY.

As the Duke of Clarence was once sitting to Northcote, he asked the artist if he knew the prince regent.

"No," was the brief reply.

"Why," said the duke, "my brother says he knows you."

"O," answered Northcote, "that's only his brag."

2053. VANITY OF HOGARTH.

Writing of himself, Hogarth says, "The portrait which I painted with most pleasure, and in which I particularly wished to excel, was that of Captain Coram, for the Foundling Hospital." And he adds, in allusion to the detraction as a portrait painter, "If I am as wretched an artist as my enemies assert, it is somewhat strange that this, which was one of the first I painted of the size of life, should stand the test of twenty years' competition, and be generally thought the best portrait in the place, notwithstanding the first painters in the kingdom exerted all their talents to vie with it."

2054. THE ARTIST'S VANITY.

Concerning Hogarth's vanity, some one told the following story to Nichols, whose ear was ever open to any thing that confirmed his own theory of the artist's ignorance and want of delicacy.

"Hogarth, being at dinner with Dr. Cheselden and some other company, was informed that John Freke, surgeon of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, had asserted in Dick's coffee-house that Greene was as eminent in composition as Handel. 'That fellow, Freke,' cried Hogarth, 'is always shooting his bolt absurdly one way or another. Handel is a giant in music; Greene only a light Florimel kind of composer.' 'Ay, but,' said the other, 'Freke declared you were as good a portrait painter as Vandyke.' 'There he was in the right,' quoth Hogarth, 'and so I am, give me but my time and let me choose my subject.'"

2055. REYNOLDS'S NEW STYLE.

There was a time when the grace of nature, which Sir Joshua Reynolds so powerfully shed over his pictures, had to maintain a serious struggle against the prejudices of the age, in favor of the constrained and uniform style of his predecessors in portrait painting, for they had possession of the public mind.

Ellis, who was an eminent painter at the time of Sir Joshua's beginning to attract the notice of the world, was naturally enough attached to the older fashions, with which he had long been familiarized. Having heard of the well-known picture of the Turkish Boy, he called on Reynolds in order to see it; and perceiving his mode of painting to be very unlike the manner to which he had himself always been accustomed, and, indeed, unlike any thing he had ever seen before, he was much astonished, and exclaimed, "Ah, Reynolds, this will never answer; why, you do not paint in the least degree in the world in the manner of Kneller." But when Reynolds began to expostulate, and to vindicate himself, Ellis, feeling himself unable to give any good reason for the objection he had advanced, cried out in a great rage, "Shakspeare in poetry, and Kneller in painting, for me!" and immediately ran out of the room.

2056. STUART'S MANTLE.

A conceited painter, who could sometimes produce a pretty tolerable copy from one of Stuart's portraits, and who could swell with pride, like the frog in the fable, to almost a fatal bursting, was told by a wag, that the mantle of Stuart would descend on him as the most talented descendant of the great master spirit in the art.

This he at last believed to be his honest inheritance, and often made mention of it to his friend. It reached, at length, the ears of Stuart, who observed, "that if it did, it would crush the little fellow to death. Here," said he, "take my old mantel-piece to him, that has just been removed for a new one, and tell him to be content with that, if he knows when he is well off"

Sir Godfrey Kneller was a man easily tickled by flattery. He was very covetous, but then he was very vain, and a great epicure. Old Tonsen, the bookseller, got many pictures from him by playing one of these passions against the other. He used to tell Kneller that he was the greatest master that ever lived, and frequently sent him a haunch of venison and a dozen of claret. Kneller once said to Vanderghucht, How this old Jacob loves me!

he is a very good man. You see, my friend, how he loves me, for he sends me good things; the venison was fat."

§ 205. JEALOUSIES, QUARRELS, AND PERSECUTIONS.

2058. PICTORIAL CHALLENGE.

Closterman, being jealous of the fame of Sir Godfrey Kneller, to whom, though a good painter, he was inferior, sent him a challenge to paint a picture with him for a wager. Sir Godfrey wisely declined the contest, and sent him word he allowed him to be his superior.

2059. REYNOLDS IN HIS YOUTH.

While Reynolds was a pupil of Hudson, he painted a head from an elderly female servant of the family, in which he discovered a taste superior to most of the painters of the day. It is said that his master, upon seeing the portrait, foretold the future success of his pupil, not without discovering, in his subsequent behavior towards young Reynolds, some symptoms of jealousy of his becoming a future rival.

2060. BOLOGNA SCHOOL OF PAINTING.

The establishment of the famous Accademia, or school of painting, at Bologna, which restored the art in the last stage of degeneracy, originated in the profound meditations of Lodovico. There was a happy boldness in the idea; but its great singularity was that of discovering those men of genius, who alone could realize his ideal conception, amidst his own family circle; and yet these were men whose opposite dispositions and acquirements could hardly have given any hope of mutual assistance; and much less of melting together their minds and their work in such unity of conception and execution, that even to our days they leave the critics undetermined which of the Carraccis to prefer; each excelling the other in some pictorial quality. Often combining together in the same picture, the mingled labor of three painters seemed to proceed from one palette, as their works exhibit which adorn the churches of Bologna. They still disputed about a picture, to ascertain which of the Carraccis painted it; and still one prefers Lodovico for his grandiocietà, another Agostino for his invention, and others Annibale for his vigor or his grace. The secret history of this Accademia forms an illustration of literary jealousy.

Careless of fortune as they were through life, and freed from the bonds of matrimony, that they might wholly devote themselves to all the enthusiasm of their art, they lived together in the perpetual intercourse of their thoughts; and even at their meals laid on their table their crayons and their papers, so that any motion or gesture which occurred, as worthy of picturing, was instantly sketched. Annibale caught something of the critical taste of Agostino, learned to work more slowly, and to finish with more perfection, while his inventions were enriched by the elevated thoughts and erudition of Agostino.

Yet such was the mordacity and envy of Annibale at the superior accomplishments of his more learned brother, that they could neither live together nor endure absence.

Many years their life was one continual struggle and mortification; and Agostino often sacrificed his genius to pacify the jealousy of Annibale, by relinquishing his palette to resume those exquisite engravings, in which he corrected the faulty outlines of the masters whom he copied, so that his engravings are more perfect than their originals. "To this unhappy circumstance," observes Lanzi, "we must attribute the loss of so many noble compositions which otherwise Agostino, equal in genius to the other Carraccis, had left us."

The jealousy of Annibale, at length, forever tore them asunder. Lodovico happened not to be with them when they were engaged in painting together the Farnesian Gallery at Rome. A rumor spread that in their present combined labor the engraver had excelled the painter. This Annibale could not forgive; he raved at the bite of the serpent; words could not mollify, nor kindness any longer appease, that perturbed spirit—neither the humiliating forbearance of Agostino, the counsels of the wise, nor the mediations of the great. They separated forever—a separation in which they both languished, till Agostino, broken-hearted, sunk into an early grave; and Annibale, now brotherless, lost half his genius: his great invention no longer accompanied him, for Agostino was not by his side. After suffering many vexations, and preyed on by his evil temper, Annibale was deprived of his senses.

2061. BENEFIT OF RIVALRY.

Giorgione is, in some of his portraits, still unsurpassed. Du Fresnoy observes of him that he dressed his figures wonderfully well; and it may truly be said that, but for him, Titian would never have attained that perfection which was the consequence of the rivalry and jealousy which prevailed between them.

2062. CASTILLO AND MORILLO'S PAINTINGS.

In the jealousy of genius there is a peculiar case, where the fever rages not in its malignancy, yet silently consumes. Even the man of genius of the gentlest temper dies under its slow wastings; and this infection may happen among dear friends, when a man of genius loses that self-opinion which animated his solitary labors, and constituted his happiness—when he views himself, at the height of his class, suddenly eclipsed by another great genius. It is then the morbid sensibility, acting on so delicate a frame, feels as if under the old witchcraft of tying the knot on the nuptial day; the faculties are suddenly extinct by the very imagination. This is the jealousy, not of hatred, but of despair.

A curious case of this kind appears in the anecdote of the Spanish artist Castillo, a man distinguished by every amiable disposition. He was the great painter of Seville. When some of Morillo's paintings were shown to him, who seems to have been his nephew, he stood in meek astonishment before them, and when he recovered his voice, turning away, he exclaimed with a sigh, "Ya murio Castillo!" (Castillo is no more!) Returning home, the stricken genius relinquished his pencil, and pined away in hopelessness.

2063. MONOPOLY OF PATRONAGE.

Three painters at Naples, Corenzio, Caracciolo, and Spagnoletto sought to establish a monopoly of patronage, to the exclusion of every other person, whatever talents he might possess.

The Cavalier d' Arpino was engaged to paint the cupola of the Chapel of St. Gennario; but, as this gave great displeasure to the triumvirate, they united with one Belisario, a man of equally audacious spirit with themselves, and forced the knight, by their ill treatment, to quit the city before he had well entered upon his employment.

Upon his departure, Guido was appointed to the charge; but he also was driven away. The mode they adopted was, to lay hands upon his servant, and, after beating him violently, to bid him go and relate to his master what had happened, and adding, that he should say it was done by two men in disguise, who intended his death unless he took warning by what had happened to his servant. Guido lost no time in availing himself of the hint, and instantly fled.

His scholar, Gessi, succeeded him, and, by way of strengthening himself against the attack, took care to be accompanied in preparations for the work by two able-bodied assistants. The adverse party still pursued their plan, and finding means to decoy these men on board a vessel lying in the roads, gave orders to set sail and carry them out to sea. Their sudden disappearance was sufficient to awaken the fears of Gessi, and he consulted his safety by retiring as speedily as possible from the place. In this instance, also, they succeeded to the utmost of their wishes, and the decoration of the chapel was intrusted to their own hands.

Scarcely, however, had they commenced, when the deputies, who had the management of the concern, changed their mind, and punished their treachery with the disappointment it deserved. Their work was effaced, and Domenichino solicited to perform the task; and by his vigorous pencil it was at last executed. The remuneration made for this splendid work, which is still one of the chief boasts of Naples, was extremely large; and this circumstance may in some degree account for the extraordinary pains taken to obtain the commission. He received a hundred ducats for every whole figure, fifty for every half length, and twenty for every head introduced into the painting.

Even Domenichino, however, was not permitted by these restless men to continue his labors without great interruption, and his death, which took place before it was entirely finished, has been ascribed by some to poison.

2064. SELF-MURDER FOR ENVY.

At the time when Raphael possessed at Rome the reputation of being the mightiest living master of his art, the Bolognese gave all their suffrages to their countryman, François Francia, who had long exercised his art among them, and was undoubtedly a man of first-rate talents.

These two artists had never personally met, neither had the one ever seen the works of the other; but a very friendly correspondence had been opened and continued between them. The desire of Francia to see some of the works of Raphael, of which he was every day hearing statements more and more encomiastic, was extreme; but advanced years deterred him from undertaking the fatigues and perils of a journey to Rome. A circumstance at last occurred which gave him, without this trouble, an opportunity of seeing what he had so long desired.

Raphael having painted a picture of St. Cecilia, to be placed in a chapel at Bologna, he wrote to Francia, as his friend, requesting him to see it put up, and even to correct any defects he might observe in it. As soon as Francia drew the picture from its case, and put it in a proper light for viewing it, he was struck with admiration and wonder, and felt painfully how much he was Raphael's inferior. This picture was indeed one of the finest that ever came from Raphael's pencil; but it was only so much the more a source of grief to poor Francia. He assisted, as desired, in placing it in the situation for which it was intended, but he had never after a happy hour.

In one moment he had seen all he had ever done — all that had been once so much admired — thrown far into the shade; he was too old to entertain any hope, by renewed efforts, of coming up with the excellence of Raphael, or even approaching to it; and struck to the heart with grief and despair, he took to his bed, from which he never again arose. He was inaccessible to all consolation, and in a few days expired, the victim of sublime melancholy, in his sixty-eighth year.

This excellent painter, who died at the age of thirty, was pupil to Simon Vouet; but he soon surpassed his master, and, though he never quitted France, became one of the first painters of his day. His contemporary Le Brun appears to have been very jealous of his superior talents, for on hearing of his death, he malignantly said, "I feel now as if I had a thorn just taken out of my foot."

§ 206. ARTISTS UNAPPRECIATED, ABUSED, PERSECUTED.

2066. NEGLECT OF TRUE MERIT.

It was the misfortune of Wilson to be unappreciated in his own day; and he had the additional mortification of seeing works wholly unworthy of being ranked with his admired by the public, and purchased at large prices. The demand for the pictures of Barret was so great, that the income of that indifferent dauber rose to two thousand pounds a year; and the equally weak landscapes of Smith, of Chichester, were of high value in the market at the time when the works of Wilson were neglected and disregarded, and the great artist himself was sinking, in the midst of the capital, under obscurity, indigence, and dejection. He was reduced, by this capricious ignorance of the wealthy and the titled, to work for the meanest of mankind.

2067. POUSSIN ROMANIZED.

When the court of France was at variance with the holy see, a considerable acrimony existed among his holiness's troops against all Frenchmen; consequently, wherever they met them in Rome, they instantly attacked them with sticks and stones, and sometimes even with more formidable weapons.

It happened one day, that, as Poussin and three or four of his countrymen were returning from a drawing excursion, they met at the Quattro Fontane, near Monte Cavallo, a company of soldiers, who, seeing them dressed in the French costume, instantly attacked them. They all fled but Poussin, who was surrounded, and received a cut from a sabre between the first and second finger. Passeri, who relates the anecdote, says that the sword turned, otherwise "a great misfortune must have happened both to him and to painting." Not daunted, however, he fought under the shelter of his portfolio, throwing stones as he retreated, till the passengers taking his part, he effected his escape to his lodgings. From that day he put on the Roman dress, adopted the Roman way of living, and became so much a Roman that he considered the city his true home.

of another, were detected in the brutish physiognomy of the swine who were treading pearls and flowers under their feet; a cardinal was recognized in an ass, scattering with his hoof the laurel and myrtle which lay in his path; and in an old goat reposing on roses, some there were who even fancied the infallible lover of Donna Olympia, the sultana queen of the Quirinal!

The cry of atheism and sedition—of contempt of established authorities—was thus raised under the influence of private pique and long-cherished envy: it soon found an echo in the painted walls where the conclave sat "in close divan," and it was banded about from mouth to mouth, till it reached the ears of the inquisitor, within the dark recesses of his house of terror. A cloud was now gathering over the head of the devoted Salvator, which, it seemed, no human power could avert. But ere the bolt fell, his fast and tried friend Don Mario Ghigi threw himself between his protégé and the horrible fate which awaited him, by forcing the sullen satirist to draw up an apology, or rather an explanation of his fatal picture.

This explanation, bearing a title of a "manifesto," he obtained permission to present to those powerful and indignant persons in whose hands the fate of Salvator now lay; Salvator explained away all that was supposed to be personal in his picture, and proved that his hogs were not churchmen, his mules pretending pedants, his asses Roman nobles, and his birds and beasts of prey the reigning despots of Italy.

2069. SPECIMEN OF SALVATOR'S WIT.

Salvator Rosa exhibited a clever picture, the work of an amateur, by profession a surgeon, which picture had been rejected by the academicians of St. Luke. The artists came in crowds to see it; and by those who were ignorant of the painter, it was highly praised.

On being asked, by some one, who had painted it, Salvator replied, "It was performed by a person whom the great academicians of St. Luke thought fit to scorn, because his ordinary profession was that of a surgeon. But," continued he, "I think they have not acted wisely; for if they had admitted him into their academy, they would have had the advantage of his services in setting the broken and distorted limbs that so frequently occur in their exhibitions."

2070. RISE AND FALL OF OPIE.

About the time when Mr. Opie, the painter, came to settle in London, accompanied by his friend Dr. Wolcot, the novelty and originality of his manner in his pictures, added to his great abilities, drew a universal attention from the connoisseurs, and he was immediately surrounded and employed by all the principal nobility of England. Sir Joshua Reynolds himself compared him to Caravaggio.

"However, it is curious to observe the changes which frequently happen in the course of a very short period; and if we oftener made this the subject of our reflection, it would have a great tendency to check our vanity in prosperity, and give us consolation even in situations apparently the most forlorn. For in a very little space of time, that capricious public, who had so violently admired and employed Opie, when first he appeared, and was a novelty among them, and was, in reality, only the embryo of a painter, left him in disgust. He was no longer a novelty among them; though he was a real artist, and admitted to be so. But they now looked out for his defects alone, and he became in his turn totally neglected and forgotten, and instead of being the sole object of public attention, and having the street, where he lived, so crowded with coaches of the nobility as to become a real nuisance to the neighborhood,—when, as he jestingly observed to me, that he thought he must place cannon at his door to keep the multitude off from it,—he now found himself as entirely deserted as if his house had been infected with the plague." Such is the world.

Wilson painted his Cæx and Alcyone for a pot of beer and the remains of a Stilton cheese. His chief resource for subsistence was in the sordid liberality of pawnbrokers, to whose hands many of his finest works were consigned wet from the easel.

One person, who had purchased many pictures from him, when urged by the unhappy artist to buy another, took him into his shop garret, and, pointing to a pile of landscapes, said, "Why, look ye, Dick, you know I wish to oblige; but see! there are all the pictures I have paid you for these three years." To crown his disappointments, in a contest for fame with Smith, of Chichester, the Royal Society decided against Wilson.

2072. INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF ALONZO CANO.

An event happened to Alonzo Cano, while in the height of his fame, which involved him in much trouble. Returning home one evening, he discovered his wife murdered, and his house robbed, while an Italian journeyman, on whom suspicion fell, had escaped. The magistrates, having discovered that Cano had been jealous of this Italian, and was also attached to another woman, acquitted the fugitive, and condemned the husband.

On this, he fled to Valencia, and took refuge in a Carthusian convent; but afterwards was so imprudent as to return to Madrid, where he was apprehended, and put to the torture, which he suffered without uttering a word. The king, hearing of this, received him again into favor; and as Cano saw there was no protection save through the church, he solicited the king's permission, which was granted, and he was named residentiary of Granada. The chapters objected to his nomination, but were obliged to submit, and their church profited by the appointment, in receiving from him many sculptures and paintings.

The last years of his life he spent in acts of devotion and charity. When he had no money to bestow in alms, he would give a beggar a drawing, directing him where to take it for sale. To the Jews he bore an implacable antipathy. On his death bed he would not receive the sacrament from a priest, because he had administered it to a converted Jew; and from another he would not receive a crucifix in his last moments, because it was so bungling a piece of work that he could not endure the sight of it. In this manner died Alonzo Cano, at the age of seventy-six, in 1676.

2073. GEORGE MORLAND.

After George Morland left his father's house, and became his own master, his first employer was an Irishman in Drury Lane, who kept him constantly at the easel, by being always at his elbow. His meals were carried to him by the shop boy; and when dinner was brought, which generally consisted of sixpennyworth of meat from a cook's shop, and a pint of beer, he would sometimes venture to ask if he might have a pennyworth of pudding. If he asked for five shillings, the Hibernian would reply, "D'ye think I'm made of money?" and give him half a crown. Morland, however, painted pictures enough for this man to fill a room, the price of admittance to which was half a crown.

From this state of bondage he was released by an invitation from Mrs. Hill, a lady of fortune then at Margate, to paint portraits there for the summer season. Morland stole away from his Irish keeper to Margate, and was there introduced to abundance of lucrative employment.

In the ensuing winter he returned to London. He was now rising so much in repute, that the prints engraved from his pictures had an unparalleled sale, both at home and abroad. In a short time, so great was the demand for any thing from his hand, that though often ill paid, he could earn from seventy to a hundred guineas a week. Unfortunately, no man could be more regardless of money; and while affluence was at his command, he scarcely ever knew what it was to be out of want. He was in the constant habit of giving bills of credit, and when they became due, he rarely had the cash ready to discharge them. In order to have a note of twenty pounds renewed for a fortnight, he has been known to give a painting that has been immediately sold in his presence for ten guineas. Morland's easel was always surrounded by associates of the lowest class, horse dealers, boxers, jockeys, cobblers, &c. He had a wooden frame placed across his room, similar to that in a police office, with a bar that lifted up, to allow those to pass with whom he had business, or who enjoyed his special favor. He might have been said to have lived in an academy in the midst of models. He would get one to stand or sit for a hand, another a head, an attitude, or a figure, according as their countenance or character suited. In this manner he painted some of his best pictures, while his companions were regaling on red herring around him.

Morland never let slip an opportunity which he could turn to his professional advantage. Just as he was about to begin his four pictures of the Deserters, a sergeant, drummer, and private, on their way to Dover in pursuit of deserters, came in for a billet. Morland, seeing that these men would answer his purpose, treated them plentifully, while he was making inquiries on the different modes of recruiting, with every particular attendant of the trial of deserters by court-martial, and on their punishment. He then took them to his house, where he gave them plenty of ale, wine, and tobacco, and caroused with them all night, employing himself busily in sketching and noting down whatever was likely to serve his purpose.

Nature was the grand source from which Morland

drew all his images. He was fearful of becoming a mannerist. With other artists he never held any intercourse, nor had he prints of any kind in his possession; and he often declared that he would not go across the way to see the finest assemblage of paintings that ever was exhibited. He was once induced to make a journey with Mr. Ward, on purpose to view Lord But's collection; but having sauntered through one of the rooms, he refused to see any more, declaring that he was averse to contemplate any man's works, lest he should become an imitator.

At the death of his father, Morland was advised to claim the dormant title of baronet, which had been conferred on one of his lineal ancestors by Charles II. Finding, however, that there was no emolument attached to it, he relinquished the distinction, observing that a "plain George Morland would always sell his pictures, and there was more honor in being a fine painter than a titled gentleman; that he would have borne the vanity of a title, had there been any income to accompany it, but, as matters stood, he would wear none of the fooleries of his ancestors."

2074. MORLAND SUSPECTED OF CRIME.

A memorable circumstance occurred to Morland during his retreat at Hackney, for in his retirement here he applied closely to his profession, remaining singularly sober, and seemed about to recover that composure and serenity of mind to which he had long been a stranger. All the pictures sent from his easel while at Hackney were very carefully finished; his drawings also showed a minuteness of attention which was wanted in many others produced under the pressure of immediate necessities.

His works, in consequence of this great and obvious improvement, now rose very highly in value; and although, through the craft of picture dealers, the artist himself derived from his paintings a small part only of the price which they produced, still Morland received such sums of money, in his retirement as produced a suspicion that he was connected with a band of forgers or coiners. Information was accordingly communicated to the Bank of England, and a party of officers were despatched to the harmless dwelling of poor Morland, in order to secure the suspected criminal. He had notice of their approach, and having no doubt that they were coming to arrest him for debt, made his escape over the garden wall, and effected his retreat undiscovered into London. The officers, after rummaging all his boxes, drawers, &c., discovered their error; and the directors, when the affair was represented to them, sent the terrified artist, as an indemnification for the inconvenience he had suffered, a paltry present of twenty guineas. The mischief to Morland, however, was irreparable: the spot which had afforded him an asylum was no longer secure, and the tranquillity he had begun to enjoy was destroyed.

2075. HAYDON'S PECUNIARY WANTS.

When his late majesty, George IV., sent five hundred guineas to Haydon, the painter, for his celebrated picture of the Mock Election, he had but three shillings and sixpence in his possession; and, to give a stamp receipt for the money, he was obliged to borrow four shillings of the gentleman commissioned to purchase.

2076. STUART IN PRISON.

The Duke of Rutland invited Stuart to his house in Dublin. Stuart "got money enough together somehow" to pay his passage to Ireland; but when he got there, he found the duke had died the day before. If any body else had gone there, the duke would have been just as sure to live, for something extraordinary must happen to Stuart, of course.

He soon got into the debtor's prison again; but he was a star still. He would not let people give him money. Rich people and nobles would be painted by him, and they had to go to jail to find the painter. There he held his court; flashing equipages of lords and ladies came dashing up to prison, while their exquisite proprietors waited for their first sitting.

"He began," says Dunlap, "the pictures of a great many nobles and men of wealth and fashion, received half price at the first sitting, accumulated enough to enfranchise himself, and left their Irish lordships imprisoned in effigy. Having thus liberated himself, and there being no law that would justify the jailer in holding half-finished peers in prison, the painter fulfilled his engagement, more at his ease, in his own house, and in the bosom of his own family; and it is probable that the Irish gentlemen laughed heartily at the trick, and willingly paid the remainder of the price."

Soon after young Trumbull had commenced his studies under West, in London, a movement was set on foot against him by some American loyalists, and he was arrested for high treason, and taken off, at eleven o'clock at night, to the lock-up house in Drury Lane. Examined the next morning by three police magistrates, who seemed to desire to know something about the traitor, he thus addressed them:—

"You appear to have been much more habituated to the society of highwaymen and pickpockets than to that of gentlemen. I will put an end to all this insolent folly by telling you frankly who and what I am. I am an American; my name is Trumbull; I am a son of him whom you call the rebel governor of Connecticut; I have served in the rebel American army; I have had the honor of being an aide-de-camp to him whom you call the rebel George Washington. These two have always in their power a greater number of your friends, prisoners, than you have of theirs. Lord George Germaine knows under what circumstances I came to London, and what has been my conduct here. I am entirely in your power; and, after the hint which I have given you, treat me as you please, always remembering that as I may be treated, so will your friends in America be treated by mine."

The painter's commitment was made out for a loathsome prison,—the only one the Gordon riots had left standing in London,—and the first night the son of the governor of Connecticut slept with a highwayman. Lord George Germaine was appealed to; and although he could not "interrupt the course of justice," he offered the young rebel a lodging in the Tower, where Raleigh and some other distinguished men had lodged centuries before, or any prison in England. Trumbull had no money to waste, and he declined the Tower, and chose Tithill Fields Bridewell, behind Buckingham House. Here the painter had a parlor on the ground floor, a garden to walk in, and other et ceteras, which made him quite comfortable.

Death was the only probable or apparently possible termination of this affair. The moment West heard what had befallen his pupil, he hurried to Buckingham House, asked an audience of the king, and was admitted. "I am sorry for the young man," said the king; "but he is in the hands of the law, and must abide the result. I cannot interpose. Do you know whether his parents are living?"

"I think I have heard him say that he has very lately received news of the death of his mother. I believe his father is living."

"I pity him from my soul!" He mused a few moments, and then added, "But, West, go to Mr. Trumbull immediately, and pledge to him my royal promise, that, in the worst possible event of the law, his life shall be safe." With this kind answer, West hurried away to the prison. "I had now," says Trumbull, "nothing more to apprehend than a tedious confinement, and that might be softened by books and my pencil. I therefore begged Mr. West to permit me to have his beautiful little Correggio and my tools. I proceeded with the copy, which was finished in prison during the winter of 1780—

81, and is now deposited in the Gallery at New Haven.

"In the course of the winter I received kind visits from many distinguished men, among whom were John Lee, lately attorney general, Charles J. Fox, and others. Mr. Fox was very kind; he recommended a direct application to ministers, on the ground of impolicy, and added, 'I would undertake it myself, if I thought I could have any influence with them; but such is the hostility between us, that we are not even on speaking terms. Mr. Burke has not lost all influence—has not thrown away the scabbard, as I have; I will converse with him, and desire him to visit you.'

"A few days after, Mr. Burke came to see me, and readily and kindly undertook the negotiation, which, after some unavoidable delay, ended in the order of the king in council to admit me in bail, with the condition that I should leave the kingdom in thirty days, and not return until after peace should be restored. Mr. West and Mr. Copley became my sureties, and I was liberated in the beginning of June, after a close confinement of seven months.

"I remained in London a few days, and then determined to return to America by the shortest route."

§ 208. EXCELLENCES IN OTHER DEPARTMENTS.

2078. INVENTION AND EXPERIENCE.

"Invention," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "is one of the great marks of genius; but, if we consult experience, we shall find, that it is by being conversant with the inventions of others, that we learn to invent; as by reading the thoughts of others we learn to think.

"It is in vain for painters or poets to endeavor to invent without materials on which the mind may work, and from which invention must originate. Nothing can come of nothing. Homer is supposed to have been possessed of all the learning of his time; and we are certain that Michael Angelo and Raphael were equally possessed of all the knowledge in the art which had been discovered in the works of their predecessors."

2079. THE BOY "THE FATHER OF THE MAN."

Henry Fuseli's father, a scholar and an artist, had probably experienced some of the sorrows common to both characters, and, desirous that his son should at least have bread, proposed to educate him for the church. The wayward temper of the boy, and his already enthusiastic love for painting, opposed strong obstacles to this sensible plan, and the father, with much of his own wilfulness of spirit, resolved to enforce obedience. For a while he was successful. Henry made great progress in learning: having overleaped the first difficulties, he became an ardent admirer of the classics; but it was only, or chiefly, to find in the poetry of Greece and Rome vivid images of heroic life and daring flights of imagination.

The time which the school demanded was thus spent by one who could do in minutes what would have cost his fellows hours. For the rest of the day he had other occupation.

As soon as he was released from his class, he withdrew to a secret place to enjoy, unmolested, the works of Michael Angelo, of whose prints his father had a fine collection. He loved, when he grew old, to talk of those days of his youth, of the enthusiasm with which he surveyed the works of his favorite masters, and the secret pleasure which he took in acquiring forbidden knowledge.

With candles which he stole from the kitchen, and pencils which his pocket money was hoarded to procure, he pursued his studies till late at night, and made many copies from Michael Angelo and Raphael, by which he became familiar, thus early, with the style and ruling character of the two greatest masters of the art.

A wild German poem caught his fancy, called the Hour-Glass, and he illustrated it with outlines, representing fantastic imps and elves engaged in strange dances, ludicrous gambols, and mischievous tricks. Etchings of those early attempts were afterwards published, and are now exceedingly rare: they are said not to be without merit, and to show, as the poet says, that "the boy is father of the man."

2080. ROSA IN NAPLES AND ROME.

It was during the residence of Salvator Rosa in Naples, that the memorable popular tumult under Massaniello took place; and our painter was persuaded by his former master, Aniello Falcione, to become one of an adventurous set of young men, principally painters, who had formed themselves into a band, for the purpose of taking revenge on the Spaniards, and were called La Compagnie della Morte. The tragical fate of Massaniello, however, soon dispersed these heroes, and Rosa, fearing he might be compelled to take a similar part in that fatal scene, sought safety in flight, and took refuge in Rome.

Here our painter met with great encouragement, and painted many excellent pictures. But though indefatigable in this department of the fine arts, he did not entirely confine himself to it, for at this time he wrote some of his so justly celebrated satires, and also several beautiful sonnets. His house was the resort of the most distinguished persons in Rome, ecclesiastical as well as secular, who were drawn hither, not merely to see his paintings, but for the pleasure of hearing him read his satires, and conversing with him.

This notice, added to other causes, made him much disliked among the painters—a result by no means uncommon in such circumstances.

2081. WEST A SKATER.

Very small matters sometimes help a man on to popularity in his profession. In the case of West we have an interesting illustration of the truth of this remark.

West was a skilful skater, and in America had formed an acquaintance on the ice with Colonel, afterwards too well known in the colonial war as General Howe. This friendship was dissolved with the thaw, and was forgotten, till one day the painter, having tied on his skates at the Serpentine, he was astonishing the timid practitioners of London by the rapidity of his motions, and the graceful figure which he cut.

Some one who beheld him cried out, "West! West!" It was Colonel Howe. "I am glad to see you," said he, "and not the less so that you come in good time to vindicate my praises of American skating." He called to him Lord Spencer, Hamilton, and some of the Cavendishes, to whom he introduced West as one of the Philadelphia prodigies, and requested him to show them what was called "the salute." He performed this feat so much to their satisfaction, that they went away spreading the praises of the American skater over London.

Nor was the considerate Quaker insensible to the value of such commendations; he continued to frequent the Serpentine, and to gratify large crowds by cutting the Philadelphia salute. Many to their praise of his skating added panegyrics on his professional skill; and not a few, to vindicate their applause, followed him to his easel, and sat for their portraits.

2082. CLOSE RESEMBLANCE.

"I have read somewhere," says Urban Chevreau, "that Raphael and Titian painted a man in a fever, and that the painting was so naturally and artfully executed, that a physician, on looking at the picture, declared at once that the original must have been sick of a quartan fever."

2083. BACICI.

Bacici, a Genoese painter who flourished in the seventeenth century, had a very peculiar talent of producing the exact resemblance of deceased persons whom he had never seen. He first drew a face at random, and afterwards altering it in every feature, by the advice and under the inspection of such as had known the party, he improved it to a striking likeness.

2084. STUART'S FIRST PORTRAIT.

One of Stuart's first portraits, after his return in the "Collier," was of his mother, who had died some ten years before, when he was in his eleventh year. It was painted from recollection, and yet so striking was the likeness, his uncle from Philadelphia recognized it the moment he entered the room.

2085. KETEL'S PERFORMANCES.

Cornelius Ketel, a native of Gouda, who visited England in 1573, and finally settled at Amsterdam, sought to make himself known by a method of painting entirely new. He discarded his brushes, and painted only with his fingers, beginning with his own portrait. The whim took; he repeated the practice, and, it is said, executed these fantastic works with great beauty of coloring. As his success increased, so did his folly. His fingers appeared too easy tools, and he undertook to paint with his feet. His pretended first essay he made in public on a picture of Silence. That part of the public, who, like Ketel, began to think the more a painter was a mountebank, the greater was his merit, were so indulgent as to applaud even his caprice.

2086. POWER OF HARLOW'S MEMORY.

Mr. Harlow commenced his professional career at the age of sixteen; and before he had doubled that age he rose to the first rank, whether considered as to the variety of his talent, the purity of his taste, or the transcendency of his genius.

His first introduction to that sort of notice which is favorable to an aspiring artist arose from a curious circumstance, which involved a singular, rare, and precocious talent. Walking with his mother in Piccadilly, she pointed out to him a gentleman knocking at the Duke of Devonshire's gate. This was Mr. Hare, the well-known associate of his grace, of Mr. Fox, and other celebrated persons, and a gentleman of whom Mrs. Harlow had often spoken as being an intimate friend of her family. No further attention was paid to the matter at the time; but, Mr. Hare dying soon after, it became a subject of deep regret to the Duchess of Devonshire and others, that no likeness had been taken, to preserve the memory of one so much valued.

By accident this reached the ear of Harlow, who told his mother that he thought he could execute a portrait of Mr. Hare from recollection. He accordingly set about it, and with very slight assistance produced a picture, which was universally allowed to be an excellent likeness. This extraordinary talent never left the artist, and he could almost invariably retrace from memory such portraits as he had formerly copied. In one case, when he did so for Sir Thomas (then Mr.) Lawrence, the work was so perfect, that that gentleman refused to credit the possibility of its being performed without the original.

This excellent artist, after visiting Rome, and executing paintings which would do honor to any age or country, died in his thirty-second year.

2087. SALVATOR ROSA'S HARPSICHOED.

Salvator Rosa's confidence in his powers was as frankly confessed as it was justified by success. Happening one day to be found by a friend, in Florence, in the act of modulating on a very indifferent old harpsichord, he was asked, how he could keep such an instrument in his house. "Why," said his friend, "it is not worth a scudo." "I will lay what you please," said Salvator, "that it shall be worth a thousand before you see it again." A bet was made, and Rosa immediately painted a landscape with figures on the lid, which was not only sold for a thousand scudi, but was esteemed a capital performance. On one end of the harpsichord he also painted a skull and music-books. Both these pictures were exhibited in the year 1823, at the British Institution.

This artist was a pupil of Vandyke, from whom he acquired that excellent manner of pencilling and sweetness of coloring which distinguished the works of Vandyke and those of his school. He possessed, besides, that freedom of hand and readiness, or rather rapidity, of execution, for which Vandyke was so remarkably famous; and King Charles I., when he observed the expeditious manner of Beek's painting, was so exceedingly surprised, that he told him it was his opinion he could paint if he was riding post.

He was appointed portrait painter and chamberlain to Queen Christina of Sweden; and, by her recommendation, most of the illustrious persons in Europe sat to him for their pictures. He was agreeable, handsome, and polite, and lived in the highest favor with his royal mistress; but having an earnest desire to visit his friends in Holland, and leaving the court of Sweden much against the queen's inclination, she imagined that he intended never to return; and as he died soon after at the Hague, it was strongly and generally suspected he died of poison.

2089. CHANGES OF THE ARTIST.

The Grand Duke of Tuscany was amusing himself, one day, with beholding Peter de Cortona, while engaged in painting a picture, which represented an infant shedding tears of distress. "I am now going," said the artist, "to make a change in this figure." Accordingly, he gave a stroke with his pencil; and instantly the same child appeared laughing, with the best grace in the world. Presently, by another touch, he restored the picture to its former state. "You see," cried the painter, "what trifles make children laugh or weep."

2090. TINTORET'S FACILITY OF COMPOSITION.

The facility of composition for which this artist was remarkable was a source of great inequality among his paintings. He preferred being the author of a great many good conceptions to wasting his time in giving what is called a high finishing to any one. Hence the remark of Annibale Carracci, in a letter from Venice to his cousin Louis Carracci, that "he had seen Tintoret sometimes equal to Titian, and at others much below Tintoret."

Some Flemish painters, being at Rome, showed Tintoret two or three heads, which they had painted and finished with great care. He asked them how long they had taken to do them. They replied they had taken several weeks. Tintoret on this dipped his pencil in some black color, and, with a few strokes, drew on a canvas a figure, which he filled in with white. Turning towards the strangers, "See," said he to them, "how we poor Venetian painters are accustomed to make pictures."

2091. CARRACCI'S PERFORMANCE.

The famous Annibale Carracci, the painter, had a brother named Agostino, a poet of some celebrity, and a man eminent in literature. Agostino having delivered a long and animated discourse in praise of that admirable group of statuary, the Laocoon and his sons, it was observed to Annibale that it was extraordinary he did not add his share of eulogium on that wonderful performer. Annibale took up a crayon, and immediately drew the group with as much exactness as if he had the statues before him. This simple action was a panegyric that exceeded in felicity all that the most brilliant figures of speech, or the most energetic expression, could have produced. Turning round to his brother, Annibale observed to him, "Poets paint with words, and painters speak with their pencil." It was a principle of that extraordinary painter, that pictures were always good exactly in proportion to the nearness of the approximation to nature; and he related that he was decided in his opinion respecting the merits of the two celebrated rival pictures of the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, the one painted by Dominichino, and the other by Francisco Albani, by observing, that an old woman and her daughter had stood a long time talking about and surveying the picture of Dominichino, and then passed by that of Albani, without taking any particular notice of it.

§ 210. ENTHUSIASM, SENSIBILITY, AND SENSITIVENESS.

2092. BARRY'S ENTHUSIASM.

Barry, the painter, has left behind him works not to be turned over by the connoisseur by rote, nor by the artist who dares not to be just, and will not suffer even the infirmities of genius to be buried in its grave. That enthusiast, with a temper of mind resembling Rousseau's, the same creature of imagination, consumed by the same passions, with the same fine intellect disordered, and the same fortitude of soul, found his self-taught pen, like his pencil, betray his genius. A vehement enthusiasm breaks through his ill-composed works, throwing the sparkle of his bold and rich conceptions, so philosophical youth of genius. When, in his character of professor, he delivered his lectures at the academy, he never ceased speaking but his auditors rose in a tumult, while their hands returned to him the proud feelings he adored. The self-educated and gifted man, once listening to the children of genius whom he had created about him, exclaimed, "Go it, go it, my boys! they did so at Athens." Thus high could he throw up his native mud into the very heaven of his invention.

2093. CALMNESS OF VERNET.

Vernet was on board a ship in the midst of a raging tempest, and all hope was given up; the astonished captain beheld the artist of genius, his pencil in his hand, in calm enthusiasm, sketching the terrible world of waters—studying the wave that was rising to devour him.

2094. PICTORIAL ENTHUSIASM AND BRAVERY.

William Vandervelde was such an enthusiast in his art, that in order more exactly to observe the movements and various positions of ships engaged in battle, he did not hesitate to attend those engagements in a small, light vessel, and sail close to the enemy, attentive only to his drawing, and without the least apparent anxiety about the danger to which he was every moment exposed. In this way he took a sketch of the severe battle between the Duke of York and Admiral Opdam, in which the duke, admiral, and five hundred men were blown up, and of the memorable engagement between Monk and De Ruyter, sailing alternately between the fleets, so as to represent minutely every movement of the ships, and the most material circumstances of the action, with incredible exactness and truth.

2095. SALVATOR AND THE HIGGLING PRINCE.

A Roman prince, more notorious for his pretensions to virtu than for his liberality to artists, sauntering one day in Salvator's gallery in the Via Babuina, paused before one of his landscapes, and after a long contemplation of its merits exclaimed, "Salvator mio! I am strongly tempted to purchase this picture: tell me at once the lowest price."

"Two hundred scudi," replied Salvator, carelessly. "Two hundred scudi! ohime! that is a price! but we'll talk of that another time."

The illustrissimo took his leave; but bent upon having the picture, he shortly returned, and again inquired the lowest price.

"Three hundred scudi!" was the sullen reply.

"Carpo di bacco!" cried the astonished prince; "mi burla, vostra signoria; you are joking! I see I must e'en wait upon your better humor; and so addio, Signor Rosa."

The next day brought back the prince to the painter's gallery; who, on entering, saluted Salvator with a jocular air, and added, "Well, Signor Amico, how goes the market to-day? Have prices risen or fallen?"

"Four hundred scudi is the price to-day!" replied Salvator, with affected calmness; when, suddenly giving away to his natural impetuosity, and no longer stifling his indignation, he burst forth: "The fact is, your excellency would not now obtain this picture from me at any price; and yet so little value do I put upon its merits, that I deem it worthy no better fate than this;" and snatching the panel on which it was painted from the wall, he flung it to the ground, and with his foot broke it into a hundred pieces. His excellency made an unceremonious retreat, and returned no more to drive a hard bargain.

2096. SELF-POSSESSION OF VERNET.

Vernet, the painter, was so attached to his profession, that he used to make voyages in bad weather on purpose to see the sky and ocean in picturesque perturbation. One day the storm was so violent that the ship's crew were in great consternation. Vernet desired a sailor to bind him to the mast. When every one was crying and praying, Vernet, with his eyes now upon the lightning, and now upon the mountainous waves, continued to exclaim, "How fine this is!"

2097. PROTOGENES AND PARMEGGIANO.

The painters Protogenes and Parmeggiano found their senses locked up as it were, in meditation, so as to be incapable of withdrawing themselves from their work even in the midst of the terrors and storming of the place by the enemy.

2098. SENSIBILITY OF WEST.

When West, the venerable president of the Royal Academy, was very young, he had attained great skill in the use of the bow and arrow, and was one day unfortunately successful in bringing down a dove, at which he aimed rather in the thoughtlessness of play than design. The moanings of its widowed mate made an impression on his mind which was never erased, and caused him frequently to introduce the dove in his pictures. This was a sensibility quite unaffected, and closely allied to the highest energies of intellect. An anonymous writer, in some tributary verses to the memory of West, thus alludes to the circumstance:—

"——— Age had not chilled
Thy genuine sensibility, nor care,
That upas of the soul, impaired thy powers.
Still couldst thou mourn the fluttering dove's distress,
Which struck thy heart in boyhood's affluent hour,
And on thy latest canvas claims a sigh."

2099. WEST'S REMINISCENCES.

West, in his old age, in conversing with a friend, said, "Yesterday was fifty years since I arrived in London. I remember travelling on the top of the Canterbury coach, and stopping about two miles from London, at a mean tavern, and taking dinner before I entered the metropolis to seek my fortune; and I could not avoid yesterday going to the same tavern, calling for a dinner alone in the same room, looking back on the fifty years I had spent, the progress I had made in my profession, the friends I possessed, and the adventures I had met with." This was a singular epoch in the life of an individual.

2100. ENTHUSIASM OF DROUAIS.

Drouais, a pupil of David, the French painter, was a youth of fortune; but the solitary pleasure of his youth was his devotion to Raphael. He was at his studies at four in the morning till night. "Painting or nothing!" was the cry of this enthusiast of elegance. "First fame, then amusement," was another. His sensibility was as great as his enthusiasm; and he cut in pieces the picture for which David declared he would inevitably obtain the prize. "I have had my reward in your approbation; but next year I shall feel more certain of deserving it," was the reply of the young enthusiast. Afterwards he astonished Paris with his Marius; but while engaged on a subject which he could never quit, the principle of life itself was drying up in his veins.

2101. HAYDON'S FIRST SIGHT OF THE ELGIN MARBLES.

"At my entrance among these divine things," says Haydon, "for the first time, with Wilkie, 1808, in Park Lane, the first thing I saw was the wrist of the right hand and arm of one of the Fates, leaning on the thigh; it is the Fate on the right side of the other, which, mutilated and destroyed as it was, proved that the great sculptor had kept the shape of the radius and ulna, as always seen in fine nature, male and female.

"I felt at once, before I turned my eyes, that there was the nature and ideal beauty joined, which I had gone about the art longing for, but never finding! I saw at once I was among productions such as I had never before witnessed in the art; and that the great author merited the enthusiasm of antiquity, of Socrates, of Plato, of Aristotle, of Juvenal, of Cicero, of Valerius Maximus, and of Plutarch and Martial. If such were my convictions on seeing this dilapidated but immortal wrist, what do you think they were on turning round to the Theseus, the Horse's Head, and the Fighting Metope, the Frieze, and the Jupiter's Breast?

"O, may I retain such sensations beyond the grave! I foresaw at once a mighty revolution in the art of the world forever. I saw that union of nature and ideal perfected in high art, and before this period pronounced by the ablest critics as impossible. I thanked God with all my heart, with all my soul, and with all my being, that I was ready to comprehend them from dissection. I bowed to the Immortal Spirit, which still hovered near them. I predicted at once their vast effect on the art of the world, and was smiled at for my boyish enthusiasm.

"What I asserted in their future influence and enormous superiority, Canova, eight years after, confirmed. On my introduction by Hamilton, author of Egyptiaca, I asked Canova what he thought of them; and he instantly replied, with a glistening Italian fire, 'Ils renverseront le système des autres antiques.' [They will reverse the system of other antiques.] Mr. Hamilton replied, 'I have always said so; but who believed me? and what was the result of the principles I laid down? Why, many a squeeze of the hand to support me under my infirmities, and many a smile in my face in mercy at my delusion. "You are a young man," was often said; "and your enthusiasm is all very proper.'"

"After seeing them myself," says Haydon, "I took Fuseli to see them, and, being a man of quick sensibility, he was taken entirely by surprise. Never shall I forget his uncompromising enthusiasm; he strode about, thundering out, 'The Greeks were gods! the Greeks were gods!' When he got home, he wanted to modify his enthusiasm, but I always reminded him of his first impressions."

2102. ROUBILLIAC.

On the return of that sculptor from Rome, he paid a visit to Reynolds, and expressed himself in raptures on what he had seen on the continent; on the exquisite beauty of the works of antiquity, and the captivating and luxuriant splendor of Bernini. "It is natural to suppose," said he, "that I was infinitely impatient till I had taken a survey of my own performances in Westminster Abbey; but, after having seen such a variety of excellence, my own work looked to me as meagre and starved as if made of nothing but tobacco pipes."

2103. GENEROSITY OF REYNOLDS.

A painter of considerable merit, having unfortunately made an injudicious matrimonial choice, was, along with that and its consequences, as well as an increasing family, in a few years reduced so very low that he could not venture out without danger of being arrested—a circumstance which, in a great measure, put it out of his power to dispose of his pictures to advantage.

Sir Joshua Reynolds, having accidentally heard of his situation, immediately hurried to his residence to inquire into the truth of it, when the unfortunate man told him all the melancholy particulars of his lot, adding, that forty pounds would enable him to compound with his creditors.

After some further conversation, Sir Joshua took his leave, telling him that he would do something for him; and when he was bidding him adieu at the door, he took him by the hand, and, after squeezing it in a friendly way, hurried off with that kind of triumph in his heart which the exalted of human kind only experience, while the astonished artist found that he had left in his hand a bank note for one hundred pounds.

2104. DISINTERESTEDNESS OF ENGLISH PAINTERS.

"There are no examples in the history of painting," says Haydon in his lectures, "of such noble disinterestedness as has ever been shown by the English historical painters. Hogarth and others adorned the Foundling for nothing; Reynolds and West offered to adorn St. Paul's for nothing, and yet were refused. Barry painted the Adelphi without remuneration."

neration; but, as Burke beautifully says, 'The temple of honor ought to be seated on an eminence. If it be open through virtue, let it be remembered, too, that virtue is never tried but by some difficulty and some struggle.'

2105. REYNOLDS'S CONSCIENTIOUSNESS.

It is recorded of Reynolds, as an instance of his prizing extraordinary merit, that when Gainsborough asked him but sixty guineas for his celebrated Girl and Pigs, yet being conscious in his own mind that it was worth more, he liberally paid him down one hundred guineas for the picture.

2106. HOGARTH.

Hogarth treated those who sat for their portraits with a courtesy which is not always practised now.

"When I sat to Hogarth," said Mr. Cole, "the custom of giving vails to servants was not discontinued. On taking leave of the painter at the door, I offered his servant a small gratuity; but the man politely refused it, telling me it would be as much as the loss of his place, if his master knew it. This was so uncommon and so liberal in a man of Hogarth's profession, at that time of day, that it much struck me, as nothing of the kind had happened to me before." Nor is it likely that such a thing would happen again: Sir Joshua Reynolds gave his servant six pounds annually for wages, and offered him one hundred pounds a year for the door!

2107. REYNOLDS AND DAYES.

The kindness of Sir Joshua Reynolds's manner, and readiness to oblige, were particularly exemplified by a little incident, thus noted by Mr. Dayes, the artist, who says,— "Malice has charged him with avarice; probably from his not having been prodigal, like many of his profession. His offer to me proved to the contrary. At the time that I made the drawings of the king at St. Paul's, after his illness, Reynolds complimented me handsomely on seeing them, and afterwards observed that the labor bestowed must have been such that I could not be remunerated from selling them; but, if I would publish them myself, he would lend me the money necessary, and engage to get me a handsome subscription among the nobility."

2108. GAINSBOROUGH AND HIS FRIEND WILTSHIRE.

One of Gainsborough's acquaintances in Bath was Wiltshire, the public carrier, a kind and worthy man, who loved him and admired his works. In one of his landscapes he wished to introduce a horse, and as the carrier had a very handsome one, he requested the loan of it for a day or two, and named his purpose: his generous neighbor bridled it and saddled it, and sent it as a present. The painter was not a man to be outdone in acts of generosity: he painted the wagon and horse of his friend, put his whole family and himself into it, and sent it well framed to Wiltshire, with his kind respects. It is considered a very capital performance.

From 1761, when Gainsborough began to exhibit his paintings at the Academy, till his removal from Bath in 1774, Wiltshire was annually employed to carry his pictures to and from London. He took great care of them, and constantly refused to accept money, saying, "No, no; I admire painting too much," and plunged his hands into his pockets to secure them against the temptation of the offered payment. Perceiving, however, that this was not acceptable to the proud artist, the honest carrier hit upon a scheme which pleased both. "When you think," said he, "that I have carried to the value of a little painting, I beg you will let me have one, sir; and I shall be more than paid." In this coin the painter paid Wiltshire, and overpaid him. His son is still in possession of several of these pictures, and appreciates their value. Many of Gainsborough's productions were not so worthily disposed of.

2109. THE MODESTY OF GENIUS.

"Never," relates Haydon, "was any thing more extraordinary than the modesty and simplicity of Wilkie, at the period of his production of the Village Politicians. Jackson told me he had the greatest difficulty to persuade him to send this celebrated picture to the exhibition; and I remember his (Wilkie's) bewildered astonishment at the prodigious enthusiasm of the people at the exhibition, when it went, May, 1806.

"On the Sunday after the private day and dinner, the News said, 'A young Scotchman, by name Wilkie, has a wonderful work.' I immediately sallied forth, took up Jackson, and away we rushed to Wilkie. I found him in his parlor, in Norton Street, at breakfast. 'Wilkie,' said I, 'your name is in the paper.' 'Is it, really?' said he, staring with delight. I then read the puff, ore rotunde, and Jackson, I, and he, in an ecstacy, joined hands and danced round the table."

2110. LOVE OF COUNTRY ABOVE PECUNIARY REMUNERATION.

The Dead Man of Allston won the first prize, of two hundred guineas, from the British Institution, and the painter could have sold it for a large sum; but a fortunate occurrence brought it to this country. Mr. McMurtie, of Philadelphia, proposed to Allston to put the picture into his hands, and the Pennsylvania Academy paid for it three thousand five hundred dollars—hardly a tithe of its real value. But the reader will see the noble spirit of the painter in the extract here given from his letter to Mr. McMurtie. He writes from London, the 13th of June, 1816.

"When you first made me the generous offer of taking out my picture, you may remember with what implicit confidence I submitted the entire management and disposal of it to yourself and Mr. Sully. I would not have done this, if I had not been fully assured that whatever might be the event, I should have every reason to be grateful; for, even if it had wholly failed of profit, I should still have felt myself indebted for every exertion that kindness and liberality could make. If such would have been my feelings in the event of a total failure,—an event which I had suffered myself almost to anticipate,—you may well judge what I now feel at the account of this most agreeable and unexpected result. I beg you both to accept my warmest and most grateful acknowledgments. The sale is in every respect highly gratifying, both as affording a very seasonable pecuniary supply, and on account of the flattering circumstances attending it. As necessary and acceptable as the money is to me, I assure you I think more of the honor conferred by the Academy, in becoming purchasers of my work."

2111. WEST'S CHRIST HEALING THE SICK.

The Quakers of Philadelphia requested West to aid them in erecting a hospital for the sick of his native town: he told them his circumstances scarcely admitted of his being generous, but he would aid them after his own way, and paint them a picture, if they would provide a place to receive it in their new building. They were pleased with this, and Christ healing the Sick was painted for Philadelphia.

When exhibited in London, the rush to see it was very great; the praise it obtained was high, and the British Institution offered him three thousand guineas for the work. West accepted the offer, for he was far from being rich, but on condition that he should be allowed to make a copy, with alterations, for his native place. He did so; and when the copy went to America, the profits arising from its exhibition enabled the committee of the hospital to enlarge the building and receive more patients.

2112. ALLSTON EXCEPTING TO ONE OF HIS OWN PAINTINGS.

From a biographical sketch of Mr. Allston, in the Phrenological Journal, the following is taken, which speaks volumes to the honor of the painter and the man:—

"A friend of Allston tells me a hundred touching stories about him. Here is one: 'While in England, he threw off a little painting of great beauty, the subject of which, though perfectly free, to his own perception, from all moral objection, might be perverted to evil associations. The idea occurred to him while sitting alone the evening he had sent it to the purchaser. No sooner did the impression seize him, than, with conscientious sensibility to the high claims of his art, he wrote the owner of the picture, stating his scruples—begging its return. His desire was reluctantly granted. He sent back the gold with his thanks, and burnt the picture.' And yet the painter was poor, and needed money in that solitude of London. The artist who knew these facts had known Allston for years. He says that when he looked on him after this sublime act, notwithstanding his familiarity with the painter, he was struck with a sudden veneration."

2113. POOR GOVERNESS.

The widow of a clergyman who kept the grammar school at Plympton, on the decease of her husband, opened a boarding-school for young ladies, but, having few friends, was unable to make a sufficiently reputable appearance at their accustomed balls. The daughter of a neighbor, an only child, and then a very young girl, felt for the poor governess. Her pitiable insufficiency in the article of finery first arrested her attention, and being unable to help her from her own resources, devised the means by which it might be done.

Having heard of the great fame of Sir Joshua

Reynolds, his character for generosity and charity, and recollecting that he had formerly belonged to the Plympton school, she, without mentioning it to her companions, addressed a letter to Sir Joshua, whom she had never seen, stating the forlorn condition of the poor governess's wardrobe, and begged the gift of a silk gown for her. Very shortly after, silks of different patterns, sufficient for two dresses, reached the astonished governess, who was wholly unacquainted with the compassionate means that had procured her so welcome a present.

2114. FROLICS OF MIERIS AND JAN STEEN.

Mieris had conceived a real friendship for Jan Steen, and delighted in his company, though he was by no means so fond of drinking freely as Jan was accustomed to do every evening at the tavern. Notwithstanding this, he often spent whole nights with his friend in a joyous manner, and frequently returned very late to his lodging.

One evening, when it was almost midnight, and very dark, as Mieris strolled home from the tavern, he unluckily fell into the common sewer, which had been opened for the purpose of cleansing, and the workmen had left it unguarded. There he must have perished, if a cobbler and his wife, who worked in a neighboring stall, had not heard his cries, and instantly ran to his relief. Having extricated Mieris, they took all possible care of him, and procured the best refreshment in their power.

The next morning Mieris, having thanked his preservers, took his leave, but particularly remarked the house, that he might know it another time. The poor people were totally ignorant of the person who had been relieved by them; but Mieris had too grateful a spirit to forget his benefactors, and having painted a picture in his best manner, he brought it to the cobbler and his wife, telling them it was a present from the person whose life they contributed to save, and desired them to carry it to his friend Cornelius Plaats, who would give them the full value for it. The woman, unacquainted with the real value of the present, concluded she might receive a moderate gratuity for the picture; but her astonishment was inexpressible when she received the sum of eight hundred florins.

2115. BARRY'S GENEROSITY.

In 1777, Mr. Barry undertook to decorate the rooms at the Society of Arts, London, and his offer was accepted. It would have been singular, indeed, if such an offer had been rejected, as his labor was to be gratuitous. He had been heard to say that at the time of his undertaking this work, he had only sixteen shillings in his pockets, and that in the prosecution of his labor, he was often, after painting all day, obliged to sketch or engrave at night some design for the print-sellers, which was to supply him with the means of his frugal subsistence. He has recorded some of his prints as done at this time, such as his Job, dedicated to Mr. Burke; Birth of Venus; Polemon; head of Lord Chatham; King Lear, &c.

Of his terms with the society, we know only that the choice of subjects was allowed him, and the society was to defray the expense of canvases, colors, and models. In the course of his labors, however, he found that he had been somewhat too disinterested, and wrote a letter to Sir George Saville, soliciting such a subscription among the friends of the society as might amount to one hundred pounds a year. He computed that he should finish the whole in two years, and pay back the two hundred pounds to the subscribers by means of an exhibition; but he very candidly added, that if the exhibition should produce nothing, the subscribers would lose their money.

This subscription did not take effect, and the work employed him seven years; at the end of which, the society granted him two exhibitions, and at different periods voted him fifty guineas, their gold medal, and again two hundred guineas, and a seat among them. These pictures were afterwards engraved, but what they produced is not known. In 1792, however, he deposited seven hundred pounds in the funds, and to this wealth he never afterwards made any great addition, for he never possessed more than sixty pounds a year from the funds; a sum barely sufficient to pay the rent and other charges of his house; but as his domestic economy was of the plainest kind, this sum was probably not insufficient.

2116. REYNOLDS'S GIFT.

In the year 1760, a youth named Buckingham, a scholar of Mr. King's academy, in Chapel Street, Soho, presuming upon his father's knowledge of Sir Joshua Reynolds, asked the president if he would paint him a flag for the next breaking up of the school; when Sir Joshua good-naturedly replied, if he would call upon him at a certain time, he would see what he could do. The boy accordingly went, accompanied by a school-fellow, named Williamson, (the narrator of this anecdote,) when Sir Joshua Reynolds presented them with a flag, about a yard square, on which he had painted the king's coat of arms. This flag was carried in the breaking-up procession to the Yorkshire Stingo, an honor to the boys, and a still greater honor to him who painted it, and gave up his valuable time to promote their holiday amusements.

2117. GAINSBOROUGH.

Among those who sat to Gainsborough was the Duchess of Devonshire, then in the bloom of youth, at once the loveliest of the lovely and the gayest of the gay. But her dazzling beauty, and the sense which she entertained of the charms of her looks, and her conversation, took away that readiness of hand, and hasty happiness of touch, which belonged to him in his ordinary moments. The portrait was so little to his satisfaction that he refused to send it to Chatsworth. Drawing his wet pencil across a mouth which all who saw it thought exquisitely lovely, he said, "Her grace is too hard for me." The picture was probably destroyed. Among his papers were found two sketches of the duchess, both exquisitely lovely and graceful.

2118. REYNOLDS'S MODESTY.

Sir Joshua Reynolds, like many other distinguished persons, was never satisfied with his own efforts, however well they might satisfy others. When the ingenious M. Mosnier, a French painter, was one day praising to him the excellence of one of his pictures, he replied, "Ah! Monsieur, je ne fais que des ébauches, des ébauches." (Alas! sir, I can only make sketches, sketches.)

2119. ROUBILLIAC'S HONESTY AND ITS REWARD.

It is a pleasing circumstance to relate that Roubilliac's own goodness of heart first brought his excellent talents into notice; and that his great success in life seems to have depended, in some degree, on his honest and liberal conduct, soon after he came to England.

At that time, he was merely working as a journeyman; and, having spent an evening at Vauxhall, on his return he picked up a pocket book, which contained a considerable quantity of bank notes. He immediately advertised it, and a claimant soon appeared, who was so pleased with the integrity of the youth, and so struck with his genius,—of which he showed several specimens,—that he not only gave him a handsome remuneration, but, being a man of rank and fortune, became his patron.

2120. HOGARTH'S MARCH TO FINCHLEY.

This celebrated picture was disposed of by the painter by lottery. There were eighteen hundred and forty-three chances subscribed for. Hogarth gave the remaining one hundred and sixty-seven tickets to the Foundling Hospital, and the same night delivered the picture to the governors. The fortunate number is generally stated to have been among the tickets which the painter handed to the hospital; but it is related in the Gentleman's Magazine, though anonymously, that a lady was the possessor of the fortunate number, and intended to present it to the Foundling Hospital, but that some person having suggested what a door would be open to scandal, were any of her sex to make such a present, it was given to Hogarth, on the express condition that it should be presented in his own name.

§ 212. PECUNIARY AID, PATRONAGE, AND REMUNERATION.

2121. HOGARTH'S MANNER OF SELLING HIS PICTURES.

Hogarth supported himself by the sale of his prints: the prices of his paintings kept pace neither with his fame nor with his expectations. He knew, however, the passion of his countrymen for novelty—how they love to encourage whatever is strange and mysterious; and, hoping to profit by these feelings, the artist determined to sell his principal paintings by an auction of a very singular nature.

On the 25th of January, 1745, he offered for sale

the six paintings of the Harlot's Progress, the eight paintings of the Rake's Progress, the four Times of the Day, and the Strolling Actresses, on the following conditions:—

1. Every bidder shall have an entire leaf numbered in the book of sale, on the top of which will be entered his name and place of abode, the sum paid by him, the time when, and for what picture.

2. That on the day of sale, a clock, striking every five minutes, shall be placed in the room; and when it has struck five minutes after twelve, the first picture mentioned in the sale book shall be deemed as sold; the second picture, when the clock has struck the next five minutes after twelve, and so on in succession till the whole nineteen pictures are sold.

3. That none advance any thing short of gold at each bidding.

4. No person to bid on the last day, except those whose names were before entered in the book. As Mr. Hogarth's room is but small, he begs the favor that no persons, except those whose names are entered on the book, will come to view his paintings on the last day of sale."

This plan was new, startling, and unproductive. It was probably planned to prevent biddings by proxy, and so secure to the artist the price which men of wealth and rank might be induced to offer publicly for works of genius. "A method so novel," observes Ireland, "probably disgusted the town; they might not exactly understand this tedious formula of entering their names and places of abode in a book open to indiscriminate inspection; they might wish to humble an artist who, by his proposals, seemed to consider that he did the world a favor in suffering them to bid for his works, or the rage for paintings might be confined to the admirers of the old masters." Be that as it may, he received only four hundred and twenty-seven pounds seven shillings for his nineteen pictures—a price by no means equal to their merit.

The prints of the Harlot's Progress had sold much better than those of the Rake's, yet the paintings of the former produced only fourteen guineas each, while those of the latter were sold for twenty-two. That admirable picture, Morning, brought twenty guineas, and Night, in every respect inferior to almost any of his works, six and twenty. Such was the reward, then, to which these patrons of genius thought these works entitled. More has been since given, over and over again, for a single painting, than Hogarth obtained for all his paintings put together.

Francis I. having received a picture of St. Michael from the hand of Raphael d'Urbino, which he much coveted, he remunerated Raphael far beyond what his modesty conceived he ought to receive. The generous artist, however, made him a present of a Holy Family, painted by himself, which the courteous monarch received, saying, that "persons famous in the arts partake of the immortality of princes, and are upon a footing with them."

2123. CORREGGIO'S LAST WORK.

Correggio was chosen, by the canons of the cathedral at Parma, to paint its cupola in fresco. The subject was the Assumption of the Virgin. Correggio painted the holy Mary, surrounded by happy spirits and adoring angels, the faces of the heavenly choir glowing with rapturous, celestial joy. This was a subject fitted for Correggio's genius; it was his last and his greatest work. The innumerable company of cherubs—some singing, others scattering incense, and all full of holy delight—gave an opportunity for the display of that childlike grace which was peculiar to Correggio. The picture was wonderful—beautiful; but this was unacknowledged by the mean and cold-hearted dignitaries with whom the artist had to deal.

When Correggio came to receive payment for his finished work, that he might joyfully take home the price of his labors to his poverty-stricken family, the canons found fault with the picture, and finally refused to give him more than half the paltry sum originally promised.

Correggio's necessities were too overpowering to allow him to debate the point. He took the money, which his mean patrons paid all in copper coins. Correggio took the heavy burden on his shoulders. His home was six or eight miles from Parma, and he had to walk that distance under the burning heat of an Italian sun, laden with the weight of the copper, his heart sinking with despondency. He reached his cottage at last, and, thirsty and exhausted, drank plentifully of some water which his children brought. He was immediately seized with a fever, and lay down on his straw bed, from whence he never rose. In three days Antonio Correggio was no more.

2124. STUART AND HIS FRIENDLY ADVISERS.

Stuart related an anecdote of himself to Mr. Frazer worth preserving. "Lord St. Vincent, the Duke of Northumberland, and Colonel Barré, came unexpectedly one morning to my room, locked the door, and then explained the intention of their visit: this was shortly after my setting up an independent easel. They understood that I was under pecuniary embarrassments, and offered me assistance; which I declined. They then said they would sit for their portraits. Of course I was ready to serve them. They then advised that I should make it a rule that half price should be paid at the first sitting. They insisted on setting this example, and I followed the practice ever after this delicate mode of their showing their friendship."

2125. BEFRIENDING GENIUS.

Those who befriend genius, when it is struggling for distinction, befriend the world; and their names should be held in remembrance. There is good sense and right feeling in the reply of Mahomet to the insinuations of the fair Ayesha, that his first wife, Cadijah, was old and unlovely, and that he had now a better in her place—"No, there never was a better: she believed in me when men despised me; she relieved my wants when I was poor and persecuted by the world."

The names of Smith, Hamilton, Kelly, Allen, Jackson, Rathford, and Lord Grantham must be dear to all the admirers of West: they aided him in the infancy of his fame and fortune; they cheered him when he was drooping and desponding, and watched over his person and purse with the vigilance of true friendship.

The story of his success with the portrait of Lord Grantham found its way to Allen, of Philadelphia, when he was at dinner with Governor Hamilton. "I regard this young man," said the worthy merchant, "as an honor to his country; and as he is the first that America has sent out to cultivate the fine arts, he shall not be frustrated in his studies, for I shall send him whatever money he may require." "I think with you, sir," said Hamilton; "but you must not have all the honor to yourself: allow me to unite with you in the responsibility of the credit."

Some time afterwards, when West went to take up ten pounds from his agents, the last of the sum with which he had commenced his studies, one of the partners opened a letter, and said, "I am instructed to give you unlimited credit: you will have the goodness to ask for what sum you please." It is not without cause that Mr. Galt says, "The munificence of the Medici was equalled by these American magistrates."

2126. SIR GODFREY KNELLER.

Sir Godfrey Kneller lessened his own reputation by making it subservient to his fortune. He united the highest vanity with the most consummate negligence of his character. He had the singular honor of painting the portraits of ten sovereigns, and amassed a fortune of two thousand pounds a year, although he lived magnificently, and lost twenty thousand pounds in the South Sea scheme. He is said to have given as a reason for preferring portrait painting, that "painters of history make the dead live, and do not begin to live themselves till they are dead. I paint the living, and they make me live."

2127. SALVATOR ROSA.

Salvator Rosa was one of the greatest painters of the seventeenth century. He was gifted, too, with unusual talents for poetry and music, and has justly been reckoned one of the most extraordinary men the world has ever produced.

He was the son of a poor architect, who made many ineffectual efforts to divert his mind from the bent which nature and genius gave it; but it was all in vain. Poverty and misfortune, however, followed his steps, till some time after his twenty-first year. At length the patrons of art at Rome instituted two public exhibitions of paintings in that city, and a picture, which Salvator sent to a friend at Rome, was placed in the hall of exhibition. It decided his fate: the best judges placed it above Titian's paintings in merit, and nought was heard but praises and applause. No sooner did these reach our hero than he quitted Naples, and hired a house in Rome, where he received the visits and secured the friendship of all the great men of the day. Not only as a painter was he admired, but as a poet, a musician, and a man of great knowledge and acquirement.

In the midst of these happy days arrived the carnival of 1639. The carnivals of Rome were then, as now, very famous, and all the great men of the day contributed to the general amusement. Plays were performed, and cars were drawn through the streets, in which were men wearing masks, who danced, sung, and acted. Among these, at the carnival to which we allude, was an actor, who announced himself as a Signor Formica, from Naples. He attracted the attention of all present by his wit, eloquence, and above all by his songs, which he accompanied with the lute. Various were the conjectures as to who or what this Signor Formica really was; and what was the surprise of the people, when, on the last day of the carnival, he removed his mask, and displayed the well-known features of Salvator Rosa, the painter.

All Rome was now filled with his fame, and there was no longer any doubt of his obtaining that high rank which his ambition had so long desired in vain. No sooner was the carnival past, than Salvator applied himself with increased diligence to his art, and numerous and beautiful were the pictures sent forth from his easel. Poverty was now unknown to him, and he became remarkable for the elegance of his dress and habits. Men of talent flocked around him, and his musical acquirements procured him admittance into the highest society. Orders for pictures increased in number, and he was soon at the height of his fame.

2128. BENJAMIN WEST.

Mr. West, on his return to England, from his studies in Italy, soon displayed his powers for historical painting in a most excellent picture. The subject was that of Pylades and Orestes—one of his very best works. As any attempt at history was at that period an almost unexampled effort, this picture became a matter of much surprise: his house was soon filled with visitors from all quarters to see it; and those among the highest rank, who were unable to come to his house to satisfy their curiosity, desired his permission to have it sent them. Nor did they fail, every time it was returned to him, to accompany it with compliments of the highest commendation on its great merits.

But the most wonderful part of the story is, that notwithstanding this vast bustle and commendation bestowed upon this justly-admired picture, by which Mr. West's servants gained upwards of thirty pounds for showing it, no mortal ever asked the price of the work, or so much as offered to give him a commission to paint any other subject. Indeed, there was one gentleman who was so highly delighted with the picture, and spoke of it with such great praise to his father, that the latter immediately asked him the reason he did not purchase, as he so much admired it, when he answered, "What could I do if I had it? You would not surely have me hang up a modern English picture in my house, unless it was a portrait."

2129. CHARLES AND TITIAN.

Titian had painted the portrait of Charles several times, but now being called to the court of that prince, he for the last time painted his portrait, just as he then appeared in the latter part of his life; and this picture also much pleased the renowned emperor. Certain it is that the very first portrait Titian drew of him so struck him with admiration, that he would never after sit to any other artist; and for every portrait Titian took of him he gave him a thousand crowns in gold.

Titian in all painted three portraits of the emperor; and when he last sat to him, at the conclusion of the picture, Charles said with emphasis, "This is the third time I have triumphed over death."

2130. SIR ANTONIO MORE.

Sir Antonio More, for his portrait of Queen Mary, received from Philip a chain of gold, with the more substantial addition of a pension of four hundred a year, as painter to the king. More followed Philip into Spain, lived in much splendor, and in close intimacy, too, with the monarch, which was not without its danger.

One day, it is said, Philip laid his hand jestingly on More's shoulder, in the presence of his courtiers; and as the artist was professionally engaged, he touched the royal hand with a brush dipped in carmine. The courtiers stood aghast at this criminal breach of court etiquette, and Philip himself surveyed for a moment, in silence, that awful hand which even ladies knelt to kiss, with a serious look. The painter saw his error: he knelt, sued for forgiveness, and obtained it from the king, but not from the Inquisition, who believed, or said, that More had got from the English heretics a charm, wherewith he bewitched Philip. He retired from a country so dangerous for a man of free manners, and pleased the Duke of Alva so much with some portraits of favorite ladies that he was made receiver of the revenue of West Flanders—a lucrative appointment; whereon Sir Antonio forthwith threw away his brushes and burned his easel.

2131. CARLO MARATTI AND SALVATOR ROSA.

While Carlo Maratti was working with daily assiduity in the magnificent gallery of the most interesting palace in Rome, (the Colonna,) condescending to paint Cupids and roses on fragile mirrors, which, however, still decorate walls dismantled of nobler and more lasting ornaments, Salvator Rosa was employed by the Constable Colonna in painting historical pictures for the same gallery, and even affected to barter compliments with the puissant prince. By more than one ill-timed but generous present to a man so greatly his superior in rank and fortune, he unconsciously laid the foundation of a calumny against his noted disinterestedness, which, inconsistent as it is, still stamps his liberal character with one solitary incident of ridicule, or of avarice.

"The Constable Colonna," says a modern retailer of historical anecdotes, "sent a purse of gold to Salvator on receiving one of his beautiful landscapes. The painter, not to be outdone in generosity, sent the prince another picture as a present, which the prince insisted on remunerating with another purse: another present and another purse followed; and this struggle between generosity and liberality continued to the time of many other pictures and presents, until the prince finding himself the loser by the contest, sent Salvator two purses, with the assurance that he gave in, 'et lui ceda le champ de bataille.' The pictures painted at this time for the Constable Colonna were Mercury and the Peasant, Moses found by Pharaoh's Daughter, the two sublime St. Johns, and the landscapes which give rise to the anecdote above recited."

2132. ELEGANT ANECDOTE.

We do not know when we have read a more elegant anecdote than the following, translated from the French for the National Intelligencer. It is told of Horace Vernet, the great French historical painter:—

Vernet had been received in Russia with all the distinction due to his eminent rank in the arts. At Warsaw he was greeted with double enthusiasm on account of his professional fame, and his being, at the same time, one of that nation between which and Poland there is so strong a sympathy. The following anecdote is told with the strongest asseverance of its truth. The Emperor Nicholas engaged Horace Vernet to paint him a picture of the taking of Warsaw, for which his majesty agreed to pay two hundred thousand francs. In the course of their conversation on the subject, the emperor asked the artist whether he might not feel some repugnance in doing a work that would be a record of the fall of Poland. "No, sire," replied Horace Vernet, "I have several times painted the Crucifixion of Christ."

2133. TRIUMPH OF NEEDLEWORK.

The celebrated Miss Linwood copied the Salvator Mundi of Guido, in the collection of the Marquis of Exeter, so exquisitely that she was offered three thousand guineas for that performance alone.

2134. BROOKING.

Brooking, a ship painter of rare merit, about the middle of the last century, like many of the artists of the time, worked for the shops. Mr. Taylor White, treasurer of the Foundling Hospital, one day saw some of the sea pieces of this artist in a shop window in Castle Street, Leicester Square. He inquired his name, but was answered equivocally by the dealer, who told Mr. White that if he pleased he could procure other pictures by the same painter.

Brooking was accustomed to write his name upon his pictures, which mark was as often obliterated by the shopkeeper before he placed them in his window. It, however, happened that the artist carried home a piece on which his name was inscribed; and the master being from home, his wife, who received it, placed it in the window without effacing the signature. Luckily, Mr. White saw the picture before it was removed, and thus discovered the name of the painter whose works he so much admired. He instantly advertised for the artist to meet him at a certain wholesale linen draper's in the city. To this invitation Brooking, at first, paid no regard; but, seeing it repeated, with assurance of benefit to the person to whom it was addressed, he prudently attended to it, and had an interview with Mr. White, who, from that time, became his friend and patron. One of Brooking's sea pieces hangs in the Foundling Hospital: it was painted in eighteen days, and is, altogether, a first-class picture.

2135. OLD MIERIS.

Old Francis Mieris used to value his time at a ducat an hour; and for one picture of a lady fainting he was paid, at that ratio, the large sum of fifteen hundred florins. The Grand Duke of Tuscany is said to have offered three thousand for it, but was refused. One of the most beautiful of the works of Francis Mieris in England, where they are not very common, is known by the name of the Shrimp Man.

2136. GUIDO SELLING HIS TIME.

Guido, when in embarrassment from his habit of gaming and extravagance, is related by Malvasia, his well-informed biographer, to have sold his time, at a stipulated sum per hour, to certain dealers, one of whom tasked the painter so rigidly, as to stand by him, with watch in hand, while he worked. Thus were produced numbers of heads and half figures, which, though executed with the facility of a master, had little else to recommend them. Malvasia relates that such works were sometimes begun and finished in three hours, and even less time.

2137. POVERTY OF CORREGGIO.

"Flanders," says Zimmerman, "amidst all the horrors of civil discord, produced painters as rich in fame as they were poor in outward circumstances.

"The celebrated Correggio had been so seldom rewarded during his life, that the paltry payment of ten pistoles of German coin—and which he was obliged to travel as far as Parma to receive—created in his mind a joy so excessive, that it caused his death."

2138. THE ROYAL PRISONER.

Goupy, an ingenious artist, was in great favor with Frederic, Prince of Wales, and frequently attended at Leicester House, to draw such designs as his royal highness chose to dictate. One morning, on his arrival, the prince said, "Come, Goupy, sit down and paint me a picture on such a subject." But Goupy, perceiving Prince George, his late majesty, standing as a prisoner behind a chair, took the liberty humbly to represent to his royal patron, how impossible it was for him to sit down to execute his commands with spirit, while the prince was standing, and under his royal displeasure. "Come out, then, George," said the good-natured prince, "Goupy has released you."

When Goupy was eighty-four, and very poor, he had a mad woman to nurse and maintain, who had been the object of his delight when young: he therefore put himself in the king's way, at Kensington, where he lived. One morning the king saw him, and stopped the coach, saying, "How do you do, Goupy?" asking him also if he had sufficient to live upon. "Little enough, indeed," answered Goupy; "and, as I once took your majesty out of prison, I hope you will not let me go into one." His majesty was graciously pleased to order him a guinea a week for the remainder of his life, which, however, was but short.

2139. CORREGGIO.

It is related of this artist, justly styled the Apelles of Europe, that, instigated by the desire of beholding the frescoes of Raphael in the Vatican, he visited Rome; and after having long gazed on these celebrated works, conscious of his own transcendent but less regarded talents, he broke forth with the memorable words, "Anch' io son pittore!" (I also am a painter.)

Vasari commiserates the fate of Correggio, whom he represents as of a melancholy turn of mind; timid and diffident of his own powers; burdened with a numerous family, which, with all his prodigious talents, he could scarcely support; ill recompensed for his works.

This picture, however, is exaggerated; for although the situation of Correggio was far beneath his merits, yet it was by no means deplorable. His family was highly respectable, and possessed considerable landed property, which is said to have been augmented by his own earnings. For the Cupola and Tribuna of the Church of St. Giovanni, he received four hundred and seventy-two sequins; for that of the Duomo, three hundred and fifty—payments by no means inconsiderable in those times. For his celebrated Notte, he had forty sequins; for his St. Jerome, which cost him six months' labor, forty-seven. It does not appear probable that he acquired great riches; but there is no doubt that he was equally screened from the evils attendant on penury and affluence.

§ 213. TRIBUTES OF HONOR AND ADMIRATION TO GIFTED ARTISTS AND THEIR WORKS.

When Wilkie was in the Escorial looking at Titian's famous picture of the Last Supper, in the refectory there, an old Jeromionite said to him, "I have sat daily in sight of that picture for now nearly threescore years. During that time, my companions have dropped off one after another, all who were my seniors, all who were my contemporaries, and many or most of those who were younger than myself. More than one generation has passed away, and these, the figures in the picture, have remained unchanged. I look at them till I sometimes think that they are the realities, and we but the shadows."

2141. TRIBUTE TO GAINSBOROUGH.

Shortly after Gainsborough's death, Sir Joshua Reynolds, then president of the Royal Academy, delivered a discourse to the students, of which "the character of Gainsborough" was the subject. In this he alludes to Gainsborough's method of handling—his habit of scratching. "All these odd scratches and marks," he observes, "which, on a close examination, are so observable in Gainsborough's pictures, and which, even to experienced painters, appear rather the effect of accident than design,—this chaos, this uncouth and shapeless appearance, by a kind of magic, at a certain distance, assumes form, and all the parts seem to drop into their proper places; so that we can hardly refuse acknowledging the full effect of diligence, under the appearance of chaste and hasty negligence."

2142. HAYDON'S JUDGMENT OF SOLOMON.

This picture was bought of the artist by Sir W. Elford and Mr. Tingcomb, for seven hundred pounds. While painting it, Haydon got embroiled in a controversy on the Elgin Marbles with Mr. Payne Knight, one of the directors of the British Institution. This gave great offence; and when the painter had been four months at work on the Solomon, he was left without resources; but, by selling successively his books, prints, and clothes, he was enabled to go on with his picture.

At length, after a labor of two years, and by a closing exertion of painting six days, and nearly as many nights, the picture was completed, and exhibited in Spring Gardens, with great success. The directors of the British Institution then showed their sense of Haydon's genius by a vote of one hundred guineas, and all ill feeling was forgotten.

For this work, Haydon was presented with the freedom of the borough of Plymouth, says the vote, "as a testimony of respect for his extraordinary merit as an historical painter, and particularly for the production of his recent picture, the Judgment of Solomon, a work of such superior excellence as to reflect honor on his birthplace, distinction on his name, lustre on the art, and reputation on the country."

Miss Mitford addressed to the painter the following sonnet on this picture:—

"Tears in the eye, and on the lips a sigh;
Haydon, the great, the beautiful, the bold,
Thy Wisdom's King, thy Mercy's God unfold!
There art and genius blend in unison high,
But this is of the soul. This majesty
Of grief dwells here: grief cast in such a mould
As Niobe's of yore. The tale is told
All at a glance. 'A childless mother I!'
The tale is told, and who can e'er forget,
That e'er has seen that woe of despair?
With unaccustomed tears our cheeks are wet;
Heavy our hearts with unaccustomed care;
Upon our thoughts it presses like a debt;
We close our eyes in vain: that face is there!"

Mr. West, on seeing the picture, was affected to tears at the figure of the pale, fainting mother.

2143. THE MEZZOTINTO ENGRAVING OF RUBENS.

James Mac Ardell, the mezzotinto engraver, having taken a very good print from the portrait of Rubens, came with it one morning to Sir Joshua Reynolds, to inquire if he could inform him particularly of the many titles to which Rubens had a right, in order to inscribe them properly under his print; saying he believed that Rubens had been knighted by the kings of France, Spain, and England; was secretary of state in Flanders, and to the privy council in Spain; and had been employed in a ministerial capacity from the court of Madrid to the court of London, to negotiate a treaty of peace between the two crowns, and that he was also a magistrate of Antwerp, &c.

Dr. Johnson happened to be in the room with Sir Joshua Reynolds at the time, and understanding Mac Ardell's inquiry, interfered rather abruptly, saying, "Pooh! pooh! Put his name alone under the prints—Peter Paul Rubens: that is sufficient, and more than all the rest."

During the residence of Titian in Spain, he composed many admirable works, and received many princely rewards from the Emperor Charles V., who gave him the Key, the order of Santiago at Brussels, and constituted him a count palatine of the empire at Barcelona, in 1553.

These favors alarmed the jealousy of the nobles both of Germany and Spain; but their envy drew no other answer from Charles than that he had many nobles, but only one Titian. The artist, who was at some distance, overheard the retort with conscious satisfaction; and as he made his obeisance to the emperor, he dropped a pencil on the floor. The courteous monarch took it up, and delivering it to him, said, that to wait on Titian was a service for an emperor.

The figure of the Sleeping Venus is a miracle of art, and was so decidedly the chef-d'œuvre of Titian, that after several efforts to rival his own matchless work, he quitted this self-emulation in despair. So delighted was Philip IV. with this picture, that when the Prado was on fire, on the fatal accident being reported to him while on the throne, he instantly demanded if the Titian Venus had escaped the conflagration. The messenger assured him that it was saved. "Then," replied the king, "all other losses may be supported."

2145. SIR RICHARD PHILIPS AND THE SEXTON'S ASSISTANT.

When Sir Richard Philips, in his morning's walk from London to Hlew, visited the church on Hlew green, he halted beside the tomb of Gainsborough, and said to the sexton's assistant, "Ah, friend, this is a hallowed spot. Here is one of Britain's favored sons, whose genius has assisted in exalting her among the nations of the earth." "Perhaps it was so," said the man; "but we know nothing about the people buried, except to keep up their monuments, if the family pay; and perhaps, sir, you belong to this family; if so, I'll tell you how much is due." "Yes, truly, friend," said Sir Richard, "I am one of the great family bound to preserve the monument of Gainsborough; but if you take me for one of his relatives, you are mistaken." "Perhaps, sir, you may be of the family, but were not included in the will; therefore are not obligated." Sir Richard could not avoid looking with scorn at the fellow; but, as the spot claimed better feelings, he gave him a trifle, and so got rid of him.

2146. HOLBEIN.

When Holbein determined to quit his native town, Basil, in order to enhance the value of his works, which were becoming too numerous there, he intimated that he would leave a specimen of the power of his abilities. He had still at his house a portrait of one of his patrons, which he had just finished. On the forehead he painted a fly, and sent the picture to the person for whom it was intended. The gentleman, struck with the beauty of the piece, went eagerly to brush off the fly, and found the deceit. The story soon spread, and made more impression than efforts of greater excellence. Orders were immediately given to prevent the city being deprived of so wonderful an artist; but Holbein had already gone.

2147. OPINIONS OF STUART'S WORKS.

Stuart painted a great number of portraits, and they are scattered over the country. They have stirred the first ambition of many an early painter, and they have been visited by our best artists from a distance, as men go to see the works of Italian masters.

When an English ambassador was leaving England for America, he called on West, and asked him to recommend a portrait painter. "Where are you going?" "To the United States." "There, sir, you will find the best portrait painter in the world, and his name is Gilbert Stuart," said West.

When Sully was in Boston, he requested Allston to accompany him to see a portrait of Mr. Gibbs, by Stuart. "Well," said Allston, "what is your opinion?" The reply was, "I may commit myself, and expose my ignorance; but in my opinion, I never saw a Rembrandt, Rubens, Vandyke, or Titian equal to it. What say you?" "I say," replied Allston, "that all combined could not have equalled it."

2148. JUST CRITICISM OF MARTIN'S DELUGE.

Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton has written this eloquent criticism: "Martin's Deluge is the most simple of his works: it is perhaps, also, the most awful. Poussin had represented before him the waste of inundation, but not the inundation of the world. With an imagination that pierces from effects to their ghastly and sublime agency, Martin gives, in the same picture, a possible solution to the phenomenon he records; and in the gloomy and perturbed heaven you see the conjunction of the sun, the moon, and a comet. I consider this the most magnificent alliance of philosophy and art of which the history of painting can boast."

2149. OPINIONS OF ALLSTON IN ROME.

As a proof of the estimation in which Allston was held in Rome, Professor Wier, of West Point, who was studying in that city many years after Allston had left, says that the artists of Rome inquired of him about an American painter, for whom they had no name but the American Titian. When Wier mentioned Allston's name, they exclaimed, "That's the man."

"I have heard celebrated European artists say," states an American writer, "that they believed no painter's coloring, for two hundred years, has so closely resembled Titian's."

2150. ALLSTON'S LATER LIFE.

The latter years of Allston's life were passed in distant from the city of Boston and Harvard University. Probably he chose this residence partly from motives of economy, and partly that he might have easy access to literary society. We know not, indeed, how far his health and circumstances may have rendered seclusion necessary; but it was felt by many, who had no claim to the artist's acquaintance, that he was most unjustly neglected.

A great painter, in the vicinity of so opulent and refined a metropolis, should certainly have found a wider and more intimate recognition—more cordial and spontaneous sympathy. True, his humble abode was sought out by the young worshipper of art, who approached it with reverence, and left it with gratitude. True, his presence was sometimes invoked at the table of an opulent merchant of the neighboring city, who desired to exhibit a native lion to some curious foreigner; and it is also true that Lord Mor-peth's first inquiry, after the British steamer reached the Boston pier, was, "Where does Allston live?" his first object being to visit his studio, and give him a commission, since he had tried in vain to buy one of his pictures in England.

Labouchere managed to hunt out his dwelling and give him gold, which would buy bread, for his Elijah in the Desert. De Tocqueville, and such men, who could not accept every invitation to be lionized, took pains to go out to Cambridgeport to show their veneration for the man who had painted the Dead Man. But, as a general rule, we are told, he was left to his retirement and his poverty, by those who might have been proud of doing homage to the genius, and sitting in the sunlight, of such a spirit.

2151. COLERIDGE'S OPINION OF ALLSTON.

"Washington Allston was gifted with a poetical and artistic genius," Coleridge once remarked to Campbell, "unsurpassed by any man of his age."

2152. DIBDIN ON REYNOLDS.

"Of all conceptions, as well as executions, of portraits," says Dr. Dibdin, "that of Lord Heathfield, by Reynolds, is doubtless among the very finest and most characteristic. The veteran has a key, gently raised, in his right hand, which he is about to place in his left. It is the key of the impregnable fortress of Gibraltar; and he seems to say, 'Wrest it from me at your peril!' Kneller, and even Vandyke, would have converted this key into a truncheon."

2153. VOLTAIRE AND VERNET.

Voltaire was determined never to be outdone in compliments. He said once to Vernet, the painter, in return for his praise,—

"Your colors are beautiful and lasting, and your name will be immortal."

"My colors," said Vernet, "are not so durable as your ink;" and he was going, when he uttered these words, to kiss Voltaire's hand.

"What are you going to do?" said Voltaire, drawing back his hand; "if you kiss my hand, I must kiss your feet."

2154. LIMITATION OF THE ROYAL PRE-ROGATIVE.

When Leonardo da Vinci lay upon his death bed, Francis I. visited him. An attendant informing the painter that the king was come to inquire after his health, he raised himself from his pillow, a lambent beam of gratitude for the honor lighted up his eyes, and he made an effort to speak. The exertion was too much; he fell back, and Francis stooping to support him, the great artist expired in his arms. Affected with the awful catastrophe, the king heaved a sigh, and left the chamber in tears. He was immediately surrounded by his nobles, one of whom entreated him not to indulge his grief, adding, as a consolatory reflection,—

"Consider, sire, the man was but a painter."

"I do," replied the king; "and at the same time consider that though, as a king, I could make a thousand such as you, the Deity alone can make such a painter as Leonardo da Vinci."

2155. TITIAN PATRONIZED BY CHARLES V.

Even after Titian's fame was established, wealth did not come in proportion to renown. He was still a poor man, though he was received as a friend by nobles and princes. Perhaps he hid his poverty through pride, so that it never came to the knowledge of these—his patrons. However, it is asserted that, in 1530, when Titian's name was known over all Italy, the artist himself was in the deepest poverty. This was discovered by a friend, Peter Aretine, who considerably mentioned the painter to the Emperor Charles V. as a subject of his generosity. Charles knew how to assist genius without wounding its delicacy. He employed Titian to paint his portrait, for which he paid him a sum far above any the artist had ever received.

From Bologna, where the emperor was, Titian proceeded to Mantua and Rome, being honorably received at both courts, and using his pencil advantageously, chiefly in portraits of the great and noble of the day. He then rejoined Charles V., who had returned to Madrid, in which city Titian passed three years.

One of the most pleasant things that we have in Titian's life is the long and intimate friendship that subsisted between him and his royal patron, Charles V., the great and good Emperor of Spain, whose name is well known in history as one of the wisest and best sovereigns of Europe. From the time of the painter's first introduction to him at Bologna, Charles ever regarded him as a friend, and treated him as an equal. Not long after this first acquaintance, when the emperor had excited the jealousy of his courtiers by placing Vecelli at his right hand while riding, he made the well-known reply, "I have many nobles, but only one Titian."

2156. TITIAN'S PAINTING AND EL MUDO.

When Titian's famous painting of the Last Supper arrived at the Escorial, the king, Philip II., proposed to cut the canvas to the size of the panel in the refectory, where it was designed to hang. El Mudo, who was present, to prevent the mutilation of so capital a work, made earnest signs of intercession with the king, to be permitted to copy it, and reduce it to the size of the place assigned for it, offering to do it in the space of six months. The king expressed some hesitation on account of the length of time required for the work, and was proceeding to put his design in execution, when El Mudo repeated his supplications in behalf of his favorite master with more fervency than ever, offering to complete the copy in less time than he at first demanded, tendering at the same time his head as the punishment if he failed. The offer was not accepted, and execution was performed upon Titian, accompanied with the most distressing attitudes and distortions of El Mudo.

2157. XIMENES, THE DEAF AND DUMB PAINTER.

Juan Fernandez Ximenes, commonly called El Mudo, or the Dumb, was from his infancy both deaf and dumb. But affording sufficient tokens of an earnest desire to learn the art of painting, he was placed under good masters; and from the excellence which he attained he was called the Spanish Titian. He was one of the painters of the Escorial, and his principal work is the representation of the four evangelists, which he painted in fresco.

One of the paintings which he made for a chapel that King Philip erected in the wood of Segovia represents the beheading of Santiago; and El Mudo inserted the portrait of Santoyo as the executioner, in revenge for some ill offices which that minister had done him. Santoyo complained to the king, begging that the figure might be expunged, and his person not delivered to posterity in the disgraceful occupation of a hangman. The king, who probably knew the cause of the offence, did not disapprove of the nature of the revenge, and excusing himself to Santoyo on account of the excellence of the performance, would not allow the picture to be defaced.

Giovanni Bellini was one of three—a father and two sons—who were founders of the Venetian school of art. Of these, the elder brother, Giovanni, was much the best artist. He was highly esteemed in his own country, and his fame even reached to Constantinople. The Ottoman Emperor Mahomet II. sent a request to him, inviting him thither; but the Venetian senate valued their painter too highly to part with him; they sent his brother Gentili to the Turkish sovereign.

Mahomet courteously received his guest, showed him all honor, and employed him to paint several pictures. Among these was one the subject of which was the beheading of John the Baptist. The emperor was one day looking at this, and pointed out to the artist some error which he fancied he perceived. To enforce his arguments, Mahomet had a black slave brought in, and decapitated in his presence!

This very despotic mode of proving a disputed question in art so terrified the painter, that he never knew peace until he contrived to escape from his polite host, and returned in safety to his own country and his brother Giovanni.

A nobleman of the first quality came one day to see Holbein, when he was drawing a figure after the life. Holbein begged his lordship to defer the honor of his visit till another day; which the nobleman taking as an affront, broke open the door, and very rudely went up stairs. Holbein, hearing a noise, came out of his chamber, and meeting the lord at the door, fell into a violent passion, and pushed him backwards from the top of the stairs to the bottom. However, considering immediately what he had done, he escaped from the tumult he had raised, and made the best of his way to the king.

The nobleman, who was much hurt, though not so much as he pretended, was there soon after him; and upon opening his grievance, the king ordered Holbein to ask pardon for his offence. But this only irritated the nobleman the more, who would not be satisfied with less than life; upon which the king sternly answered, "My lord, you have now to do with Holbein, but with me; whatever punishment you may contrive by way of revenge against him shall assuredly be inflicted upon yourself. Remember, my lord, that I can, whenever I please, make seven lords of seven ploughmen, but I cannot make one Holbein of seven lords."

2160. COPLEY'S DEATH OF LORD CHATHAM

Washington, on seeing this picture, remarked, "This work, highly valuable in itself, is rendered more estimable in my eye, when I remember that America gave birth to the celebrated artist that produced it." The picture is ten feet long, and seven feet six inches high. The painter refused fifteen hundred guineas for it; it was purchased, we know not at what price, by the late Earl of Liverpool, who used to say that such a work ought not to be in his possession, but in that of the public. These words were not heard in vain by the present earl, who munificently presented it to the National Gallery.

2161. WEST AT ROME.

West was the first American who visited Rome for the purpose of accomplishing himself in the art of painting. One of the first acquaintance whom he made after his arrival was Lord Grantham, who became deeply interested in his behalf. Of his claims to mix with men of genius, however, he had as yet submitted no proof; he had, indeed, shown his drawings to Mengs and to Hamilton; but they were, as he confessed, destitute of original merit; nor, indeed, could they be commended for either neatness or accuracy.

He waited on Lord Grantham. "I cannot," said he, "produce a finished sketch, like the other students, because I have never been instructed in drawing; but I can paint a little, and if you will do me the honor to sit for your portrait, that I may show it to Mengs, you will do me a great kindness."

His lordship consented; the portrait was painted; and, the name of the artist being kept a secret, the picture was placed in the gallery of Crespigni, where amateurs and artists were invited to see it. It was known that Lord Grantham was sitting to Mengs, and to him some ascribed the portrait, though they thought the coloring surpassed his other compositions. Dance, an Englishman of sense and acuteness, looked at it closely. "The coloring surpasses that of Mengs," he observed, "but the drawing is neither so fine nor so good." The company engaged eagerly in the discussion; Crespigni seized the proper moment, and said, "It is not painted by Mengs." "By whom then?" they exclaimed; "for there is no other painter in Rome capable of doing anything so good." "By that young gentleman," said the other, turning to West, who sat uneasy and agitated. The English held out their hands; the Italians ran and embraced him.

Mengs himself soon arrived; he looked at the picture, and spoke with great kindness. "Young man, you had no occasion to come to Rome to learn to paint. What I therefore recommend to you is this: Examine every thing here worthy of attention, making drawings of some half dozen of the best statues. Go to Florence, and study in the galleries; go to Bologna, and study the works of Carracci; and then proceed to Venice, and view the productions of Tintoretto, Titian, and Paul Veronese. When all this is accomplished, return to Rome, paint an historical picture, exhibit it publicly, and then the opinion which will be expressed of your talents will determine the line of art which you ought to follow."

A dangerous illness interposed, and for a time prevented West from following this common but sensible counsel. The change of scene, the presence of works of first-rate excellence, and the anxiety to distinguish himself, preyed upon him; sleep deserted his pillow, a fever followed, and by the advice of his physicians he returned to Leghorn, where, after a lingering sickness of eleven months, he was completely cured.

2162. HOMAGE TO ART.

The first great painter in encaustic, of whose works lengthened descriptions have been handed down, was Polygnotus. He painted his celebrated Triumph of Miltiades and the Victors of Marathon by public request; and such was the admiration in which it was held, that the Athenians offered to reward the artist with whatever he might desire. Polygnotus nobly declined asking any thing; upon which the Amphictyonic Council proclaimed that he should be maintained at the public expense wherever he went. Such was the homage of a whole nation! What, then, shall we say to the sentiments of the narrow-minded prelate, who declared that a pinmaker was a more valuable member of society than Raphael!

2163. FUNERAL OF INMAN.

The funeral of Inman, and the subsequent meeting of friends in his behalf, must be regarded with deep interest by all interested in the progress of American art.

"Never—never," says the New York Excelsior, "have we witnessed a more striking scene than that of the long and compact procession, comprising some of the most prominent men, both from this and other cities, following the bier of the artist on foot, for two long miles, on a cold winter evening. No splendid pageant to the memory of the eminent painter could have been so balmful to his hurt mind as that unerring tribute to his acknowledged worth as a man. And if his spirit still hovered near till the earth closed over his mortal remains, it must have soared away at last, content that his name and his fame would be alike shielded and cherished by his mourning countrymen.

"There has seldom been a nobler display of kind and generous feeling than was manifested at the Globe Hotel a few evenings after Inman's death. A notice was published in the city journals, inviting the friends of the late artist to assemble at that place. The high character, and the number of the assembly, bespoke the feeling his death had awakened. Mr. Cummings was called to preside over the meeting, and all its proceedings were characterized by the utmost dignity and propriety. It was resolved that all the works of the late artist, which could be conveniently collected, should be brought together, and an exhibition made for the benefit of his family.

"The next few days furnished the most convincing proofs of the sincerity of the professions that had been made of respect for the citizen they lamented, and admiration for the artist they had lost. The day the exhibition was to begin was anxiously waited for, and when the doors were at last thrown open, the gallery was crowded. Thousands on thousands went to pay their tribute of admiration to departed genius. To those who loved Inman, this was a grateful spectacle; to those who loved art, no sight could be more cheering; for it bespoke an increasing appreciation of the high claims of art and artists to the sympathies of the nation, and a consciousness too that over the early death of Inman the country had cause to mourn."

§ 214. ECCENTRICITIES, SINGULAR ACTS OR HABITS.

To describe the conversation which Blake held in prose with demons, and in verse with angels, would fill volumes, and an ordinary gallery could not contain all the heads which he drew of his visionary visitants. That all this was real, he himself most sincerely believed; nay, so infectious was his enthusiasm, that some acute and sensible persons, who had heard him expatiate, shook their heads, and hinted that he was an extraordinary man, and that there might be something in the matter.

One of his brethren, an artist of some note, employed him frequently in drawing the portraits of those who appeared to him in visions. The most propitious time for those "angel visits" was from nine at night till five in the morning; and so docile were his spiritual sitters, that they appeared at the wish of his friends. Sometimes, however, the shape which he desired to draw was long in appearing, and he sat with his paper and pencil ready, and his eyes wildly roaming in vacancy; all at once the vision came upon him, and he began to work like one possessed.

He was requested to draw the likeness of Sir William Wallace: the eye of Blake sparkled, for he admired heroes. "William Wallace!" he exclaimed, "I see him now—there, there, how noble he looks!—reach me my things." Having drawn for some time with the same care of hand and steadiness of eye as if a living sitter had been before him, Blake stopped suddenly, and said, "I cannot finish him—Edward I. has stepped in between him and me." "That's lucky," said his friend, "for I want the portrait of Edward too."

Blake took another sheet of paper, and sketched the features of Plantagenet; upon which his majesty politely vanished, and the artist finished the head of Wallace.

"And pray, sir," said a gentleman who heard Blake's friend tell his story, "was Sir William Wallace an heroic-looking man? and what sort of a personage was Edward?" The answer was, "There they are, sir, both framed and hanging on the wall behind you: judge for yourself." "I looked," says my informant, "and saw two warlike heads of the size of common life. That of Wallace was noble and heroic, that of Edward stern and bloody. The first had the front of a god, the latter the aspect of a demon."

2165. DOMESTIC STORY OF GESNER.

An interesting domestic story has been preserved of Gesner, who so zealously devoted his graver and his pencil to the arts; but his sensibility was ever struggling after that ideal excellence he could not attain: often he sunk into fits of melancholy, and gentle as he was, the tenderness of his wife and friends could not soothe his distempered feelings; it was necessary to abandon him to his own thoughts, till, after a long abstinence from his neglected works, in a lucid moment, some accident occasioned him to return to them.

In one of these hypochondria of genius, after a long interval of despair, one morning at breakfast with his wife, his eye fixed on one of his pictures: it was a group of fawns with young shepherds dancing at the entrance of a cavern shaded with vines: his eye appeared at length to glisten; and a sudden return to good humor broke out in this lively apostrophe, "Ah! see those playful children, they always dance!" This was the moment of gayety and inspiration, and he flew to his forsaken easel.

Backhuysen was a student in nature's school; and yet he attained to the highest celebrity of his day. He was a resident of Amsterdam, and died there in 1709, at the age of seventy-eight. At a sale of pictures in Amsterdam as late as 1810, four pieces of paintings by Backhuysen sold, respectively, for five hundred and fifty, eight hundred and ninety-five, nine hundred and eighty, and fourteen hundred florins. For a sea piece, painted on a certain occasion, he received thirteen hundred florins.

Sea pieces were his favorites. He often made his sketches in an open boat, amid stormy seas and the wrecks of vessels, at the imminent peril of himself and the boatmen. Or, if reluctantly rowed to the shore, in spite of his entreaties to the contrary, he would go without speaking a word, or allowing any one to speak to him, and complete his sketches with the utmost exactness and truthfulness.

So great was his reputation that many princes visited his rooms, and some even desired to take lessons of him. For Peter the Great he made constructive drawings of ships. He also gave lessons in writing, in which he introduced a new and approved method. He was also a poet.

But along with his many excellences, Backhuysen had his defects. Full of natural gayety, he affected a scepticism which perhaps he did not in his heart always respond to. And yet, within a few days of his death, he ordered a number of bottles of choice wine, on each of which he set his seal. A certain number of friends were then invited to his funeral, to each of whom he bequeathed a gold coin, requesting them to spend it merrily, and to drink the wine with as much cordiality as he had felt while assigning it to them.

2167. BARRY'S APPEARANCE

Barry's dress was coarse and mean. This arose partly from affectation, but not wholly so. His income was small and uncertain, and he was too proud and honest to dress fashionably at the expense of others. The man who contests the matter with fortune will sometimes be worsted; and we must pity, not blame, the consequence of such distress. That he was never rich there can be no doubt; but that he was never in want is also certain; and it is very probable that he flattered himself with thinking that men would say, as he passed by, "That is Barry, the restorator of the antique spirit in art, and the painter of the six pictures in the Adelphi. See how coarsely he is clad, and how careless he is;" and that he would be honored more for the breach than the observance of custom in such matters.

His residence in Castle Street, though wearing a decent exterior when he took possession, soon corresponded in looks with the outward man of its master. The worst inn's worst room, in which the poet placed the expiring Villiers, was equalled, if not surpassed, by that in which Barry slept, atc, and meditated in perfect satisfaction and security. His own character and whole system of in-door economy was exhibited in a dinner given to Mr. Burke. No one was better acquainted with the singular manners of this very singular man than the great statesman; he wished, however, to have ocular demonstrations how he managed his household concerns in the absence of his wife or servant, and requested to be asked to dinner.

"Sir," said Barry, with much cheerfulness, "you know I live alone; but if you will come and help me eat a steak, I shall have it hot and tender, and from the most classic market in London—that of Oxford."

The day and the hour came, and Burke, arriving at No. 36 Castle Street, found Barry ready to receive him; he was conducted into the painting-room, which had undergone no change since it was a carpenter's shop. On one of the walls hung his large picture of Pandora, and round it was placed the studies of the six pictures of the Adelphi. There were likewise old straining frames—old sketches—a printing press—in which he printed his plates with his own hands: the labors too of the spider abounded, and rivalled in extent and color pieces of old tapestry.

Burke saw all this, yet wisely seemed to see it not. He observed, too, that most of the windows were broken, or cracked; that the roof, which had no ceiling, admitted the light through many crevices in the tiling; and that two old chairs and a deal table composed the whole of the furniture. The fire was burning brightly; the steaks were put on to broil, and Barry, having spread a clean cloth on the table, put a pair of tongs in the hand of Burke, saying, "Be useful, my dear friend, and look to the steaks till I fetch the porter." Burke did as desired: the painter soon returned with the porter in his hand, exclaiming, "What a misfortune! the wind carried away the fine foaming top as I crossed the street." They sat down together. The steak was tender, and done to a moment. The artist was full of anecdote, and Burke afterwards declared that he never spent a happier evening in his life.

"I knew Barry," says Mr. Southey, "and have been admitted into his den in his worst (that is to say, his maddest) days, when he was employed upon his Pandora. He wore at that time an old coat of green baize, but from which time had taken all the green that an incrustation of paint and dirt had not covered. His wig was one which you might have supposed he borrowed from a scarecrow; all round it there projected a fringe of his own black hair. He lived alone in a house which was never cleaned; and he slept on a bedstead with no other furniture than a blanket nailed on one side. I wanted him to visit me. No, he said; he could not go out by day, for he could not spare time from his great picture; and if he went out in the evening, the academicians would waylay him, and murder him."

In this solitary and sullen life he continued till he felt ill, very probably from want of food sufficiently nourishing; and after lying two or three days under his blanket, he had just strength enough left to crawl to his own door, open it, and lay himself down with a paper in his hand, on which he had written his wish to be carried to the house of Mr. Carlyle (Sir Antony) in Soho Square. There he was taken care of; and the danger from which he had thus escaped seemed to have cured his mental hallucinations. He cast his slough afterwards, appeared decently dressed in his own gray hair, and mixed in such society as he liked.

Barry was the most repulsive of men in his exterior, in the roughness of his language, and the wildness of his looks; intermingling vulgar oaths, which he seemed to use as strong expletives and notes of admiration. His conversation has communicated even a horror to some. On one of these occasions, a pious lady, who had felt intolerable uneasiness in his presence, did not, however, leave this man of genius that evening, without an impression that she had never heard so divine a man in her life.

The conversation happening to turn on that principle of benevolence which pervades Christianity and the meekness of the Founder, it gave Barry an opportunity of opening on the character of Jesus with that copiousness of heart and mind, which, once heard, could never be forgotten. That artist had, indeed, long in his meditations an ideal head of Christ, which he was always talking of executing. "It is here," he would cry, striking his head. What baffled the invention, as we are told, of Leonardo da Vinci, who left his Christ headless having exhausted his creative faculty among the apostles, Barry was still dreaming on; but this mysterious mixture of a human and celestial nature could only be conceived by his mind, and even the Catholic enthusiasm of Barry was compelled to refrain from unveiling it to the eye; but this unpainted picture was perpetually exciting this artist's emotions in conversation.

§ 2169. SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS'S WORKS.

Sir Joshua Reynolds appears to have been but an irregular manager in his conviviality.

Often was the dinner board, prepared for seven or eight, required to accommodate itself to fifteen or sixteen; for often, on the very eve of dinner, would Sir Joshua tempt afternoon visitors with intimations that Johnson, or Garrick, or Goldsmith was to dine there. Nor was the want of seats the only difficulty. A want of knives and forks, of plates and glasses, as often succeeded.

In something of the same style, too, was the attendance: the kitchen had to keep pace with the visitors; and it was easy to know the guests best acquainted with the house by their never failing to call instantly for beer, bread, or wine, that they might get them before the first course was over, and the worst confusion began. Once was Sir Joshua prevailed upon to furnish his table with dinner glasses and decanters; and some saving of time they proved; yet, as they were demolished in the course of service, he could never be persuaded to replace them.

tosh, "only served to enhance the hilarity and the singular pleasure of the entertainment." It was not the wine, dishes, and cookery, not the fish and venison, that were talked of or recommended: those social hours, that irregular convivial talk, had matter of higher relish, and were far more eagerly enjoyed. And amid all the animated bustle of guests, the host sat perfectly composed; always attentive to what was said, never minding what was eaten or drunk, and leaving every one at perfect liberty to scramble for himself.

2170. THE RAPHAEL OF CATS.

The truth and excellence with which Mind represented cats and bears were without precedent; and his drawings of cats, especially, were so admirable as to entitle him to the honorable, but rather awkward, title of "the Raphael of Cats," by which he was distinguished. No painter before him had ever succeeded in representing, with so much of nature and spirit, the mingled humility and fierceness, suavity and cunning, which the appearance of this animal presents, or the grace of its various postures in action or repose. Kittens he particularly delighted to represent. He varied, to infinity, their fine attitudes whilst at play around the mother, and represented their gambols with inimitable effect. Each of his cats, too, had an individual character and expression, and was, in fact, a portrait, which seemed animated; the very fur appeared so soft and silky as to tempt a caressing stroke from the spectator.

In time, the merit of Mind's performances came to be so well understood, that travellers made it a point to visit him, and to obtain, if possible, his drawings, which even sovereigns sought for, and amateurs treasured carefully in their portfolios. But it does not appear that popularity had any effect on him, either for good or evil, or in any degree modified his simple tastes and habits of life. His attachment was unbounded to the living animals he delighted to represent. Mind and his cats were inseparable.

Minette, his favorite cat, was always near him when at work; and he seemed to carry on a sort of conversation with her by gestures and by words. Sometimes this cat occupied his lap, while two or three kittens were perched on each shoulder, or reposed in the hollow formed at the back of his neck, while sitting in a stooping posture at his table. Mind would remain for hours together in this posture without stirring, for fear of disturbing the beloved companions of his solitude, whose complacent purring seemed to him an ample compensation for the inconvenience. Not at any time what is called a good-humored man, he was particularly surly if disturbed by visitors when thus situated.

Symptoms of madness having been manifested among the cats of Berne in the year 1809, the magistrates gave orders for their destruction. Mind exhibited the greatest distress when he heard of this cruel mandate. He cherished his dear Minette in secret; but his sorrow for the death of eight hundred cats immolated to the public safety was inexpressible, nor was he ever completely consoled. To soothe his regret, and as if to reproduce the victims with his pencil, he began to paint cats with increased diligence, and he amused the long evenings of the ensuing winter in cutting chestnuts into the miniature figures of bears and cats. These fine trifles were executed with such astonishing address, that, notwithstanding his dexterity, he was unable to supply the demand for them. But, being mostly employed as ornaments for the mantel-piece, they were soon attacked by worms, and there is scarcely reason to expect that any specimens of Mind's talents in this line now exist.

2171. BARRY LEAVING THE TAVERNS.

Barry, finding himself too constant a hunter of tavern company, imagined that his expenditure of time was occasioned by having money: to put an end to the conflict, he threw the little he possessed at once into the Liffey.

2172. HOGARTH'S ABSENCE OF MIND.

The celebrated Hogarth was one of the most absent minded of men. Soon after he set up his carriage, he had occasion to pay a visit to the lord mayor. When he went the weather was fine; but he was detained by business till a violent shower of rain came on. Being let out of the mansion house by a different door from that at which he had entered, he immediately began to call for a hackney coach. Not one could be procured, on which Hogarth braved the storm, and actually reached his house in Leicesterfield without bestowing a thought on his carriage, till Mrs. Hogarth, astonished to see him so wet and hurried, asked him where he had left it.

2173. SHALCHEN'S VULGARITY.

Shalchen once painted King William; but as the piece was to be done by candle light, he gave his majesty the candle to hold, till the tallow ran down upon his fingers. As if to justify this ill breeding, he drew his own picture in the same situation. Delicacy was no part of his character.

Having, on a certain occasion, drawn a lady who was marked with the small-pox, but had handsome hands, she asked him, when the face was finished, if she must not sit for her hands. "No," replied Shalchen, "I always draw them from my house maid."

2174. GAINSBOROUGH AND SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

Mr. Gainsborough was a man of great generosity. If he selected, for the exercise of his pencil, an infant from a cottage, all the tenants of the humble roof generally participated in the profits of the picture; and some of them frequently found in his habitation a permanent abode. His liberality was not confined to this alone: needy relatives and unfortunate friends were further encumbrances on a spirit that could not deny; and, owing to this generosity of temper, that affluence was not left to his family which so much merit might promise, and such real worth deserve.

There were other traits in his personal character less amiable. He was very capricious in his manners, and rather fickle and unsteady in his social connections. This was sufficiently evinced by his general conduct towards the Royal Academy, and by his whimsical behavior to Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Soon after he settled in London, Sir Joshua thought himself bound in civility to pay him a visit. Gainsborough, however, took not the least notice of him for several years, but at length called upon him, and requested him to sit for his picture. Sir Joshua complied, and sat once, but, being soon after taken ill, was obliged to go to Bath for his health.

On his return to London, perfectly restored, he sent Gainsborough word that he was returned; Gainsborough only replied, that he was glad to hear that Sir Joshua Reynolds was well, but never afterwards desired him to sit, nor had any other intercourse with him, until he himself was dying, when he sent to request to see Sir Joshua, and thanked him for the very liberal and favorable manner in which he had always spoken of his works.

2175. DAVID THE PAINTER.

It is stated that David, the celebrated artist, in his picture of the Coronation of Napoleon, painted Cardinal Caprara without his wig. The likeness was exact. Caprara remonstrated with David on the omission, and desired him to supply it. The painter said that he never had painted, and he never would paint, a wig. The cardinal then applied to the minister for foreign affairs, and urged particularly that, as no pope had hitherto worn a wig, it might seem as if he (Caprara) had left off his own on purpose to show his pretensions to the tiara. David, however, stood like a rock, even before Talleyrand, and said that his eminence might think himself lucky that nothing but the wig had been taken off. And to this day the wig is not to be seen in the picture.

2176. HUDSON.

Previous to the appearance of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Hudson was the greatest painter in England. The qualification that enabled him to hold this decided preëminence was the ability of producing a likeness with that kind of address which, by the vulgar, is considered as flattering to the person. But after having the head, Hudson's genius failed him, and he was obliged to apply to one Vanhaaken to put it on the shoulders, and to finish the drapery, of both which he himself was totally incapable.

Unluckily, Vanhaaken died, and for a time Hudson was driven almost to despair, and feared he must quit his lucrative employment; he was, however, fortunate enough to meet with another drapery-painter, named Roth, who, not so expert as the former, was yet sufficiently qualified to carry on the manufactory.

2177. THE MAN WITH THE BEARD.

The longest beard recorded in history was that of John Mayo, painter to the Emperor Charles V. Though he was a tall man, it is said that his beard was of such a length that he could tread upon it. He was very vain of his beard, and usually fastened it with a ribbon to his button-hole; and sometimes he would untie it by the command of the emperor, who took great delight in seeing the wind blow it in the face of his courtiers.

2178. EQUANIMITY.

Regnier, King of Naples, was painting a partridge, when he was told that his kingdom was lost. He heard the fatal intelligence in silence, and finished his work before he permitted himself to lament his calamity.

2179. LORENZO LIPPI'S PEDESTRIANISM.

Lippi might have rivalled any modern English pedestrian. One morning, at dinner, he suddenly took it into his head to go to Prato, a town ten miles distant from Florence; so, starting from table, he arrived at Prato, saluted some of his friends, and returned home to finish his meal. Boldinucci says, "He died the victim of his indefatigable walking: having made one of his usual tours in hot weather, he was attacked with pleurisy, and perished in his fifty-eighth year, about 1652.

§ 215. GOOD FORTUNES, POPULARITY, HAPPY CHANGES.

2180. THE COOK AND THE PAINTER.

There dwelt in the service of Paolo Minucci a domestic, holding a place between that of a house steward and a chef-de-cuisine; for he equally regulated the accounts, and superintended the cookery, of the learned and reverend commentator's establishment.

"He was," says Baldinucci, "a fellow of a coarse humor, (di grossa pasta crozzo legname), mingling with a sort of half-witted buffoonery much native shrewdness and sagacity. Allowed to say something worth hearing, he appears to have been the very type of those misnamed fools, who were very frequently the only wise persons in the courts and great houses, in which they were retained for the amusement of the masters."

Salvator Rosa, struck by the humor of this kitchen Democritus, on whom he had bestowed the name of "Filosofo Negro," (the grinning philosopher,) was wont, occasionally, to hold with him "a keen encounter of the wits."

It happened, one day, that as he sat carelessly on the edge of a marble table, chatting with his Filosofo Negro, who stood before him, the conversation took a turn which enabled the cook to utter many silly attacks upon the notorious extravagance, in pecuniary matters, of the prodigal painter. Salvator in vain endeavored to parry the blow by a defence of his contempt of wealth on philosophical principles, and laughingly concluded his argument by observing, "One thing is certain, Il mio Filosofo Negro, that in the hour I have fooled away with you, I might have earned a hundred scudi." "Da vero!" exclaimed the cook, opening his eyes, "eh ben, signior, padrone mio, siete dunque un guan goffo!" (In truth! then verily, master o' mine, thou art an errant blockhead for thy pains!)

Then throwing himself into an oratorical posture, he continued, "Now, what does all this talk about philosophy, and independence, and the like, come to? Suppose your philosophership lost your voice by a cold, your hand by an accident, or your leg by a fall, Signior Dio! what then becomes of this same philosophy? What then would be our famous Signor Rosa! Signor Rosa the improvisatore! Signor Rosa the marvellous painter! Signor Rosa the poet and actor!! No, marry, it would then be Signor Rosa the cripple, Signor Rosa the pauper, Signor Rosa the mendicant. Sante Madre! I see him now standing at the porch of one of our holy churches, with his staff and his poor-box, (bossolo), stunning the good devotees as they pass with 'Carita, signori Christiani miei!' Philosophy, in sooth! I never yet could see the beauty of that philosophy which leads to the staff and the poor-box."

The cook, having thus rounded his period, wiped his greasy face, and went about his business. But when Minucci returned to his house after some hours' absence, he found Salvator, with crossed arms and dangling legs, seated pensively on the marble slab where he had left him on going abroad. Minucci, accustomed to his fitful abstractions, sat down beside him, and accidentally turned the conversation to the arts, and the general extravagance of artists, whose money went more lightly than it came.

Salvator agreed with him, and declared emphatically his own intention of beginning the most rigorous reform in his expenditures, until, growing warm as he spoke, he concluded by sketching a plan of life for his future conduct, which was that of the most penurious miser; "in order," he said, "that he might provide against the accidents of age, infirmity, and the world's neglect."

Minucci, struck by the suddenness of this extraordinary change, and the vehemence with which it was announced, began to argue on the danger and folly of extremes in all things, when Salvator, impatiently springing from the table, exclaimed, "What! do you then desire to see me reduced to beggary? and to behold me standing at a church porch with a staff and a box, and Carita, signori Christiani miei?" Minucci thought he was mad, but on inquiry he discovered that his half-witted cook had done more by an image than all the learned and sage friends of Salvator had been able to effect by reiterated counsels of economical reform.

2181. THE COOK TURNED PAINTER.

In his thirty-sixth year, Claude Gelée was cooking cutlets and grinding colors. In ten years afterwards, Claude Lorraine appears on the scene, the friend of the elegant Cardinal Bentivoglio, the distinguished favorite of Urban VIII., the courted of him who was courted by all, Bernini, and the patent painter of fashion to all the aristocracy of Europe. "The road to his gallery," say some of his historians, "was closed against all who held not the highest rank in the state." Pontiffs, potentates, and princes became the exclusive candidates for the splendid products of his creative genius. His enormous prices limited his purchasers to the wealthiest classes, and the public were, in a manner, shut out from bidding for pictures of which three popes and two sovereigns sought to be the exclusive monopolists.

2182. ADVANTAGES OF PAINTING.

Previous to the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, Zaccarelli, travelling on the continent, was detained on the territories of one of the belligerent powers as a suspicious person, but obtained his release with honor. After declaring his profession and name, both of which he considered sufficiently known, he offered to prove the truth of his assertion by painting a picture, provided the necessary materials were allowed him. His proposal was granted, and his veracity confirmed by the production of his pencil, on which he was immediately released.

2183. STUART'S LOVE OF MUSIC.

When Stuart had exhausted all there was of the Newport patronage he cared for, he made up his mind he would go to London and see if he could not be a painter, as West had become. He seems to have taken with him a full stock of poverty, enthusiasm, and hope—a painter's capital. Poor fellow! He expected to find Waterhouse in London, who would have helped him, but he was gone off to Edinburgh; and so he found himself, one day when his money was all gone, wandering around the "dreary solitude" of London, as Johnson delighted to characterize the dreadful hum of that crowded city.

He went by a church door in Foster Lane, where he heard an organ playing. He stepped upon the threshold, and the "pew woman" told him, in answer to a question what was going on, that the vestry were together testing the candidates for the post of organist. He went in boldly; asked if he might try. He was told he could. He did. He succeeded, got the place, and a salary of one hundred and fifty dollars a year. So much for the musical genius he had cultivated in America, when wise people were telling him he had better leave off serenading girls at night, (for he used to do such things; the lady of a British officer in Newport told Trumbull that he spent his last night he passed in Newport under the window of a friend of hers, playing the flute,) and go to work. It gave him bread now in the swarming wilderness of London, where he needed nothing else.

2184. TRUMBULL'S PAINTINGS FOR CONGRESS.

On the restoration of peace, at the close of the war of 1812-15, Trumbull lost no time in returning to America. He arrived in New York in the autumn of 1815, and "took a house in Broadway, now the Globe Hotel, at one thousand two hundred dollars per year, and commenced his labors with good prospect of success." The 1st of February, the executor was offered two thousand two hundred dollars rent for the same building, and Trumbull was turned adrift.

"I removed," says he, "in May, to Hudson Square, to a good house, at a reasonable rent, and in a beautiful situation; but I soon found myself too far out of town for success in portrait painting, and business languished. Congress was in session, and my friend, Judge Nicholson, advised me to go on to Washington, and there offer my great, but long-suspended project of national paintings of subjects from the revolution.

"Some of the studies were put up in the hall of the house, and in one of the debates on the subject, Mr. John Randolph was ardently eloquent in his commendation of the work, and insisted that I should be employed to execute the whole. The result was, that a resolution finally passed both houses, giving authority to the president to employ me to compose and execute four paintings, commemorative of the most important events of the American revolution; to be placed, when finished, in the Capitol of the United States.

"The choice of the subjects, and the size of each picture, was left to the president, Mr. Madison. I immediately waited upon the president to receive his orders. The size was first discussed. I proposed that they should be six feet high by nine long, which would give the figures half the size of life. The president at once overruled me. 'Consider, sir,' said he, 'the vast size of the apartment in which these works are to be placed; the rotunda, one hundred feet in diameter, and the same in height; paintings of the size you propose will be lost in such a space: they must be of dimensions to admit the figures to be the size of life.'

"This was so settled, and when we came to speak of the subjects, the president first mentioned the battle of Bunker Hill. Observing me to be silent, Mr. Madison asked if I did not approve that. My reply was, 'that if the order had been (as I hoped) for eight paintings, I should have named that first; but as there were only four commanded, I thought otherwise. It appeared to me that there were two military subjects paramount to all others. We had, in the course of the revolution, made prisoners of two entire armies—a circumstance almost without a parallel; and of course the surrender of General Burgoyne, at Saratoga, and that of Lord Cornwallis, at Yorktown, seemed to me indispensable.' 'True,' replied he, 'you are right; and what for the civil subjects?' 'The Declaration of Independence, of course.' 'What would you have for the fourth?' 'Sir,' I replied, 'I have thought that one of the highest moral lessons ever given to the world was that presented by the conduct of the commander-in-chief, in resigning his power and commission, as he did, when the army, perhaps, would have been unanimously with him, and few of the people disposed to resist his retaining the power which he had used with such happy success, and such irreproachable moderation. I would recommend, then, the resignation of Washington.' After a momentary silent reflection, the president said, 'I believe you are right; it was a glorious action.'

The price was settled at eight thousand dollars for each painting. The work went on without interruption, and was finished in 1824.

Soon after Trumbull had painted the four great national pictures in the rotunda at Washington, his wife died; and close upon this, a friend, who had loaned him money during his last unfortunate residence in Europe, asked a settlement. This stripped him of all his means; and at more than seventy years of age the world was before him to begin anew. "A sense of loneliness," says he "began to creep over my mind; yet my hand was steady and my sight good, and I felt the vis vite strong within me. Why then sink down into premature imbecility?"

"I resolved, therefore, to begin a new series of paintings of revolutionary subjects, of a smaller size than those in the Capitol, and to solace my heavy hours by working on them. I chose the size of six feet by nine, and began. Funds, however, began to diminish, and I sold the scraps of furniture, fragments of plate, &c. My pictures remained on my hands unsold, and, to all appearances, unsalable. At length the thought occurred to me, that although the hope of a sale to a nation or state became more and more desperate from day to day, yet, in an age of speculation, it might be possible that some society might be willing to possess these paintings, on condition of paying me a life annuity.

"I first thought of Harvard University, my alma mater; but she was rich and amply endowed. I then thought of Yale: although not my alma, yet she was within my native state, and poor. I hinted this to a friend, (Mr. Alfred Smith, of Hartford;) it took, was followed up, and resulted in a contract."

A gallery, fire-proof, was erected by the college; his pictures arranged under the direction of the artist, and an annuity of one thousand dollars settled upon him for the remainder of his life. Trumbull also made one noble condition in this final disposition of his works, which would alone give immortality to his name. After his death, the entire proceeds of the exhibition of the gallery were to be "perpetually appropriated towards defraying the expense of educating poor scholars in Yale College." He says, in the close of his autobiography,—

"Thus I derive present subsistence principally from this source, and have, besides, the happy reflection that, when I shall have gone to my rest, these works will remain a source of good to many a poor, and perhaps meritorious and excellent man."

§216. WILSON GIVING UP PORTRAIT PAINTING.

Wilson was at first devoted to portrait painting, and, it is said, with fair hopes of success, when an accident opened another avenue to fame, and shut up the way to fortune.

Having waited one morning, till he grew weary, for the coming of Zuccarelli, the artist, he painted, to beguile the time, a scene upon which the window of his friend looked, with so much grace and effect that Zuccarelli was astonished, and inquired if he had studied landscape. Wilson replied he had not. "Then I advise you," said the other, "to try; for you are sure of great success."

The counsel of one friend was confirmed by the opinion of another. This was Vernet, a French painter; a man whose generosity was equal to his reputation, and that was very high. One day, while sitting in Wilson's painting-room, he was so struck with the beauty of a newly-finished landscape, that he desired to become its proprietor, and offered in exchange one of his best pictures.

This was much to the gratification of the other: the exchange was made, and with a liberality equally rare and commendable, Vernet placed his friend's picture in his exhibition room; and when his own productions happened to be praised or purchased by English travellers, the generous Frenchman used to say, "Don't talk of my landscapes alone, when your own countryman, Wilson, paints so beautifully."

These praises, and an internal feeling of the merits of his new performances, induced Wilson to relinquish portrait painting, and proceed with landscape. He found himself better prepared for this new pursuit than he had imagined; he had been long insensibly storing his mind with the beauties of natural scenery, and the picturesque mountains and glens of his native Wales had been to him an academy, when he was unconscious of their influence.

He did not proceed upon that plan of study, much recommended, but little practised, of copying the pictures of the old masters, with a hope of catching a corresponding inspiration; but he studied their works, and mastered their method of attaining excellence, and compared them carefully with nature.

By these means he caught the hue and the character of Italian scenery, and steeped his spirit in its splendor. His landscapes are fanned with the pure air, warmed with the glowing suns, filled with the ruined temples, and sparkling with the wooded streams and tranquil lakes of that classic region. His reputation rose so fast that he obtained pupils. Mengs, out of regard for his genius, painted his portrait, and Wilson repaid this flattery with a fine landscape.

2187. ZOFFANI'S PAINTINGS.

Zoffani was a native of Frankfort, and came to England as a painter of small portraits when he was about thirty years of age. He was employed by George III., and painted portraits of the royal family. He was celebrated for small whole lengths, and painted several pieces of Garrick and his contemporaries in dramatic scenes.

He was engaged by the queen to paint a view of the tribune of Florence; and while there, he was noticed by the Emperor of Germany, who inquired his name, and, on hearing it, asked what countryman he was. Zoffani replied, "An Englishman." "Why," said the emperor, "your name is German." "True," replied the painter, "I was born in Germany; that was accidental: I call that my country where I have been protected."

Zoffani was admitted a member of the Royal Academy in 1783. He went afterwards to the East Indies, where he became a favorite of the nabob of Oude, and amassed a handsome fortune, with which he returned to England, and settled at Strand-on-the-Green. Whilst there, he presented a large and well-executed painting of the Last Supper, as an altar piece to St. George's Chapel, then lately built, where it still remains. Every head in the picture (excepting that of Christ) is a likeness. Here is a portrait of Zoffani himself; the others were likenesses of persons then living at Strand-on-the-Green and Old Brentford. Zoffani had in his establishment a nurse maid, who possessed fine hands, which he ever and anon painted in his pictures.

2188. WASHINGTON ALLSTON'S PRAYER.

The strong devotional feelings of this late distinguished artist formed one of the most prominent traits of his beautiful character. Connected with this characteristic is a remarkable incident in his early life, which has been related to us by one of his few intimate friends. Mr. Allston was a member of the Episcopal church. Although in early life he was ever a constant attendant, he was not strongly attached to religion, nor eminent for his piety. It would be too much to say that he was an unbeliever, or even a sceptic, in his views, but he was wont to speak slightly of religious things, and even to enjoy jests at the expense of holy subjects. His feelings, however, underwent a remarkable change, in consequence of a singular event in his life, which made a very strong impression, and was even regarded by him as a direct divine interposition in his behalf.

Not long after his marriage with his first wife, the sister of the late Dr. Channing, he made his second visit to Europe. After a residence there of a little more than a year, his pecuniary wants became very pressing and urgent—more so than at any other period of his life. He was even at times at a loss for the means of purchasing the necessities of life.

On one of these occasions, as he himself used to narrate the event, he was in his studio, reflecting, almost with a feeling of desperation, upon his condition. His conscience seemed to tell him that he had deserved his afflictions, and drawn them upon himself, by his neglect of religion, and his want of due gratitude for past favors from Heaven. His heart, all at once, seemed filled with the hope that God would listen to his prayers, if he would offer up his direct expressions of penitence, and ask for divine aid. He accordingly locked his door, withdrew to a corner of the room, threw himself upon his knees, and prayed for a loaf of bread for himself and his wife.

While thus employed, a knock was heard at the door. A feeling of momentary shame at being detected in this position, and of fear lest he might have been observed, induced him to hasten and open the door. A stranger inquired for Mr. Allston. He was anxious to learn who was the fortunate purchaser of the painting of the Angel Uriel, regarded by the artist as one of his masterpieces, and which had won the prize at the exhibition of the Academy. He was told that it had not been sold.

"Can it be possible? Not sold! Where is it to be had?" "In this very room. Here it is;" producing the painting from a corner, and wiping off the dust. "Is it for sale? Can it be bought?" was the eager interrogatory. "It is for sale; but its value has never yet, to my idea of its worth, been adequately appreciated, and I would not part with it." "What is its price?" "I have done affixing any nominal sum. I have always, so far, exceeded my offers. I leave it for you to name the price." "Will four hundred pounds be an adequate recompense?" "It is more than I have ever asked for it." "Then the painting is mine."

The stranger introduced himself as the Marquis of Stafford, and he became, from that moment, one of the warmest friends of Mr. Allston. By him, Mr. Allston was introduced to the society of the nobility and gentry, and he became one of the most favored among the many gifted minds that adorned the circle to which he was thus introduced, but in which he was never fond of appearing often.

The instantaneous relief, thus afforded by the liberality of this noble visitor, was always regarded by Allston as a direct answer to his prayer, and it made a deep impression upon his mind. To this event he was ever after wont to attribute the increase of devotional feelings, which became a prominent trait in his character.

2189. SALVATOR ROSA'S ESTATE.

Salvator Rosa had two sons by Lucrezia Rosalba. The elder died young at Naples; Agosto, his heir, on the death of his father, became possessed of a respectable and most interesting property. According to various authorities, he found himself master of eight thousand scudi in specie; letters of credit on the bank of the Rossi for seven thousand more, (the accumulated prices of pictures which Salvator had painted for and left in the hands of this liberal and devoted friend;) a collection of pictures, (some few of Salvator's own were among the number;) a library of valuable books; a quantity of rich furniture; a volume of Salvator's original designs, forming, says Pascoli, "un grosse volume," and his manuscript writings, none of which, not even his satires, were published till after his death. The whole of this property was accumulated since the period of his last return to Rome.

2190. ROUND AS GIOTTO'S O.

Giotto was the man who made that famous design for a church, at the request of Pope Benedict IX. The messengers of the pope entered the artist's studio, and communicated the wish of their master. Giotto took a sheet of paper, fixed his elbow at his side, to keep his hand steady, and instantly drew a perfect circle. "Tell his holiness that this is my design," said he. His friends tried to persuade him not to send such a thing to the pope; but he persisted in doing so. Pope Benedict was a learned man, and he saw Giotto had given the best evidence of perfection in his art. He invited the painter to Rome, and honored and rewarded him. "Round as Giotto's O," from that time, became an Italian proverb.

When Zoffani, the painter, went to England, he was but little known in the country, and without a patron; but the very first picture which he exhibited in London was purchased by Sir Joshua Reynolds at the price which Zoffani demanded for it.

The picture of Zoffani represented a scene in the farce of the Alchemist, in which there is a most excellent portrait of Garrick in the character of Abel Druggier, accompanied by those of Palmer and Burton. This picture Sir Joshua sold soon after to the Earl of Carlisle for twenty guineas above the price which he had given for it, and sent the advanced price immediately to Zoffani, saying, he thought he had sold the picture at first below its real value.

2192. HOGARTH AND HIS FATHER-IN-LAW.

In 1730, Hogarth, then in his thirty-third year, married Jane, the only daughter of Sir James Thornhill, aged twenty-one. The match was neither hasty nor imprudent on the side of the lady; but it was accomplished without the consent of her parents, and her father was offended.

Thornhill had been, or was then, a member of Parliament, was sergeant painter to the king, and a person of public importance and fame in his day, and conceived that his only daughter might have been wooed and won by a man of higher birth and larger income. He could not foresee his unwelcome son-in-law's future eminence; and he knew his present inability to maintain his wife in the style in which she had been educated.

Hogarth was as yet acknowledged by few even as a painter: his works were obviously deficient in the elegant and elaborate drawing recommended by academies, and preached upon by Sir James himself. They wanted harmony of coloring; and, more than all, they bore a stamp and impress of thought materially different from what had found favor with any artist of established reputation.

Some years afterwards, Hogarth designed and etched the first portion of the Harlot's Progress, so much to the gratification of Lady Thornhill that she advised her daughter to place it in her father's way. "Accordingly, one morning," said Nichols, "Mrs. Hogarth conveyed it secretly into his dining-room.

"When he rose, he inquired from whence it came, and by whom it was brought. When he was told, he cried out, 'Very well! very well!' The man who can make works like this can maintain a wife without a portion." He designed this remark as an excuse for keeping his purse-strings close, but soon after became both reconciled and generous to the young people." The reconciliation was sincere. Hogarth was ever the earnest admirer and the ready defender of the conduct and reputation of Sir James Thornhill.

2193. WILKES.

At the period of Wilkes's popularity, every wall bore his name, and every window his portrait. In china, in bronze, or in marble, he stood upon the chimney-pieces of half the houses of the metropolis; he swung upon the sign-post of every village and every great road throughout the country. He used himself to tell, with much glee, of a monarchical old lady, behind whom he accidentally walked, looking up, and murmuring within his hearing, in much spleen, "He swings every where but where he ought." Wilkes passed her, and, turning round, politely bowed.

§ 216. SUDDEN RISE FROM OBSCURITY.

2194. THOMAS SYDNEY COOPER, THE ENGLISH PAUL POTTER.

The admirers of Mr. Cooper's Cuyp-like pictures will be gratified with the following anecdote of the early recognition of the painter's genius, pleasantly related by Miss Mitford, in her Belford Regis:—

"Some time in November, 1831, Mr. Cribb, an ornamental gilder in London, (King Street, Covent Garden,) was struck with a small picture—a cattle piece, in a shop window in Greek Street, Soho. On inquiring for the artist, he could learn no tidings of him; but the people of the shop promised to find him out.

"Time after time, our persevering lover of the arts called to repeat his inquiries, but always unsuccessfully; until about three months after, when he found that the person he sought was a Mr. Thomas Sydney Cooper, a young artist, who had been for many years settled at Brussels, as a drawing master, but had been driven from that city by the revolution, which had deprived him of his pupils, among whom were some of the members of the royal family; and, unable to obtain employment in London as a cattle painter, he had, with the generous self-devotion which most ennoble a man of genius, supported his family by making lithographic drawings of fashionable caps and bonnets, I suppose, as a puff for some milliner, or some periodical which deals in costumes.

"In the midst of this interesting family, and of these caps and bonnets, Mr. Cribb found him; and deriving from what he saw of his sketches and drawings additional conviction of his genius, he immediately commissioned him to paint a picture on his own subject, and at his own price, making such an advance as the richest artist could not scruple to accept on a commission, conjuring him to leave off caps and bonnets, and foretelling his future eminence.

"Mr. Cribb says that he shall never forget the delight of Mr. Cooper's face when he gave the order: he has the right to the luxury of such a recollection.

"Well, the picture was completed: our friend Mr. Cribb, who is not a man to do his work by halves, bespoke a companion, and while that was painting, showed the first to a great number of artists and amateurs, who all agreed in expressing the strongest admiration, and in wondering where the painter could have been hidden.

"Before the second picture was half finished, a Mr. Carpenter (I believe that I am right in the name) gave Mr. Cooper a commission for a piece, which was exhibited in May, 1833, at the Suffolk Street Gallery; and from that moment orders poured in, and the artist's fortune was made. It is right to add, that Mr. Cooper was generously eager to have this story made known, and Mr. Cribb as generously averse to its publication. But surely it ought to be recorded for the example's sake, and for their mutual honor."

In the year 1276, about forty miles from Florence, there lived a poor laboring man named Bondone. This man had a son whom he brought up in the ignorance usual to the lowly condition of a peasant boy. But the extraordinary powers of the child, uncultivated as they necessarily were, and his surprising quickness of perception and never-failing vivacity, made him the delight of his father, and of the unsophisticated people among whom he lived.

At the age of ten, his father intrusted him with the care of a flock. Now, the happy little shepherd boy strolled at his will over meadow and plain with his woolly charge, and amused himself with lying on the grass, and sketching, as fancy led him, the surrounding objects, on broad flat stones, sand, or soft earth. His sole pencils were a hard stick, or a sharp piece of stone; his chief models were his flock, which he used to copy as they gathered around him in various attitudes.

One day, as the shepherd boy lay in the midst of his flock, earnestly sketching something on a stone, there came by a traveller. Struck with the boy's deep attention to his work, and the unconscious grace of his attitude, the stranger stopped, and went to look at his work. It was a sketch of a sheep, drawn with such freedom and truth of nature that the traveller beheld it with astonishment.

"Whose son are you?" cried he, with eagerness. The startled boy looked up in the face of his questioner. "My father is Bondone, the laborer, and I am his little Giotto, so please the signor," said he. "Well, then, Giotto, should you like to come and live with me, and learn how to draw, and paint sheep like this, and horses, and even men?"

The child's eyes flashed with delight. "I will go with you any where to learn that," said he; "but," he added, as a sudden thought made him change color, "I must first go and ask my father; I can do nothing without his leave." "That is quite right, my boy, and so we will go to him together and ask him," said the stranger. It was the celebrated painter Cimabue.

Old Bondone consented to the wish of his son, and the boy went to Florence with Cimabue. Giotto soon went beyond his master in his sketches. His former familiarity with nature, while tending his sheep, doubtless contributed a good deal to his astonishing progress. One morning, the master came into his studio, and looking at a half-finished head, saw a fly resting on the nose. He tried to brush it off with his hand, when he discovered that it was only painted, and that it was one of the tricks of his young pupil. It was not long before the fame of the new artist spread all over Europe.

2196. SALVATOR ROSA AND LANFRANCO.

It happened that as the Cavaliere Lanfranco was returning one day in his splendid equipage from La Chiesa del Gesa to his lodgings by La Strada della Carita, he was struck by a picture in oil, which was outside the shop door of a revenditore, with other odds and ends of second hand wares. Lanfranco stopped his carriage, and ordered Antonio Richieri, his favorite pupil, to alight, and bring him the painting which had attracted his attention.

The revenditore was struck by an honor so little to be expected. The carriage of the great Signor Cavaliere Lanfranco stopping before his miserable balk was a distinction to excite the envy of all his compeers in the Strada della Carita, and he came forward with many gesticulations of respect, wiping the dust from a painting on canvas, four palms in length, which had lain for weeks untouched at his shop door; while "hells" and "purgatories," saints, and martyrs, had gone off with successful rapidity.

Lanfranco took the picture into his carriage, and a nearer inspection convinced him of the accuracy of his first rapid decision. It was labelled Istoria di Agare e del suo figlio languenti per la seta. The affecting story of Hagar had already been treated by Guercino; and the virtuosi of other and distant countries made pilgrimages to Bologna* to view that masterpiece of art, which attracts now the eyes even of the unlearned amidst all the splendid works that surround it, in the gallery of the Brera, at Milan.

Guercino had taken that moment in the story of Hagar, when, having been brought back to the arms of Abraham by "the angel of the Lord," she is again driven forth, through the jealousy of Sarah. She is still in all the force of health and pride of beauty, and she pauses at the threshold of the timid Abraham's dwelling, from which she is sent as an outcast, exhibits all the rural wealth of that patriarch, who is described as being very "rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold." But another epoch, and another view of the story of Hagar, had been taken in the picture which now fixed the attention of the chief of the Roman school. The scene was the wilderness of Beersheba; but so boldly conceived, so desolate, and so dreary, that Nature alone could furnish its details in those vast regions where few then had ventured to study.

The incident was that, — so terrible and affecting in the life of the young outcast mother, — when, having long wandered through pathless deserts and under burning skies, she beholds her last hope extinguished; "for the water was spent in the bottle" which Abraham had put upon her shoulder, and the bread had long been devoured which stood between her and death. She was no more the blooming and indignant Hagar as at the moment of departure, but that Hagar who had, indeed, been "hardly dealt with." She appeared to have "cast her child under one of the shrubs," and had "sat down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot; for she said, Let me not see the death of the child; and she sat over against him, and lifted up her voice and wept."

There was in the conception of this picture a tone of deep and powerful feeling, a gloomy and melancholy originality, which probably struck on the imagination of Lanfranco even more than its execution. He sought for the name of the painter, who was evidently of no school, who copied no master, and whose manner was all his own; and in a corner he perceived a superscription unknown to fame, and by its diminutive termination almost consigned to ridicule. It was "Salvatoriello." The revenditore either could not, or would not, give any intelligence concerning the painter; and Lanfranco, paying without hesitation the price demanded, carried home the picture in his carriage, and gave general orders to his pupils to purchase all they saw bearing the signature of Salvatoriello, without reservation. When he departed from Rome, Hagar was the companion of his voyage, and became the chief ornament of his picture gallery at La Vigna, where he showed it himself to Passeri.

This incident of the purchase of Hagar, and the sweeping order that followed it, caused considerable sensation in the school of Spagnuolo, and among the dilettanti of Naples, which the revenditore who had sold the picture, and others of his brethren who were in possession of works of the same hand, made use to raise the humble price hitherto demanded for the quadretti of the young and neglected artist. They now began to place some value on pictures, which they had hitherto considered it a risk to purchase, even at prices which scarcely repaid the expense for canvas and colors.

This celebrated painter was indebted to Dr. Wolcot, (Peter Pindar,) who found him laboring in a sawpit, for first bringing him forward. When he was first heard of, his fame rested on a very humble foundation. He was asked what he had painted to acquire him the village reputation he enjoyed. His answer was, "I ha' painted Duke William from the signs; and stars, and sich like things, for the boys' kites." Wolcot told him, some time after, that he should paint portraits as the most profitable employment. "So I ha'; I ha' painted farmer so and so, and neighbor such a one, &c., wi' their wives, and their eight or ten children." "And how much do you receive?" "Why, farmer so and so said it were but right to encourage genus, and so he ga' me half a guinea!" "Why, sir, you should get at least half a guinea for every head." "O, na! that winna do; it would ruin the country." So strikingly humble and characteristic were the first steps of Opie.

2198. BAPTISM OF THE KING OF CASHEL.

There is a tradition in the Irish church concerning the conversion of a king of Cashel by the eloquence of St. Patrick. The barbarian prince, when the apostle concluded his exhortation, called loudly to be baptized; and such was the hurry of the one, and the fortitude of the other, that though the saint, while implanting his iron-shod crosier in the ground, struck it unwittingly through the royal convert's foot, he uttered not one murmur, nor moved a muscle, but, conceiving it to be a part of the ceremony, stood and was baptized. This subject was wisely selected by Barry, while as yet almost unknown to the world as an artist.

"The moment of baptism," says Dr. Fryer, "rendered so critical and awful by the circumstance of the king's foot being pierced with the spear, is that which Barry chose for the display of his art; and few stories, it is presumed, have been selected with greater felicity, or with greater scope for the skill and ingenuity of the artist. The heroic patience of the king, the devotional abstraction of the saint, and the mixed emotions of the spectators, form a combined and comprehensive model of imitation, and convey a suitable idea of the genius of one, who, self-instructed, and at nineteen, conceived the execution of so grand a design.

With this work in his hand, Barry went to Dublin, and placed it among the paintings collecting for exhibition by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. He was at this time utterly unfriended and unknown, coarsely clad, and with something of the stamp of one enduring poverty upon him. The picture was exhibited and admired; but so little was such a work expected from a native artist, that when the name of the painter was demanded, and he stepped modestly forward, no one would believe him: his brow glowed, he burst into tears, and hurried out of the room. All this was observed by Edmund Burke, one of the greatest and best-hearted of all the sons of genius. He sought the young artist out, commended and encouraged him, laid down the natural rules of composition, and directed his attention to what was pure and poetical.

2199. RACHEL VAN POOL, BETTER KNOWN BY THE NAME OF RACHEL RUGSCH.

This ingenious lady was born at Amsterdam, in 1664. Her father was the famous professor of anatomy, Rugsch; and her instructor in the art of painting was William Van Aelst, whom, in a few years, she equalled in the representation of flowers and fruit.

She studied Nature with a curious and penetrating eye, and imitated her productions in so lovely a manner, that she was considered almost a prodigy, and allowed to be the most able artist, in that line, of her time. Her choice of subjects was judicious; her manner of painting them exquisite; and she contrasted them, in all her compositions, with unusual beauty and delicacy, so that her reputation was spread throughout Europe.

She was appointed painter to the elector palatine, who, as a testimony of respect for her merit, sent her a complete set of silver furniture for her toilet, consisting of twenty-eight pieces, and six candlesticks, of wrought plate, for wax tapers. He also engrossed the greatest part of her works, and not only paid for them with princely liberality, but also made her some additional present.

In early life she married Juria Van Pool, an eminent painter of portraits, with whom she lived happily, and yet continued to paint to the last period of a very long life; and her pictures at the age of eighty were as neatly pencilled, and worked up as highly, as those which she painted when she was thirty. She composed her subjects with extraordinary skill, finished them with a degree of transparency, and her coloring was not only beautiful, but showed so much nature, that every plant, flower, or insect, might deceive the eye with the semblance of reality.

Her pictures are uncommonly rare, being treasured up as curiosities in Germany and Holland, in the cabinets of princes, or in the collections of connoisseurs. She died at Amsterdam, in 1750.

2200. SOPHONISBA ANGUSCIOLA.

This ingenious female artist was born at Cremona, of a noble family, in 1533. Her first instructor was Bardino Campi; but she learned coloring and perspective from Bernardo Gatti, called Soirro.

One of her first performances was the portrait of her father, placed between his two children, with such strong characters of life and nature, a pencil so free and firm, and so lively a tone of color, as commanded universal praise. But though portraits engrossed the greatest part of her time, she also designed several historical subjects, the figures of which were of small size, touched with spirit, and with attitude easy, graceful, and natural.

In 1561, Sophonisba, by which name she was always called, went to Madrid, with her three sisters; and while there, she painted the portrait of Queen Isabella, which the king sent to Pope Pius IV. This picture was accompanied by a letter to his holiness from Sophonisba, who was honored with a gracious answer in the pope's own hand, highly complimentary to her talents, and assuring her he had placed her performance among his choicest curiosities.

Palomino says that she died in Madrid, in 1575; but this is incorrect, for she returned to her native place, where, by continual application to her profession, she lost her sight. In this state she was visited by Vandyke, who used to say that he had received more practical knowledge of the principles of his art from a blind woman than by studying all the works of the best masters in Italy. She died in Cremona, in 1626.

2201. SCISSORS ARTIST.

Joanna Koerton Block, the wife of Adrian Block, from her youth showed a strong inclination to drawing, painting, and embroidery, and arrived at an astonishing excellence in all. But she principally employed herself in cutting on paper the representation of landscapes, birds, fruits, and flowers, which she executed with incredible exactness and delicacy. The lines with which she defined her objects were as exquisitely nice as the lines of engraving; and yet she performed it with scissors alone.

Nor was she confined to any particular subject, for all kinds were to her equally easy and familiar. Sea pieces, animals, architecture, and still life were, perhaps, her favorite subjects; but she also cut portraits on paper, with as striking a resemblance as if they had been painted in oil by the hand of the ablest masters. She was accounted so great a prodigy in this way, that she was visited by the nobility of the first rank of all nations who travelled through Amsterdam, where she resided; and was particularly honored by Peter the Great, who condescended to pay her a visit in her own house. The elector palatine offered her, for three small pictures of her own cutting, a thousand florins; yet she refused so large a price for them.

At the request of the Empress of Germany, she designed a trophy, with the arms of the empire, ornamented with laurel crowns, garlands of flowers, and other decorations suitable to the subject, which she executed with such correctness of drawing and design, such wonderful beauty and delicacy, as it is impossible to describe. For this exquisite performance she received a present from the empress of four thousand florins. She also cut the portrait of the emperor, which is hung up in the imperial cabinet at Vienna, and esteemed not the least curiosity in that collection of rarities.

2202. HOLLOWAY, MADAME BOUILLER, AND THE CARTOONS.

Holloway, who so successfully copied in black chalks the cartoons of Raphael in Hampton Court Palace, was an eccentric genius, deeply read in Scripture, which he expounded in the most nasal tone; but it was very interesting to listen to his observations on the beauties and merits of these masterpieces of art. A Madame Bouiller, a French emigrée, was also occupied on the same subjects. She was patronized by West, who gave her permission to study in the palace, and said that he had never seen such masterly artistical touches of the crayon as hers.

One morning, Holloway was found foaming with rage in the cartoon gallery. Some person had written against the cartoons, denominating them "wretched daubs;" and sorely did it wound the feelings of the enthusiastic artist, who worshipped with religious fervor these works of Raphael. Yet it was a grotesque scene to behold Madame Bouiller pacing after Holloway, up and down the gallery, with all the grimace and intensity of a French woman, and reëchoing his furious lamentations.

2203. MINIATURE LANDSCAPE PAINTING.

Van Mander relates that Anne Smyters, the wife of John de Herre, a Flemish sculptor, painted a landscape representing a mill with the sails bent, and the miller appearing as if mounting the stairs, loaded with a sack. Upon the terrace, where the mill was fixed, were seen a horse and cart, and, on the road, several peasants. The whole was highly finished, and pencilled with wonderful delicacy and neatness, and was also wonderfully distinct; yet the painting was so amazingly minute, that the surface of it might be covered with one grain of corn.

218. PAINTERS AND THEIR CRITICS.

2204. JOHNSON'S PORTRAIT.

In 1775, Sir Joshua painted that portrait of his friend Dr. Johnson which represents him as reading and near-sighted. This was very displeasing to Johnson, who, when he saw it, reproved Sir Joshua for painting him in that manner and attitude, saying, "It is not friendly to hand down to posterity the imperfections of any man." But, on the contrary, Sir Joshua himself esteemed it a circumstance in nature to be remarked as characterizing the person represented, and therefore as giving additional value to the portrait.

Of this circumstance Mrs. Thrale says, "I observed that he would not be known by posterity for his defects only, let Sir Joshua do his worst;" and when she adverted to his own picture painted with the ear trumpet, and done in this year for Mr. Thrale, she records Johnson to have answered, "He may paint himself as deaf as he chooses, but I will not be blinking Sam."

2205. PRECISION IN THE EXTREME.

The Evening Traveller, some time ago, gave the following anecdote as illustrative of the extreme precision of a large class of American ladies:—

"A number of years ago, Mr. Bass Otis, a portrait painter, executed the likeness of Mrs. —, the sister of Dr. Physic, of New York. She was a Quakeress of the strictest sect, and wonderfully precise in the number and arrangement of the plaits and folds of her extremely plain, neat dress. After the picture was finished, it was exhibited by the artist to the lady for examination. Having looked at it silently, in Quaker style, for some moments, she suddenly raised her hands and exclaimed, in tones of disappointment and surprise,—

"Thee has made a great mistake, friend Bass!"

"Indeed, replied the painter, who thought his picture too correct to be a great mistake; 'and wherein, madam?'

"Why, thee has painted ten crimps in my cap, and I never wear but nine!"

"The cap had to be altered to correspond with the truth."

2206. ANECDOTE OF SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

The following remark of Sir Joshua Reynolds is worthy of so eminent, enlightened, and liberal an artist.

"The only wages a real genius thinks of in his labor is the praise of impartial judges."

He was so deeply impressed by the transcendent genius of Michael Angelo, that in the last speech which he made as president of the Royal Academy, he thus concludes: "I reflect, not without vanity, that these discourses bear testimony of my admiration of this truly divine man; and I should desire that the last words which I should pronounce in this Academy, and from this place, might be the name of Michael Angelo! Michael Angelo!"

In a party dining at General Paoli's, the subject of wine drinking was introduced, which Sir Joshua defended; and Boswell at that time drinking water, in imitation of Dr. Johnson, the latter exclaimed, "Boswell is a bolder combatant than Sir Joshua. He argues for wine without the help of wine, but Sir Joshua with it." Sir Joshua replied, "But to please one's company is a strong motive." Johnson, supposing many in the company to be elevated, exclaimed, "I won't argue any more with you, sir; you are too far gone." Sir Joshua mildly answered, "I should have thought so, indeed, sir, had I made such a speech as you have now done." On this, Johnson drew himself up, blushing, as Boswell describes him, and said, "Nay, don't be angry. I did not mean to offend you."

This delicacy of conduct was remarkable. Mr. Burke remarked to him the peculiar advantages which certain situations gave to those who chose to make use of them. "For instance; you who are so much in private with persons of the highest rank and power, when they are sitting for their pictures, at moments also when they are at leisure and in good humor, might obtain favors from them which would give you a patronage almost equal to that of a prime minister." "There is some truth in what you say," answered Sir Joshua; "but how could I presume to ask favors from those to whom I became known only by my obligations to them?"

2207. QUEEN ELIZABETH.

"I do not approve of shades in painting," said Queen Elizabeth to Daniel Myers; "you must strike off my likeness without shadows." Her majesty, when she spoke thus, was near sixty, and the "shadows," as she humanely called them, were wrinkles big enough to have laid a straw in them.

2208. RAPHAEL'S PAUL.

While Raphael was engaged in painting his celebrated frescoes, he was visited by two cardinals, who began to criticize his work, and found fault without understanding it.

"The apostle Paul has too red a face," said one.

"He blushes, even in heaven, to see what hands the church has fallen into," said the indignant painter.

2209. OPIE'S PORTRAIT OF FOX.

Opie's portrait of Charles Fox has been justly commended; nor does the circumstance of his having completed the likeness from the bust of Nollekens, as related by Smith, diminish his merit.

When Fox, who sat opposite to Opie at the Academy dinner, given in the exhibition room, heard the general applause which his portrait obtained, he remembered that he had given him less time than the painter had requested, and said, across the table, "There, Mr. Opie, you see I was right; every body thinks it could not be better. Now, if I had minded you, and consented to sit again, you most probably would have spoiled the picture." While this far-famed portrait was in progress, Opie became alarmed for his success. He was distracted by a multitude of hints, which friends who came in swarms dropped, regarding the expression, the posture, and the handling.

Fox was amused at the variety of opinions, and kindly whispered to Opie, "Don't mind what these people say; you must know better than they do."

2210. VANDYKE'S KING CHARLES I.

The portrait of King Charles I., in whole length, in armor, painted by Vandyke, and which formed part of the Houghton collection, afterwards sold to the Empress of Russia, has a singular defect, both the gauntlets being drawn for the right hand. When this picture was in the Wharton collection, old Jacob Tonson, who had remarkably ugly legs, was finding fault with the two gauntlets; on which Lady Wharton said, "Mr. Tonson, why might not one man have two right hands, as well as another two left legs?"

2211. VERNET'S INVISIBLE.

Vernet relates that he was once employed to paint a landscape with a cave, and St. Jerome in it. He accordingly painted the landscape with St. Jerome at the entrance of the cave. When he delivered the picture, the purchaser, who understood nothing of perspective, said, "The landscape and the cave are well made, but St. Jerome is not in the cave."

"I understand you, sir," replied Vernet; "I will alter it." He therefore took the painting, and made the shade darker, so that the saint seemed to be farther in. The gentleman took the painting; but it again appeared to him that the saint was not in the cave. Vernet then wiped out the figure, and gave it to the gentleman, who seemed perfectly satisfied. Whenever he saw strangers to whom he showed the picture, he said, "Here you see a picture by Vernet, with St. Jerome in the cave."

"But we cannot see the saint," replied the visitors.

"Excuse me, gentlemen," answered the possessor; "he is there; for I have seen him standing at the entrance, and afterwards farther back, and am therefore quite sure that he is in it."

2212. TWO GENTLEMEN IN MASQUERADE.

In the exhibition of the Royal Academy, 1770, there was a picture painted by Mr. Hone, entitled Two Gentlemen in Masquerade. They were represented as capuchin friars, regaling themselves with punch. When this picture was sent for admission, one of the personages was represented as squeezing a lemon, while the other was stirring the liquor with the crucifix at the end of his rosary; but the council considered the latter circumstance as too indecorous to allow the picture's being exhibited in that state, and the artist was requested to alter the crucifix. This request was complied with; but Mr. Hone was much offended, when, in truth, he ought to have been pleased, with their having pointed out an impropriety which might not have struck him upon the first idea of his picture.

However, the desired alteration was made, and a ladle introduced, which he painted with a substance easily washed away, and the picture was again displayed at his own exhibition in its original state.

2213. HOGARTH'S UNFORTUNATE DEDICATION OF A PICTURE.

Hogarth dedicated his picture of the March to Finchley to George II. The following dialogue is said to have ensued, on this occasion, between the sovereign and the nobleman in waiting: "Pray, who is this Hogarth." "A painter, my liege." "I hate painting, and poetry too; neither the one nor the other ever did any good." "The picture, please your majesty, must undoubtedly be considered as a burlesque." "What, a painter burlesque a soldier? He deserves to be picketed for his insolence. Take his trumpery out of my sight."

2214. THE GERMAN'S CRITICISM.

A plain, blunt German was asked by his friend, a Roman, how he liked a very famous picture of an old shepherd leaning on his crook. "Like it?" said he; "why, if the original was alive, I would not take him if you would give him to me for a slave."

2215. RILEY.

John Riley, one of the best native painters that has flourished in England, was too diffident of his own talents, and easily disgusted with his own work. A small portion of the vanity of Kneller would have made Riley's fortune. Charles II. sat to him, but almost discouraged the bashful artist from pursuing a profession for which he was so well calculated. Looking at the picture, the king exclaimed, "Is this like me? Then, odds fish, I am an ugly fellow." This discouraged Riley so much, that he could not bear the picture, though he sold it for a large price. He afterwards painted the portraits of King James II. and of William and Mary.

2216. CARRACHI AND THE CENSURED ARTIST.

Annibale Carracci censured the pictures of Josephin, a rival artist, who, desirous to be revenged upon the critic, challenged him to fight with swords. Annibale took a painting brush, and, showing it to the incensed Josephin, said, with coolness, "I challenge you to fight with this weapon, and with this I mean to conquer you."

§ 219. MODELS USED BY ARTISTS.

2217. THE WISDOM OF EUPOMPUS.

Eupompus, the painter, was asked by Lysippus, the sculptor, whom among his predecessors he should make objects of his imitation. "Behold," said the painter, showing his friends a multitude of characters passing by,— "behold my models. From nature, not from art, by whomsoever wrought, must the artist labor, who hopes to attain honor and extend the boundaries of his art."

2218. GIOTTO'S LIVING MODEL FOR A CRUCIFIX.

Giotto, intending to make a painting of the Crucifixion, induced a poor man to suffer himself to be bound to a cross, under the promise of being set at liberty in an hour, and handsomely rewarded for his pains. Instead of this, as soon as Giotto had made his victim secure, he seized a dagger, and, shocking to tell, stabbed him to the heart! He then set about painting the dying agonies of the victim to his foul treachery.

When he had finished his picture, he carried it to the pope, who was so well pleased with it that he resolved to place it above the altar of his own chapel. Giotto observed that, as his holiness liked it so well, he might, perhaps, like to see the original. The pope, shocked at the impicity of such an idea, uttered an exclamation of surprise. "I mean," added Giotto, "I will show you the person whom I employed as my model in this picture; but it must be on condition that your holiness will absolve me from all punishment for the use which I have made of him." The pope promised Giotto the absolution for which he stipulated, and accompanied the artist to his workshop. On entering, Giotto drew aside a curtain which hung before the dead man, still stretched on the cross, and covered with blood.

The barbarous exhibition struck the pontiff with horror. He told Giotto he could never give him absolution for so cruel a deed, and that he must expect to suffer the most exemplary punishment. Giotto, with seeming resignation, said he had only one favor to ask—that his holiness would give him leave to finish the piece before he died. The request had too important an object to be denied: the pope readily granted it; and, in the mean time, a guard was set over Giotto to prevent his escape.

On the painting being replaced in the artist's hands, the first thing he did was to take a brush, and, dipping it into a thick varnish, he daubed the picture all over with it, and then announced that he had finished the task. His holiness was greatly incensed at this abuse of the indulgence he had given, and threatened Giotto that he should be put to the most cruel death, unless he painted another picture equal to the one which he had destroyed. "Of what avail is your threat," replied Giotto, to a man whom you have doomed to death at any rate?" "But," replied his holiness, "I can revoke that doom." "Yes," continued Giotto, "but you cannot prevail on me to trust your verbal promise a second time." "You shall have a pardon under my signet before you begin."

On that, a conditional pardon was accordingly made out and given to Giotto, who, taking a wet sponge, in a few minutes wiped off the coating with which he had bedaubed the picture, and, instead of a copy, restored the original in all its beauty to his holiness.

2219. THE PAINTER AND HIS MODEL.

A modern French painter, who wished to represent the tragical end of Milo of Crotona, met in the street a porter of most athletic form. He admired his colossal figure and vigorous muscles, and offered him a louis d'or on condition of his standing to him as a model. It was only necessary to tie his hands and confine him with an iron ring, in order to represent, as well as possible, the trunk of the tree in which Milo's hands were imprisoned, when he was devoured by wild beasts.

The porter readily consented to the proposal of the painter: he stripped himself, and suffered his hands to be bound. "Now," said the artist, "imagine a lion is darting upon you, and make every effort you would in such a case to escape his fury. The porter threw himself into a violent agitation; but he made too many grimaces; there was nothing natural in his frightful contortions. The painter gave him further directions; but still he failed of producing the desired effect. At length he thought of a method to obtain his object. He let loose a vigorous mastiff, which was kept in the yard of the house, and desired him to seize the unfortunate captive.

This stratagem fully excited both the gesture and utterance. The efforts of the porter became natural, and the fury of the animal increased in proportion as his struggles were violent. The painter, in a fit of transport, seized his pencil. The porter, who had been bitten by the dog, uttered violent cries. "Excellent! Bravo!" exclaimed the artist; "continue; O, that's admirable!" Finally the sitting, or rather the torture, being at an end, the artist released his model, who consented to be indemnified in money for having been so cruelly used.

2220. CALLOUSNESS OF FEELING IN THE FRENCH PAINTER, DAVID.

It is related of the French painter David, that he attended the execution of his friends Danton and Camille Desmoulins, as a spectacle connected with his improvement in the art of painting; and that at the time of the massacre of the prisoners at La Force, in September, 1792, he was composedly making sketches from the dying and the dead. Roboul asked him what he was doing. He coolly replied, "I am catching the last convulsions of nature in these scoundrels."

2221. GUIDO RENI.

Guercino was very desirous to know the model by which Guido painted the heads of his women; he therefore begged a common friend to prevail upon Guido to satisfy his curiosity. The friend went and made his request. Immediately Guido ordered the woman who ground his colors, who was ugliness itself, to sit down before him, and painted the most beautiful female head that could be imagined. "So," said he to the astonished friend of Guercino, "relate what you have seen me do; and be assured, that when an artist has his head filled with fine ideas, he wants no other model than such a one as you see before me."

An ancient artist, being required to paint a perfect female face, had the collected beauty of Greece brought before him; and as there was some particular feature in which each of their fair models excelled, he took from every face its greatest excellence, and combined them into one. From one he took a tress, from another an eye, from another a lip, from another an eyebrow, &c.

His picture at last needed but one more touch, and that was the simple and unaffected blush of modesty. He came to the last of his models, and requested her to remove the veil from her face; but her modesty revolted; she shrunk from the artist's scrutiny, and made her escape from his apartment. The picture was finished without her, and exhibited to the public; and while all were loud in their admiration of it, the artist alone seemed discontented. His friends inquired the cause of his dissatisfaction, and he replied, "I know the picture has merit, and that it would be easier to criticize than to excel it; but it has one capital defect." "What is that?" said his friend. He answered, "The blush of the maiden whose modesty would not suffer herself to be unveiled."

Morland's easel was always surrounded by associates of the lowest class—horse dealers, boxers, jockeys, cobblers, &c. He had a wooden frame placed across his room, similar to that placed in a police office, with a bar that lifted up to allow those to pass with whom he had business, or who enjoyed his special favor. He might have been said to be in an academy in the midst of models. He would get one to stand for a hand, another for a head, an attitude, or a figure, according as their countenance or character suited. In this manner he painted some of his best pictures, while his companions were regaling on gin and red herrings around him. Morland never let slip an opportunity which he could turn to his professional advantage.

Just as he was about to begin his four pictures of the Deserter, a sergeant, drummer, and soldier, on their way to Dover, in pursuit of deserters, came in for a billet. Morland, seeing these men would answer his purpose, treated them plentifully, while he was making inquiries on the different modes of recruiting, with every particular attendant on the trial of deserters by court-martial, and on their punishment. He then took them to his house, where he gave them plenty of ale, wine, and tobacco, and caroused with them all night, employing himself busily in sketching and noting down whatever was likely to serve his purpose.

2224. FUSELI AND SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE.

In Cunningham's Life of Mr. Lawrence is a curious passage relating to Fuseli. "When he first saw my Satan," said Sir Thomas, "he was nettled, and said, 'You borrowed the idea from me.' 'In truth, I did take the idea from you,' I replied; 'but it was from your person, and not from your painting-room. When we were assembled at Stockport, in Cheshire, you may remember, you stood on the high rock, which overlooks the Bay of Bristol, and gazed upon the sea, which rolled so magnificently below. You became enraptured; and while you were exclaiming, 'Grand! how grand, how terrific, how sublime the view!' you put yourself in one of the wildest of postures. I thought then of the devil looking into the abyss, and took a slight sketch of you at that time here it is. My Satan's posture now was yours then!"

§ 220. KEENNESS, WIT, AND SARCASM.

2225. FLATTERING COMPLIMENT.

It is remembered by many that Stuart generally produced a likeness on the panel or canvas, before painting in the eyes, his theory being, that on the nose, more than any other feature, likeness depended. On one occasion, when a pert coxcomb had been sitting to him, the artist gave notice that the sitting was ended, and the dandy exclaimed, on looking at the canvas, "Why, it has no eyes!" "It is not nine days old yet!" was Stuart's reply. The reader need not be reminded that nine days must elapse from the birth of a puppy before he opens his eyes.

2226. HOGARTH versus POPE.

While Hogarth was sketching the Harlot's Progress, he found leisure, and had the audacity, to satirize Pope. "Pope," says Johnson, "published, in 1731, a poem called False Taste, in which he very particularly and severely criticizes the house, the furniture, the gardens, and the entertainments of Timon, a man of great wealth and little taste. By Timon and the Earl of Burlington, to whom the poem is addressed, he was privately said to mean the Duke of Chandos, a man perhaps too much delighted with pomp and show, but of a temper kind and beneficent, and who had, consequently, the voice of the public in his favor. A violent outcry was therefore raised against the ingratitude and treachery of Pope, who was said to be indebted to the patronage of Chandos for a present of a thousand pounds, and who gained the opportunity of insulting him by the kindness of his invitation."

Hogarth's hostility to Pope might have arisen from his connection with Sir James Thornhill, who was uneasy under the success of Pope's friend Kent, the architect; or it might have originated in the public odium which the poet incurred by wantonly attacking a kind and benevolent nobleman. Of his motives it is difficult to judge; of the sharpness of his satire there can be but one opinion. He painted Burlington Gate, with Kent on the summit, in the threefold capacity of painter, sculptor, and architect, flourishing his palette and pencils over the heads of his astonished supporters, Michael Angelo and Raphael. On a scaffold a little lower down, Pope stands, whitewashing the front; and while he makes pillar and pilaster shine, his wet brush besprinkles Lord Chandos, who is passing by. Lord Burlington serves the poet in the condition of a laborer.

Of all this Pope took no notice. "Either Hogarth's obscurity," says Nicholas, "was his protection from the lash of Pope, or perhaps the bard was too prudent to exasperate a painter who had already given such proofs of his ability in satire." The poet was not a person to be easily intimidated, and the name of Hogarth, then in full fame, must have been familiar to him.

Pope remained silent; whether to the satisfaction or sorrow of the painter cannot be ascertained. Much blame had been incurred by the satire of Chandos, and the poet might be unwilling to provoke further discussion, or prolong the strife. It is, however, probable that Pope regarded Hogarth as a vulgar caricaturist, beneath his notice.

2227. MARTINON AND LEGOUX.

M. Martinon, advocate, was extremely dark in his complexion. He had his picture painted by Legoux, of Angers, and allowed it to remain for a long time with the painter, before he sent for it. Legoux said to him one day, "Sir, I think you had better send for your portrait, for the landlord of the Moor's Head has been applying for it."

2228. POUSSIN, THE GREAT PAINTER.

A person of rank having painted a picture, which he showed to Poussin, he remarked, "You want a little poverty, sir, to make you a good painter."

2229. SITTING FOR A PORTRAIT.

There is a very good story told of Jarvis, the painter. When his bacchanalian propensities had rendered him rather an unequal if not an unsafe artist, he was employed by a gentleman in a southern city to paint his wife,—a miracle of plainness,—under the stipulation that a pint of wine at a single sitting must be the extent of his potations. Jarvis assented, and in due time produced a perfect facsimile of the lady. On exhibiting it to the husband, he seemed disappointed.

"Couldn't you have given it," said he to the painter, "a little less—that is, couldn't you give it now a little more——"

"If you expect me," said Jarvis, seeing the husband's drift at once, "if you expect me to make a handsome portrait of your wife, I must have more than a pint of wine at a sitting. I couldn't get up imagination enough to make her even good looking under a quart at the very least."

2230. A PROMPT REMEDY.

Opie was painting an old beau of fashion. Whenever he thought the painter was touching the mouth, he screwed it up in a most ridiculous manner. Opie, who was a blunt man, said very quietly, "Sir, if you want the mouth left out, I will do it with pleasure."

2231. WOLVES IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING.

Before the discovery of the art which multiplies, with such facility, libels or panegyrics,—when the people could not speak freely against those rapacious clergy, who sheared the fleece and cared not for the sheep,—many a secret of popular indignation was confided, not to books, (for they could not read,) but to pictures and sculptures, which are books which the people can always read. The sculptors and illuminators of those times no doubt shared in common the popular feelings, and boldly trusted to the paintings or the carvings, which met the eyes of their luxurious and indolent masters, their satirical inventions. As far back as in 1300, we find in Wolfius the description of a picture of this kind, in a manuscript of Æsop's Fables, found in the Abbey of Fulda, among other emblems of the corrupt lives of the churchmen. The present was a wolf, large as life, wearing a monkish cowl, with a shaven crown, preaching to a flock of sheep, with these words of the apostle in a label from his mouth: "God is my witness how I long for you all in my bowels!" And underneath was inscribed, "This hooded wolf is the hypocrite of whom it is said in the gospel, Beware of false prophets!"

Such exhibitions were often introduced into articles of furniture. A cushion was found in an old abbey, in which was worked a fox preaching to geese, each goose holding in his bill his praying beads! In the stone wall and on the columns of the great church at Strasburg was once viewed a number of wolves, bears, foxes, and other mischievous animals, carrying holy water, crucifixes, and tapers; and others more indelicate. These, probably as old as the year 1300, were engraven in 1617, by a Protestant; and were not destroyed till 1685, by the pious rage of the Catholics, who seemed at length to have rightly construed these silent lampoons. and in their turn broke to pieces the Protestant images as the others had done the Papistical dolls. The carved seats and stalls in our own cathedrals exhibit subjects not only strange and satirical, but even indecent. At the time they built churches they satirized the ministers—a curious instance how the feelings of the people struggle to find a vent.

The margins of illuminated manuscripts frequently contain ingenious caricatures or satirical allegories. In a magnificent chronicle of Froissart are several—a wolf, as usual, in a monk's frock and cowl, stretching his paw to bless a cock, bending its head submissively to the wolf; or a fox with a crosier, dropping beads, which a cock is picking up, to satirize the blind devotion of the bigots; perhaps the figure of the cock alluded to certain neighbors. A cat in the habit of a nun, holding a platter in its paws to a mouse approaching to lick it; alluding to the allurements of the abbesses to draw young women into their convents; while sometimes a sow is seen, in an abbess's veil, mounted on stilts; the sex marked by the sow's dugs. A pope sometimes appears to be thrust by devils into a caldron, and cardinals are seen roasting on spits! These ornaments must have been generally executed by monks themselves; but these more ingenious members of the ecclesiastical order appear to have sympathized with the people, like the curates in our church, and envied the pampered abbot and the purple bishop. Churchmen were the usual objects of the suppressed indignation of the people in those days; but the knights and feudal lords have not always escaped from the "curses not loud, but deep," of their satirical pencils. As the reformation, or rather revolution, was hastening, this custom became so general, that in one of the dialogues of Erasmus, where two Franciscans are entertained by their host, it appears that such satirical exhibitions were hung up as common furniture in the apartments of inns. The facetious genius of Erasmus either invents or describes one which he has seen of an ape in the habit of a Franciscan sitting by a sick man's bed, dispensing ghostly counsel, holding up a crucifix in one hand, while with the other he is filching a purse out of the sick man's pocket. Such are "the straws," by which we may always observe from what corner the wind rises.

2232. ANECDOTE OF GILBERT STUART, THE AMERICAN PAINTER.

Gilbert Stuart.

Stuart was as remarkable for the vigor of his language as for the strength with which he portrayed with his pencil. While in the city of New York, his rooms were open on stated days to receive visitors, who thronged to admire the productions of the gifted artist, who had won such reputation for his country abroad.

Among others came Talleyrand. Stuart, a great physiognomist, fixing his eyes upon him attentively for a moment, remarked to a friend, with violent emphasis and gesture, "If that man is not a villain, the Almighty does not write a legible hand!"

2233. THE BOLD AND SPIRITED STUDENT.

Reynolds and Burke being one evening at the Royal Academy, a student showed his drawing to Sir Joshua, accompanied with the observation that he hoped it was bold and spirited. Reynolds, in his usually mild manner, answered, "Very spirited," and handed it to Burke, who made no other remark, in returning the drawing, but, "Very bold indeed."

2234. ANECDOTE OF SULLY.

A good story is related of Sully, the painter, a man distinguished for refinement of manners as well as his success in art. At a party, one evening, Sully was speaking of a belle, who was a great favorite.

"Ah," says Sully, "she has a mouth like an elephant's."

"O, O, Mr. Sully! how can you be so rude?"

"Rude, ladies! rude! What do you mean? I say she has a mouth like an elephant's, because it is full of ivory."

2235. RIGAND'S DIFFICULTIES WITH HIS PATRONESES.

Although Hyacinthus Rigand had a turn for gallyantry, he was not fond of painting ladies. "If," said he, "I represent them exactly as they are, they do not think themselves handsome enough; and if I flatter them excessively, then their pictures are not like them."

A lady who rouged very highly, and whose likeness he had taken, complained that he did not use good colors for her pictures, and asked him where he bought them. "I believe, madam," said he, "you and I both deal at the same shop."

2236. FLYING COLORS.

Two gentlemen were at a coffee-house, when the discourse fell upon Sir Joshua Reynolds's painting. One of them said that "his tints were admirable, but the colors flew." It happened, unluckily, that Sir Joshua was in the next stall, and he, taking up his hat, accosted them thus, with a low bow: "Gentlemen, I return you many thanks for bringing me off with flying colors."

2237. THE STRANGE MECHANIC.

Of Stuart, an American, the following anecdote is related: He had put up at an inn, and his companions were desirous, by putting roundabout questions, to find out his calling or profession. Stuart answered, with a grave face and serious tone, that he sometimes dressed gentlemen's and ladies' hair. At that time, high-cropped pomaturned hair was all the fashion.

"You are a hair-dresser, then?"

"What," said he, "do I look like a barber?"

"I beg your pardon, sir, but I inferred it from what you said. If I mistook you, may I take the liberty to ask what you are then?"

"Why, I sometimes brush a gentleman's coat or hat, and sometimes adjust a cravat."

"O, you are a valet, then, to some nobleman?"

"A valet! Indeed, sir, I am not. I am not a servant. To be sure, I make coats and waistcoats for gentlemen."

"O, you are a tailor?"

"A tailor! Do I look like a tailor? I assure you, I never handled a goose, other than a roasted one."

By this time they were all in a roar.

"What are you, then?" said one.

"I'll tell you," said Stuart. "Be assured, all I have said is literally true. I dress hair, brush hats and coats, adjust a cravat, and make coats, waistcoats, and breeches, and likewise boots and shoes, at your service."

"O, ho! a boot and shoemaker, after all!"

"Guess again, gentlemen. I never handled boot or shoe, but for my own feet and legs ; yet all I have told you is true."

"We may as well give up guessing."

"Well, then, I will tell you, upon my honor as a gentleman, my bona fide profession. I get my bread by making faces."

He then screwed his countenance, and twisted the lineaments of his visage, in a manner such as Samuel Foote or Charles Mathews might have envied. His companions, after loud peals of laughter, each took credit to himself for having suspected that the gentleman belonged to the theatre, and they all knew he must be a comedian by profession, when, to their utter astonishment, he assured them that he was never on the stage, and very rarely saw the inside of a playhouse, or any similar place of amusement. They all now looked at each other in utter amazement. Before parting, Stuart said to his companions, —

"Gentlemen, you will find that all I have said of my various employments is comprised in these few words: I am a portrait painter! If you will call at John Palmer's, York Buildings, London, I shall be ready and willing to brush you a coat or hat, dress your hair à la mode, supply you, if in need, with a wig of any fashion or dimensions, accommodate you with boots or shoes, give you ruffles or cravat, and make faces for you."

2239. LUCAS'S ENGLISHMAN.

Lucas, a painter in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was employed to paint a gallery for the Earl of Lincoln, lord high admiral. He was to represent the habits of different nations. When he came to the English, he painted a naked man, with cloth of various sorts lying by him, and a pair of shears, as a satire on their fickleness of dress. The thought was borrowed from Andrew Borde, who, in his Introduction to Knowledge, prefixed a naked Englishman, with these lines: —

"I am an Englishman, and naked; I stand here Musing in my mind what raiment I shall wear."

§ 221. HUMOROUS AND AMUSING FACTS.

2238. STUART A PUPIL OF WEST.

Two or three years after Stuart went to London, West, having learnt that he was in poor circumstances, sent him three or four guineas, with an invitation to call at his house. Stuart went, and soon after, at twenty-four years of age, he entered West's studio.

"Mr. West," says Stuart, "treated me very cavalierly on one occasion; but I had my revenge. My old master, who was always called upon to paint a portrait of his majesty for every governor general sent out to India, received an order for one of Lord ——. He was busily employed upon one of his ten-acre pictures, in company with prophets and apostles, and thought he could turn over the king to me. He never could paint a portrait.

"Stuart," said he, "it is a pity to make his majesty sit again for his picture; there is the portrait of him that you painted; let me have it for Lord ——. I will retouch it, and it will do well enough." 'Well enough! very pretty,' thought I; 'you might be civil, when you ask a favor.' So I thought; but I said, 'Very well, sir.' So the picture was carried down to his room, and at it he went. I saw he was puzzled. He worked at it all that day. The next morning, 'Stuart,' says he, 'have you got your palette set?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Well, you can soon set another; let me have it; I can't satisfy myself with that head.'

"I gave him my palette, and he worked the greater part of that day. In the afternoon I went into his room, and he was hard at it. I saw that he had got up to the knees in mud. 'Stuart,' says he, 'I don't know how it is, but you have a way of managing your tints unlike every body else. Here, take the palette and finish the head.' 'I can't, sir.' 'You can't?' 'I can't indeed, sir, as it is; but let it stand till to-morrow morning and get dry, and I will go over with it with all my heart.' The picture was to go away the day after the morrow; so he made me promise to do it early next morning.

"He never came down into the painting-room until about ten o'clock. I went into his room bright and early, and by half past nine I had finished the head. That done, Rafe [Raphael West, the master's son] and I began to fence; I with my maulstick, and he with his father's. I had just driven Rafe up to the wall, with his back to one of his father's best pictures, when the old gentleman, as neat as a lad of wax, with his hair powdered, his white silk stockings and yellow morocco slippers, popped into the room, looking as if he had stepped out of a handbox. We had made so much noise that we did not hear him come down the gallery, or open the door. 'There, you dog,' says I to Rafe, 'there I have you, and nothing but your back-ground relieves you.'

"The old gentleman could not help smiling at my technical joke, but soon, looking very stern, 'Mr. Stuart,' says he, — for he always mistered me when he was angry, as a man's wife calls him my dear when she wishes him at the devil, — 'Mr. Stuart, is this the way you use me?' 'Why! what's the matter, sir? I have neither hurt the boy nor the back-ground.' 'Sir, when you knew I had promised that the picture of his majesty should be finished to-day, ready to be sent away to-morrow, thus to be neglecting me and your promise! How can you answer it to me or to yourself?'

"'Sir,' said I, 'do not condemn me without examining the easel. I have finished the picture please to look at it.' He did so, complimented me highly, and I had ample revenge for his, 'It will do well enough.'"

2240. COPLEY AND THE THREE WIVES.

A portrait painter in large practice might write a pretty book on the vanity and singularity of his sitters.

A certain man came to Copley, and had himself, and wife, and seven children, all included in a family piece. "It wants but one thing," said he, "and that is a portrait of my first wife; for this one is my second." "But," said the artist, "she is dead, you know, sir: what can I do? she is only to come in as an angel." "O, no! not at all," answered the other; "she must come in as a woman. No angels for me."

The portrait was added, but some time elapsed before the person came back; when he returned, he had a strange lady on his arm. "I must have another cast of your hand, Copley," he said: "an accident befell my second wife: this lady is my third; and she is come to have her likeness included in the family picture." The painter complied, the likeness was introduced, and the husband looked with a glance of satisfaction on his three spouses.

Not so the lady. She remonstrated: never was such a thing heard of! out her predecessors must go. The artist painted them out accordingly, and had to bring an action at law to obtain payment for the portraits he had obliterated.

2241. AVERSION OF MICHAEL ANGELO'S FATHER TO HIS SON'S PROFESSION.

Michael Angelo's father, not being pleased with his great attachment to painting, used to scold when he saw him engaged in his darling employment. One day he threw himself into a violent rage. The enthusiastic son, instead of saying a word in answer to the old man's reproaches, fixed his eyes attentively upon him, and exclaimed, "What an admirable subject for the pencil is my father in this fine passion!"

2242. PAINTING BY THE DOZEN.

Every one who knew Hoppner must recollect that he was of the genus irritabile. A wealthy stock broker drove up to his door, and two carriages emptied into his hall, in Charles Street, a gentleman and lady, with five sons and seven daughters, all samples of pa and ma, as well fed and as city bred and comely a family as any within the sound of Bow bell.

"Well, Mr. Painter," said he, "here we are—a baker's dozen. How much will you demand for painting the whole lot of us—prompt payment for discount?" "Why," replied the astonished painter, who might be likened to a superannuated elephant,— "why, sir, that will depend upon the dimensions, style, composition, and ——" "O, that is settled," quoth the enlightened broker: "we are all to be touched off in one piece as large as life, all seated upon our lawn at Clapham, and all singing 'God save the King.'"

"These things," said Hoppner, in relating the circumstance, to his friend and crony, the critic-poet Gifford,— "these things—and be hanged to you scribblers!—are part and parcel of the delectables of portrait painting."

2243. SIGN PAINTING.

A sign painter, being called upon to letter the front of a large general clothing establishment, finished one line across the whole front, thus: "Dealer in all sorts of Ladies," and finding his ladder too long to paint the next line, returned to his house to get one of suitable length; but stepping on a stone, it turned his foot up, sprained his ankle, so that he could not finish the lettering till the next day.

In the mean time, the people stared at the new sign, and many of them, knowing the character of the man to be strictly in keeping with that of a good husband, father, and citizen, it was unaccountable; as "all sorts of ladies," in New York, comprised commodities at their antipodes, the best and worst on earth.

The citizens made themselves busy that day in surmises, scurrilous remarks, and injurious quizzing; which could be hardly overcome when the finishing lettering, "and Gentlemen's ready-made Clothing," was added.

2244. TAKEN BY SURPRISE.

At the time when Mr. Peale was exhibiting his beautiful picture of the Court of Death in Boston, he sent the late Rev. Dr. Osgood a ticket, on which was inscribed, "Admit the bearer to the Court of Death." The old gentleman, never having heard of the picture, was utterly confounded. "I expected to go before long," said he, "but I was not prepared for so abrupt a summons."

2245. ARTISTS OPPOSED IN SKETCHING.

The late Mr. Brown, so justly famed for his knowledge of design, having often remarked in his neighborhood a curious cottage, where the rays came in as one could wish, and admitted a fine blending of light and shadow, resolved to make a drawing of it. While he was at work, an old woman came out to him, dropping many a courtesy. "I am very glad your honor has come to look at it yourself. I have told the steward, over and over again, that the house would fall down about my ears, but he did not mind me. I hope your honor will order it to be done up soon."

Mr. Brown came off better than a brother artist, who, being on a sketching excursion, fell in with a mill, which presented an admirable piece of picturesque. He was proceeding with a drawing of it very much to his satisfaction, when the miller, with a stout stick in his hand, made his approach.

"What are you doing, Mr. Gentleman?"

"Making a drawing of your mill."

"Making a drawing! To be sure, my old mill is a pretty thing to take. No! no! Your business here is to peep in at my windows, and see if I han't undercharged in the number. Come, sir, off directly; and if ever I catch you here again," &c.

The time of the threatened invasion of England by the French was a sad time for the hunters of picturesque, more especially along the coast. To be caught taking a sketch of even an old pigsty was enough, in some instances, to get seized and carried before a magistrate as a French spy, engaged in stealing plans of all the strong points of the country. And as magistrates are not in all parts much more sensible than the ignorant rustics they keep in order, it happened more than once that professional ardor was sent to cool itself within the walls of a jail.

2246. SHERIDAN AND FOX.

Sheridan was down at Brighton one summer, when Fox, the manager, desirous of showing him some civility, took him all over the theatre, and exhibited its beauties. "There, Mr. Sheridan," said Fox, who combined twenty occupations, without being clever in any, "I built and painted all these boxes, and I painted all these scenes." "Did you?" said Sheridan, surveying them rapidly: "well, I should not, I am sure, have known you were a Fox by your brush."

2247. HAYDON'S INTRODUCTION TO FUSELI.

Prince Hoare introduced Haydon to Fuseli, who was so struck with his close attendance at the Royal Academy, that he one day said, "Why, when do you dine?" The account of his introduction is very characteristic. "Such was the horror connected with Fuseli's name," says Haydon, "that I remember perfectly well, the day before I was to go to him, a letter from my father concluded in these words: 'God speed you with the terrible Fuseli.'"

Awaking from a night of awful dreaming, the awful morning came. I took my sketch-book and drawings, invoking the protection of my good genius to bring me back alive, and sallied forth to meet the enchanter in his den. After an abstracted walk of perpetual musing on what I should say, how I should look, and what I should do, I found myself before his door in Berners Street, — 1805."

Haydon was shown into his painting-room, full of Fuseli's hideous conceptions. He adds, "At last, when I was wondering what metamorphosis I was to undergo, the door slowly opened, and I saw a little hand come slowly round the edge of it, which did not look very gigantic, or belonging to a very powerful figure; and round came a little, white-faced, lion-headed man, dressed in an old flannel dressing-gown, tied by a rope, and the bottom of Mrs. Fuseli's work-basket on his head for a cap. I was perfectly amazed. There stood the designer of Satan in many an airy whirl plunging to the earth; and was this the painter himself? Certainly."

"Not such as I had imagined when enjoying his inventions. I did not know whether to laugh or cry; but at any rate I felt that I was his match if he attempted the supernatural. We quietly stared at each other, and Fuseli, kindly understanding my astonishment and inexperience, asked in the mildest voice for my drawings. Here my evil genius took the lead, and instead of showing him my studies from the antique, which I had brought, and had meant to show him, I showed him my sketch book I did not mean to show him, with a sketch I had made, coming along, of a man pushing a sugar cask into a grocer's shop. Fuseli, seeing my fright, said, by way of encouragement, 'At least the fellow does his business with energy.' From that hour commenced a friendship which lasted till his death."

2248. NORWICH CHURCH-WARDEN AND THE ALTAR PIECE.

A worthy citizen of Norwich, whose taste as an upholsterer had long been considered of the first-rate order, being chosen church-warden of St. Stephen, commenced his reign by cleaning and painting the church; and at the termination of his labors, he rested his eye upon a picture of the Lord's Supper in the vestry, —

"The painters ran in, and the glaziers ran out; They could not conceive what their chief was about," — and with his "eye in a fine frenzy rolling," he thus addressed the painter: "Boy, I should consider myself wanting in duty and veneration did I suffer this church to be cleaned, and leave our Savior sitting before so dirty a table-cloth; therefore take your brush and paint it all over with white." In the space of five minutes, this order was executed to the great satisfaction of our sapient church-warden. A few days after, this mutilation was discovered by the rector, who sent the picture, with tears in his eyes, to an artist, to be restored to its pristine state again.

Stuart's love for painting was the love of an enthusiast; but his early friend says that "music divided his affection so equally with his sister, that it was difficult to say which was the ruling passion. He became enamored with music, in which he made remarkable progress, without any other master than his own superior genius."

"He once attempted to enrapture me," says one of his friends, "by a newly-studied classical composition of his own. I exerted all the kind attention I could muster up for the occasion, until his sharp eye detected, by my physiognomy, that I did not much relish it. He colored, sprang up in a rage, and striding back and forth the floor, vociferated, 'You have no more taste for music than a jackass! and it is all owing to your stupid Quaker education.'"

Jervis, who affected to be a freethinker, was one day talking very irreverently of the Bible. Dr. Arbuthnot maintained to him that he was not only a speculative but a practical believer. Jervis denied it. Arbuthnot said he would prove it: "You strictly observe the second commandment," said the doctor; "for in your pictures you make not the likeness of any thing that is in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth."

2251. THE ANNUNCIATION.

An altar piece in a church at Capua, painted by Chella delle Puera, representing the Annunciation, is a curious collection of absurdities. The Virgin is seated in a rich arm-chair of crimson velvet, with gold flowers; a cat and parrot, placed near her, seem extremely attentive to the whole scene; and on a table are a silver coffee-pot and cup.

A modern Italian has painted the same subject in a way equally absurd. The Virgin is on her knees near the toilet; on a chair are thrown a variety of fashionable dresses, which show that in the painter's opinion, at least, she must have been a practised coquette; and at a little distance appears a cat with its head lifted up towards the angel, and its ears on end to catch what he has to say.

2252. WILKIE'S NATIONALITY.

"Thomson! Ye maun be a Scotch Thomson, I'll warrant," said Sir David Wilkie to Henry Thomson, as they sat together for the first time at an Academy dinner.

"I'm of that ilk, sir," was his reply; "my father was a Scotchman."

"Was he really?" exclaimed Wilkie, grasping the other's hand quite brotherly.

"And my mother was Irish."

"Ay, ay, was she really?" and the hand relaxed its fervor.

"And I was born in England."

Wilkie let go Thomson's hand altogether, turned his back on him, and indulged in no further conversation. My friend Thomson, a wit as well as a painter, perhaps caricatured this conversation; but I remember it was received as true to the spirit of Wilkie when it was first told.

2253. SINGULAR ADHERENCE TO CUSTOM IN PAINTING PORTRAITS.

Portraits, in the time of Hudson, the master of Sir Joshua Reynolds, were almost always painted in one attitude,—one hand in the waistcoat, and the hat under the arm. A gentleman, whose portrait young Reynolds painted, desired to have his hat on his head in the picture, which was quickly finished in a commonplace attitude, done without much study, and sent home. On inspection, it was soon discovered, that although the gentleman, in his portrait, had one hat upon his head, yet there was another under his arm.

2254. SIR GODFREY KNELLER.

Sir Godfrey, at Witton, acted as justice of peace, and was so much more swayed by equity than law, that his judgments, accompanied with humor, are said to have occasioned these lines by Pope:—

"I think Sir Godfrey should decide the suit,
Who sent the thief that stole the cash away,
And punished him that put it in his way."

This alluded to his dismissing a soldier who had stolen a joint of meat, and accusing the butcher of having tempted him by it.

Whenever Sir Godfrey was applied to, he always inquired which parish was the richest, and settled the poor man there; nor would he even sign a warrant to distrain the goods of a poor man who could not pay a tax. These instances showed the goodness of his heart; others, even in his capacity of justice, his peculiar turn.

A handsome young woman came before him to swear a rape: struck with her beauty, he continued examining her, as he sat painting, till he had taken her likeness.

If he disliked interruption, he would not be interrupted. Seeing a constable coming to him at the head of a mob, he called to him, without inquiring into the affair, "Mr. Constable, you see that turning: go that way, and you will find an alchouse,—the sign of the King's Head,—go and make it up."

2255. JOHN ASTLEY.

While Reynolds was pursuing his studies at Rome, several other English artists were there to the same intent, particularly Mr. John Astley, who had been his fellow-pupil in the school of Hudson, and of whom Reynolds used to say, that Astley would rather run three miles to deliver his message by word of mouth than venture to write a note. He afterwards became a very rich man, by an advantageous marriage which he contracted with a lady of quality. The observation of his biographer on this event is, that Astley owed his fortune to his form, his follies to his fortune; and indeed, at the period of his life now alluded to, he was as poor in purse as he ever had been as an artist.

It was a usual custom with the English painters at Rome to meet in the evenings for conversation, and frequently to make little excursions together in the country. On one of these excursions, on a summer day, when the season was particularly hot, the whole company threw off their coats, as being an encumbrance to them, except poor Astley, who alone showed great reluctance to take off his. This seemed very unaccountable to his companions, when some jokes made on his singularity at last obliged him to take his coat off also. The mystery was then immediately explained; for it appeared that the hinder part of his waistcoat was made, by way of thriftiness, out of one of his own pictures, and thus displayed a tremendous waterfall on his back, to the great diversion of all the spectators.

2256. ARTIST ANECDOTE.

Willis, on the authority of a French paper, relates an amusing incident that lately happened to a celebrated artist, who is extremely neglectful of his toilet. Leaving his study one day, and walking along the street rather absently, he heard a call from a female voice behind him.

"Here, my man," said a lady, beckoning to him; "can you carry a bundle a little way for me?"

The artist looked at the lady for a moment, saw that she was very handsome, and instead of explaining, as he was about to do, that he was a gentleman, he said, "Willingly, madam," and followed her into a shop.

The bundle was large and heavy; but he lifted it with some effort upon his shoulder, and followed after the lady, who, slightly raising her dress, went fast on before him, showing an exquisitely turned pair of feet and ankles. She mounted at last to the second story of a house, with the tired porter close at her heels, and began to fumble in her pocket to find the money to pay him. As she did so, the artist looked well at her face, and found it to be one of the most peculiar in its style of beauty, as well as one of the finest, he had ever seen.

"Pardon me," he said, as she offered him the money; "I am not a porter. I am an artist; and, instead of money, will ask a favor of you—to allow me to make a copy of your face. The package was heavy, and the compliment you paid to my dress was not very gratifying; but I shall be well paid if I can send a copy of your beauty to the next exhibition of the Academy."

And thus a great artist came by the original of one of the most exquisite pictures which his pencil has put upon canvas.

2257. RARE PORTRAIT BY SALVATOR ROSA.

While Salvator Rosa was on a visit to Florence, and refused all applications for his pictures, he was accidentally taken in to paint what he so rarely condescended to do—a portrait.

There lived in Florence a good old dame of the name of Anna Gaetano, who, though of some celebrity, held no more notable rank than that of keeping an osteria, or inn, over the door of which was inscribed, in large letters, "Al buon vino non bisogna fruscia," (Good wine needs no bush;) or, literally, (Good wine needs no rubbing up, or puffing.)

But it was not the racy orvietto alone of Madonna Anna that drew to her house some of the most distinguished men of Florence, and made it particularly the resort of the Cavalieri Ultramontani: her humor was as racy as her wine; and many of the men of wit and pleasure upon town were in the habit of lounging in the Salé Commune of Dame Gaetano, merely for the pleasure of drawing her out.

Among these were Lorenzo Lippi and Salvator Rosa; and although this Tuscan Dame Quickly was in her seventieth year, hideous, ugly, and grotesquely dressed, she was yet so far from being an "antidote to the tender passion," that she distinguished Salvator Rosa by a preference which deemed itself not altogether hopeless of return. While emboldened by his familiarity and condescension, she had the vanity to ask him to paint her picture, "that she might," she said, "reach posterity by the hand of the greatest master of the age." Salvator first received her proposition as a jest, for he rarely condescended to paint portraits, except his caricato sketches may be called such. But, perpetually teased by her reiterated importunities, and provoked by her pertinacity, he at last exclaimed,—

"Well, Madonna, I have resolved at last to comply with your desire; but with this agreement, that, not to distract my mind during my work, I desire you will not move your seat until I have finished the picture."

Madonna, willing to submit to any penalty in order to obtain an honor which was to immortalize her septuagenary charms, joyfully agreed to the proposition; and Salvator, sending for an easel and painting materials, drew her as she sat before him, to the life.

The portrait was dashed off with the usual rapidity and spirit of the master, and was a chef-d'œuvre. But when, at last, the vain and impatient hostess was permitted to look upon it, she perceived that to one of the strongest and most inveterate likenesses that was ever taken, the painter had added a long beard; and that "mine hostess al buon vino" figured on the canvas as an ancient male pilgrim—a character admirably suited to her furrowed face, weather-beaten complexion, strong lineaments, and gray hairs. Her mortified vanity vented itself in the most violent abuse of the ungallant painter, of whom her sex had ordinarily so little to complain; and she is described as dealing out her Tuscan Billingsgate with a purity that would have excited the envy of the most consummate Trecentisto of the Della Tuscan school.

Salvator, probably less annoyed by her animosity than disgusted by her preference, called upon some of her guests (ultramontane painters and others) to judge between them. The artists saw only the merits of the fine painting; the laughers only looked to the jest; and the value fixed to the exquisite portrait soon reconciled the vanity of the original, through her interests. After the death of Madonna Anna, her portrait was sold by her heirs at an enormous price, and is said to be still in existence.

2258. THE ARTIST AFFRONTED.

One morning the late Mr. Christie, to whom had been intrusted the sale by auction of a fine collection of pictures, belonging to a nobleman, having arrived at a chef-d'œuvre of Wilson's, was expatiating with his usual eloquence on its merits, quite unaware that Wilson himself had just before entered the room. "This, gentlemen, is one of Mr. Wilson's Italian pictures; he cannot paint any thing like it now." "That's a lie!" exclaimed the irritated artist, to Mr. Christie's no small discomposure, and to the great amusement of the company; "he can paint infinitely better."

§ 222. ORIGIN OF NOTED PAINTINGS.

2259. STUART'S WASHINGTON.

Stuart, after spending some years in Europe, and meeting with great success, determined to return to his native land. The chief objects that impelled his enthusiastic mind to this step was his love for his country, his admiration of General Washington, and the very great desire he had to paint his portrait.

With a letter to Washington from John Jay, he went on to Philadelphia, where he was courteously and familiarly received by the man whom Botta used to call the "father of freedom." Stuart had been familiar with the highest society of England, but he was embarrassed when he entered the room where Washington was; and he said it was the first time he had ever felt awe in the presence of a fellow-man.

Stuart was now gratified in the accomplishment and the hope of years. Washington was standing on the highest eminence of glory any man had yet stood on; the gaze of the world was fixed steadily upon him. To leave for posterity a faithful portrait of him, and thus link his name forever with that great man's, had now become the most earnest wish of Stuart's life.

Washington sat for his portrait: Stuart was not pleased with his first attempt. It may easily be imagined with what feelings the painter was stirred, when he gazed with the full, clear, earnest eye of the artist upon that face which Guizot has declared more than half divine. It is a matter of little surprise that he failed in the first trial. He destroyed the picture.

Washington sat again, and then he painted as good a portrait as ever was or can be painted. There have been more beautiful pictures; brighter lights and darker shades have been thrown in; more gorgeous coloring and "tricks of art" have been thrown around them; but so completely did the artist transfer the features, the form, and the very soul of Washington to the canvas, in all the simplicity of nature, that we are not afraid to say it is the best portrait ever painted in this country, and that it has never been surpassed by any artist whose works have come down to our times.

"He offered it," says Dunlap, "to the State of Massachusetts for one thousand dollars, which they refused to give! Those intrusted with our national government passed by the opportunity of doing honor to themselves during the life of a man they could not honor, and the only portrait of Washington was neglected in the painter's workshop until the Boston Athenæum purchased it of his widow. It is now, together with its companion, the portrait of Mrs. Washington, adorning one of the rooms of that institution."

Catlin, the American traveller, was born in Wyoming, on the Susquehanna. He was bred to the law; but after he had practised two or three years, he sold his law library, and with the proceeds commenced as painter in Philadelphia, without either teacher or adviser.

Within a few years, a delegation of Indians arrived, from the wilds of the far west, in Philadelphia, "arrayed and equipped in all their classical beauty, with shield and helmet, with tunic and manteau, tinted and tasselled off exactly for the painter's palette. In silent and stoic dignity these lords of the forest strutted about the city for a few days, wrapped in their pictured robes, with their brows plumed with the quills of the war-eagle," and then quitted for Washington city, leaving Catlin to regret their departure. This, however, led him to consider the preservation by pictorial illustrations of the history and customs of these people as a theme worthy the life of one man; and he therefore resolved that nothing short of the loss of life should prevent him from visiting their country, and becoming their historian.

He could find no advocate or abettor of his views; still, he broke from all connections of family and home, and thus, firmly fixed, armed, equipped, and supplied, he started, in the year 1832, and penetrated the vast and pathless wilds of the great far west, devoted to the production of habitual and graphic portraiture of the manners, customs, and character of an interesting race of people, who were rapidly passing away from the earth.

Catlin spent about eight years in the Indian country, and, in 1841, brought home portraits of the principal personages from each tribe, views of their villages, pastimes, and religious ceremonies, and a collection of their costumes, manufactures, and weapons. He was undoubtedly the first artist who ever started upon such a labor, designing to carry his canvas to the Rocky Mountains. He visited forty-eight different tribes, containing four hundred thousand souls, and mostly speaking different languages. He brought home three hundred and ten portraits in oil, all painted in their native dress, and in their own wigwams; besides two hundred paintings of their villages, wigwams, games, and religious ceremonies, dances, ball plays, buffalo hunts, &c., containing three thousand full length figures; together with landscapes, and a collection of costumes and other artificial produce, from the size of a huge wigwam to that of a rattle.

2261. MR. BANVARD.

There was a young lad of fifteen, a fatherless youth, to whom there came a very extraordinary idea, as he was floating for the first time down the Mississippi. He had read, in some foreign journal, that America could boast the most picturesque and magnificent scenery in the world, but that she had not yet produced an artist capable of delineating it.

On this thought he pondered and pondered, till his brain began to whirl; and as he glided along the shores of the stupendous river, gazing around him with wonder and delight, the boy resolved within himself that he would take away the reproach from his country—that he would paint the beauties and sublimities of his native land.

Some years passed away, and still John Banvard (for that was his name) dreamed of being a painter.

What he was in his waking, working moments, we do not know—probably a mechanic. But at all events, he found time to turn over and over again the great thought that haunted him; till at length, before he had yet attained his twenty-first year, it assumed a distinct and tangible shape in his mind, and he devoted himself to its realization.

There mingled no idea of profit with his ambition; and, indeed, strange to say, we can learn nothing of any aspirations he may have felt after artistic excellence. His grand object, as he himself informs us, was to falsify the assertion that America had no "artists commensurate with the grandeur and extent of her scenery," and to accomplish this by producing the largest painting in the world.

John Banvard was born in New York, and "raised in Kentucky;" but he had no patrons either among the rich merchants of the one, or the wild enthusiasts of the other, whose name has become a synonyme for all that is good, bad, and ridiculous in the American character. He was self-taught and self-dependent; and when he determined to paint a picture of the shores of the Mississippi, which should be as superior to all others in point of size as that prodigious river is superior to the streamlets of Europe, he was obliged to betake himself for some time to trading and boating upon the mighty stream, in order to raise funds for the purchase of materials. But this was at length accomplished and the work begun. His first task was to make the necessary drawing, and in executing this he spent four hundred days in the manner thus described by himself:—

For this purpose he had to travel thousands of miles alone in an open skiff, crossing the rapid streams, in many places over two miles in width, to select proper points of sight from which to take this sketch. His hands became hardened with constantly plying the oar, and his skin as tawny as an Indian's, from exposure to the rays of the sun and the vicissitudes of the weather.

He would be weeks together without speaking to a human being, having no other company than his rifle, which furnished him with his meat from the game of the woods or the fowls of the river.

When the sun began to sink behind the lofty bluffs, and evening to approach, he would select some secluded sandy cove, overshadowed by the lofty cottonwood, draw out his skiff from the water, and repair to the woods to hunt his supper. Having killed his game, he would return, dress, cook, and from some fallen log would eat it with his biscuit, with no other beverage than the wholesome water of the noble river that glided by him.

Having finished his lonely meal, he would roll himself in his blanket, creep under his frail skiff, which he turned over to shield him from the night dews, and with his portfolio of drawings for his pillow, and the sand of the bar for his bed, would sleep soundly till the morning, when he would arise from his lowly couch, eat his breakfast before the rays of the rising sun had dispersed the humid mist from the surface of the river, and then start fresh to his task again.

When the preparatory drawings were completed, he erected a building at Louisville in Kentucky, where he at length commenced his picture, which was to be a panorama of the Mississippi, painted on canvas three miles long; and it is noted, with a justifiable pride, that this proved to be a home production throughout, the cotton being grown in one of the Southern States, and the fabric spun and woven by the factory girls of Lowell.

What the picture is, as a work of art, many thousands have had an opportunity of ascertaining personally; and we know that it receives the warmest eulogiums from the most distinguished of his countrymen, and a testimony in favor of its correctness from the principal captains and pilots of the Mississippi.

At the meeting in Boston, his excellency Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts, who was in the chair, talked of it with enthusiasm, as "a wonderful and extraordinary production;" and Mr. Calhoun, president of the Senate, moved a series of resolutions expressive of "their high admiration of the boldness and originality of the conception, and the indefatigable perseverance of the young and talented artist in the execution of his herculean work;" and these being warmly seconded by Mr. Bradbury, speaker of the House of Representatives, were carried unanimously.

Soon after Banvard's panorama appeared, its popularity brought scores of rival panoramas before the public—Panorama of the Hudson, Panorama of a Voyage around the World, Panorama of the Rhine, and others without end. We should suppose at the present writing, (1851,) that many artists, thus employed, who might otherwise have languished in poverty, find panorama painting a great source of pecuniary profit.

2262. ORIGIN OF THE TAPESTRY IN THE OLD HOUSE OF LORDS.

Henry Cornelius Vroom, the Dutchman, having painted a number of devout subjects, started for Spain to sell them, but was cast away upon a small island near the coast of Portugal. The painter and some of the crew were relieved by monks, who lived among the rocks, and they conducted them to Lisbon, where Vroom was engaged by a picture dealer to paint the storm he had just escaped. In this picture he succeeded so well that the Portuguese dealer continued to employ him.

He improved so much in sea pieces that he saved money, returned home, and applied himself exclusively to that class of painting. He then lived at Haerlem, where he was employed to design the suit of tapestry representing the defeat of the Spanish Armada, which hung for many years upon the walls of the House of Lords, at Westminster. It had been bespoken by Lord Howard, of Effingham, the lord high admiral of the English fleet which engaged the armada. It was sold by him to James I.

It consisted originally of ten compartments, forming separate pictures, each of which was surrounded by a wrought border, including the portraits of the officers who held command in the English fleet. This tapestry was woven, according to Sandrart, by Francis Spiering: it was destroyed in the fire which consumed the two Houses of Parliament, in 1834. Fortunately, engravings from these hangings were executed by Mr. John Pine, and published in 1739, with illustrations from charters, medals, &c.

2263. HOGARTH AND TYERS.

Soon after his marriage, Hogarth had summer lodgings at South Lambeth, and became intimate with Jonathan Tyers, then proprietor of Vauxhall Gardens.

On passing the tavern one morning, Hogarth saw Tyers, and observing him to be very melancholy, "How now, Master Tyers; why so sad this morning?" said the painter. "Sad times, Master Hogarth," replied Tyers; "and my reflections were on a subject not likely to brighten a man's countenance. I was thinking, do you know, which was likely to prove the easiest death, hanging or drowning." "O," said Hogarth, "is it come to that?" "Very nearly, I assure you," said Tyers. "Then," replied Hogarth, "the remedy you think of applying is not likely to mend the matter; don't hang or drown to-day. I have a thought that may save the necessity of either, and will communicate it to you to-morrow morning; call at my house in Leicester Fields."

The interview took place, and the result was the concocting and getting up the first Ridotto al Fresco, which was very successful; one of the new attractions being the embellishment of the pavilions in the gardens by Hogarth's pencil. Thus he drew the Four Parts of the Day, which Hayman copied; and the two scenes of Evening and Night, with portraits of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn. Hayman was one of the earliest members of the Royal Academy, and was, when young, a scene painter at Drury Lane Theatre.

Hogarth was at this time in prosperity, and assisted Tyers more essentially than by the few pieces he painted for the gardens; and for this Tyers presented the painter with a gold ticket of admission for himself and friends, which was handed down to Hogarth's descendants; the medal being for the admission of six persons, or "one coach," as it was termed.

Hogarth and Hayman are reputed to have painted other pieces for the gardens, where the following were disposed of by auction, a year or two since, (1848:) an oil painting, said to be by Hogarth, painted expressly for the gardens,—subject, Drunken Men, four guineas; ditto, a female pulling out the gray hairs of an aged man, by Hogarth, three guineas; ditto, the original of a scene afterwards in the Kake's Progress, by Hogarth, curious as the first of the series, five pounds; ditto, a painting, in oil, of the Village Curate reproving the Drunken Cobbler, by Hogarth, four pounds; ditto, with numerous figures, boys and children at play, four pounds ten shillings; a painting, by Dyce, emblematical of the Descent of Venus, with allegorical figures, seven pounds. The number of lots were two hundred and thirty-four, amongst which were the pictures above mentioned by Hogarth, together with others by Hayman, amounting altogether to twenty-four; and the singularly low prices which these obtained excited universal surprise. Among the articles disposed of in the course of the sale were upwards of four hundred punch bowls.

2264. M. MASQUERIER'S BONAPARTE.

In the year 1800, M. Masquerier had occasion to go to Paris on family matters. Like a sensible man, who made all his pursuits available to the purposes of his profession, he conceived the happy thought of obtaining permission to make a portrait of Bonaparte, (then first consul,) and afterwards portraits of his generals; the whole of which were concentrated in one grand picture, of the size of life, and exhibited in this country as Bonaparte reviewing the Consular Guard.

It appears that Masquerier, through the interest of a friend acquainted with Josephine, got permission to be present at the Tuileries, where he saw Bonaparte in the gray great-coat which has since been so well known throughout Europe. Masquerier remarked that Bonaparte's appearance in this costume was so different from all portraits which he had seen, that he resolved to fix him in his sketch-book in this identical surtout, the French thinking that the portrait of a great man must necessarily be tricked out in finery. He sketched him just as he saw him, and carried him to England, placing him upon a gray horse, his usual charger, and surrounding him with his staff. The picture told in all respects. The prince regent, (afterwards George IV.,) and Tallien, then in London on his return from Egypt, were among the twenty-five or thirty thousand visitors who went to see it. Tallien left in the exhibition room the following testimony to the likeness of the first consul:—

"J'ai vu le portrait du General Buonaparte fait par M. Masquerier, et je l'ai trouvé très ressemblant. TALLIEN, Londres, ce 24 Mars, 1801."

There is a print of this picture, which is scarce. The original was afterwards sold, to be taken to America. Masquerier netted about one thousand pounds by this speculation, but the remuneration did not overpay the toil. Such was the reaction. from incessant application and anxiety, that the artist was confined to his room several weeks afterwards.

2265. HOGARTH'S JOHN WILKES.

One of the most interesting of Hogarth's productions is the portrait of the celebrated demagogue John Wilkes. This singular performance originated in a quarrel with that witty libertine and his associate Churchill, the poet. It immediately followed an article, from the pen of Wilkes, in the North Briton, which insulted Hogarth as a man, and traduced him as an artist. It is so little of a caricature, that Wilkes good-humoredly observed, somewhere in his correspondence, "I am growing every day more and more like my portrait by Hogarth."

The terrible scourge of the satirist fell bitterly upon the personal and moral defects of the man. Compared with his chastisement, the hangman's whip is but a proverb, and the pillory a post of honor. He might hope oblivion from the infamy of both; but from Hogarth there was no escape. It was little indeed that the artist had to do, to brand and emblazon him with the vices of his nature; but with how much discrimination that little is done!

He took up the correct portrait, which Walpole upbraided him with skulking into a court of law to obtain. and in a few touches the man sunk, and the demon of hypocrisy and sensuality sat in his stead. It is a fiend, and yet it is Wilkes still. It is said that when he had finished this remarkable portrait, the former friendship of Wilkes overcame him, and he threw it into the fire, from which it was saved by the interposition of his wife.

§ 223. PAINTINGS LOST AND RECOVERED.

2266. THE CARTOONS.

The cartoons, the most esteemed of all Raphael's compositions, were designed to serve as patterns for tapestry, to decorate the Papal chapel, by order of Pope Leo X., and represent subjects judiciously selected from the Evangelists and the Acts of the Apostles. They were painted about the year 1520. The tapestry was executed at the famous manufactory at Arras, in Flanders; but the death of their illustrious author, the assassination of the pope, his munificent patron, and the subsequent troubles that agitated Rome, prevented their being placed in the chapel for which they were intended. Indeed, the tapestry was never paid for, and the cartoons were retained as security until they were purchased by the King of England.

It has been a generally received opinion that these works were purchased by King Charles I., at the recommendation of Rubens; but there is reason for believing that they were brought to England in the reign of his father, who had already promoted the establishment of an extensive manufactory of tapestry at Mortlake, and munificently given Sir Francis Crane, its ingenious projector, the sum of two thousand pounds towards the erection of a building for that purpose. It is not improbable that the cartoons were purchased soon after the erection of this manufactory, with the intention of having them copied by the skilful artisans who were there employed, and who were not long before they not only rivalled the tapestry at Arras, but produced copies from the finest pictures, with such effect and splendor, that at a short distance they assumed the appearance of painting. Artists of distinguished merit were invited from abroad to superintend the workmen; and Francis Cleyn, of singular eminence in his department, was retained by King James, to design grotesques for the looms. In the subsequent reign, five of the cartoons were sent to Mortlake, to be copied under the direction of this artist.

Soon after King William was invited to the English throne, the cartoons, with other valuable property, then considered, perhaps, as "parcel of royal lumber," were discovered in one of the apartments of the old palace of Whitehall. It is supposed they had remained there from the time of the dispersion of the collection of paintings and other noble productions of art, the property of King Charles I.; for this palace was occupied by the protector Cromwell, and it is known that they were purchased of the commissioners appointed by the Parliament to sell the king's effects, by order of the usurper, for the sum of three hundred pounds. They were found packed, some in four, some in five pieces, in cases of slit deal.

There is every reason to believe that the cartoons were discovered by Sir Christopher Wren, as it belonged to his office, as surveyor of the works, to explore the abdicated apartments in all the royal palaces which had not yet recovered from the wanton dilapidations of civil war; and it was owing to his careful researches that many valuable remains, which escaped the destructive hands of the fanatics, were brought to light, and replaced in the royal collection.

The cartoons were several years in the collection at Windsor, when they were returned to their old destination at Hampton Court, by his majesty, George III., who was so careful that they should sustain no injury in taking them from their frames, or in their removal, that he superintended the workmen employed on that service for several mornings, and assisted himself in placing them in their cases. The frames in which they now hang were made at his majesty's private expense, and cost five hundred pounds. They are carved, and of the pattern known to connoisseurs as the Carlo Maratti frame.

2267. THE PAINTER AND HIS PUPIL.

A young artist had produced a very excellent painting, the best he had ever succeeded in; even his master found nothing to criticize in it. The young painter was so enraptured with it, that he was continually gazing at his art, and thus neglected his studies; "For," thought he, "I can produce nothing superior to it."

One morning, when he went, as usual, to rejoice in the contemplation of his painting, he found that his master had erased the whole work. Angry, and in tears, he hastened to him, and inquired the reason of this cruel treatment.

The master replied, "I have done it with wise intent. The painting was a good one, but it would have proved your ruin."

"How so?" inquired the young artist.

"Because," answered the master, "you no longer admired the art in your painting, but only yourself. Believe me, it was not perfect, although it appeared so to us; it was only an attempt. There, take your pencil, and see what new painting you can produce. Do not regret the sacrifice. The elements of greatness must be in you before you can transfer it to canvas."

Full of confidence in himself and his instructor, he seized the pencil, and produced his masterpiece, the Sacrifice of Iphigenia.* The name of the artist was Timanthes.

2268. THE TWO PICTURES.

Some children were once playing in the Kent road, near Blackheath, England, amusing themselves with making grottoes of oyster-shells; and, in order to give effect, one of the children went home and begged of his mother to let him have two old pictures that were lying about the house, and considered but as useless lumber, to adorn their grotto. This was readily granted, and the old pictures were placed on each side of the grotto.

In a short time, a Jew dealer came by, and, after looking at the pictures for some time, he offered to give the children sixpence for them; the children refused, and said that they belonged to their parents. The Jew, at last, offered five shillings, but was still refused, and, at last, went to the parents, and offered ten shillings; but the extreme eagerness of the Jew excited some suspicion that the old pictures were of more value than was suspected, and this was confirmed when the Jew offered five pounds five shillings for them, which was also refused. The next day, the father of the children took the pictures to Mr. Angerstein, at Blackheath, to inquire if they were of any value, and that gentleman gave him a letter of recommendation to a person in London, who purchased them for fourteen hundred pounds; and they have since been sold for considerably more.

2269. COSMO.

In the year 1644, Cosmo, the son of Ferdinand II., de Medici, undertook a journey, an account of which was written at the time by Philippe Pizzichi, his travelling chaplain. This work was published at Florence, in 1829. It contains some curious notices of persons and things, and, among others, what will interest every lover of the fine arts. Speaking of Verona, the diarist mentions the Curtioni Gallery of Paintings, in which "the picture most worthy of attention is the Lady of Raphael so carefully finished by himself, and so well preserved that it surpasses every other." The editor of these travels has satisfactorily shown that Raphael's Lady here described is the true Fornarina; so that of the three likenesses of her said to be executed by this eminent artist, the genuine one is the Veronese, belonging to the Curtioni Gallery, now the property of a Lady Cavallini Brenzoni, who obtained it by inheritance.

2270. CORREGGIO'S MAGDALEN.

In the spring of 1837, Mr. Atherstone bought for a few guineas a Magdalen, by Correggio, at the auction mart, where he saw it among a heap of spoiled canvases, that an amateur (no connoisseur) of pictures had sent to be sold. This gentleman had bought it in Italy for ten pounds, admiring its beauty, but ignorant of its value. It was in perfect preservation; in the grandest style of Correggio; and in coloring surpassing in brilliancy and depth of tone even the famous specimens in the National Gallery.

§ 224. DESCRIPTION OF PARTICULAR PAINTINGS AND COLLECTIONS.

2271. SALVATOR'S CATILINE CONSPIRACY.

It was reserved for the exhibition of the Pantheon, in the year 1663, to be distinguished by the exposition of the master-work of Salvator Rosa's life and genius—the work which he himself has stamped with superiority over all his other pictures, by giving it the title of 'mio quadro grande!'—(my great picture!)

This noble picture was his Catiline Conspiracy, and the scene is an apartment in Catiline's palace. The light, which falls from above, is reflected from the marble walls, and most skilfully illuminates the heads of the splendid group in the foreground; leaving the lower part of the picture in deep and effective shadow. A beautiful antique tripod occupies the centre, and serves as an altar for the celebration of a fearful ceremony.

* This painting was greatly admired among the ancients, as expressive of the highest degree of pain which art could venture to indicate.

The moment taken by the painter in the story of Catiline is that so terrible and imposing, when, having detailed, with all the magic cloquence for which he was so noted, his views, and the nature of his perilous enterprise, he induces the conspirators to bind themselves to secrecy, and to the cause, by a solemn oath, consecrated by the awful ceremony of pledging each other in wine mingled with human blood.

The ceremony is just begun. Two persons in the dress of Roman nobility stand forward, each with an arm outstretched, and hands clasped over the tripod, while blood drops from the arm of one into a beautiful cup or vase held beneath.

In the countenance of him who bleeds, and whose blood is about to be quaffed, may be read one lettered and marked out for dupery—one expressly chosen from the band for this fearful act, that its awfulness might, by impressing his imagination with terror, bind him to that faith and secrecy he had not the strength of honor to preserve without such a sanction. Though of high birth, he was one stained with crime and obloquy, at once vain and audacious—incapable of keeping the secrets of others, or of hiding his own follies. This feeble villain is evidently Quintus Curius, who is thus described by Sallust, and thus painted in every trait and lineament by Salvator Rosa. The treachery which proceeds from weakness is already traceable in the timid indecision of his looks.

In the well-defined features of him who clasps the hand of Curius lurks more honesty, but not more firmness of purpose. He appears overpowered, rather than convinced; but he takes the oath, and seems equally divided in his attention by the awful act in which he is engaged, and by the stunning eloquence of that splendid apparition, which hovers like an evil genius near him, and which, though seen but in profile, with upraised arms and pointed finger, exhibits an almost unearthly superiority over all who surround it. This figure is Catiline,—

And all his host are standing in his looks.”

He is evidently winding up the courage of his dupes to its sticking-place, both by look, and word, and gesture, while a Roman patrician, with a keen, concentrated glance, as he holds the cup under the bleeding arm, reads the effects of the chief's eloquence in the looks of Curius. Filling up the background, to the left of the picture, are two of the old guard of Sylla, in full armor, long broken into civil dissensions, and ready, in the weariness of slothful peace, for any active mischief; they are gazing on the scene before them with looks of admiration and vulgar wonder, wondrously expressed.

It is remarkable that over the stern features and martial figures of these veterans the painter has shed an air of plebeian grossness, which singularly and artfully contrasts with the high blood and dignified elegance of the patrician conspirators; some of whom fill up the background to the right. One, however, there is among them, not confounded in the group, who comes prominently forward, as turning in disgust or horror from the atrocious ceremony of sealing an oath by a libation of human blood—one, too, to whom the shedding of human blood was yet familiar, and who probably, envious even then of the influence of Catiline, was already meditating that greatest and far more fatal conspiracy against the liberators of Rome, which placed the world's diadem at his own feet. It is Julius Cæsar!

2272. RAPHAEL'S CARTOON OF THE MURDER OF THE INNOCENTS.

This cartoon came into the possession of the Foundling Hospital by the conditional bequest of Prince Hoare, Esq. Haydon describes it as “one of the finest instances in the world of variety of expression and beauty of composition—as a work of ‘high art.’” It is the centre part of one of the best cartoons which belonged to the set executed by Raphael, at the order of Leo X., and sent afterwards to Flanders, to be copied in tapestry, for exhibition at the Vatican.

The original number of the cartoons was thirteen; but in consequence of the Flemish weavers cutting them in strips for their working machinery, after the tapestry was executed and sent to Rome, the original cartoons were left mingled together in boxes.

When Rubens was in England, he told Charles I. the condition they were in; and the king, who had the finest taste, desired him to procure them. Seven perfect ones were purchased, all, it may be inferred, which remained, and sent to his majesty; what became or had become of the remainder nobody knows; but here and there, all over Europe, fragments have appeared. At Oxford there are two or three heads; and we believe the Duke of Hamilton or Buccleuch has others. After Charles's misfortunes, the cartoons now at Hampton Court were sold, with the rest of his majesty's fine collection; but by Cromwell's express orders they were bought in for three hundred pounds. During the reign of Charles II. they were offered to France for fourteen thousand francs; but Charles was dissuaded from selling them.

The above portion of the Murder of the Innocents was sold at Westminster, many years ago, as disputed property. Prince Hoare's father, before the sale, explained to an opulent friend the great treasure about to be disposed of, and persuaded him to advance the money requisite, on condition of sharing the property. To his great surprise, he bought it for twenty-six pounds; and his friend, having no taste, told Mr. Hoare, if he would paint him and his family, he would relinquish his right.

These particulars Mr. Haydon had from Prince Hoare, the son; they are related in a letter from the painter to Mr. Lievesley, at the Foundling Hospital, dated October 3, 1837, wherein Haydon suggests the better exhibition of the work as a model of study; and soon after the governors of the hospital sent the cartoons, by way of loan, to the National Gallery, where they may now be seen and studied.

2273. THE FOUNDLING HOSPITAL AND THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

That Tenterden Steeple was the cause of Goodwin Sands does not appear a whit more strange than that in the Foundling Hospital originated the Royal Academy of Arts. Yet such was the case. The hospital was incorporated in 1739, and in a few years the present building was erected; but, as the income of the charity could not, with propriety, be expended upon decorations, many of the principal artists of that day generously gave pictures for several of the apartments of the hospital.

These were permitted to be shown to the public upon proper application, and hence became one of the sights of the metropolis. The pictures proved very attractive; and this success suggested the annual exhibition of the united artists which institution was the precursor of the Royal Academy, in the Adelphi, in the year 1760. Thus, within the walls of the Foundling the curious may see the state of British art previously to the epoch when King George III. first countenanced the historical talent of West.

Among the earliest governors and guardians of the hospital we find William Hogarth, who liberally subscribed his money, and gave his time and talent, towards carrying out the designs of his friend, the venerable Captain Coram, through whose zeal and humanity the hospital was established. Hogarth's first artistical aid was the engraving of a head-piece to a power of attorney, drawn for the collection of subscriptions towards the charity. Hogarth next presented to the hospital an engraved plate of Coram.

Among the early artistic patrons of the charity we find Rysbrach, the sculptor; Hayman, the embellisher of Vauxhall Gardens; Highmore, Hudson, and Allan Ramsay; and Richard Wilson, the prince of English landscape painters. They met often at the hospital, and thus advanced charity and the arts together; for the exhibition of their donations in paintings, &c., drew a daily crowd of visitors in splendid carriages; and a visit to the Foundling became the most fashionable morning lounge of the reign of George II. The grounds in front of the hospital were the promenade; and broadened silks, gold-headed canes, and laced three-cornered (Egham, Staines, and Windsor) hats formed a gay bevy in Lamb's Conduit Fields.

A very interesting series of biographettes of the artists of the Foundling, with a catalogue raisonnée of the pictures presented by them, will be found in Mr. Brownlow's Memoranda, or Chronicles of the Hospital. Among the pictures by Hogarth are, Moses brought to Pharaoh's Daughter, the March to Finchley, and a portrait of Captain Coram. Here are also the Charter House, by Gainsborough; St. George's and the Foundling Hospitals, by Wilson; portrait of Handel, by Kneller; the Earl of Dartmouth, by Reynolds; the cartoon of the Murder of the Innocents, by Raphael; the altar piece of the chapel, Christ presenting a Little Child, by West; portrait of the Earl of Macclesfield, by Wilson; Dr. Mead, by Allan Ramsay; George II., by Shackleton; the Offering of the Wise Men, by Casali; crayon portrait of Taylor White, by Cotes; a landscape, by Lambert; a sea piece, by Brookings, &c.

2274. TRUMBULL.

"In 1792," says Trumbull, "I was in Philadelphia, and there painted the portrait of General Washington which is now placed in the gallery at New Haven—the best certainly of those which I painted, and the best, in my estimation, which exists, in his heroic military character.

"The city of Charleston, S. C., instructed William R. Smith, one of the representatives of South Carolina, to employ me to paint for them a portrait of the great man, and I undertook it con amore, (as the commission was unlimited,) meaning to give his military character, in the most sublime moment of its exertion—the evening previous to the battle of Princeton; when, viewing the vast superiority of his approaching enemy, and the impossibility of again crossing the Delaware, or retreating down the river, he conceived the plan of returning by a night march into the country from which he had just been driven, thus cutting off the enemy's communication, and destroying his depot of stores and provisions at Brunswick.

"I told the president my object: he entered into it warmly, and, as the work advanced, we talked of the scene, its dangers, its almost desperation. He looked the scene again, and I happily transferred to the canvas the lofty expression of his animated countenance, the high resolve to conquer or to perish.

"The result was, in my own opinion, eminently successful, and the general was satisfied. But it did not meet the views of Mr. Smith. He admitted he was personally pleased, but he thought the city would be better satisfied with a more matter-of-fact likeness, such as they had recently seen him—calm, tranquil, peaceful.

"Another was painted for Charleston, agreeably to their taste; a view of the city in the background, a horse, with scenery, and plants of the climate; and when the State Society of Cincinnati of Connecticut dissolved themselves, the first picture, at the expense of some of the members, was presented to Yale College."

2275. ENGLISH SKILL.

Mr. Eugenio Latilla, a member of the Society of British Artists, painted for his grace the Duke of Beaufort the banquetting-room of Beaufort House, in Arlington Street, Piccadilly. This encaustic is one of Mr. Latilla's own discovery, and resembles fresco in effect, with rather more depth of color, and admitting a higher finish. The design throughout is original, though in Greek taste. The single flowers in the large panels were not, as has been supposed, taken from Herculaneum, but nature, as also the fruit and flowers in the arabesques. The character of the composition being bacchanalian, scrolls of the acanthus, with boys and panthers, the size of life, are introduced in the cove. The ornaments may rank among the most masterly specimens ever produced in England. They are drawn in a grand gusto, and painted in a vigorous impasto, strongly resembling the style of Giovanni da Udine, the very reverse of the method pursued under the direction of house painters and upholsterers, which is a system of japaning, or teatray painting, by no means artistic.

The ornaments in the Beaufort House encaustic were drawn and executed by Mr. Latilla's assistants, who have thus proved themselves equal to any work of a high class, and thereby subverted the evidence taken before a parliamentary committee, where it was represented as necessary to send to France both for designers and painters of arabesques.

This room was to have been painted by Germans; and the idea had so possessed men's minds that English artists were unfit for a work of the kind, that the sagacious critics in the newspapers ascribed it to them. This success may, probably, have influenced the parliamentary committee, some of whom desired that Cornelius, or some other German artist, should be employed for the new houses of Parliament. They should, however, have first proved Englishmen to have failed, before they invited a foreigner, unless it were to take part in the competition.

2276. HARLOW'S TRIAL OF QUEEN KATHARINE.

This celebrated picture (known also as the Kemble Family, from its introducing their portraits) was the last and most esteemed work of J. H. Harlow, whom Sir Thomas Lawrence generously characterizes as "the most promising of all our painters." The painting was commenced and finished in 1817. Immediately after its exhibition at the Royal Academy, it was finely copied in mezzotint, by G. Clint; and the print has, probably, enjoyed higher popularity than any production of its class. A proof impression has been known to realize upwards of twenty guineas.

The picture is on mahogany panel, stated to have cost the artist fifteen pounds. It is one and a half inches in thickness, and in size about seven feet by five feet. It originated with Mr. S. Welsh, the professor of music, who, in the first instance, commissioned Harlow to paint for him a Kitecat size portrait of Mrs. Siddons, in the character of Queen Katharine, in Shakspeare's play of Henry VIII., introducing a few scenic accessories in the distance. For this portrait Harlow was to receive twenty-five guineas; but the idea of representing the whole scene occurred to the artist, who, with Mr. Welsh, prevailed upon most of the actors to sit for their portraits: in addition to these are portraits of the friends of both parties, including the artist himself. The sum ultimately paid by Mr. Welsh for the picture was one hundred guineas; and a like amount was paid by Mr. Cribb for Harlow's permission to engrave the well-known print, to which we have already adverted.

Harlow owed many obligations to Fuseli for his critical remarks on this picture: when he first saw it, chiefly in dead coloring, he said, "I do not disapprove of the general arrangement of your work, and I see you will give it a powerful effect of light and shadow; but you have here a composition of more than twenty figures, or, I should rather say, parts of figures, because you have not shown one leg or foot, which makes it very defective. Now, if you do not know how to draw legs and feet, I will show you;" and taking up a crayon, he drew two on the wainscot of the room.

Harlow profited by these instructions, and the next time Fuseli saw the picture, the whole arrangement in the foreground was changed. He then said to Harlow, "So far you have done well; but now you have not introduced a back figure, to throw the eye of the spectator into the picture;" and then pointed out by what means he might improve it in this particular. Accordingly, Harlow introduced the two boys who are taking up the cushion.

It has been stated, that the majority of the actors of the scene sat for their portraits in the picture. John Kemble, however, refused, when asked to do so by Mr. Welsh, strengthening his refusal with emphasis profane.

Harlow was not, however, to be defeated; and he actually drew Kemble's portrait in one of the stage boxes of Covent Garden Theatre, while the great actor was playing his part. The vexation such a ruse must have occasioned to a man of Kemble's temperament may be imagined.

Egerton, Pope, and Stephen Kemble were successively painted for Henry VIII., the artist retaining the latter. The head of Charles Kemble was likewise twice painted; the first, which cost him many sittings, was considered by himself and others to be very successful. The artist thought otherwise, and contrary to Mr. Kemble's wish and remonstrance, he one morning painted out the approved head: in a day or two, however, entirely from memory, Harlow repainted the portrait with increased fidelity. It is stated that but one sitting was required of Mrs. Siddons; the fact is, the great actress held her uplifted arm frequently till she could hold it raised no longer, and the majestic limb was finished from another original.

2277. PORTRAITS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

The Eastern Zoölogical Gallery of the British Museum has its walls decorated with an assemblage of portraits, in number upwards of one hundred, forming, probably, the largest collection of portraits in the kingdom. The execution of many of them is but indifferent; there are others which are exceedingly curious; and some are unique. A great part of them came into the Museum from having belonged to the Sloanean, Cottonian, and other collections, which now form the magnificent library; and others have been the gifts of individuals. Before the rebuilding of the Museum, many of these pictures were stowed away in the lumber-rooms and attics of the mansion; and it was principally at the suggestion of an eminent London print seller that they were drawn from their "dark retreat," cleaned, and the frames regilded, and hung in their present position, above the cases containing the fine zoölogical specimens.

2278. REMINISCENCES OF COPLEY'S PORTRAITS.

The fame of Copley, as a portrait painter, is comparatively limited. "I can speak," says Dr. Dibdin, "but of four of his portraits from reminiscence—those of the late Earl Spencer, Lord Sidmouth, Lord Colchester, and the late Richard Heber, Esq.; the latter when a boy of eight years, in the dining-room at Hodnet Hall.

"These portraits, with the exception of the last, are all engraved. That of Earl Spencer, in his full robes as a knight of the Garter, and in the prime of his manhood, now placed at the bottom of the great historical portrait gallery at Althorp, must have been a striking likeness; but, like almost all the portraits of the artist, it is too stiff and stately.

"The portrait of the young Heber has, I think, considerable merit on the score of art. There is a play of light and shadow, and the figure, with a fine flowing head of hair, mixes up well with its accessories. He is leaning on a cricket bat, with a ball in one hand. The face is, to my eye, such as I could conceive the original to have been, when I first remember him a bachelor of arts, at Oxford, full, plump, and athletic.

"In short," as Dean Swift expresses it, 'if you should look at him in his boyhood through the magnifying end of the glass, and in his manhood through the diminishing end, it would be impossible to spy any difference.' The contemplation of this portrait has at times produced mixed emotions of admiration, regard, and pity."

2279. THE TOURNAMENT OF THE FIELD OF THE CLOTH OF GOLD.

In the spring of 1830, there was exhibited in London a superb specimen of painting on glass, the size almost amounting to the stupendous—being eighteen by twenty-four feet. The term "window," however, is hardly applicable to this vast work, for there was no framework visible; but the entire picture consisted of upwards of three hundred and fifty pieces, of irregular forms and sizes, fitted into metal astragals, so contrived as to fall with the shadows, and thus to assist the appearance of an uninterrupted and unique picture upon a sheet of glass.

The subject was the Tournament of the Field of the Cloth of Gold, between Henry VIII. and Francis I., in the plain of Ardres, near Calais—a scene of overwhelming gorgeousness, and, in the splendor of its appointments, well suited to the brilliant effect which is the peculiar characteristic of painting in enamel.

The stage represented was the last tourney on June 25, 1520. The field is minutely described by Hall, whose details the painter had closely followed. There were artificial trees, with green damask leaves; and branches and boughs, and withered leaves of cloth of gold; the trunks and arms being also covered with cloth of gold, and intermingled with fruits and flowers of Venice gold; and "their beauteie shewed farre."

In these trees were hung, emblazoned upon shields, "the Kyng of Englands armes, within a garter, and the French Kynges within a collar of his order of Sainct Michael, with a close croune, with a flower de lise in the toppe;" and around and above were the shields of the noblemen of the two courts. The two queens were seated in a magnificent pavilion, and next to the Queen of England sat Wolsey; the judges were on stages, the heralds, in their tabards, placed at suitable points; and around were gathered the flower of the French and English nobility, to witness this closing glory of the last days of chivalry.

The action of the piece is thus described: The trumpets sounded, and the two kings and their retinues entered the field; they then put down their visors, and rode to the encounter valiantly; or, as Hall says, "The ii kynges were ready, and either of them encountered one man-of-arms; the French Kyng to the Erle of Devonshire, the Kyng of England to Mounsire Florrenge, and brake his Poldron, and him disarmed, when ye strokes were stricken, this battail was departed, and was much praised."

The picture contained upwards of one hundred figures, life size, of which forty were portraits, after Holbein and other contemporary authorities. The armor of the two kings and the challenger was very successfully painted; their coursers almost breathed chivalric fire; and the costumes and heraldic devices presented a blaze of dazzling splendor. Among the spectators, the most striking portraits were the two queens, Anne Boleyn, and the Countess of Chateaubriant, Wolsey, Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, and Queen Mary, Dowager of France, with the ill-fated Duke of Buckingham, whose hasty comment upon the extravagance of the tournament proved his downfall.

The elaborate richness of the costumes, sparkling with gold and jewels, the fleecy, floating feathers of the champions, their burnished armor and glittering arms, the congregated glories of velvet, ermine, and cloth of gold, and the heraldic emblazonry amidst the emerald freshness of the foliage, all combined to form a scene of unparalleled sumptuousness and effect.

The picture was executed in glass, by Mr. Thomas Wilmshurst, a pupil of the late Mr. Moss, from a sketch by Mr. R. T. Bone; the horses by Mr. Woodward. The work cost the artist nearly three thousand pounds. It was exhibited in a first floor at No. 15 Oxford Street, and occupied one end of a room decorated for the occasion with panelling and carving, in the taste of the time of Henry VIII. It was very attractive as an exhibition, and nearly fifty thousand descriptive catalogues were sold.

Sad, then, to relate, in one unlucky night, the picture and the house were entirely burnt in an accidental fire; not even a sketch or study was saved from destruction; and the property was wholly uninsured. As a specimen of glass painting, the work was very successful, the colors were very brilliant, and the ruby red of old was all but equalled. The artistic treatment was altogether original; the painters in no instance borrowing from the contemporary picture of the same scene in the Hampton Court collection.

2280. THE OLDEST PICTURE IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF ENGLAND.

This is No. 186—portraits of a Flemish gentleman and lady, standing in the middle of an apartment, with their hands joined. In the background are a bed, a mirror, and a window, partly open; the objects in the room being distinctly reflected in the mirror. A branch chandelier hangs from the ceiling, with the candle still burning in it; in the foreground is a small poodle. In the frame of the mirror are ten minute circular compartments, in which are painted stories from the life of Christ; and immediately under the mirror is written "Johannes de Eyck fuit hic," with the date 1434 below.

This signifies, literally, "John Van Eyck was this man," an interpretation which leads to the conjecture that this may be Van Eyck's own portrait, with that of his wife, though in this case the wife's name should have been written, as well as his own; and the expression is not exactly that which would have been expected. The words, are, however, distinctly fuit hic.

As already mentioned, the date of the picture is 1434, when John Van Eyck was, according to the assumed date of his birth, in his fortieth year, which is about the age of the man in this picture. Van Mander speaks of the painting as the portraits of a man and his wife, or bride and bridegroom: it may be a bridegroom introducing his bride to her home.

This picture, about a century after it was painted, was in the possession of a barber-surgeon at Bruges, who presented it to the then Regent of the Netherlands, Mary, the sister of Charles X., and Queen Dowager of Hungary. This princess valued the picture so highly, that she granted the barber-surgeon in return an annual pension, or office worth one hundred florins per annum. It appears, however, to have again fallen into obscure hands; for it was discovered by Major General Hay, in the apartments to which he was taken in 1815, at Brussels, after he had been wounded at the battle of Waterloo. He purchased the picture after his recovery, and disposed of it to the British government in 1842, when it was placed in the National Gallery. It is the oldest painting in the collection.

2281. PEALE'S DESCRIPTION OF HIS COURT OF DEATH.

Rembrandt Peale gives the following history of his Court of Death: "In answering your inquiry concerning the origin of my picture of the Court of Death, I shall briefly narrate the process of its invention. Accidentally taking up Bishop Porteus's Poem on Death,—poetical as may be deemed his description of the Cavern of Death, and familiar as his personifications may have been to the minds of literary men,—it struck me that a picture thus representing Death as a monarch, with his ebon sceptre, seated on a throne, and having on either side, as prime ministers, War and Old Age, and sending forth Intemperance and Disease as agents to execute his will, would unquestionably present an appalling scene, better in the description than on the canvas.

"I had seen, in Westminster Abbey, Roubilliac's beautiful monumental scene, representing a noble lady lying on her couch at the close of life, and a skeleton, wonderfully wrought out of marble, issuing from the tomb, in an attitude of vigor, but without a muscle, directing his lance towards the heart of the lady as his victim, and, with others, felt the absurdity of it. An angel to receive the parting soul would be better. I had seen West's Death on the Pale Horse, a most impressive picture, now in the Academy in this city, but my veneration of the artist could not reconcile me to his personifications; for, though he has given muscles to the figure, they are dried up, to say nothing of the fire from his mouth and the lightning from his hand; yet I had an idea that the case might be fairly stated on the canvas. I imagined how I should attempt to paint a subject founded on Porteus's Poem, and immediately began to sketch with my pencil on a piece of shingle, which chanced to be in my hand, a figure enveloped in drapery, which indicated form and power, with a shadowy but fixed countenance, and with extended arms, as a judge issuing a decree. At his feet I drew a prostrate corpse, and on one side the figure of an old man submissively approaching. I had a faint conception of War going forth, impelled by his own passions, and of Intemperance, Luxury, and Disease; but having no intention to paint such a scene, I threw my board away, and thought no more about it.

"A month afterwards, one of my little daughters produced the board, with my sketch upon it. I was flattered by imagining there was some merit in it, and I added a few more figures, thus fixing the subject in my mind, which I immediately transferred to a small piece of canvas, and consulted my father, without sending him my design, whether I should paint the picture in large. His prudent advice was, 'No.'

"But some months afterwards, being on a visit to me in Baltimore, I showed him my design, when he enthusiastically said, 'Begin it immediately.' My painting-room was too small, and I had to build a larger one expressly for it, during which I prepared a large canvas, and executed many studies from the life, of figures, heads, hands, &c. My good and venerable father stood as the representative of Old Age, modified by the antique bust of Homer; one of my daughters stood in the place of Virtue, Religion, Hope; and another knelt to the attitude of Pleasure. I borrowed a countenance from my imagination. My friend and critic, John Neal, of Portland, impersonated the Warrior, beneath whom a friend consented to sink to the earth in distress, and thus appeared as the mother of a naked child, which I painted from my then youngest daughter. The corpse was the joint result of a study from a subject in the Medical College and the assistance of my brother Franklin, lying prostrate with inverted head, which was made a likeness of Mr. Smith, founder of the Baltimore Hospital; my brother also, though of irreproachable temperance, stood for the inebriated youth; my wife and others served to fill up the background.

"It may be worth while to mention, that for the figure of Famine, following in the train of War, I could find no model, though I sought her in many a haunt of misery, and therefore drew her from my brain; but, strange to say, two weeks after the picture was finished, a woman passed my window, who might have been sworn to as the original.

"I had not employed the mythology of the ancients, nor the symbols of other artists. It was not an allegorical picture, composed after the examples of Lebrun, or of any school. I had read some remarks by Pliny on a style of painting which he recommended as capable of embodying thought, principle, and character, without the aid of conventional allegory, and described one on these principles painted by Apelles, and approved by the multitude. This picture of the Court of Death is an approach to that style; at any rate, it was the first large picture, whatever may be its merits or its faults, that has been attempted in modern times, upon the same broad and universal principles. I would lay claim to some little credit for the stand I took in reprobation of intemperance, before that subject was introduced to popular notice; and the Society of Friends, at least, will give me credit for my views of the glory and magnanimity of war, whilst the philosophic Christian must agree with the picture, that death has no terror in the eyes of virtuous old age, and of innocence, faith, and hope."

2282. THE PICTURES AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The pictures which now constitute the private gallery of her majesty at Buckingham Palace were principally collected by George IV., whose exclusive predilection for pictures of the Dutch and Flemish schools is well known. To those which he brought together here, and which formerly hung in Carlton House, her present majesty has made, since her accession, many valuable additions—some purchased, and others selected from the royal collections at Windsor and Hampton Court; others have been added by Prince Albert, from the collection of the late Professor D'Alton, of Bonn.

George IV. began to form his collection about the year 1802, and was chiefly guided by the advice and judgment of Sir Charles Long, afterwards Lord Farnborough, an accomplished man, whose taste for art, and intimacy with the king, then Prince of Wales, rendered him a very fit person to carry the royal wishes into execution. The importation of the Orleans gallery had diffused a feeling—or, it may be, a fashion—for the higher specimens of the Italian schools; but under the auspices of George IV., the tide set in an opposite direction.

In the year 1812, the very select gallery of Flemish and Dutch pictures collected by Sir Francis Baring was transferred by purchase to the prince regent. Sir Francis Baring had purchased the best pictures from the collections of M. Geldermeeester, of Amsterdam, (sold in 1800,) and that of the Countess of Holderness, (sold in 1802,) and, except the Hope Gallery, there was nothing at that time to compare with it in England. Mr. Segnier valued this collection at eighty thousand pounds; but the exact sum paid for it was certainly much less.

The specimens of Rubens and Vandyke are excellent, but do not present sufficient variety to afford an adequate idea of the wide range or power of the first of these great painters, nor of the particular talent of the last. On the other hand, the works and style of Gerard Douw, Teniers, Jan Steen, Adrian, and Wilhelm Vandevelde, Wouvermans, and Burg-hem, may be very advantageously studied in this gallery, each of their specimens being many in number, various in subject, and good in their kind.

Of Mieris and Metzels, there are finer specimens at Mr. Hope's and Sir Robert Peel's; and the Hobbimas and Cuypers must yield to those of Lord Ashburton and Lord Francis Egerton. But, on the whole, it is certainly the finest gallery of this class of works in England. The collection derives additional interest from the presence of some pictures of the modern British artists—Reynolds, Wilkie, Allen, Newton, Gainsborough. It is, however, only just to these painters to add, that not one of their pictures here ought to be considered as a first-rate example of their power.

2283. THE BRIDGEWATER GALLERY.

This valuable collection—to be henceforth located in the Earl of Ellesmere's new mansion, in the Green Park—originated in the Orleans Gallery. The Italian part of the collection had been mortgaged, for forty thousand pounds, to Harman's banking-house, when Mr. Bryan, a celebrated collector and picture dealer, and author of the Dictionary of Painters, induced the Duke of Bridgewater to purchase the whole, as it stood, for forty three thousand pounds.

The pictures, amounting to three hundred and five, were then valued separately by Mr. Bryan, making a total of seventy-two thousand pounds; and from among them the duke selected ninety-four of the finest, at the prices at which they were valued, amounting all together to thirty-nine thousand guineas. The duke subsequently admitted his nephew, the Earl Gower, and the Earl of Carlisle, to share his acquisition; resigning to the former a fourth part, and to the latter an eighth, of the whole number thus acquired. The exhibition and sale of the rest produced forty-one thousand pounds; consequently, the speculation turned out most profitably, for the ninety-four pictures, which had been valued at thirty-nine thousand pounds, were acquired, in fact, for two thousand pounds. The forty-seven retained for the Duke of Bridgewater were valued at twenty-three thousand one hundred and thirty pounds.

The Duke of Bridgewater already possessed some fine pictures, and after the acquisition of his share of the Orleans Gallery, he continued to add largely to his collection, till his death, in 1803, when he left his pictures, valued at one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, to his nephew, George, first Marquis of Stafford, afterwards first Duke of Sutherland.

During the life of this nobleman, the collection, added to one formed by himself when Earl Gower, was placed in the house in Cleveland Row; and the whole known then, and for thirty years afterwards, as the Stafford Gallery, became celebrated all over Europe.

On the death of the Marquis of Stafford, in 1833, his second son, Lord Francis Leveson Gower, taking the surname of Egerton, inherited, under the will of his grand-uncle, the Bridgewater property, including the collection of pictures formed by the duke. The Stafford Gallery was thus divided: that part of the collection which had been acquired by the Marquis of Stafford fell to his eldest son, the present Duke of Sutherland; while the Bridgewater collection, properly so called, devolved to Lord Francis Egerton, and has resumed its original appellation, being now known as the Bridgewater Gallery.

This gallery has a great attraction, owing principally to the taste of its present possessor: it contains some excellent works of modern English painters. Near to the famous Rising of the Gale, by Vandevelde, hangs the Gale at Sea, by Turner, not less sublime, not less true to the grandeur and the modesty of nature; and by Edwin Landseer, the beautiful original of a composition which the art of the engraver has made familiar to the eye—the Return of the Hawking Party, a picture which has all the romance of poetry and the antique time, and all the charm and value of a family picture. Nor should be passed without particular notice one of the most celebrated productions of the modern French historical school—Charles I. in the Guard-room, by Paul Delaroche; a truly grand picture, which Lord Francis Egerton has added to the gallery since 1838.

2284. DAVID'S NAPOLEON.

David's portrait of Napoleon is considered the most accurate likeness extant. It hangs in the museum belonging to the East India Company, in Leadenhall Street. Napoleon sat only twice—to David and Girard.

In 1828, the Hon. Mrs. Damer bequeathed to the British Museum a gold snuff-box set with diamonds, and ornamented with a miniature of Napoleon, which the lady received from the emperor's own hands. The bequest was made to the British Museum on condition that the miniature should never be copied; but nothing is said in the will to prohibit the exhibition of the portrait. Why, then, should it be buried among the unexplored and almost inaccessible treasures of the coin and medal room?

2285. TURNER'S SLAVE SHIP.

"I think," says the Graduate of Oxford, in his eloquent Modern Painters, "the noblest sea that Turner has ever painted, and, if so, the noblest certainly ever painted by man, is that of the Slave Ship, the chief Academy picture of the exhibition of 1840. It is a sunset on the Atlantic, after a prolonged storm; but the storm is partially lulled, and the torn and streaming rain clouds are moving in scarlet lines to lose themselves in the hollow of the night.

"The whole surface of sea included in the picture is divided into two ridges of enormous swell, not high nor local, but a low, broad heaving of the whole ocean, like the lifting of its bosom by a deep-drawn breath after the torture of the storm. Between these two ridges, the fire of the sunset falls along the trough of the sea, dyeing it with an awful but glorious light—the intense and lurid splendor which burns like gold, and bathes like blood. Along this fiery path and valley, the tossing waves, by which the swell of the sea is recklessly divided, lift themselves in dark, indefinite, fantastic forms, each casting a faint and ghastly shadow behind it along the illumined foam. They do not rise every where, but three or four together, in wild groups, fitfully and furiously, as the under strength of the swell compels or permits them; leaving between them treacherous spaces of level and whirling water, now lighted with green and lamp-like fire, now flashing back the gold of the declining sun, now fearfully dyed from above with the indistinguishable images of the burning clouds, which fall upon them in flakes of crimson and scarlet, and give to the reckless waves the added motion of their own fiery flying. Purple and blue, the lurid shadows of the hollow breakers are cast upon the mist of the night, which gathers cold and low, advancing like the shadow of death upon the guilty ship as it labors amidst the lightning of the sea, its thin masts written upon the sky in lines of blood, girded with condemnation in that fearful hue which signs the sky with horror, and mixes its flaming flood with the sunlight; and, cast far along the desolate heave of the sepulchral waves, incarnadines the multitudinous sea."

2286. DE LOUTHERBOURG'S EIDOPHUSIKON.

It would be a subject of regret to all lovers of the picturesque scenery of nature, if the ingenious contrivances which De Louthembourg invented, in the formation of his beautiful little stage, were consigned to oblivion for want of record. It is well known that this original exhibition not only delighted, but even astonished, the artists who crowded the seats of his theatre.

The stage on which the Eidophusikon was represented was a little more than six feet wide, and about eight feet in depth; yet such was the painter's knowledge of effect, and of scientific arrangement, and the scenes which he described were so completely illusive, that the space appeared to recede for many miles, and his horizon seemed as palpably distant from the eye as the extreme termination of the view would appear in nature.

The opening subject of the Eidophusikon represented the view from the summit of Tree Hill, in Greenwich Park, looking up the Thames to the metropolis: this scene, on the rising of the curtain, was enveloped in that mysterious light which is the precursor of daybreak, so true to nature that the imagination of the spectator sniffed the sweet breath of morn. A faint light appeared along the horizon; the scene assumed a vaporish tint of gray; presently a gleam of saffron, changing to the pure varieties that tinge the fleecy clouds that pass away in morning mist; the picture brightened by degrees; the sun appeared, gilding the tops of the trees and the projections of the lofty buildings, and burnishing the vanes on the cupolas; when the whole scene burst upon the eye in the gorgeous splendor of a beauteous day.

The clouds in every scene had a natural motion; and they were painted in semitransparent colors, so that they not only received light in front, but, by a greater intensity of the Argand lamps, were susceptible of being illuminated from behind. The linen on which they were painted was stretched on frames of twenty times the surface of the stage, which rose diagonally by a winding machine. De Louthembourg, who excelled in representing the phenomena of clouds, may be said to have designed a series of effects on the same frame: thus the first gleam of morning led to the succeeding increase of light; and the motion being oblique, clouds first appeared from beneath the horizon, rose to meridian, and floated fast or slow, according to their supposed density, or the power of the wind.

To illuminate the scenes for this interesting display of nature, the ingenious projector had constructed his lights to throw their power in front of the scenes; and the plan might be tried with advantage for spectacles and particular effects on the great stages of our magnificent theatres. The lamps on De Louthembourg's stage were above the proscenium, and hidden from the audience, instead of being unnaturally placed, as we are accustomed to see them, below.

Before the line of the brilliant lamps, on the stage of the Eidophusikon, were slips of stained glass, yellow, red, green, purple, and blue; by the shifting of which, the painter could throw a tint upon the scenery, compatible with the time of day which he represented, and by a single slip, or their combinations, could produce a magical effect; thus giving a general hue of cheerfulness, sublimity, and awfulness, subservient to the phenomena of his scene.

Louthembourg's genius was as prolific in imitations of nature to astonish the ear as to charm the sight. He introduced a new art — the picturesque of sound.

I can never forget the awful impression that was excited by his ingenious contrivance to produce the effect of firing off a signal of distress, in his sea storm — that appalling sound which he had to have exposed to the terrors of a raging tempest could not listen to, even in this mimic scene, without being reminded of the heart-sickening answer which sympathetic danger had reluctantly poured forth from his own loud gun — a hoarse sound to the howling wind, that proclaimed, "I, too, holy Heaven, need that succor I fain would lend!"

De Louthembourg had tried many schemes to effect this; but none were satisfactory to his nice ear, until he caused a large skin to be dressed into parchment, which was fastened by screws to a circular frame, forming a vast tambourine; to this was attached a compact sponge that went upon a whalebone spring, which, struck with violence, gave the effect of a near explosion; a more gentle blow, that of a far-off gun; and the reverberation of the sponge produced a marvellous imitation of the echo from cloud to cloud, dying away into silence.

The thunder was no less natural, and infinitely grand. A spacious sheet of thin copper was suspended by a chain, which, shaken by one of the lower corners, produced the distant rumbling, seemingly below the horizon, and, as the clouds rolled on, approached nearer and nearer, increasing peal by peal, until, following rapidly the lightning's zigzag flash, which was admirably vivid and sudden, it burst in a tremendous crash immediately overhead.

The waves for his stage were carved in soft wood, from models made in clay: these were colored with great skill, and being highly varnished, reflected the lightning. Each turned on its own axis towards the other in a contrary direction, throwing up the foam, now in one spot, now in another, and diminishing in altitude as they receded in distance, were subdued by corresponding tints. Thus the perturbed water appeared to cover a vast space. One machine of simple construction turned the whole, and the motion was regulated according to the increase of the storm.

The vessels, which were beautiful models, went over the waves with a natural undulation, those nearest making their courses with a proportionate rate to their bulk, and those farther off moving with a slower pace. They were all correctly rigged, and carried only such sails as their situation would demand. Those in the distance were colored in every part to preserve the aerial perspective of the scene.

The illusion was so perfect, that the audience were frequently heard to exclaim, "Hark! that signal of distress came from that vessel laboring, out there—and now from that."

The rush of the waves was effected by a large octagonal box made of pasteboard, with internal shelves, and charged with small shells, peas, and light balls, which, as the machine wheeled upon its axis, were hurled in heaps in every turn, and being accompanied by two machines of a circular form, covered with tightly-strained silk, which pressed against each other by a swift motion, gave out a hollow, whistling sound, in perfect imitation of loud gusts of wind. Large silken balls, passed hastily over the surface of a great tambourine, increased the awful din.

The rain and hail were no less truly imitated. For the rain, a long, four-sided tube was charged with small seed, which, according to the degree of its motion, from a horizontal to a vertical position, forced the atoms in a pattering stream to the bottom, when it was turned to repeat the operation. The hail was expressed by a similar tube, on a larger scale, with pasteboard shelves, projecting on inclined planes, and charged with little beads, so that, sliding from shelf to shelf, fast or slow, as the tube was suddenly or gently raised, the imitation was perfect.

One of the most interesting scenes described a calm, with an Italian seaport, in which the rising of the moon, with the serene coolness which it diffused to the clouds, the mountains, and the water, was finely contrasted by a lofty light-house, of picturesque architecture, jutting out far into the sea, upon a romantic promontory of broken rocks. The red glowing light of its spacious lantern tinged the rippling of the water on one part of its surface, whilst the moon shed its silvery lustre on another in sweet repose. Shipping in motion added to the interest of the view; and a fleet in the offing, slowly proceeding on its course, melted into air.

The clouds for this scene were admirably painted; and as they rolled on, the moon tinged their edges, or was obscured, at the will of the painter; for where he had loaded the color to opaqueness, the transparent light of the orb could not penetrate. The clouds in front received sufficient illumination from the lamps, which were subdued by a bluish-gray glass, one of the slips before described. The moon was formed by a circular aperture of an inch in diameter, cut in a tin box, that contained a powerful Argand lamp, which, being placed at various distances from the back of the scene, gave a brilliant or a subdued splendor to the passing cloud, producing, without any other aid, the prismatic circle, with that enchanting purity which is peculiar to an Italian sky.

But the most impressive scene which formed the finale of the exhibition was that representing the region of the fallen angels, with Satan arraying his troops on the banks of the fiery lake, and the rising of the palace of Pandemonium, as described by the pen of Milton. De Louthembourg had already displayed his graphic powers, in his scenes of fire, upon a great scale at the public theatre—scenes which had astonished and terrified the audience; but in this he astonished himself; for he had not conceived the power of light that might be thrown upon a scenic display until he made the experiment on his own circumscribed stage. Here, in the foreground of a vista stretching an immeasurable length between mountains, ignited, from their bases to their lofty summits, with many-colored flames, a chaotic mass arose in dark majesty, which gradually assumed form, until it stood, the interior of a vast temple of gorgeous architecture, bright as molten brass, seemingly composed of unconsuming and unquenchable fire. In this tremendous scene, the effect of colored glasses before the lamps was fully displayed, which, being hidden from the audience, threw their whole influence on the scene, as it rapidly changed, now to a sulphurous blue, then to lurid red, and then again to a pale vivid light, and ultimately to a mysterious combination of the glasses, such as a bright furnace exhibits in fusing various metals. The sounds which accompanied the wondrous picture struck the astonished ear of the spectator as no less preternatural; for to add a more awful character to the peals of thunder and the accompaniments of all the hollow machinery that hurled balls and stones with indescribable rumbling and noise, an expert assistant swept his thumb over the surface of the tambourine, which produced a variety of groans, that struck the imagination as issuing from infernal spirits.

2297. HOGARTH'S TAILPIECE.

A few months before Hogarth was seized with the malady which deprived society of one of its brightest ornaments, he proposed to his matchless pencil the work he had entitled the Tailpiece.

The first idea of this picture is said to have been started in company, while the convivial glass was circulating round his own table. "My next undertaking," said Hogarth, "shall be the end of all things." "If that is the case," replied his friends, "your business will be finished, for there will be an end to the painter." "There will be so," answered Hogarth, sighing heavily; "and therefore the sooner my work is done the better."

Accordingly he began the next day, and continued his design with a diligence that seemed to indicate an apprehension he should not live to complete it. This, however, he did, and in the most ingenious manner, by grouping every thing that could denote the end of all things—a broken bottle; an old broom worn to the stump; the but-end of an old musket; a cracked bell; a bow unstrung; a crown tumbled to pieces; towers in ruins; the sign-post of a tavern called the World's End falling down; the moon in her wane; the map of the globe burning; a gibbet falling, the body gone, and the chains which held it dropping down; Phœbus and his horses lying dead in the clouds; a vessel wrecked; Time with his glass and scythe broken; a tobacco pipe with the last whiff of smoke going out; a play-book opened, with Exeunt omnes stamped in the corner; an empty purse; and a statute of bankruptcy taken out against nature.

"So far, so good," saith Hogarth, on reviewing his performance: "nothing remains but this," taking his pencil and sketching the resemblance of a painter's palette broken—"Finis!" He then exclaimed, "The deed is done; all is over."

It is a very remarkable fact, not generally known, that Hogarth never again took the palette in his hand, and that he died in about a month after he had finished this Tailpiece.

§ 225. HISTORY OF NOTED PAINTINGS.

2286. CORREGGIO'S APOTHECARY.

Tradition states that the beautiful picture of Christ's Agony in the Garden was given by Correggio to an apothecary, in discharge of a paltry debt of four crowns, and soon afterwards sold to one of the Visconti family for five hundred. All that is known of its history is, that it was purchased for Philip IV. of Spain, by the governor of Milan, at the price of seven hundred and fifty Spanish doubloons, or fifteen hundred pounds sterling, and transferred to the palace of Madrid. It remained there till the invasion of Spain by the French, and, on their retreat, was purloined by Joseph Bonaparte, and concealed, with other paintings, in the interior of his carriage, in his flight from Madrid. It was, however, taken by the troops of the victorious army, and afterwards graced the collection of the Duke of Wellington.

2289. WEST.

Before the time of West, historical painting had appeared in a masking habit: the actions of Englishmen seemed all to have been performed, if costume were to be believed, by Greeks or by Romans. West dismissed at once this pedantry, and restored nature and propriety in his noble work of the Death of Wolfe.

The multitude acknowledged its excellence at once. The lovers of old art, the manufacturers of compositions called by courtesy classical, complained of the barbarism of boots, and buttons, and blunderbuses, and cried out for naked warriors, with bows, bucklers, and battering-rams. Lord Grosvenor, disregarding the frowns of amateurs, and the, at best, cold approbation of the Academy, purchased this work, which, in spite of laced coats and cocked hats, is one of the best of our historical pictures. The Indian warrior, watching the dying hero, to see if he equalled in fortitude the children of the deserts, is a fine stroke of nature and poetry.

The king questioned West concerning the picture, and put him on his defence of this new heresy in art. To the curiosity of Galt we owe the sensible answer of West.

"When it was understood," said the artist, "that I intended to paint the characters as they had actually appeared on the scene, the Archbishop of York called on Reynolds, and asked his opinion; they both came to my house to dissuade me from running so great a risk. Reynolds began a very ingenious and elegant dissertation on the state of the public taste in this country, and the danger which every innovation incurred of contempt and ridicule, and concluded by urging me earnestly to adopt the costume of antiquity, as more becoming the greatness of my subject than the modern garb of European warriors. I answered, that the event to be commemorated happened in the year 1758, in a region of the world unknown to the Greeks and Romans, and at a period of time when no warrior who wore such costume existed. The subject I have to represent is a great battle fought and won, and the same truth which gives law to the historian should rule the painter.

"If, instead of the facts of the action, I introduce fictions, how shall I be understood by posterity? The classic dress is certainly picturesque, but by using it I shall lose in sentiment what I gain in external grace. I want to mark the place, the time, and the people, and to do this I must abide by truth.

"They then went away, and returned again when I had the painting finished. Reynolds seated himself before the picture; examined it with deep and minute attention for half an hour; then rising, said to Drummond, 'West has conquered; he has treated his subject as it ought to be treated; I retract my objections. I foresee that this picture will not only become one of the most popular, but will occasion a revolution in art.' 'I wish,' said the king, 'I had known all this before, for the objection has been the means of Lord Grosvenor's getting the picture; but you shall make a copy for me.'"

2290. PEALE'S WASHINGTON.

"When I was a schoolboy," says Rembrandt Peale, "I knew no other who was born on the birthday of Washington, and it was this childish motive which impelled me to seek every occasion of seeing him. This was necessarily followed by the greatest veneration for his character, as well as his sublime aspect.

"My post had been behind my father's chair when he painted him in 1786. I was the bearer of every message from my father to him. I met him every Sunday, as he went to church; crossed the street, returned, and met him again, to glance at his countenance; and when he, sometimes, putting his hand on my head, asked me, 'How is your good father?' I loved him the more. At public parades, I studied him in military guise, and afterwards saw him when he resigned his seat to Adams. It will not be difficult, therefore, to believe that I longed for no honor greater than to paint his portrait. This privilege he granted me in September, 1795, by giving three sittings, of three hours each.

"Young in the world, and inexperienced in conversation, I induced my father to begin also a portrait, alongside of me, keeping him in familiar conversation. From this study I executed ten copies in Charleston, South Carolina, where I spent the winter in professional business."

Some thirty-five years afterwards, as Peale meditated a visit to the galleries of Europe, and a final residence in London, he says, "The image of Washington once more rose to engrass my mind. I determined on another attempt, not to seek approbation here, but to gratify my own heart. I knew that in Europe his character was justly appreciated, and I wished to take with me, if possible, a good likeness. I therefore assembled in my painting-room every portrait, bust, medallion, and print of Washington I could find — thus to excite and resuscitate my memory.

"My wife, who had always objected to these absorbing studies, now entreated me that I would disturb my spirit no more with Washington, saying that she thought him my evil genius, and, with tears on her cheeks, wished that he had never been born. I promised her to make but this one trial, but it was an illusive promise, for it lasted but three months, to the exclusion of all other thoughts.

"My father, too, was grieved at my infatuation and waste of time, saying that I ought to be satisfied with what had already been done. That could not be; and I wrought at my task with increasing assiduity, till one day my father entered, and clapping me on the shoulder, exclaimed, 'You have it now; this is indeed Washington!'

"His approbation increased my excitement, and I consumed the day in retouches from my own original, as if Washington had just left me. It was the fever, and I feared the fatal madness, of memory; but the next day, with a tranquil pulse and cool forehead, I looked on my work, and was satisfied I had not destroyed it. My father brought Judges Tilghman and Peters to see it, and they sent others, so that during five days my room was crowded with persons that knew Washington.

"Instead of going to England, I hastened with my picture to Washington city, Congress being then in session, hoping that Chief Justice Marshall, the friend and biographer of Washington, might also be satisfied with it. It was put up in the vice president's chamber.

"Judge Marshall recommended to me to procure the written testimonials of the friends of Washington, as a duty they owed to their country, and himself gave the example. I therefore obtained from Judges Washington, Tilghman, and Peters, Bishop White, and other contemporaries, letters repeating such expressions of their approbation as had previously been made public. 'These letters I shall deposit in the library of Congress.

"The sittings Washington had given me were from seven to ten in the morning. He shaved himself, but at or after ten the barber dressed his hair in the formal, wig-like fashion usual in his other portraits of that period. Mine, therefore, represents him with his hair somewhat in dishabille, and shows, by the whisker on his cheek, the dark brown color of his hair.

"This portrait I afterwards took to Europe, and it afforded me the privilege of inviting to my painting-room the most distinguished persons. In Florence it was exhibited in the Royal Academy. At a later period, a special committee of the United States Senate recommended the purchase of this picture, which I parted with for two thousand dollars."

2291. THE CHANDOS PORTRAIT OF SHAKESPEARE.

This far-famed picture was bought at the sale at Stowe, in the autumn of 1848, by the Earl of Ellesmere, for three hundred and fifty-five guineas; and it will form, it is said, the gem of the Shakespeare Closet, in the new Bridgewater House.

Its history, as stated in the Athenæum, is shortly this: "The Duke of Chandos obtained it by marriage with the daughter and heiress of a Mr. Nicholl, of Minchenden House, Southease. Mr. Nicholl obtained it from a Mr. Robert Keck, of the Inner Temple, who gave (the first and best) Mrs. Barry, the actress, as Oldys tells us, forty guineas for it. Mrs. Barry had it from Betterton, and Betterton had it from Sir William Davenant, who was a professed admirer of Shakespeare, and not unwilling to be thought his son. Davenant was born in 1605, and died in 1668; and Betterton (as every reader of Pepys will recollect) was the great actor, belonging to the Duke's Theatre, of which Davenant was the patentee. The elder brother of Davenant (Parson Robert) had been heard to relate, as Aubrey informs us, that Shakespeare had often kissed Sir William when a boy.

"Davenant lived quite near enough to Shakespeare's time to have obtained a genuine portrait of the poet whom he admired—in an age, too, when the Shakespeare mania was not so strong as it is now. There is no doubt that this was the portrait which Davenant believed to be like Shakespeare, and which Kneller, before 1692, copied and presented to glorious John Dryden, who repaid the painter with one of the best of his admirable epistles.

"The Chandos Shakespeare is a small portrait on canvas, twenty-two inches long by eighteen broad. The face is thoughtful, the eyes are expressive, and the hair is of a brown black. The dress is black, with a white turn-over collar, the strings of which are loose. There is a small gold ring in the left ear. We have had an opportunity of inspecting it both before and after the sale, and in the very best light, and have no hesitation in saying that the copies we have seen of it are very far from like.

"It agrees in many respects—the short nose especially—with the Stratford bust, and is not more unlike the engraving before the first folio—or the Gerard Johnson bust on the Stratford monument—than Raeburn's Sir Walter Scott is unlike Sir Thomas Lawrence's, or West's Lord Byron unlike the better known portrait by Phillips. It has evidently been touched upon; the yellow oval that surrounds it has a look of Kneller's age."

The opinion of the writer in the Athenæum is, that the Chandos picture is not the original for which Shakespeare sat, but a copy made for Sir William Davenant from some known and acknowledged portrait of the poet.

2292. A NATIONAL PAINTING.

The great Earl of Nottingham, whose defeat of the Armada established the throne of his mistress, employed Cornelius Vroom, a native of Haarlem, to draw the designs of his successive victories over the Spaniards, and the whole was wrought in tapestry by Francis Spiering. It is a noble and national work. It is divided into ten battles, and contains the portraits of twenty-seven naval commanders.

These portraits have the air of real likenesses; indeed, as the tapestry was wrought while the original persons were living, the artist could not well indulge in imaginary features. The painter had for his drawing one hundred pieces of gold; the arras cost ten pounds one shilling per ell—a high price; and as it measures seven hundred and eight ells, the whole amounted to upwards of seven thousand pounds. This was a work worthy of the noble house of Howard. James I. repaid the money to the earl, and the crown became proprietor of the work; and the Puritan commonwealth placed it (where it still remains) in the House of Lords, then used by the Commons as a committee room.

2293. LORENZO LIPPI'S FLIGHT INTO EGYPT.

Lorenzo Lippi's Flight into Egypt owes to the good-natured assistance of Rosa's pencil that it was ever finished, to contribute to the fame of its author. It happened that Salvatore Rosa, in one of those fits of idleness to which even his strenuous spirit was occasionally liable, flung down his pencil, and sallied forth to communicate the infection of his far niente to his friend Lippi.

On entering his studio, however, he found him laboring with great impetuosity on the background of this picture; but in such sullen vehemence, or in such evident ill humor, that Salvator demanded, "Che far, amico?" "What am I about?" said Lippi: "I am going mad with vexation. Here is one of my best pictures ruined. I am under a spell, and cannot even draw the branch of a tree, nor a tuft of herbage."

"Signore Dio!" exclaimed Rosa, twisting the palette off his friend's thumb, "what colors are here?" and scraping them off, and gently pushing away Lippi, he took his place, murmuring, "Let me see! Who knows but what I may help you out of the scrape?"

Half in jest, and half in earnest, he began to touch, and retouch, and change, till nightfall found him at the easel finishing one of the best background landscapes he ever painted. All Florence came the next day to look at this chef-d'œuvre, and the first artists of the age took it as a study.

2204. SINGULAR FATE OF CORREGGIO'S ADORATION OF THE SHEPHERDS.

A few days before the French's entrance into Seville, during the peninsular war, when the inhabitants, in great consternation, were packing up their most valuable effects to send them to Cadiz, a masterpiece of Correggio, representing the Adoration of the Shepherds, which was painted on wood, and which the proprietors, who were the monks of Seville, wished to preserve safe from the hands of the enemy, was sawed in two for its more easy carriage. By one of those accidents which will occur in the most regular times, and which are still more excusable in times of great confusion, the two parts of Correggio were separated on their way to Cadiz; and on their arrival in that city, part was sold to one connoisseur, with the promise that the part wanting should be subsequently delivered to him, while the other part was sold to another connoisseur, under the same engagement. Both the parts arrived in England, and the possessor of each maintained that he was entitled to the other's lot.

It is somewhat remarkable that the harmony of the composition is unquestionably broken by the separation of the parts, yet that each part forms of itself an admirable picture; and as the rival proprietors are rich and obstinate, (1825,) the parts are not likely to be united. The whole picture is reckoned to be worth four thousand guineas.

Allston's great picture has been the subject of no little misunderstanding. It was unfortunate that such vague and almost boundless expectations in regard to it should have been excited in the public mind. His injudicious friends whispered about that he was engaged upon a stupendous work, and it was not long before a mysterious interest became attached to the rumor.

Years passed, and the picture did not make its appearance. Meantime a few individuals had been favored with a glimpse of the design. The subject was known to be Belshazzar's Feast. Delay only quickened curiosity and inflamed expectation. At length it was said that the canvas was rolled up, and the great work abandoned.

Two reasons have been assigned for this—one, that an execution had been levied upon the work, in consequence of which the artist had resigned it in disgust; the other, that the great idea of the picture—that of making the light all radiate from the hand writing on the wall—had been anticipated by Martin.

In 1831, Allston says, in a letter to McMurtie, "I have but a few weeks since been established in my new painting-room, which I have built in this place, (Cambridgeport.) Belshazzar has been rolled up and reposing in a packing case for more than three years, in consequence of my former large room in Boston passing into the hands of a new owner, who has converted it into a livery stable. . . . Belshazzar will still remain some time in his case; some embarrassing debts, and my immediate necessities, being the cause. I must be free in mind before I can finish. I trust, however, that the time will not be very long."

In another letter he thus speaks of it: "I could long ago have finished this, and other pictures as large, had my mind been free; for, indeed, I have already bestowed upon it as much mental and manual labor as, under another state of mind, would have completed several such pictures. But to go into the subject of all the obstacles and the hindrances upon my spirit would hardly be consistent with delicacy and self-respect. Nor could I be far enough understood, if I should do it, to answer by it any essential purpose. Those feelings which are most intimately blended with one's nature, and which most powerfully and continuously influence us, are the very feelings most difficult to give any distinct apprehension of to another."

It is well known that not until a few months before his death did Allston resume the work. He then erased several figures, altered his plan, and in the midst of these changes forever ceased from his labors. It remains a great fragment. His power and style are, however, clearly evident. To the artist it will ever be an object of veneration, for it bears the last touches of the great pencil. It has secured to Allston an immortality which would have satisfied even Napoleon himself. Allston was indeed one of the first stars in a bright constellation of American geniuses.

2206. THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S CORREGGIO.

Allan Cunningham warms into rapture in speaking of this wondrous picture, captured by Wellington at Vittoria. "The size is small, some fifteen inches square, or so; but true genius can work miracles in little compass. The central light of the picture is altogether heavenly; we never saw any thing so insufferably brilliant; it haunted us round the room at Apsley House, and fairly extinguished the light of its companion pictures."

2207. LEONARDO DA VINCI'S LAST SUPPER.

In the school of Milan, no great progress was made previous to the time of Leonardo da Vinci, who opened an academy there, under the patronage of the government, in the year 1494. Da Vinci was at once a poet, painter, engineer, and architect, and in each of these lines attained a considerable degree of proficiency. His treatise on painting presents a highly interesting series of remarks on the art. Twelve manuscript volumes of his observations, preserved in the Ambrosian Library, at Milan, were seized by the French, but only three of them reached Paris; and when the works of art were restored to Italy, at the peace, only one of these volumes, and that the least interesting, found its way back to Milan.

One of the qualities of Da Vinci, that should be noticed, was the rare property of being able to ascertain the just medium between a too hasty work and a too labored one; and we observe that, though very minute in his attentions to the finishing of his picture, he yet painted in a great style, free and unrestrained. The same master, who is said to have consumed four years in the portrait of the beautiful Lisa, or La Gioconda, was able to give one of the earliest and best lessons to the age, in the great style, by his memorable painting of the Last Supper. This power of attending at the same moment to the minutiae of detail, and to the grand and leading principles of the art or science in which a person may be employed, shows a species of universality of power, that may be reckoned among the highest perfections of the human mind, and places Da Vinci not merely in the rank of the first of painters, but of the greatest of men.

The Gioconda was purchased by Francis I., at the enormous price of four thousand crowns, being a sum equivalent to forty-five thousand francs in money of this day; and it is still to be seen in the gallery of the Louvre.

The Last Supper, as it is commonly called, was the chief work of this master. It was painted in the refectory of S. M. delle Grazie, at Milan, and its possession was considered as one of the proudest boasts of that city.

While forming the plan of his composition, Da Vinci meditated profoundly on the subject; and, having prepared himself by long study, and, above all, by a close examination of nature, began the execution by repeated sketches, both of the whole design and of all its individual parts. He used to frequent the accustomed haunts of persons resembling, by their character and habits, those whom he was about to introduce in his picture; and as often as he met with any attitude, group, or feature, which suited his purpose, he sketched it in the tablets which he always carried about with him. Having nearly finished the other apostles in this way, in his picture of the Last Supper he had left the head of Judas untouched, as, for a long time, he could find no physiognomy which satisfied him, or came up to the ideas he had formed of transcendent villany and treachery.

The prior of the Dominican convent, in the refectory or dining-room of which the painting was, grew impatient at being so long incommoded in that essential branch of monastic discipline which was carried on in this apartment, and complained to the grand duke, who called on the artist to explain the delay. He said he worked at it two whole hours every day. The pious head of the house renewed his representations with very honest zeal, and alleged that Leonardo had only one head to finish, and that, so far from working two hours a day, he had not been near the place for almost twelve months. Again summoned before the prince, the painter thus defended himself:—

"It is true I have not entered the convent for a long time; but it is no less true that I have been employed every day, at least two hours, upon the picture. The head of Judas remains to do; and, in order to give it a physiognomy suitable to the excessive wickedness of the character, I have for more than a year past been daily frequenting the Borghetto, morning and evening, where the lowest refuse of the capital live; but I have not yet found the features I am in quest of. These once found, the picture is finished in a day. If, however," he added, "I am still unsuccessful in my search, I shall rest satisfied with the face of the prior himself, which would suit my purpose extremely well; only that I have for a long time been hesitating about taking such a liberty with him in his own convent." It is hardly necessary to add, that the grand duke was perfectly satisfied; and the artist, happening soon after to meet with his Judas, finished his grand work.

The picture of the Last Supper, thus completed, and the object of unbounded and universal admiration, has, unhappily, been, of all great pictures, by far the shortest lived. Every thing unfortunate in the materials and position has been combined in a number of untoward accidents, and some still more fatal acts of premeditated mischief, to destroy long ago all the traces of the master hand.

The first misfortune was, that it should have been painted in oil, instead of fresco—a kind of work ill suited to the slow, retouching hand and most fastidious taste of Leonardo, who was glad, on this account, to take advantage of the then recent invention of body colors. A miserable fresco at the other end of the refectory, painted in the same age, still tantalizes the observer by the freshness of its tints, while the masterpiece of Leonardo, perhaps of the art, has been gone for ages.

It is further said that he used oil too much refined, and of too thin a consistency. It is certain, too, that the plaster on which he worked had some defect, which made it scale off in a few years. Then the convent is situated in a damp place, and the refectory is in the lowest part of the building; so that at all times when there is an inundation in the Milanese, the room is filled with water.

From all these causes this picture retained its original beauties only for a few years. It was finished in 1498; in 1540 it was half effaced; and ten years later, the outlines only remained, the colors being entirely gone. A century after this, the venerable fathers whose lot it was to occupy the same room with it during a very interesting portion of the day, observing (with their wonted sagacity) that the straight line which joined their table and the kitchen passed through the centre of the picture, and by no means through the door, and aware, from instinctive science, that the straight line between these two points was the shortest, thought proper to cut through the wall, and thus destroyed a part of the principal figure, and the two figures next it. With a tenderness for their sovereign almost equal to their zeal for their own clerical duties, they next nailed a great escutcheon of the emperor upon the middle of the wall, so as to reach the heads of the group.

But the tender mercies of those reverend personages have been still more fatal to this masterpiece, and have finished the destruction which their negligence began. In 1726, they employed an artist who pretended to have a secret for reviving lost colors; and allowed him to work upon the Supper under an awning which concealed his operations. This dauber, whose name was Bellotti, painted the whole picture over again, with the exception of a portion of the sky as seen through the window, the original color of which remained nearly entire. Finally, its destruction was completed in 1770, by one Mazza, who actually scraped off most of the few outlines which remained of the original, and had inserted heads of his own in all the figures but three, when he was stopped by a change in the convent, and a new prior succeeding.

In 1796, Bonaparte, out of respect for the place, rather than that it signified much what now became of the picture, signed an order there, before he remounted his horse, prohibiting any military use being made of the apartment; but soon after, one of his generals broke down the doors, and made a stable of it. The dragoons, as might be expected, amused themselves with throwing stones at the heads, being told they were meant to represent the apostles. The refectory was then used for some years as a magazine of forage; and when at length permission was given to wall up the door, in order to prevent further dilapidations, so little was it attended to, that, in 1800, a flood having covered the floor a foot deep with water, it was suffered to remain until it dried by evaporation.

Such is the history, and so complete the destruction, of this celebrated picture; and thus entirely from tradition, and through the medium of copies and engravings, do we derive all the knowledge of its merits which we can now obtain. Happily, those copies are numerous, and some of them by contemporary artists of note, who studied the original in the days of its greatest preservation.

2298. ANGELO'S SELF-RESPECT.

Michael Angelo's disinterestedness did not make him neglect the honor of his art, which he would not sacrifice even to his friends. Signor Doni, one of his most intimate friends, wished to have a picture painted by him. Michael Angelo painted a picture for him, and sent it to him, with a receipt for seventy crowns. Doni returned him word that he thought forty crowns was sufficient for the picture. The painter gave him to understand that he now asked one hundred crowns. Doni informed him that he would now give him seventy crowns. Michael Angelo sent him for answer that he must either return him the picture or send him one hundred and forty crowns. Doni kept the picture, and paid the money.

2299. SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

"What do you ask for this sketch?" said Sir Joshua Reynolds to an old picture dealer, whose portfolio he was looking over. "Twenty guineas, your honor." "Twenty pence I suppose you mean." "No, sir: it is true I would have taken twenty pence for it this morning; but if you think it worth looking at, all the world will think it worth buying." "Sir Joshua ordered him to send the sketch home, and gave him his price.

2300. PORTER'S PANORAMA.

Mr. (subsequently Sir) Robert Kerr Porter, at the age of nineteen, produced a performance at once inconceivable and unparalleled—the panorama of the Storming and Capture of Seringapatam. It was not the very first thing of its kind, because there had been a panorama of London exhibited in Leicester Fields by Mr. Barker; but it was the very first thing of its kind if artist-like attainments be considered.

"The learned," says Dr. Dibdin, "were amazed, and the unlearned were enraptured. I can never forget its impression upon my own mind. It was a thing dropped from the clouds; all fire, energy, intelligence, and animation. You looked a second time; the figures moved and were commingled in hot and bloody fight. You saw the flash of the cannon, the glitter of the bayonet, the gleam of the falchion. You longed to be leaping from crag to crag with Sir David Baird, who is hallooing the men on to victory.' Then again you seemed to be listening to the groans of the wounded and the dying; and more than one female was carried out swooning.

"The Oriental dress, the jewelled turban, the curved and ponderous cimier, — these were among the prime objects of favoritism with Sir Robert's pencil; and he touched and treated them to the very spirit and letter of the truth. The coloring, too, was good and sound throughout. The accessories were strikingly characteristic; rock, earth, and water had its peculiar and happy touch; and the accompaniments about the Sallyport, half choked up with the bodies of the dead, made you look on with a shuddering awe, and retreat as you shuddered. The public poured in by hundreds and by thousands for even a transient gaze; for such a sight was altogether as marvellous as it was novel. You carried it home, and did nothing but think of it, talk of it, and dream of it. And all this by a young man of nineteen."

Miss Jane Porter, Sir Robert's sister, wrote for Dr. Dibdin a very interesting narrative of this extraordinary work.

"It was two hundred and odd feet long," says Miss Porter; "the proportioned height I have now forgotten. But I remember, when I first saw the vast expanse of vacant canvas stretched along, or rather in a semicircle, against the wall of the great room in the Lyceum, where he painted it, I was terrified at the daring of his undertaking. I could not conceive that he could cover that immense space with the subject he intended under a year's time, at least; but — and it is indeed marvellous — he did it in six weeks! But he worked on it every day, except Sundays, during those weeks, from sunrise until dark. It was finished during the time the committees of the Royal Academy were sitting at Somerset House, respecting the hanging of the pictures there for that year's exhibition; therefore it must have been towards the latter end of April. No artist had seen the painting of Seringapatam during its progress; but when it was completed, my brother invited his revered old friend, Mr. West, (the then president of the Royal Academy,) to come and look at the picture, and give him his opinion of it, ere it should be opened to the public view. . . .

"Mr. West went over from the Lyceum, on the morning on which he had called to see my brother and his finished painting, to Somerset House, where the committee had been awaiting his presence above an hour. 'What has detained our president so long?' inquired Sir Thomas Lawrence of him, on his entrance. 'A wonder!' returned he; 'a wonder of the world!—I never saw any thing like it!—a picture of two hundred feet dimensions, painted by that boy Kerr Porter, in six weeks! and as admirably done as it could have been by the best historical painter amongst us in as many months!' You, my dear sir, need no description of this picture; you saw it; and at the time of its exhibition you also must have heard of, and probably also saw, some of the affecting effects the truth of its pictorial war tale had on many of the female spectators.

"After its exhibition closed, it was deposited, packed upon a roller, in a friend's warehouse. Thence some circumstances caused it to be removed successively to other places of supposed similar security, but in one of which, I believe, it finally perished, by the accidental burning down of the premises. The original sketches of this 'noble and stupendous effort of art,' as you so truly call it, are now in my own possession; and you may believe I value them as the apple of my eye. I must not forget to mention, with regard to Seringapatam, that had our British government, at the time of my brother's ardor for these paintings, possessed a building large enough for the purpose, he would have presented his country with that picture, and three others on British historical subjects, to form a perpetual exhibition for the benefit of its military and naval hospitals. Mr. Pitt lamented to him the impossibility then of commanding such a building: so the project fell to the ground.

"The last of these intended four pictures was that of the Battle of Agincourt, which my brother afterwards presented to the city of London, where it was hung up in the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion House. Some alterations in the room occasioned its being taken down for a temporary purpose; but it never saw the light again until last year, when, after above a dozen years' oblivion in,—nobody knew where,—it was accidentally found in one of the vaulted chambers under Guildhall.

"When discentombed, it was hastily spread out against one of the walls of the great hall itself, and announced in the newspapers as 'a picture of unknown antiquity, of some also unknown, but evidently distinguished, artist; and most probably it had been deposited in those vaults for security, at the great fire of London, and has remained there, unsuspected, ever since.' The hall was thronged, day after day, to see it, and Sir Martin Shee told me that so great was the mysterious valuation the discovery had put on it, that he heard he had been quoted as having passed his opinion on it, that 'it was a picture worth fifteen thousand pounds.' Without proper safeguards behind the canvas, a long exposure on the wall would have injured the picture; and it was taken down again before I came to London, after having heard of the discovery of the Agincourt; for I immediately recognized what, and whose, the picture was, and hastened to inform the present gentlemen of the city corporation accordingly."

Such is the affectionate narrative from the pen of the youthful painter's sister.

2301. THE PAINTINGS OF THE GREAT MASTERS.

While the great masters were living, some of their best works brought less than the cost of the frames in which they are now preserved. Andrea del Sarto painted one of his great frescoes for the monks of the Church of the Annunziata, at Florence, for a sack of corn! An Italian prince commissioned a picture of him just before he died, and besought him to execute it, and name his price. But it was too late; and when the news of his death went through Italy, his pictures could not be commanded at any price, for the master could paint no more.

2302. DUCHESS OF KINGSTON AND THE RUSSIAN COUNT.

The Duchess of Kingston was very anxious to be received by some crowned head, as the only means of relief from the disgrace fixed upon her by her trial and conviction. The court of Russia was chosen, when pictures were sent as presents, not only to the sovereign, but also to the most powerful of the nobles. Count Chernicheff was regarded by the duchess as an exalted character, and to him she ought, in policy, to pay her particular devoirs. She accordingly sent him two pictures. The duchess was no judge of paintings, and a total stranger to the value of these pieces, which were originals by Raphael and Claude Lorraine. The count was soon apprised of this, and on the arrival of the duchess at St. Petersburg, he waited on her grace, and confessed his gratitude for the present, at the same time assuring the duchess, that "the pictures were estimated at a value in Russian money equal to ten thousand pounds sterling."

The duchess, who, the moment before, looked with a most complacent smile, and whose avarice was at least equal to her ambition, instantly changed color, and could with the utmost difficulty conceal her chagrin. She told the count she had other pictures, which she would consider it an honor if he would accept; that the two paintings in his possession were particularly the favorites of her departed lord; but that the count was extremely kind in permitting them to occupy a place in his palace until her mansion was properly prepared. This palpable hint did not answer, and the count retained the pictures, which are now (1825) at St. Petersburg.

2303. ALLSTON'S DEATH.

Never, we are told, was Allston's language more significant, clear, and spiritual, than on the night of his death. This event was very unexpected. He had painted all day, and with unusual cheerfulness talked away the evening with his kindred. At a late hour he complained of a pain in his breast, to which he had occasionally been subject. His wife, a sister to Dana, the poet, left the room to bring some remedy which had proved serviceable on former occasions. When she returned, he was leaning back in his chair, apparently in a doze. She touched his shoulders; his eyes opened with a calm, sweet expression, and closed again; he sighed gently, and ceased to breathe. Thus was softly loosened the tie that bound that gifted and pure spirit to mortal life. He passed away in the full activity and consciousness of his powers, without any struggle or decay.

The death of Allston gave an immediate value to his works, which they had never had before; and those who have since sought for his pictures could not get them at any price. Five thousand dollars one gentleman was willing to give for the Rosalie, but the owner would not let it go: it was painted in seven hours.

2304. PATRONAGE OF ARTS.

To suffer from the want of discernment on the part of the nobility and the people appears to be the fate of artists in England. It was not a whit better formerly than it is in our own time. Hogarth had to sell his pictures by raffle, and Wilson was obliged to retire into Wales from its affording cheaper living. The committee of the British Institution purchased a picture by Gainsborough for eleven hundred guineas, and presented it to the National Gallery, as an example of excellence; yet this very picture hung for years in the artist's painting-room without a purchaser: the price was only fifty pounds. "In our own times," says John Burnet "let us take the case of Sir David Wilkie as an example; a painter who has founded a school of art unknown before in this or in any other country—a combination of the invention of Hogarth with the pictorial excellences of Ostade and Teniers; yet this artist's works, on his coming to London in 1804, were exposed in a shop window at Charing Cross for a few pounds; and a work for which he could only receive fifteen guineas was sold, the other day, for eight hundred. Do transactions such as these show the taste or discernment of the public? Lord Mansfield thought thirty pounds a large sum for the Village Politicians; and Sir George Beaumont, as a kind of patronage, gave Wilkie a commission to paint the picture of the Blind Fiddler, and paid him fifty guineas for what would now bring a thousand at a public sale. It seems, therefore, a fair inference that a discerning public, or a patronizing nobility, are only shown when an artist's reputation makes it safe to encourage him."

2305. CORREGGIO'S MULETEER.

A picture of a muleteer was drawn by Correggio, and served a great while as a sign to a little public house by the roadside. It has all the marks, in the upper corner, of its having been doubled in for that purpose. The man who kept the house had been a muleteer, and had on some occasion obliged Correggio a good deal on the road. He set him up, and painted his sign for him. The persons who were sent into Italy to collect pictures for the regent met with this sign, and bought it of the innkeeper. It cost five hundred guineas.

2306. RUBENS'S CHAPEAU DE PAILLE.

This exquisite picture is the gem of Sir Robert Peel's fine collection. Its transparency and brilliancy are unrivalled: it is all but life itself. It was bought by Sir Robert Peel for three thousand five hundred guineas.

The name of "Chapeau de Paille," as applied to this picture, appears to be a misnomer. The portrait is in what is strangely termed a Spanish hat. Why it has become the fashion in this country to designate every slouched hat with a feather a Spanish hat, it is hard to say; since, at the period that such hats were worn. (about the reign of Charles I. in England,) they were not more peculiar to Spain than to other European countries. Rubens himself wore a hat of this description; and it is related that his mistress having placed his hat upon her own head, he borrowed from this circumstance the celebrated picture in question. With respect to the misnomer, it has been conjectured that Span'sh hut, being somewhat similar in sound to Span hut, Flemish for straw hat, first led to the incongruous title Chapeau de Paille. Now, Span hut, the Flemish name of this work, does not mean a straw hat, but a wide-brimmed hat; and further, whoever has had the good fortune to see the picture must be aware that the woman is there represented not in a straw (paille) hat, but a black hat. The French title, "Chapeau de Paille," is, therefore, and we think with reason, supposed to be but a corruption of Chapeau de Poil, (nap, or beaver,) its real designation.

2307. STREATHAM GALLERY.

The following is a list of the prices which the Streatham collection of portraits, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, brought at auction in May, 1816:—

Lord Lyttleton, - - - -	43	1	0
Mrs. Piozzi, - - - -	81	18	0
Goldsmith, - - - -	133	7	0
Sir J. Reynolds, - - - -	128	2	0
Sir R. Chambers, - - - -	84	0	0
David Garrick, - - - -	183	15	0
Baretti, - - - -	31	10	0
Dr. Burney, - - - -	84	0	0
Dr. Johnson, - - - -	378	0	0

Dr. Johnson's — infinitely the finest of these portraits as a work of art, and second not even to Mr. Burke's as a work of national interest — passed, at Mr. Watson Taylor's sale, into the hands of Sir Robert Peel.

2308. W. VANDEVELDE.

William Vandeveldel the younger is distinguished as a most eminent painter of sea pieces. Having finished a painting for Charles II. of the junction of the English and French fleets at the Nore, when that monarch went to view them, two commissioners of the admiralty agreed to beg the picture of the king, then to cut it in two, and each to take a part. The painter, in whose presence they concluded this wise treaty, took away the picture, and concealed it until the king's death, when he offered it to Bullfinch, the print seller, for eighty pounds. Bullfinch took time to consider, and, returning to make the purchase, found the picture already sold for one hundred and thirty guineas.

§ 227. POWERFUL EFFECTS OF THE PENCIL.

2309. PARRHASIUS AND ZEUXIS.

Parrhasius of Ephesus and Zeuxis were contemporary painters. These artists once contended for preëminence in their profession, (415 B. C. ;) and when they exhibited their respective pieces, the birds came to peck the grapes which Zeuxis had painted. Parrhasius then produced his piece, and Zeuxis said, "Remove the curtain, that we may see the painting." The curtain itself was the painting, and Zeuxis acknowledged himself conquered, exclaiming, "Zeuxis has deceived the birds; Parrhasius has deceived Zeuxis!" Parrhasius dressed in a purple robe, and wore a crown of gold, calling himself king of painters.

2310. FILIPPO LIPPI.

In the life of Filippo Lippi, the Florentine painter, we have a memorable proof how much it is in the power of painting to charm the most barbarous minds, and to soften hearts the most hardened. Lippi and some friends happened one day to be making an excursion in a small boat along the sea-coast, when they were surprised by a Moorish brigantine, and taken prisoners into Barbary. After they had been eighteen months in a state of most cruel slavery, Lippi one day took a piece of coal, and drew on a wall a portrait of the master he served. The likeness was so strong, that it struck the barbarian, who had never seen any thing of the kind before, with astonishment and delight. He requested Filippo to draw some other portraits for him, and was, in the end, so pleased, that he not only gave him his liberty, but procured him a safe conveyance to Naples.

2311. INSANITY PREDICTED BY A PORTRAIT.

Lord Mulgrave employed Stuart to paint his brother, General Phipps, who was going out to India. When the picture was done, and the general had sailed, the earl came for the piece. "This picture looks strange, sir," said the nobleman. "How is it? I see—I think I see insanity in that face." "It may be so," replied Stuart, "but I painted your brother as I saw him." The first account Lord Mulgrave had from his brother was, that his insanity, unknown and unapprehended by his friends, had driven him to suicide!

2312. M. DE LASSON'S CARICATURE.

A Norman priest, who lived in the middle of the seventeenth century, named the Abbé Malotru, was remarkably deformed in his figure, and ridiculous in his dress.

One day, while he was performing mass, he observed a smile of contempt on the face of M. de Lassel, which irritated him so much, that the moment the service was over, he instituted a process against him.

Lassel possessed the talent of caricature drawing: he sketched a figure of the ill-made priest, accoutred, as he used to be, in half a dozen black caps, over one another, nine waistcoats, and as many pair of breeches. When the court before whom he was cited urged him to produce his defence, he suddenly exhibited his Abbé Malotru, and the irresistible laughter which it occasioned insured his acquittal.

2313. THE ARTIST AND THE INDIAN.

One of the artists attached to the Picture Gallery newspaper went over to Hoboken to sketch the group of Iowa Indians encamped there. Whilst engaged in the occupation, an Indian crept stealthily behind him, and for some time regarded his drawing in silence. At length he uttered a shrill whoop, snatched the sketch from the artist's hand, and rushed with it into the centre of the group of savages, and exhibited it to the chiefs. They examined it with a good deal of interest, and one of them finally stepped out from the group, held it up before the assembled multitude, and tore it into pieces. The artist, finding that his labors gave offence, did not, of course, attempt to renew them.

2314. A TRIUMPH OF PAINTING.

The anecdotes of the dog which menaced a goat, depicted by the faithful pencil of Glover, and of the macaw, which, with beak and wings, attacked the portrait of a female servant, painted by Northcote, are well known.

Two family portraits, painted by Mr. J. P. Knight, were one day sent home, when they were instantly recognized with great joy by a spaniel which had been a favorite with the originals. On being taken into the room, and perceiving the canvas thus stamped with identity even to illusion, the faithful dog endeavored, by every demonstration of affection, to attract the notice of her former friends, and was with difficulty withheld by one of the bystanders from leaping upon them, and overwhelming them with her caresses.

This interesting recognition continued for many minutes, and was repeated on the next and following days; until finding, doubtless, that the scent was wanting, poor "Flossy" slunk away abashed, in evident mortification that her well-known playfellows were so regardless of her proffered kindness. Yet, turning upon them both alternately many a wistful look, she seemed unwilling to be convinced, even by experience, that she had thus mistaken the shadow for the substance.

2315. A SIMILAR TRIUMPH.

The family of Mr. Sherman, of Canton, in Massachusetts, with a few neighbors and friends, were being amused one evening, by Mr. Sherman, in viewing certain paintings on glass, which he was exhibiting by means of a large magic lantern. Among the objects represented were squirrels, rabbits, and other animals, to which Tray had the usual unconquerable aversion of his fellows. When these were represented, the dog would fly at them with as much fierceness as if they had been realities; and it was with difficulty that he was withheld from injuring the cloth on which the objects were reflected.

2316. FORCE OF IMAGINATION.

It is asserted by Pomphilius Quintius, in his history of Grecian geniuses, that Maximilian Polonius, the celebrated Athenian painter, portrayed events so vividly that it was impossible for a landsman to look at the famous group, the Sea Sick Family, without vomiting instantly.

2317. PARMEGIANO AND THE SOLDIERS.

While Parmegiano was engaged on one of his largest works, the memorable sack of Rome, which occurred in 1527, an anecdote is recorded of him, similar to that which is related of Protogenes, the Greek painter, during the siege of Rhodes by Demetrius. In consequence of his fixed attention to this work, he neither heard the roaring of the cannon, nor perceived the tumult of the assault, till some soldiers rushed into his apartment, and surprised him in the midst of his labors.

Fortunately, the chief of the troop who entered his room was a man of taste, and being much struck with his compositions, checked the rapacity of his followers, and exacted from the painter only some sketches in pen and ink, with which he was highly gratified.

Another party, more regardless of the arts, insisting on money, he went out to borrow some of a friend, when he was seized by a third troop, by whom he was imprisoned until he had found means to satisfy their demands.

2318. RIGO AND THE NUBIANS.

Rigo, the painter, who was among the men of science and art who accompanied the French expedition into Egypt, fell in at Cairo with a caravan from Nubia. As the trader of the caravan had a countenance which displayed the national features in a very striking manner, Rigo resolved to paint his portrait, but was obliged to give him a considerable sum of money before he could induce him to comply with his wish. At first the Nubian seemed content with the picture; but as soon as the colors were laid on, he uttered a loud cry of horror, and all endeavors to appease him were fruitless. He escaped to his home, where he related, that his head and half of his body had been taken away by the painter.

Some days after, Rigo led another Nubian into his workshop, who was no less struck with horror at seeing the picture than the man whom it represented had been, and told all his countrymen, that he had seen a great number of lopped-off heads and limbs in the Frenchman's house. They laughed at him: however, to satisfy themselves about the matter, six of them went to visit Rigo. They were seized with the same panic at the sight of his paintings, and no entreaties could prevail upon them to remain in the house.

2319. ALEXANDER. PORTIA.

The effects of the pencil are sometimes wonderful. It is said that Alexander trembled and grew pale on seeing a picture of Palamedes betrayed to death by his friends. It doubtless brought to his mind a stinging remembrance of his treatment of Aristonius.

Portia could bear with an unshaken constancy her last separation from Brutus; but when she saw, some hours after, a picture of the parting of Hector and Andromache, she burst into a flood of tears. Full as seemed her cup of sorrow, the painter suggested new ideas of grief, or impressed more strongly her own.

2320. CURIOUS AND BEAUTIFUL INCIDENTS.

Over the pulpit, in the chapel at West Point, as some of our readers may perhaps have remarked, stands a fine allegorical picture from the true-to-life pencil of Weir. A part of it represents Peace, as a female figure, holding an olive branch in her hand.

During the performance of divine service, one or two Sundays ago, a small bird flew into the church, and made several attempts to alight on the branch. A better criticism upon the fidelity of the artist's representation of air and foliage could scarce be imagined. The same compliment, as our readers will remember, was paid by a bird to Apelles, some three thousand years ago.

2321. HAPPY EFFECT OF A PAINTING.

An Athenian courtesan, in the midst of a riotous banquet with her lovers, accidentally cast her eye on the portrait of a philosopher that hung opposite to her seat; the happy character of temperance and virtue struck her with so lively an image of her own unworthiness, that she instantly quitted the room, and, retiring home, became ever after an example of temperance, as she had been before of debauchery.

§ 228. WONDERS AND CURIOSITIES OF PAINTING.

2322. JOHN MARTIN ON GLASS PAINTING.

Several years since, when John Martin, the historical painter, was examined before the parliamentary committee on arts and manufactures; he was questioned as to the information he had collected on the subject of glass painting. To this he replied, "Glass painting has fallen almost to the same level as china painting; but it might be greatly improved now to what it was in ancient times. There is an ignorant opinion among the people that the ancient art of glass painting is completely lost: it is totally void of foundation; for we can carry it to a much higher pitch than the ancients, except in one particular color, which is that of ruby, and we come very near to that. We can blend the colors, and produce the effect of light and shadow in a way which they could not. We can harmonize and mix the colors, and fix them, by proper enamelling and burning, so that they shall afterwards become just as permanent as those of the ancients, with the additional advantage of throwing in superior art." Martin began life as a painter on glass. One of his earliest pictures is in the conservatory at the mansion of the late Marquis of Wellesley, at Knightsbridge.

2323. ANECDOTE OF A PORTRAIT.

Dr. Waagen relates the following singular anecdote of one of the portraits in the Waterloo chamber at Windsor Castle—that of the minister, William Von Humboldt. The conception is poor, and the likeness very general; but the want is, that the body does not at all suit the head; for when King George IV., who was a personal friend of the minister during his last visit in England, and a short time before his departure, made him sit to Sir Thomas Lawrence, the latter, being pressed for time, took a canvas on which he had begun a portrait of Lord Liverpool, and had already finished his body in a purple coat, and painted upon it the head of M. Von Humboldt, intending to alter it afterwards. This, however, in consequence of the death of the king, and of Sir Thomas Lawrence, was not done: it is, however, to be wished that the anomaly were remedied.

2324. CURIOUS EXTRACT FROM A SCOTCH NEWSPAPER OF 1707.

Copy of a painter's bill presented to the vestry for work done in our church:—

To filling up a chink in the Red Sea, and repairing the damages of Pharaoh's host.

To a new pair of hands for Daniel in the lions' den, and a new set of teeth for the lioness.

To repairing Nebuchadnezzar's beard.

To cleaning the whale's belly, varnishing Jonah's face, and mending his left arm.

To a new skirt for Joseph's garment.

To a sheet anchor, a jury mast, and a long-boat for Noah's ark.

To giving a blush to the cheek of Eve, on presenting the apple to Adam.

To painting a new city in the land of Nod.

To cleaning the garden of Eden, after Adam's expulsion.

To making a bridle for the Samaritan's horse, and mending one of his legs.

To putting a new handle to Moses's basket, and fitting bulrushes.

To adding more fuel to the fire of Nebuchadnezzar's furnace. Rec'd payment, D. Z.

2325. NUMBER OF WEST'S PICTURES

Blackwood's Magazine says that West painted more than three thousand pictures; and Dunlap says it was ascertained that to contain all West's pictures, a gallery would be necessary four hundred feet long, fifty broad, and forty high; or a wall ten feet high, and three quarters of a mile long.

2326. MINIATURE LANDSCAPE.

Van Munder relates that Anne Smyters, the wife of John de Heere, a Flemish statuary, painted a landscape, representing a mill with the sails bent, and the miller appearing as if mounting the stairs, loaded with a sack: upon the terrace where the mill was fixed were seen a cart and horse, and on the road several peasants. The whole was highly finished and pencilled with wonderful delicacy and neatness, and was also accurately distinct; yet the painting was so amazingly minute, that the surface of it might be covered with one grain of corn.

2327. THE FACE OF CHRIST.

One of the most celebrated Italian artists was employed in painting the Last Supper of our Lord. One by one he studied the characters of the apostles, and then settled in his own mind, and painted on canvas, a form and countenance in which any beholder might see character expressed.

He then applied himself to the character of our Savior. He studied the attributes of his mind and heart. He sought all the stores of his own inventive fancy for a combination of features and complexion which should express these attributes—the conscious power, the wisdom, the holiness, the love, the mercy, the meekness, the patience, the whole character of the divine Redeemer. He sought long, intensely, but in vain. Every countenance he could imagine fell evidently far below; and at last he threw down his pencil in despair, declaring, that "the face of Christ could not be painted."

2328. OLD PAINTINGS.

The oldest known painting in the world is a Madonna and Child, in 886. The oldest in England are said to be the portraits of Chaucer, painted on panel in 1300, and that of Henry IV., done in the beginning of the fifteenth century.

2329. SKETCHING A PORTRAIT FROM MEMORY.

Garrick and Hogarth, sitting together at a tavern, mutually lamented the want of a portrait of Fielding. "I think," said Garrick, "I could make his face;" which he did accordingly. "Hold, David," said Hogarth; "remain as you are for a few minutes." Garrick did so, while Hogarth sketched the outline, which was afterwards finished from their mutual recollection; and this drawing was the original of all the portraits we have at present of the admired author of the History of Tom Jones.

2330. PETER BALTEN.

A very remarkable incident happened to Peter Balten, the artist, at the court of the Emperor Charles V. of Germany. That monarch having engaged Balten to paint a landscape, with a number of figures in it, Balten chose for his subject St. John preaching in the desert, which afforded him an opportunity of filling his design with a great variety of auditors. To every one of them he gave a strong and proper expression of attention to the principal figure; every individual having its eyes directed to the preacher. But the emperor, from some motive that was never discovered, ordered a monstrous elephant to be painted in place of the saint; so that the whole auditory seemed then only to express an astonishment at the unwieldy bulk and shape of the animal; nor was the picture ever altered. By some it was conjectured that the emperor meant it only as a piece of humor and drollery; by others it was imputed to a contempt for the artist; but by all the ecclesiastics it was ascribed to a contempt for religion.

2331. RUBENS'S MODE OF LIFE.

Rubens was in the habit of rising very early: in summer at four o'clock, and immediately afterwards he heard mass. He then went to work, and while painting, he habitually employed a person to read to him from one of the classical authors, or from some eminent poet. This was the time when he generally received his visitors, with whom he entered willingly into conversation on various topics, in the most animated and agreeable manner.

An hour before dinner was always devoted to recreation. From anxiety not to impair the brilliant play of his fancy, he indulged but sparingly in the pleasures of the table.

After working again till evening, he usually, if not prevented by business, mounted a spirited horse, and rode an hour or two. This was his favorite exercise: he was extremely fond of horses, and his stables contained some of remarkable beauty.

On his return, it was his custom to receive a few friends, principally men of learning, or artists, with whom he shared his frugal meal, and passed the evening in instructive and cheerful conversation.

This active and regular mode of life could alone have enabled Rubens to satisfy all the demands which were made upon him as an artist; and the astonishing number of works he completed, the genuineness of which is beyond all doubt, can only be accounted for through his union of extraordinary diligence with the acknowledged fertility of his productive powers.

2332. SILHOUETTES.

"It is a curious circumstance," says D'Israeli, "that I should have to recount in this chapter on political nicknames a familiar term with all lovers of art—that of Silhouette! This is well understood as a black profile; but it is more extraordinary that a term so universally adopted should not be found in any dictionary, either in that of L'Academie, or in Todd's, and has not even been preserved where it is quite indispensable—in Millin's Dictionnaire des Beaux-Arts! It is little suspected that this innocent term originated in a political nickname.

"Silhouette was minister of state in France in 1759. That period was a critical one: the treasury was in an exhausted condition, and Silhouette, a very honest man, who would hold no intercourse with financiers or loan mongers, could contrive no other expedient to prevent a national bankruptcy than excessive economy and interminable reform.

Paris was not the metropolis, any more than London, where a Plato or a Zeno could long be minister of state, without incurring all the ridicule of the wretched wits.

"At first they pretended to take his advice, merely to laugh at him: they cut their coats shorter, and wore them without sleeves; they turned their gold snuff-boxes into rough wooden ones; and the new-fashioned portraits were now only profiles of a face, traced by a black pencil on the shadow cast by a candle on white paper. All the fashions assumed an air of niggardly economy, till poor Silhouette was driven into retirement, with all his projects of savings and reforms; but he left his name to describe the most economical sort of portrait, and one as melancholy as his own fate."

2333. THE DYING SPANISH CAVALIER.

Trumbull used to mention that in the composition of the sort of Gibraltar, he wanted a subject for his dying Spanish cavalier, Don Jos. Barboza, who appears fallen in the front of the picture, with the hilt of his broken sword still grasped in his hand, and refusing the succor offered him by General Elliott. At this crisis of the picture, who should come into the painting-room but the afterwards celebrated Sir Thomas Lawrence, then a rising young artist. Trumbull familiarly accosted him: "Come, Lawrence, lie down for my dying Spaniard," which he promptly did; and this is the origin of that fine figure, not, however, intended for a portrait.

2334. ANACHRONISMS IN PAINTING.

These are to be found in works of all ages. Thus we have Verrio's periwigged spectators of Christ Healing the Sick; Rubens's Queen-mother, Cardinals, and Mercury, the Ethiopian King, in a surplice, boots, and spurs; Berliu's Virgin and Child, listening to a violin; the Marriage of Christ with St. Catharine of Seina, with King David playing the harp; Albert Durer's flounced-petticoated Angel driving Adam and Eve from Paradise; Cigolfi's Simeon at the Circumcision, with "spectacles on nose;" the Virgin Mary helping herself to a cup of coffee from a chased coffee-pot; N. Poussin's Rebekah at the Well, with Grecian architecture in the background; Paul Veronese's Benedictine Father, and Swiss soldiers; the red Lobsters in the Sea listening to the Preaching of St. Anthony of Padua; St. Jerome, with a clock by his side; and Poussin's Deluge, with boats. In our time, West, the president of the Royal Academy, has represented Paris in a Roman instead of a Phrygian dress; and Wilkie has painted the Chelsea Pensioners reading the Gazette of the Battle of Waterloo, in June.

§ 229. INDUSTRY, ENERGY, AND PERSEVERANCE.

The German painter Rugendas, celebrated for the spirit of his battle pieces, was originally an engraver, but was obliged to abandon that profession in consequence of a weakness in his right hand, which, however, permitted him to manage the pencil, although not the burin; and accordingly he applied himself to painting.

But, some years after, his disease increased so much, that, even for the lightest work it had now to do, his right hand became quite unserviceable; and he would have been without a profession, or any means of subsistence at all if he had not determined to make his left hand supply the place of its disabled companion. The experiment, after being persevered in for some time, succeeded perfectly, and he came at last to use the one hand with more ease and effect than he had ever done the other.

the ruins; to which he replied, "I go yet to school, that I may continue to learn."

2336. WILKIE'S EARLY LIFE.

2336. REMBRANDT'S INDUSTRY.

Rembrandt pursued his art with incredible industry, during the whole course of his life. His genuine pictures are very numerous. His skotchings are no less esteemed. The best collection ever made of them in England was that by Arthur Pond, the engraver, which was sold after his death, in 1760, for five thousand five hundred and forty-six pounds seven shillings and sixpence; but the largest was that by Monsieur Amadee de Burgg, at the Hague, which was publicly sold in 1755, and contained two hundred and fifty-seven portraits, one hundred and sixty-one histories, one hundred and fifty-five figures, eighty-three landscapes, consisting in the whole of six hundred and sixty-five prints, with their variations.

2337. MICHAEL ANGELO.

Michael Angelo dedicated himself, from his childhood to his death, to a toilsome observation of nature. The first anecdote recorded of him shows him to be already on the right road. Grannacci, a painter's apprentice, having lent him, when a boy, a print of St. Anthony beaten by Devils, together with some colors and pencils, he went to the fish market to observe the form and color of the fins and eyes of fish.

Cardinal Farnese one day found him, when an old man, walking alone in the Coliseum, and expressed his surprise at finding him solitary amidst John Burnet was educated with Wilkie in the first four years of his studies in the Trustees' Academy of Edinburgh; and, after arriving in London, in 1806, witnessed the progress of nearly every picture of familiar life which he painted. Burnet relates, that Wilkie was always first on the stairs leading up to the academy, which was then held in St. James's Square, anxious not to lose a moment of the hours of drawing; and this love of art, paramount to all other gratifications, continued with him to the last, even when his success had put the means in his power of indulging relaxation and procuring amusement.

When in the academy, his intenseness attracted the notice of the more volatile students, who used to pelt him with small pills of soft bread. As he was one of the first to be present, so he was one of the last to depart. After academy hours, which were from ten to twelve in the forenoon—the best time of the day for application—those who were apprentices returned to their several professions; but Wilkie invariably returned to his lodgings, there to follow out what was begun in the academy, by copying from his own hands and face in a mirror; thus, as it were, engrafting the great principles of the antique on the basis of nature.

2339. INDUSTRY AND QUICKNESS OF BOURDON.

Sebastian Bourdon painted twelve portraits after life, as large as nature, in one day.

§ 230. MISCELLANEOUS.

2340. SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE.

Sir Thomas Lawrence, when attending the funeral of Mr. Dawe, R. A., in the vault of St. Paul's Cathedral, was observed to look wistfully about him, as if contemplating the place, as that to which he himself would some day be borne; and when the service was concluded, it was remarked that he stopped to look at the inscription upon the stone which covers the body of his predecessor West. Within three months from the date of this incident, the vaults were reopened to receive Lawrence's remains.

2341. ARTISTIC TEXT.

Wills, the portrait painter, was not very successful in his profession, and so quitted it, and, having received a liberal education, took orders. He was for several years curate of Canons, in Middlesex, and at the death of the incumbent he obtained the living. In the year 1768, he was appointed chaplain to the chartered Society of Artists; and he preached a sermon at Covent Garden Church, on St. Luke's Day, in the same year, the text being taken from Job xxxvii. 14: "Stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God." This discourse was afterwards printed at the request of the society; but Wills did not long enjoy his appointment, in consequence of the disputes which broke out among the members.

2342. NAPOLEON ON IMMORTALITY.

Napoleon, being in the gallery of the Louvre one day, attended by the Baron Denon, turned round suddenly from a fine picture, which he had viewed for some time in silence, and said to him, "That is a noble picture, Denon." "Immortal," was Denon's reply. "How long," inquired Napoleon, "will this picture last?" Denon answered, that with care, and in a proper situation, it might last, perhaps, five hundred years. "And how long," said Napoleon, "will a statue last?" "Perhaps," replied Denon, "five thousand years." "And this," returned Napoleon, sharply,—"this you call immortality!"

2343. DAVID WILKIE.

This artist was a sort of second Hogarth,—successful, indeed, in every department of his profession, but most so in painting scenes of domestic life. He was a native of Scotland, where, from the age of fifteen, he was educated with a reference to his profession. So rapid was his progress, that at the early age of twenty-seven he became a member of the Royal Academy.

Of late he soared a little. Instead of confining himself to the representation of domestic scenes, he has attempted the loftier, historical style of composition, as in his John Knox, &c.

The life of this eminent painter has been written in three volumes by Allan Cunningham. It is a remarkable fact that it was finished by the latter just two days before his death.

Allan Cunningham.

Allan Cunningham, the biographer of David Wilkie, not only wrote the above-mentioned extended history of a distinguished painter, but, in the way of contributions to Murray's Library, he wrote a series of Lives of Eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects, extending to six volumes.

2344. LOCAL ATTACHMENT.

In the remote village of Petit Bornand, in a wild valley above Bonneville, is a very valuable painting by Guido, of our Savior's removal from the cross. A native of this place lived many years at Rome in the service of a cardinal: at last, becoming old, he wished to return and end his days in the land of his fathers. The cardinal gave him his leave; adding that, in reward for his long and faithful services, he wished him to choose out of his palace any one article he might wish to take away with him. The domestic said he should choose the painting of the Removal from the Cross, which he had often looked at in the cardinal's gallery, as he wished to give it to the church of his native village. The cardinal was unprepared for this request: however, as he had promised, he allowed his servant to take the painting away. This circumstance was honorable to both.

2345. WEST PERMITTED TO PURSUE THE ART OF PAINTING.

West's parents were Quakers. When his young genius began to develop itself, his future career became the subject of anxious deliberation. Some of his best friends were in favor of his making art his profession. His mother, desirous of distinction for her youngest child, and the father influenced by a prediction made by a preacher at the time of his birth, that he would be a remarkable man, at length resolved on submitting the matter to the wisdom of the society to which he belonged.

The spirit of speech first descended on one John Williamson: "To John West and Sarah Searson," said this western luminary, "a man child hath been born, on whom God hath conferred some remarkable gifts of mind; and you have all heard that, by something amounting to inspiration, the youth has been induced to study the art of painting. It is true that our tenets refuse to own the utility of that art to mankind, but it seemeth to me that we have considered the matter too nicely. God has bestowed on this youth a genius for art. Shall we question his wisdom? Can we believe that he gives such rare gifts but for a wise and good purpose? I see the divine hand in this: we shall do well to sanction the art and encourage this youth."

The Quakers, persuaded by this sagacious enthusiast, or moved by the belief that the worldly fame which accompanies genius would shed a new halo on their sect, acknowledged the boy's powers upon the principle of implicit faith, gave their unanimous consent, like the "Brethren" in the Alchemist, to have the lead turned into gold, and forthwith summoned the youth, in whom so many hopes centred, before them.

He came and took his station in the middle of the room, his father on his right hand, his mother on the left, while around him flocked the whole Quaker community. It was one of the women that spake first; but the words of Williamson are alone remembered:—

"Painting," said he, "has been hitherto employed to embellish life, to preserve voluptuous images, and add to the sensual gratification of man. For this we classed it among vain and merely ornamental things, and excluded it from among us. But it is not the principle to which we object, but the mis-employment of painting. In wise and pure hands it rises in the scale of moral excellence, and displays a loftiness of sentiment and a devout dignity worthy of the contemplation of Christians. I think genius is given by God for some high purpose. What the purpose is let me not inquire; it will be manifest in his own good time and way. He hath, in this remote wilderness, endowed with the rich gifts of a superior spirit this youth, who has now our consent to cultivate his talent for art; may it be demonstrated in his life and works that the gifts of God have not been bestowed in vain, nor the motives of the beneficent inspiration, which induces us to suspend the strict operations of our tenets prove barren of religious or moral effect!"

"At the conclusion of this address," says Galt, "the women rose and kissed the young artist, and the men, one by one, laid their hands on his head."

That this scene made a strong impression on the mind of young West we have his own assurance; he looked upon himself as expressly dedicated to art, and considered this release from the strict tenets of his religious community as implying a covenant on his part to employ his powers on subjects holy and pure. The grave simplicity of the Quaker continued to the last in the looks and manners of the artist, and the moral rectitude and internal purity of the man were diffused through all his productions.

2346. THE CRUCIFIXION BY RUBENS.

In the Church of St. Peter, at Cologne, there used to be an altar piece, by Rubens, of the Crucifixion. Strangers who visit this church, and whose expectations have been highly raised, are at first sadly disappointed; but on their attention being suddenly diverted to some other object, the picture is turned in the frame, and all the perfections of the great artist's genius break upon the view. The first exhibition is a copy on the back of the original picture, by a modern painter, and the illusion is practised to increase the effect of the performance of which the possessors are so justly proud.

2347. RAPHAEL AND HIS MISTRESS.

When Raphael was engaged in painting the gallery of his friend, Agostino Ghighi, he was so much in love with a beautiful Roman lady that his passion interfered with his genius and his fame. Agostino persuaded the lady to pass her mornings in the gallery, and thus induced Raphael to continue his work.

2348. REYNOLDS AND HIS FIRST INSTRUCTOR, HUDSON.

Sir Joshua Reynolds studied originally under Hudson, an English portrait painter, who bestowed very liberally on his customers fair tie wigs, blue velvet coats, and white satin waistcoats. He afterwards went to Italy, where he studied three years.

On his return, he hired a large house in Newport Street; and the first specimen he gave of his abilities was a boy's head in a turban, richly painted in the style of Rembrandt, which so attracted Hudson's attention, that he called every day to see it in its progress; and perceiving, at last, no trace of his own manner left, he exclaimed, "Really, Reynolds, you don't paint so well as when you left England."

2349. RUBENS'S POPULARITY.

We are able to form some estimate of the astonishingly productive powers of Rubens, as an artist, when we consider that about one thousand of his works have been engraved; and, including copies, the number of engravings from his works amount to over fifteen hundred. The extraordinary number of his paintings adorn not merely the most celebrated public and private galleries, and various churches in Europe, but they have even found their way to America, especially to Lima, in Peru.

2350. WEST'S APPEARANCE, EDUCATION, &c.

"The appearance of West," says Leigh Hunt, his relative, "was so gentlemanly, that the moment he changed his gown for a coat, he seemed to be full dressed. The simplicity and self-possession of the young Quaker, not having time enough to grow stiff,

— for he went early to study at Rome, — took up, I suppose, with more ease than most would have done, the urbanities of his new position. And what simplicity helped him to, favor would retain.

"Yet this man, so well bred, and so indisputably clever in his art, whatever might be the amount of his genius, had received so careless or so homely an education when a boy, that he could hardly read. He pronounced also some of his words, in reading, with a puritanical barbarism, such as haive for have, as some people pronounce when they sing psalms. But this was, perhaps, an American custom. My mother, who both read and spoke remarkably well, would say haive, and shaul for shall, when she sung her hymns.

"But it was not so well in reading lectures at the academy. Mr. West would talk of his art all day long, painting all the while. On other subjects he was not so fluent; and on political and religious matters he tried hard to maintain the reserve common with those about a court. He succeeded ill in both. There were always strong suspicions of his leaning to his native side in politics; and during Bonaparte's triumph, he could not retain his enthusiasm for the republican chief, going even to Paris to pay him his homage, when first consul. The admiration of high colors and powerful effects, natural to a painter, was too strong for him. How he managed this matter with the higher powers in England I cannot say."

2351. ANECDOTES OF GUIDO.

Guido was so handsome, that Louis Carracci made use of him as his model, when he had to paint an angel.

"We other artists," said Josepino one day to Pope Paul V., who was examining a head of Guido with him, — "we other artists paint like men; Guido paints like an angel." Paul V. was much pleased to see Guido at work, and permitted him to be covered in his presence. Guido used to say, that if the pope had not given him that liberty, he should himself have taken it, and told him that he had some infirmity which made it necessary for him to do so; as such a liberty was a tribute due to the honor of art.

Guido returned no visits to the persons who came to see him. "They come," said he, "not from any respect to my person, but to my art."

Persons of talent observe every thing that occurs which has the least relation to their particular profession. Guido was once present when the Dominican monks of Bologna opened a grave in which they found a human body, that had been long buried there, quite entire. When it was touched it crumbled into dust, as well as the cloth which covered it; the veil of silk, however, which was laid upon the face, remained entire. Guido took the hint, and painted afterwards upon a kind of taffeta, which he had prepared by a particular process.

Guido received no fixed price for his pictures; the payment he received for them he always regarded as honorarium quiddam — an expression applied by the Roman law to what its lawyers received for their fees.

Out of his painting-room Guido appeared a different person from what he appeared in it. He was there as modest as he had been haughty in his room. This great painter had once been very rich, and had received great prices for his pictures; yet, possessed with the rage of play, he never painted but when he had lost his money. He became at last so completely impoverished by this pernicious passion, that he was obliged to paint for so much a day to supply himself with the common necessities of life.

Mr. West, the late president of the Royal Academy, had in his possession the finest head that Guido ever painted: it was an Ecce Homo, and united expression, drawing, and coloring, in the highest degree. In the opinion of an "ingenious critic" the best and the most candid judge of art in Europe, it was one of the most perfect heads that painting ever produced.

2352. LAST WORKS OF COLE.

Thomas Cole.

"The late Thomas Cole, the artist," says a correspondent of the Albany Journal, "had been engaged for some time in painting a series, illustrating the Cross and the World. His first series, of three paintings, had been completed but a few days since, illustrating the pilgrimage of the Christian in this world to its final termination; but with it has terminated the pilgrimage of the artist, and his deserted studio contains alone the rough sketches of the worldling's pilgrimage. This, his last effort, far surpasses any of his former paintings, not excepting the Course of Empire, and the Voyage of Human Life.

2353. RUBENS'S HOUSE AT ANTWERP.

We possess prints of Rubens's house at Antwerp. That princely artist perhaps first contrived for his studio the circular apartment with a dome, like the rotunda of the Pantheon, where the light, descending from an aperture or window at the top, sent down a single equal light—that perfection of light which distributes its magical effects on the objects beneath. Bellori describes it, una stanza rotunda con un solo occhio in cima: the solo occhio is what the French term œil de bœuf; we ourselves want this single eye in our technical language of art.

This was his precious museum, where he had collected a vast number of books, which were intermixed with his marbles, statues, cameos, intaglios, and all that variety of the riches of art which he had drawn from Rome. But the walls did not yield in value; for they were covered by pictures of his own composition, or copies by his own hand, made at Venice and Madrid, of Titian and Paul Veronese. No foreigners, men of letters, or lovers of the arts, or even princes, would pass through Antwerp without visiting the house of Rubens, to witness the animated residence of genius, and the great man who had conceived the idea.

Yet, great as was his mind, and splendid as were the habits of his life, he could not resist the entreaties of the hundred thousand florins of the Duke of Buckingham to dispose of this studio. The great artist could not, however, abandon forever the delightful contemplations he was depriving himself of; and as substitutes for the miracles of art he had lost, he solicited and obtained leave to replace them by casts, which were scrupulously deposited in the places where the originals had stood.

2354. A PLAIN HINT.

A lady, whose portrait Opie was painting, was mustering all her smiles to look charming till at length the irritated artist could endure the constrained and affected features no longer. Starting up, and throwing down his brush, he exclaimed, in his broad style, "I tell ye what it is, ma'am, if ye grin so, I canna draw ye at all."

2355. KNELLER AND THE ALDERMAN WITHOUT A FACE.

Fond as Sir Godfrey Kneller was of money, it appears he would sometimes reject it rather than do what he thought would degrade his art. When he came to a very high reputation, a certain alderman came to be painted by him, and, as usual, paid him down half of the price in guineas. Sir Godfrey, after several times touching the canvas with the chalk, and rubbing it out very deliberately, laid it aside, and pulling out the guineas he had just received, desired the alderman to repocket them. The latter staring,—"For what did you give me those guineas?" said Sir Godfrey. "To draw my face, to be sure," answered the other. "But," replied the painter, "you have no face to draw: get you gone, get you gone."

2356. REVERENCE FOR ANTIQUITY.

There have been found occasionally some artists, who could so perfectly imitate the spirit, the taste, the character, and the peculiarities of great masters, that they have not unfrequently deceived the most skillful connoisseurs.

An anecdote of Peter Mignard is singular. This great man painted a Magdalen on a canvas fabricated at Rome. A broker, in concert with Mignard, went to the Chevalier de Clairville, and told him, as a secret, that he was to receive from Italy a Magdalen of Guido, and his masterpiece. The chevalier possed upon, for that the Magdalen was painted by Mignard. Although Mignard himself caused the alarm to be given, the amateur would not believe it; all the connoisseurs agreed it was a Guido, and the famous Le Brun corroborated this opinion.

The chevalier came to Mignard. "There are," he says, "some persons who assure me that my Magdalen is your work." "Mine! they do me great honor; I am sure that Le Brun is not of that opinion." "Le Brun swears it can be no other than a Guido. You shall dine with me, and meet several of the first connoisseurs."

On the day of meeting, the picture was more closely inspected than ever. Mignard hinted his doubts whether the piece was the work of that great master; he insinuated that it was possible to be deceived, and added that, if it was Guido's, he did not think it in his best manner. "It is a Guido, sir, and in his very best manner," replied Le Brun with warmth, "I am perfectly convinced." And all the critics unanimously agreed with him. Mignard then spoke in a firm tone of voice: "And I, gentlemen, will wager three hundred louis that it is not a Guido."

The dispute now became violent. Le Brun was desirous of accepting the wager. In a word, the affair became such as could add nothing more to the glory of Mignard. "No, sir," replied the latter, "I am too honest to bet, when I am certain to win. Monsieur le Chevalier, this piece cost you two thousand crowns; the money must be returned—the painting is by my hand." Le Brun would not believe it. "The proof," Mignard continued, "is easy: on this canvas, which is a Roman one, was the portrait of a cardinal; I will show you his cap."

The chevalier did not know which of the rival artists to believe; the proposition alarmed him. "He who painted the picture shall mend it," said Mignard. He took a pencil dipped in oil, and rubbing the hair of the Magdalen, discovered the cap of the cardinal. The honor of the ingenious painter could no longer be disputed.

2357. BACON'S JUPITER.

Bacon had not had the fashionable training of an artist, and had little taste for mythological subjects, like the ancients. He made few efforts in this kind, however, enough to show his ability. The Mars pleased Lord Yarborough so well, that he desired to have a copy of it in marble. Bacon was glad of this, for he knew that his brethren looked lightly upon his performances, because he had never studied in Rome.

To rebuke their eternal sarcasms about his ignorance of the antique, he shortly after modelled a head of Jupiter Tonans, gave it the exterior aspect of time, and produced it among the connoisseurs, who, with one voice, inquired from what temple it had been brought.

"He often remarked," says his reverend biographer, "on the affectation of many, with respect to the antique, who are without taste for selecting what is really interesting in it. 'Call it,' said he, 'but an antique, and people begin immediately to find some beauty. Look at that figure in the corner of my study: can you see any thing in it? Yet many who come here, and at first take no notice of it, as soon as they hear it is a cast from the antique, begin to admire! Had I made it a few years ago, it would not have produced me a shilling.'"

2358. VANLOO AND SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

The Chevalier Vanloo, the eminent portrait painter, being in England, paid a visit to Sir Joshua Reynolds, and boasted of his great knowledge in the works of the different famous painters, saying he could not be deceived or imposed upon by a copy for an original. Sir Joshua then showed him the head of an old woman, which he had copied from one by Rembrandt, and, without letting him into the secret, asked his opinion of it. The French painter, after a very careful inspection, said he could pronounce that it was undoubtedly an original picture by Rembrandt.

2359. DESTRUCTION OF WORKS OF ART.

Conquerors at first destroy, with the rashest zeal, the national records of the conquered people; hence it is that the Irish deplore the irreparable losses of their most ancient national memorials, which their invaders have been too successful in annihilating. The same event occurred in the conquest of Mexico; and the interesting history of the New World must ever remain imperfect in consequence of the unfortunate success of the first missionaries, who too late became sensible of their error. Clavigero, the most authentic historian of Mexico, continually laments this affecting loss. Every thing in that country had been painted, and painters abounded there, as scribes in Europe.

The first missionaries, suspicious that superstition was mixed with all their paintings, attacked the chief school of these artists, and collecting, in the market-place, a little mountain of these precious records, they set fire to it, and buried in the ashes the memory of many most interesting events. Afterwards, sensible of their error, they tried to collect information from the mouths of the Indians; but the Indians were indignantly silent. When they attempted to collect the remains of these painted histories, the patriotic Mexican usually buried in concealment the remaining records of his country.

2360. ADRIAN BROWER.

Adrian Brouwer, one of the most celebrated painters in the Low Countries, when on a visit to Antwerp, was taken up as a spy, and imprisoned in the same place where the Duke d'Arenberg was confined. That nobleman had an intimate friendship with Rubens, who often went to visit him in his confinement. The duke, having observed the genius of Brouwer by some slight sketches, which he drew with black lead, but without knowing who he was, desired Rubens to bring with him, at his next visit, a palette and pencils for a prisoner, who was in confinement with him.

The materials requisite for painting were given to Brouwer, who took for his subject a group of soldiers who were playing at cards in a corner of the prison. When the picture was finished and shown to Rubens, he immediately exclaimed, that it was painted by Brouwer, whose works he had often seen and admired. The duke, delighted with the discovery, set a proper value on the performance.

Although Rubens offered six hundred gilders for it, the duke would by no means part with it, but presented the painter with a much larger sum. Rubens immediately exerted all his interest to obtain the release of Brouwer, and procured it by becoming his surety. He took him home with him, and became his best and most liberal patron and benefactor; but Brouwer, who was a man of dissolute habits, did not remain long with him.

2361. THE RAKE'S PROGRESS.

It was in a temporary summer residence at Isleworth that Hogarth painted the Rake's Progress. The crowd of visitors to his study was immense. He often asked them if they knew for whom one or another figure in the picture was designed, and when they guessed wrong, he set them right. It was generally believed that the heads were chiefly portraits of low characters, well known in the town.

In the Miser's Feast, he introduced Sir Isaac Shard, a person proverbially avaricious. His son, a young man of spirit, heard of this, and, calling at the painter's, requested to see the picture. The young man asked the servant whether that old figure was intended for any particular person, who answered it was thought to be very like one Sir Isaac Shard; whereupon he drew his sword and slashed the canvas. Hogarth heard the bustle, and was very angry. Young Shard said, "You have taken an unwarrantable license; I am the injured party's son, and ready to defend my conduct at law." He went away, and he was never afterwards molested.

§ 232. PARENTS, LITERARY, AND THEIR CHILDREN.

2362. THE POET MILTON.

HE family of Milton was never numerous: only three children survived the tender years of infancy. These were daughters. One of them had an impediment in her speech, and received but little instruction of any kind. The other two were instructed at home in every thing but the languages. These were omitted, because, as he said, one tongue was enough for a woman.

The youngest daughter was frequently employed by her father, especially after he became blind, in reading to him Homer and Ovid's Metamorphoses. Both the younger of them were also sometimes employed by their father as amanuenses. The initial engraving with which this article commences represents the poet dictating to his daughters.

2363. DR. BOWDITCH.

When Nathaniel Bowditch desired to publish his great commentary on La Place, he assembled his family, and informed them that the execution of his design would require the sacrifice of one third of his fortune, and that he felt it his duty to consult his heirs on a subject so important to them. Nobly did his children reply, "We value your reputation more than your money."

The work was published, and the day on which it was issued added one of the most brilliant of American ornaments to the temple of science. Fortunate it was that the great philosopher possessed means to be sacrificed; otherwise one of the proudest monuments of American science might have lain buried in the drawers of his cabinet. We recollect a visit once paid by us to this venerable man of science, at his financial office in Boston, and we shall not soon forget that serene brow, that eminently intellectual forehead, the quiet tones of the old man's voice, and the beautiful modesty that pervaded all his ways.

2364. THE SON OF BUFFON.

The son of Buffon one day surprised his father by the sight of a column, which he had raised to the memory of his father's eloquent genius. "It will do you honor," observed the Gallic sage. And when that son, in the revolution, was led to the guillotine, he ascended in silence, so impressed with his father's fame, that he only told the people, "I am the son of Buffon."

2365. ANTHONY COOK'S FAMILY.

Sir Anthony Cook bestowed the most careful education on his fair daughters, and all of them rewarded his exertions by becoming not only proficient in literature, but distinguished for their excellent demeanor as mothers of families.

One of these daughters, more distinguished than the rest, married Lord Burleigh. The biographer of the latter, in alluding to the great share of domestic happiness which fell to his lot, says, "For the improvement of his children, as well as his domestic happiness, Burleigh was chiefly indebted to his wife, the daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, a lady highly distinguished for her mental accomplishments."

Another of the daughters of Cook married Sir Nicholas Bacon, the father of the celebrated Lord Bacon, of whom, whatever else may be said, it is but justice to affirm that he was one of the most remarkable men of whom any age can boast. He was qualified to enter, and actually did enter, the University of Cambridge, when he was in his thirteenth year. The following testimony of the biographer of Bacon will illustrate this point still more fully.

Lord Bacon is universally admitted to have possessed the most powerful intellect of any man that has appeared upon the earth. Both of his parents belonged to that class of society from which have emanated such men as Milton, Sir Thomas More, Lord Burleigh, Oliver Cromwell, John Hampden, and a host of other great minds. His maternal grandfather, Sir Anthony Cook, became eminent in the whole circle of the arts, being a thorough master of the Latin and Greek languages, an exact critic and philologist, and equally skilled in poetry, history, and the mathematics. He was at the same time adorned with singular piety and goodness, preferring contemplation to active life. He managed his family with such prudence and discretion, that Lord Seymour, standing by one day when this gentleman chid his son, said, "Some men govern their families with more skill than others do kingdoms, and thereupon commended him to the government of his nephew, Edward VI. Such was the majesty of his looks and gait, that awe governed; such the reason and sweetness, that love obliged all his family—a family equally afraid to displease so good a head, and to offend so great.

He had five daughters, whose education he superintended himself; and thinking that women are as capable of learning as men, he instilled that into his daughters at night which he had taught the prince during the day. If he was great and happy in himself, he was greater and happier in his daughters. His first care was to give them a true sense of religion, and his next to inure them to submission, modesty, and obedience.

Their book and pen were their recreation; the music and dancing-school, the court and city, their accomplishment; the needle in the closet, and housewifery in the hall and kitchen, their business. They all married splendidly and happily; and in their marriage they were guided more by the reason of their father than by his will, and were directed rather by his counsel than led by his authority. "Their classical acquirements," says Macaulay, "made them conspicuous even among the women of fashion of that age.

"Anne, the mother of Francis Bacon, was distinguished both as a linguist and as a theologian. She corresponded in Greek with Bishop Jewel, and translated his Apologia from the Latin so correctly, that neither he nor Archbishop Parker could suggest a single alteration. She also translated a series of sermons on Fate and Free Will, from the Tuscan of Bernardo Ochino."

Her parental care of her two sons, Anthony and Francis, two of the most extraordinary men of their time, or, indeed, of any time, is possibly the best test of her powers, which was deeply felt by Francis, who, in his will, says, "For my burial, I desire that it may be in St. Michael's Church, near St. Alban's. There was my mother buried."

Monument of Lord Bacon.

In Birch's Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, the extraordinary vigilance used by Lady Anne in superintending their conduct long after they were adults may be seen.

"Sir Nicholas Bacon," continues Macaulay, "was no ordinary man; but the fame of the father was thrown into the shade by that of the son." He was, in a word, as Lloyd has well said, "father of his country and of Sir Francis Bacon."

§ 233. PLAGIARISM.

2366. PIRON'S REBUKE OF A PLAGIARIST.

TRAGIC poet, addicted to plagiarism, read a work to Alexis Piron, in which he had introduced several borrowed verses. While he was reading, Piron frequently took off his hat, and made a low bow. "What is the reason," said the pilfering poet, "of your singular behavior in lifting your hat and bowing so frequently?" "My conduct," replied Piron, "is not singular; for it is always my custom to make a bow whenever I meet any of my old acquaintance."

the warmest kind, but ending with words to the following import: "Our raptures would have been still greater, if we had not chanced to read them, some time ago, as the productions of one Tillotson."

2369. PROVING AN ALIBI.

A clergyman at Cambridge preached a sermon which one of his auditors commended. "Yea," said the gentleman to whom it was mentioned, "it was a good sermon, but he stole it." This was told to the preacher. He resented it, and called on the gentleman to retract what he had said. "I am not," replied the aggressor, "very apt to retract my words, but in this instance I will. I said you had stolen the sermon. I find I was wrong, for on returning home, and referring to the book whence I thought it was taken, I found it there."

2370. PALEY.

A correspondent of the Athenæum has discovered that Paley's Natural Theology is copied from a series of papers which appeared about the end of the seventeenth century, in the Leipsic Transactions, by a Dutch philosopher, named Nienwentyt. It is extraordinary that this discovery was not made before, seeing that the papers, after having been published at Amsterdam about the year 1700, were afterwards translated into English by Mr. Chamberlayne, and published by Longman & Co., in 1818, about fifteen years after Paley's Natural Theology appeared. As Paley quotes Nienwentyt, from the Leipsic Transactions, he, of course, must have known of and perused them. Parallel passages are printed side by side in the Athenæum.

2367. YANKEEISMS AND ALL!

A most amusing case, of which the writer of this paragraph had an intimate knowledge, occurred a few years ago. He translated a French tale—good enough of itself, but so thoroughly French in its idiom, and so bare of incidents, that a few were thrown in, in the translation. Other alterations were made. Perhaps they improved it, and perhaps not; but they served a purpose of which the translator little dreamed at the time. The tale appeared in the columns of a newspaper, and was forgotten.

A year or two afterwards, the American papers were copying, from Maine to Georgia, a highly-exalted story from the London Forget-me-Not, and the editorial scissors of the writer hereof had already followed the example of other scissors, when something that looked like an old acquaintance caught the editor's eye. The London Annual story was his own translation, emendations, alterations, Yankee provincialisms, and all.

An English D. D., since dead, and whose name we therefore suppress, had copied it bodily, and sold it as his own, affixing his own name, and publishing it, not as a translation, but as an original tale, written from the conversation of an old gentleman at Boulogne sur la Mer! Of course, the story was a good one, Yankeeisms and all, when copied from the London Annual.

2368. REPRINT OF TILLOTSON.

The posthumous works of a popular American preacher were once published by a transatlantic bibliopole. A review of them soon appeared in a widely-circulating periodical, replete with praise of 2371. POPE AND HIS ESSAY ON MAN.

Pope published the first edition of his Essay on Man anonymously, and was asked soon after by a scribe of Grub Street,—

"How did you like that last poem of mine—the Essay? Don't you think it pretty fair, considering that it was written one afternoon while I was skulking out of the way of the bailiff?"

"Pon honor," replied Pope, "I think it a first-rate performance, and intend to claim it as my own, at some fitting opportunity."

2372. BORROWING PRETTY FREELY.

It is well known to the world that the late William C. Woodbridge, the author in conjunction with the celebrated Mrs. Willard, of Troy, was the progenitor of an entirely new method of teaching geography in our public schools; but it is not so well known as it should be, that some of the school geographies which immediately, or almost immediately, followed his, borrowed much more largely from his plan, and even of his material, than is usual in such cases.

2373. HONEST PLAGIARIST.

Some persons, who were envious of the reputation of the French poet Desportes, reproached him with having stolen freely from the Italian poets. So far from denying the charge, when a book appeared upon the subject, entitled Rencontre des Muses de France et d'Italie, he said, "If I had known the author's design, I could have furnished him with a great many more instances than he has collected."

2374. DEAN SWIFT AND THE PLAGIARIST.

The eccentric Dean Swift, in the course of one of those journeys to Holyhead which it is well known he several times performed "on foot," was travelling through Church Stretton, Shropshire, when he put up at the sign of the Crown, and finding the host to be a communicative, good-humored man, inquired if there was any agreeable person in town with whom he might partake of a dinner, (as he had desired him to provide one,) and that such a person should have nothing to pay. The landlord immediately replied that the curate, Mr. Jones, was a very agreeable, companionable man, and would not, he supposed, have any objection to spend a few hours with a gentleman of his appearance. The dean directed him to wait on Mr. Jones with his compliments, and say that a traveller would be glad to be favored with his company at the Crown, if it was agreeable.

When Mr. Jones and the dean had dined, and the glass began to circulate, the former made an apology for an occasional absence, saying that at three o'clock he was to read prayers and preach at the church. Upon this intimation, the dean replied that he also should attend prayers. Service being ended, and the two gentlemen having resumed their station at the Crown, the dean began to compliment Mr. Jones on his delivery of a very appropriate sermon, and remarked that it must have cost him (Mr. Jones) some time and attention to compose such a one.

Mr. Jones observed that his duty was rather "laborious," as he served another parish church at a distance; which, with the Sunday and weekly service at Church Stratton, straitened him very much with respect to the time necessary for the composition of sermons; so that, when the subjects pressed, he could only devote a few days and nights to that purpose.

"Well," says the dean, "it is well for you to have such a talent: for my part, the very sermon you preached this afternoon cost me some months in composing." On this observation Mr. Jones began to look very gloomy, and to recognize his companion. "However," rejoined the dean, "don't you be alarmed; you have so good a talent at delivery, that I hereby declare you have done more honor to my sermon this day than I could do myself; and, by way of compromising the matter, you must accept of this half guinea for the justice you have done in the delivery of it."

2375. BORROWING AND BORROWERS.

Montaigne, with honest natveté, compares his writings to a thread that binds the flowers of others, and that, by incessantly pouring the waters of a few good old authors into his sieve, some drops fall upon his paper.

Petrarch, who is not the inventor of that tender poetry of which he is the model, and Boccaccio, called the father of Italian novels, have alike profited by a studious perusal of writers who are now only read by those who have more curiosity than taste. Boiardo has imitated Pulci, and Ariosto, Boiardo.

The madness of Orlando Furioso, though it wears, by its extravagance, a very original air, is only imitated from Sir Launcelot, in the old romance of Mort Arthur, with which, Warton observes, it agrees in every leading circumstance; and what is the Cardenio of Cervantes but the Orlando of Ariosto?

Tasso has imitated the Iliad, and enriched his poem with episodes from the Æneid. It is curious to observe that even Dante, wild and original as he appears, when he meets Virgil in the Inferno, warmly expresses his gratitude for the many fine passages for which he was indebted to his works, and on which, he says, he had "long meditated."

Molière and La Fontaine are considered to possess as much originality as any of the French writers; yet the learned Ménage calls Molière "un grand et habile picoreur;" and Boileau tells us that La Fontaine borrowed his style and matter from Marot and Rabelais, and took his subjects from Boccaccio, Poggio, and Ariosto.

Nor was the eccentric Rabelais the inventor of most of his burlesque narratives; and he is a very close imitator of Folengo, the inventor of the macaronic poetry, and not a little indebted to the old Facezio of the Italians. Indeed, Marot, Villon, as well as those we have noticed, profited by the authors anterior to the age of Francis I. La Bruyère incorporates whole passages of Publius Syrus in his work, as the translator of the latter abundantly shows. To the Turkish Spy was Montesquieu beholden for his Persian Letters, and a numerous crowd are indebted to Montesquieu. Corneille made a liberal use of Spanish literature; and the pure waters of Racine flowed from the fountains of Sophocles and Euripides.

Our master modern poets have, in many instances, drawn their waters from the ancient fountains of Gothic romance. Spenser borrowed largely, and repaid with munificence. Milton, in his loftiest theme, looked down with admiration on this terrestrial race,—

"——— and what resounds
In fable or romance of Uther's son,
Begirt with British or Armoric knights."

"In Amadis of Gaul," has said our true laureate, "may be found the Zelmene of the Arcadia, the Masque of Cupid of the Faery Queene, and the Florizel of the Winter's Tale. Sidney, Spenser, and Shakspeare imitated this book. Was ever book honored by three such imitators?"

POETRY AND POETS.

§ 234. BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

2376. THE POETS' CORNER.

HE huge edifice usually known by the name of Westminster Abbey is built in the form of a Latin cross, of which the nave is two hundred and thirty-four feet long from east to west, and ninety feet wide.

One portion of it, called the Poets' Corner, contains the monuments of the most distinguished poets of England, and is partially rep-in the accompanying engraving.

Poets' Corner, Westminster Abbey.

Other parts contain the monuments of distinguished statesmen, warriors, scholars, and artists.

Westminster Abbey was built by Edward the Confessor, about eight hundred years ago, though not fully completed till the time of Sir Christopher Wren, about the year 1700.

2377. EARLY LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The country which had the honor of receiving into being Walter Scott is the land of the Muses, where every valley is an Arcadia, and every mountain a Parnassus; inspiration breathes around. The soul of a Spenser, a Drummond of Hawthornden, and a Burns hovers over the scene; and none can tread the soil without recollecting a name dear to every lover of nature, Thomson. Here also fought "The Wallace;" and here the rival of Homer, here Ossian sang in strains sublime the praises of Fingal and the sorrows of Colma. No man possessing the smallest spark of poetic fire in his bosom but would here soon find it kindle into a flame, which, fanned by the breath of Amor Patriæ, must produce the very soul of song.

Walter Scott appears to have been smitten in a great degree with the love of country, and tainted rather strongly with the pride of ancestry; and yet, contrary to general opinion, he was not ushered into a bright and pleasing existence from the down bed of prosperity. In early youth,—

"Adversity, companion of his way, Long o'er her victim hung with iron sway."

He was a very distant relation to the noble family of Scott, Duke of Buccleugh; but the "boast of heraldry, the pomp of power," cannot add any thing glorious to the name of Walter Scott.

The father of Walter Scott was a well-informed man and a gentleman, his mother a woman of the most amiable disposition, with more common sense than in general falls to female share, and was the intimate friend of Allan Ramsay, Blacklock, and Burns. It was she who moulded the mind of her son, and gave him that tone of sensibility which breathes through all his works. She was remarkably fond of rural life and poetic description; and to her rambling in the glens and forests of Scotland, with a book in one hand and her son in the other, we are indebted for the landscapes in the Lady of the Lake, and all those beautiful descriptions of the Highland scenery, which, whilst we are perusing, we actually imagine before our eyes; and it is not until we have finished the sentence or period that we awaken from our dream of rapture.

In boyhood Walter Scott was never attached to childish amusements. At seven years of age he went to school, under the tuition of a person named More, precentor to the kirk at Musselburgh.

Mr. Scott carried with him to school such knowledge as we may suppose a youth of seven years of age capable of acquiring from a father very attentive to his little favorite in every respect. In fact, he could read well, and had such a propensity for drawing, that all his books were scribbled over with rude figures of men, houses, and trees, whenever he could get a pen or a pencil. At this early age we may mark this fact as the dawning of poetic genius: poetry and painting are as closely allied as music and love.

This taste for drawing did not advance with his advancing years, though we have seen a sketch of his of the port of Loch Lomond, taken from the west side, in 1803, very well executed; it is done on a blank leaf of Hector Mackneill's poems, and is now in possession of Captain Fullerton. Like Milton, Swift, and other great geniuses, he was, as the latter said of himself, at school, "very justly celebrated for stupidity." Perhaps much of his stupidity was owing to the want of talent in his master, or, rather, his want of method in the art of teaching. Be that as it may, young Scott certainly did not shine in his early career as a scholar. He learnt to read, write, and attained a tolerable knowledge of the mathematics. In Latin he did not advance far until his tenth year, when Dr. Patterson, a clergyman of the church of Scotland, succeeded to the school at Musselburgh, and the progress of young Scott became rapid.

Dr. Blair, on a visit at Musselburgh, shortly after Mr. Patterson took charge of the school, accompanied by some friends, examined several of the pupils; he paid particular attention to young Scott. Mr. Patterson thought it was the youth's stupidity occupied the doctor's time, and said, "My predecessor tells me that boy has the thickest skull in the school." "May be so," replied Dr. Blair, "but through that thick skull I can discern many bright rays of future genius."

2378. HENRY KIRKE WHITE.

This youthful bard, whose premature death was so sincerely regretted by every admirer of genius, manifested an ardent love of reading in his infancy; it was a passion to which every thing else gave way.

"I could fancy," says his eldest sister, "I see him in his little chair, with a large book upon his knee, and my mother calling, 'Henry, my love, come to dinner;' which was repeated so often without being regarded, that she was obliged to change the tone of her voice before she could rouse him.

"When he was about seven, he would creep unperceived into the kitchen, to teach the servant to read and write; and he continued this for some time before it was discovered that he had been thus laudably employed.

"He wrote a tale of a Swiss emigrant, which was probably his first composition, and gave it to this servant, being ashamed to show it to his mother." "The consciousness of genius," says Mr. Southey, "is always at first accompanied with this diffidence; it is a sacred, solitary feeling. No forward child, however extraordinary the promise of his childhood, ever produced any thing truly great."

When Henry was about eleven years old, he one day wrote a separate theme for every boy in his class, which consisted of about twelve or fourteen. The master said he had never known them write so well upon any subject before, and could not refrain from expressing his astonishment at the excellence of Henry's own. At the age of thirteen he wrote a poem, "On being confined to School one pleasant Morning in Spring," from which the following is an extract:—

"How gladly would my soul forego
All that arithmeticians know,
Or stiff grammarians quaintly teach,
Or all that industry can reach,
To taste each morn of all the joys
That with the laughing sun arise,
And unconstrained to rove along
The bushy brakes and glens among,
And woo the Muse's gentle power,
In unfrequented rural bowers!
But, ah! such heaven-approaching joys
Will never greet my longing eyes;
Still will they cheat in vision fine,
Yet never but in fancy shine."

The parents of Henry were anxious to put him to some trade; and when he was in his fourteenth year he was placed at a stocking loom, with the view, at some future period, of getting a situation in a hosier's warehouse; but the youth did not conceive that nature intended to doom him to spend seven years of his life in folding up stockings, and he remonstrated with his friends against the employment.

Young White was soon removed from the stocking loom to the office of a solicitor, which was a less obnoxious employment. He became a member of a literary society in Nottingham, and delivered an extempore lecture on genius; in which he displayed so much talent, that he received the unanimous thanks of the society, and they elected this young Roscius of oratory their professor of literature. At the age of fifteen he gained a silver medal for a translation from Horace; and the following year a pair of globes, for an imaginary tour from London to Edinburgh. He determined upon trying for this prize one evening when at tea with his family; and at supper he read to them his performance.

In his seventeenth year he published a small volume of poems, which possessed considerable merit. Soon after, he was sent to Cambridge, and entered at St. John's College, where he made the most rapid progress. But the intensity of his studies ruined his constitution, and he fell a victim to his ardent thirst for knowledge. He died about two years after, aged twenty-one, leaving behind him several poems and letters, which gave earnest of the high rank he would have attained in the republic of letters, had his life been spared.

2379. MILLER, THE BASKET MAKER.

"Thomas Miller I looked at with no ordinary interest. He had just then made a sensation in London, and was among the lions of the day. His history is somewhat singular. I shall avail myself of the privilege afforded by this discursive sort of scribbling, and relate the chief incidents connected with it, as I afterwards heard them from his own lips.

"I had read, with considerable interest, a work entitled A Day in the Woods, by Thomas Miller, Basket Maker, and felt not a little delighted with his vivid and graphic descriptions of rural and forest scenery. Nothing so natural and fresh had appeared in our literature. Even Bloomfield failed to convey so happy an idea of country life as Miller.

"One morning, I inquired his address, and determined to call on Mr. Miller, trusting to the frankness and amiability which pervaded every page of his book for his excuse of my introducing myself to him. I had a long walk down St. George's road, Southwark, on a dismal, drizzling, November day; and that was no joke, as any one familiar with a foggy day, at that time of the year, in London, can testify.

"After much inquiry, I found out Elliott's Row, to which place I had been directed; and when I had ascertained the group of houses, in one of which the poet resided, I had great difficulty in finding out the exact dwelling. The very people who lived next door to Miller did not know of such a person, although half of literary London was ringing with his praises, and crying him up as a newly-found genius. Such is fame in the mighty metropolis.

"At length, on inquiring at a humble but neat looking domicile, I was told by an interesting looking little girl that her father (the poet) resided there. I entered, asked to see him, and presently he came down stairs.

"I introduced myself, told him I had read his works, which delighted me by their truthfulness, and much desired to see him before I left town. He very kindly shook me by the hand, and after some agreeable chat, we made an appointment to dine with each other at a chop-house in the Strand, the next day. The story of his life, which he told me on the latter occasion, was to the following effect:—

"He was born on the borders of Sherwood Forest, where Robin Hood and his merry men flourished in times of old. From childhood (he was then about five or six and twenty) he had loved to wander in the green woods and lanes, and, unconsciously, his poetic sensibilities were thus fostered. His station in life was very humble, and at an early age he learnt basket making, by which occupation he earned a bare subsistence. He married early, and the increasing wants of a family led him to try the experiment of publishing some poems and sketches; but, owing to want of patronage, no benefit resulted to him.

"He at last determined to go to London—that fancied paradise of young authors—that great reservoir of talent—too often that grave of genius. Thither he went, leaving, for the present, his family behind, and, alighting from the stage coach, found himself in the Strand, a stranger among thousands, with just seven shillings and sixpence in his pocket. He soon made the melancholy discovery that a stranger in London, however great may be his talents, stands but a poor chance of getting on without the assistance of some helping hand; so, to keep body and soul together, he set to work making baskets.

"In this occupation he continued some time, occasionally sending some little contribution to the periodicals. At length Fortune smiled on her patient wooer. One day, while he was engaged in bending his osiers, he was surprised by a visit from Mr. W. H. Harrison, editor of the Friendship's Offering, an English annual. That gentleman had seen one or two pieces of Miller's, and been struck with their originality. He found him out, after much labor, and asked him to write a poem for the forthcoming volume of the Offering.

"Miller told me that he was so poor then that he had not pen, ink, or paper; so he got some whitish-brown paper, in which sugar had been wrapped, mixed up some soot with water for his ink, and then sat down,—the back of a bellows serving for a desk,—and wrote his well-known lines on an Old Fountain. These beautiful verses being completed, he sealed his letter with some moistened bread for a wafer, and forwarded them, with many hopes and fears, to the editor. They were immediately accepted, and Mr. Harrison forwarded the poet two guineas for them. 'I never had been so rich in my life before,' said the basket maker to me, 'and I fancied some one would hear of my fortune, and try to rob me of it; so, at night, I barred the door, and went to bed, but did not sleep all night from delight and fear.'

"Miller, still, to his honor, continued the certain occupation of basket making; but he was noticed by many—among others by Lady Blessington, who sent for him, recommended his book, and did him substantial service. 'Often,' said Miller, 'have I been sitting in Lady Blessington's splendid drawing-room, in the morning, talking and laughing as familiarly as in the old house at home, and, on the same evening, I might have been seen standing on Westminster bridge, between an apple vender and a baked potato merchant, vending my baskets.

"Miller now tried his hand at a novel,—Royston Gower,—which succeeded well, and then another—Fair Rosamond. He read diligently at the British Museum, and was perseveringly industrious. Jerdan took him by the hand, and he contributed a good deal to the Literary Gazette. He is, at the time I write, himself a publisher in Newgate Street, London.

"Miller is rather below the middle height; his face is round and rosy-looking, and he wears a profusion of light hair. He has a strong Nottinghamshire dialect, and possesses little or none of the awkwardness of a countryman. Next to William and Mary Howitt, he is the best writer on rural matters in England; and I am quite sure, that were his later works reprinted in America, they would have an extensive sale."

2380. LA FONTAINE.

La Fontaine, the poet, gave no promise in his youth of his future success. He was remarkable only for his dulness, and a certain easy, tractable good nature. His teachers pronounced him a well-disposed, but hopeless duncie; but his father, a very zealous and still more undiscriminating admirer of poetry, resolved that he should cultivate the Muses, and poor La Fontaine labored with all the complaisance of filial duty.

His efforts were vain. He could not produce a rhyme—he who afterwards rhymed with so much felicity and abundance, and who alone, of all the poets of his country before and since his time, has, by the dispositions of rhymes and the structure of his verses, completely vanquished the monotony of French versification.

The father did not abandon his cherished hopes until he beheld his son arrive at the age of nineteen, when, disappointed of making him a poet, he took the more feasible resolution of making him a priest. With no other fruits of education than such a stock of Latin as a dull boy could have acquired under a village schoolmaster, La Fontaine, now in his twentieth year, entered the religious order of the Oratoire, in passive compliance with the wishes of his father, and the example of his brother, a respectable ecclesiastic, who was affectionately attached to the poet, and who subsequently made over to him his share of their paternal inheritance.

It may be set down among the instances of La Fontaine's characteristic simplicity, that he did not perceive his utter inaptitude for such a life. He renounced the cloister, and returned to society after eighteen months.

It would appear that his father now thought once more of seeing him a poet, hopeless as this appeared to every body else, and to none more than to La Fontaine. His perseverance was strangely rewarded at last. An accident, or an incident, so described, called forth the latent fire at the age of twenty-two.

The best company of the neighborhood, and more particularly those who had any pretensions to literature, visited the father of La Fontaine. Among them, an officer of the garrison at Château Thierry, a great admirer and reciter of verse, brought with him the poems of Malherbe, and read before young La Fontaine the ode on the assassination of Henry IV., beginning,— "Que direz-vous, races futures."

Between the lyric spirit of the poet and the energy of the declaimer, La Fontaine's dormant faculty was suddenly excited. For some days he could think of nothing but the odes of Malherbe. He read them, recited them, spoke of them, with an unconscious and comic disregard of time, place, and persons. He commenced immediately writing odes in imitation of his great idol; and the happy father, on beholding his first essay, wept for joy.

2331. CHAMISSO.

Chamisso, the German author and poet, was nine years old when his impoverished family fled from France. At thirteen, he studied drawing and miniature painting at Wurtzburg. At fifteen, after having been for some time a pupil in the painting department of the royal porcelain manufactory of Berlin, he became one of the Queen of Prussia's pages. At seventeen, he entered the Prussian army; three years afterwards, (1801,) he was a lieutenant, and his family returned to France. The first occupation of the young Prussian officer was to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the German tongue; for at twenty years of age he was not yet perfectly familiar with the language, in the literature of which he was afterwards to take so prominent a place.

In 1810, he was called to France, to fill a professorship in the new college of Napoleonville. His errand was again a fruitless one, but the journey made him acquainted with Madame de Staël and M. de Barante, the historian, then prefect of Vendée. With the latter he spent the winter of 1810-11 agreeably enough, instructing the future translator of Schiller in German literature, and filling up his leisure with the perusal of old fabliaux and romances of chivalry. He was also a welcome guest of Madame de Staël's at Chaumont and Blois; and after her banishment he followed her to Geneva and Coppet.

Many eventful years pass away. Whilst he was writing verses for his young wife, and arranging the Herbaria of the Museum of Berlin, Chamisso, it is probable, scarcely recollected his quality of French emigrant. He was agreeably reminded of this, in the autumn of 1825, by a call to Paris to receive one hundred thousand francs lodged to his credit by the commissioners of the Indemnity Fund. He was welcomed with marked distinction by the learned world of Paris, and passed his time far more pleasantly than he had done when he visited the luxurious capital in his needy and obscure youth. The letters he wrote home were filled with accounts of the many remarkable things, literary and theatrical, social and political, which Paris presented to his view at that stirring period.

But in the midst of all this excitement he did not lose sight of the least every-day detail of his beloved home. "Don't forget," he says, writing to his wife,—"don't forget the roses; don't forget the children's letters; don't forget to strew food for the sparrows on my window. I shall return to you the same as I left you: let me find every thing again just as it was."

2332. COWPER AND HIS TORMENTOR.

Cowper, in his Memoirs of his Early Life, gives an affecting instance of that mental enthrallment which boys of sensitive parts are too often doomed to suffer in public schools, from the arrogance and cruelty of their senior schoolmates. "My chief affliction," he says, "consisted in my being singled out from all the other boys, by a lad about fifteen years of age, as a proper object upon whom he might let loose the cruelty of his temper.

William Cowper.

"One day, as I was sitting alone on a bench in the school, melancholy, and almost ready to weep at the recollection of what I had already suffered, and expecting at the same time my tormentor every moment, these words of the Psalmist came into my mind: 'I will not be afraid of what man can do unto me.' I applied this to my own case, with a degree of trust and confidence in God that would have been no disgrace to a much more experienced Christian. Instantly I perceived in myself a briskness of spirits and a cheerfulness which I had never before experienced, and took several paces up and down the room with joyful alacrity—his gift in whom I trusted.

"Happy would it have been for me if this early effort towards the blessed God had been frequently repeated by me; but, alas! it was the first and last instance of the kind between infancy and manhood. The cruelty of this boy, which he had long practised in so secret a manner that no person suspected it, was at length discovered. He was expelled from the school, and I was taken from it."

2333. RABELAIS AND THE CHANCELLOR.

At Montpellier no one can obtain the degree of doctor in medicine without first receiving seven times the hat and robe of Rabelais, which are deposited in the Castle of Morac. Such is the veneration paid to his memory by those who have the regulation of that academy. The reason is this:—

Some students created such frequent disturbances in the city, as gave rise to many complaints being made against them at court; the consequence of which was, that several of the students were confined, and the privileges of the Academy debarred them. Rabelais was then at Montpellier, and, though a very merry fellow, deeply partook of the sorrow which these events occasioned the academicians.

He resolved to make an attempt to obtain the release of the students, and a reinstatement in their accustomed privileges ; for which purpose he adopted the subsequent scheme :—

He dressed himself as a doctor, went to Paris, and presented himself at the door of the Chancellor du Prat. The Swiss attendant, who mistook him for a fool, roughly demanded his business ; to which Rabelais answered in pure Latin, which the Swiss not understanding, sent for one of the chancellor's officers : when he came, Rabelais spoke to him in Greek, which being equally incomprehensible both to the Swiss and officer, they sent for one who understood Greek perfectly ; to him the doctor then spoke Hebrew ; and when they brought one who spoke Hebrew, he spoke Arabic. In this manner he exhausted all the knowledge of the chancellor's house.

The chancellor, being informed of the whole proceedings, ordered the doctor to be brought to him, when Rabelais made an elegant remonstrance in favor of the students of Montpellier, and obtained an immediate order for their liberation, with a re-establishment in all the liberties of which they had been deprived.

2384. CHARLES DIBDIN.

Charles Dibdin was born in Southampton, England, on the 15th of March, 1745. His father, a man of high respectability, had a very numerous progeny, Charles being his eighteenth child. One of his brothers, Thomas Dibdin, many years older than himself, was the captain of an Indiaman. His death gave occasion to the well-known song "Tom Bowling," in which his character is beautifully painted.

With the view of his entering the church, Dibdin was placed at the College of Winchester, where his love of music first displayed itself. His musical propensities being nourished by the popularity which his attainments—slight as they then must have been—gained for him, he abandoned his ecclesiastical studies, and devoted himself wholly to his favorite pursuit, resolving to depend on it as his means of subsistence.

He afterwards was employed as chorus singer at Covent Garden Theatre, and here he made his first attempts at musical composition. Being successful, he gave it his principal attention, and prior to 1787 Dibdin composed and wrote a variety of musical and dramatic pieces for the theatres ; after which time he seems to have entered into speculations of building and managing theatres on his own responsibility.

He made a tour through various parts of England, giving entertainments, consisting of songs and recitations—the embryo, as they might be called, of the entertainments which afterwards became so famous. This tour was not very profitable, one of the obstacles to his success being an odd one : he was very generally taken for an impostor and itinerant adventurer, who was trying to make money by personating the celebrated Mr. Dibdin ; and, strange to say, Dibdin, with all his talent, failed in various places to persuade the public that he was the real Simon pure. The public was, however, subsequently awakened to the merit of this novel species of entertainment, and the remainder of his series was eminently successful.

In 1805, when at the age of sixty, Dibdin discontinued his entertainments, and sold his stock, and the copyright of three hundred and sixty songs, for eighteen hundred pounds, with one hundred pounds per annum, for three years after, for such composition as he might produce during that period. At this time he also enjoyed the annual pension of two hundred pounds, given him by government in 1803. This pension was, however, soon afterwards withdrawn, and being thus deprived of so material a part of his income, he found himself, in 1808, obliged to resume his professional labors.

In 1813, he had a paralytic stroke, under the effects of which he lingered till his death, on the 25th July, 1814, at the age of sixty-nine.

The immense body of lyric poetry which Dibdin produced is exceedingly various, not only in style and subject, but in quality. But it was in his sea songs that his greatness was most conspicuous. By these, sung as they were by all, from the proud admiral to the humble cabin boy, he elevated the condition of the British sailor, and diffused an esprit de corps that led to the most important results.

2385. TOM DIBDIN.

"At Covent Garden Market," says J. H. Sherburne, "is the stall where once stood, in his latter days, the celebrated Tom Dibdin, of National Song memory, selling his sea songs at a penny a piece to keep him from the poorhouse. Sailors from Wapping, and the invalids from Greenwich Hospital, were in the habit, two or three times a week, of coming up to Covent Garden to shake honest Tom by the hand, listen to one of his patriotic songs, join heartily in the chorus, to the amusement of the market people, then purchase a goodly number to take back to their friends to sing to their children at their own fireside, and on board the hulks."

England was, in a great measure, indebted for her many signal victories, under Lord Nelson, Duncan, and other British naval commanders, to the influence of Tom Dibdin's soul-inspiring sea songs ; yet the veteran poet, to the lasting disgrace of England, and the officers of the British navy, was permitted to die in a garret, in abject poverty, and was buried at the expense of the corporation of London.

During England's long war with France and her allies, the admiralty caused Dibdin's sea songs to be purchased and distributed through the British fleets, and premiums to be given to those among the crews who would commit and sing these songs during a cruise. Nelson, while bearing down on an enemy's fleet of superior force, would pipe all hands through the fleet, then order a stiff allowance of grog, and cause one of Dibdin's songs to be sung, the whole crew joining in full chorus.

Broadsides have been given and received while the gallant tars, at their guns, would be sounding forth, amid the din of battle, the inspiring chorus, which, echoing along the bloody decks, would be continued by the wounded and dying to cheer on their messmates to victory or death.

Among all the costly and splendid variegated marble monuments that adorn the magnificent St. Paul's and the venerable Westminster Abbey, not even among the tablets that decorate the Poets' Corner is to be seen, or can be pointed out, the name of Tom Dibdin, the national poetic English songster, so celebrated during the English wars.

2386. GOLDSMITH'S HOME

Lissoy was the name of the farm where the father of Goldsmith, after he had succeeded to the rectory of Kilkenny, removed and resided. It is on the road leading from Ballymahon to Athlone, and about midway between these two towns. The identity of Lissoy with the scene of the poem of the Deserted Village, in the general belief of the people of the vicinity, is corroborated by an anecdote told by a traveller some years ago in the United States.

Ruins of the House at Lissoy, where Goldsmith spent his youth.

"The Deserted Village," says Mr. Best, an Irish clergyman, "relates to the scenes in which Goldsmith was an actor. Auburn is a poetical name for the village of Lissoy, in the county of Westmeath, barony of Kilkenny West. The name of the schoolmaster was Paddy Burns. I remember him well. He was, indeed, a man severe to view. A woman called Walsey Cruse kept the alehouse.

"Imagination fondly stoops to trace
The parlor splendor of that festive place."

I have been often in the house. The hawthorn bush was remarkably large, and stood opposite the alehouse.

I was once riding with Brady, titular Bishop of Ardagh, when he observed to me, "Ma foy! Best, this huge overgrown bush is mightily in the way; I will order it to be cut down." "What, sir!" said I, "cut down Goldsmith's hawthorn bush, that supplies so beautiful an image in the Deserted Village?" "Ma foy!" exclaimed the bishop, "is that the hawthorn bush? Then ever let it be sacred from the edge of the axe, and evil to him that would cut from it a branch."

2337. COLERIDGE AT SCHOOL.

In Howitt's Homes and Haunts of British Poets, we find the following incidents of the early life of Coleridge:—

Books were the poor fellow's solace for the flagellation of the masters and the neglect of the boys, amongst whom Lamb was not to be reckoned, for he was very fond of him, and kind to him. "From eight to fourteen I was a playless dreamer," he observes, "a helluo librorum, my appetite for which was indulged by a singular incident: a stranger, who was struck by my conversation, made me free of a circulating library in King Street, Cheapside."

"This incident," says Colman, "was indeed singular. Going down the Strand in one of his day-dreams, fancying himself swimming the Hellespont, thrusting his hands before him as in the act of swimming, one hand came in contact with a gentleman's pocket. The gentleman seized his hand: turning round, he looked at him with some anger, exclaiming, 'What, so young, and so wicked!' at the same time accusing him of an attempt to pick his pocket.

"The frightened boy sobbed out his denial of the intention, and explained to him how he thought himself Leander trying to swim the Hellespont.

"The gentleman was so struck and delighted with the novelty of the thing, and with the simplicity and intelligence of the boy, that he subscribed, as before stated, to the library; in consequence of which Coleridge was further enabled to indulge his love of reading. It is stated that at this school he laid the foundation of those bodily sufferings, which made his life one of sickness and torture, and occasioned his melancholy resort to opium. He greatly injured his health, it is said, and reduced his strength, by his bathing excursions; but is it not quite as likely that the deficiency of food, and those holidays when he was turned out to starvation, had quite as much to do with it?

"On one occasion he swam across the New River in his clothes, and dried them on his back. This is supposed to have laid the foundation of his rheumatic pains; but may not that lying out all night in the rain at a former day have been even a still earlier predisposing cause? However that may be, he says that full half the time from seventeen to eighteen was passed in the sick ward of Christ's Hospital, afflicted with jaundice and rheumatic fever."

2338. COLERIDGE IN THE PULPIT.

"It so happened," says Cottle, "that I heard Mr. Coleridge preach his first, and also his second sermon, with some account of which I shall now furnish the reader; and that without concealment or embellishment. But it will be necessary, as an illustration of the whole, to convey some previous information, which, as it regards most men, would be too unimportant to relate.

"When Mr. Coleridge first came to Bristol, he had evidently adopted, at least to some considerable extent, the sentiments of Socinus. By persons of that persuasion, therefore, he was hailed as a powerful accession to their cause. It was determined by them that Mr. Coleridge, at the commencement of his brilliant career, should be respectfully requested to preach his inaugural discourse in the Unitarian chapel at Bath.

"The invitation being given and accepted, I felt some curiosity to witness the firmness with which he would face a large and intelligent audience, and, in the intellectual sense, grace his canonical robes. No conveyance having been provided, and wishing the young ecclesiastic to proceed to the place of his exhibition with some decent respectability, I agreed with a common friend, the late Mr. Charles Danvers, to take Mr. Coleridge over to Bath in a chaise.

"The morning of the important day unfolded, and in due time we arrived at the place of our destination. When on the way to the chapel, a man stopped Charles Danvers, and asked him if he could tell where the Rev. Mr. Coleridge preached. 'Follow the crowd,' said Danvers, and walked on. Mr. Coleridge wore his blue coat and white waistcoat; but what was Mr. Jardine's surprise, when he found that his young probationer peremptorily refused to wear the hide-all sable gown! Expostulation was unavailing, and the minister ascended to the pulpit in his colored clothes.

"Considering that it had been announced, on the preceding Sunday, that 'the Rev. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, from Cambridge University,' would preach there on this day, we naturally calculated on an overflowing audience; but it proved to be the most meagre congregation I had ever seen. The reader will but imperfectly appreciate Mr. C.'s discourse, without the previous information that this year (1796) was a year of great scarcity, and consequent privation among the poor; on which subject the sermon was designed impressively to bear. And now the long-expected service commenced.

"The prayer, without being intended, was formal, unimpressive, and undevotional; the singing was languid; but we expected that the sermon would arouse the inattentive and invigorate the dull. The moment for announcing the text arrived. Our curiosity was excited. With little less than famine in our land, our hearts were appalled at hearing the words, 'When they shall be hungry, they shall fret themselves, and curse their king and their God, and look upward.' (Isa. viii. 21.) Mr. Winterbotham, a little before, had been thrown into prison for the freedom of his political remarks in a sermon at Plymouth, and we were half fearful whether, in his impetuous current of feeling, some stray expressions might not subject our friend to a like visitation.

"Our fears were groundless. Strange as it may appear in Mr. Coleridge's vigorous mind, the whole discourse consisted of little more than a lecture on the corn laws, which some time before he had delivered in Bristol, at the assembly-room.

"Returning from our edifying discourse to a tavern dinner, we were privileged with more luminous remarks on this inexhaustible subject; but something better—worse, as the reader's taste may be—is still in reserve. After dinner, Mr. Coleridge remarked that he should have no objection to preaching another sermon that afternoon.

"In the hope that something redeeming might still appear, and the best reserved for the last, we encouraged the proposal, when he rang the bell, and on the waiter appearing, he was sent, with Mr. Coleridge's compliments to the Rev. Mr. Jardine, to say, 'If agreeable, Mr. Coleridge would give his congregation another sermon this afternoon, on the hair powder tax.*'

"On the departure of the waiter, I was fully assured that Mr. Jardine would smile, and send a civil excuse, satisfied that he had quite enough of political economy, with blue coat and white waistcoat, in the morning; but to my great surprise, the waiter returned with Mr. Jardine's compliments, saying he 'should be happy to hear Mr. Coleridge.'

"Now, all was hurry lest the concourse should be kept waiting. What surprise will the reader feel, on understanding that, independently of ourselves and Mr. Jardine, there were but seventeen persons present, including men, women, and children! We had, as we expected, a recapitulation of the old lecture, with the exception of its humorous appendages, in reprobation of the hair powder tax; and the twice-told tale, even to the ear of friendship, in truth sounded rather dull.

"Two or three times Mr. C. looked significantly towards our seat, when, fearful of being thrown off my guard into a smile, I held down my head, from which position I was aroused, when the sermon was about half over, by some gentleman throwing back the door of his pew, and walking out of the chapel. In a few minutes after, a second individual did the same; and soon after a third door flew open, and the listener escaped. At this moment, affairs looked so very ominous, that we were almost afraid Mr. Jardine himself would fly, and that none but ourselves would fairly sit it out."

2350. COLERIDGE GIVING UP THE MINISTRY.

When the Rev. Mr. Rowe, of Shrewsbury, the Unitarian minister, came to settle in Bristol, in 1798, Mr. Coleridge was strongly recommended by his friends of that persuasion to offer himself as Mr. Rowe's successor; and he accordingly went on probation to Shrewsbury.

Mr. Poole, two or three years before, had introduced Mr. Coleridge to Mr. Thomas Wedgewood. This gentleman formed a high opinion of Mr. C.'s talents, and felt an interest in his welfare. At the time Mr. Coleridge was hesitating whether or not he should persist in offering himself to the Shrewsbury congregation, and so finally settle down into a Unitarian minister, Mr. T. Wedgewood, having heard of the circumstance, and fearing that a pastoral engagement might operate unfavorably on his literary pursuits, interfered, as will appear by the following letter of Mr. Coleridge to Mr. Wade:—

My very dear Friend:—

"This last fortnight has been very eventful. I received one hundred pounds from Josiah Wedgewood, in order to prevent the necessity of my going into the ministry. I have received an invitation from Shrewsbury to be minister there; and after fluctuations of mind, which have for nights together robbed me of my sleep, and I am afraid of health, I have at length returned the order to Mr. Wedgewood, with a long letter, explanatory of my conduct, and accepted the Shrewsbury invitation. . . ."

Mr. T. Wedgewood, still adhering to his first opinion, that Mr. Coleridge's acceptance of the proposed engagement would seriously obstruct his literary efforts, sent Mr. C. a letter, in which himself and his brother, Mr. Josiah Wedgewood, promised, conjointly, to allow him, for his life, one hundred and fifty pounds a year.

This decided Mr. Coleridge to reject the Shrewsbury invitation. He was oppressed with grateful emotions to these his liberal benefactors, and always spoke, in particular, of the late Mr. T. Wedgewood as being one of the best talkers, and as possessing one of the acutest minds he had known.

* A law just then passed.

§ 235. FIRST DEVELOPMENTS AND EFFORTS OF GENIUS.

2390. DRYDEN.

This poet, when a boy at Westminster school, was put with others to write a copy of verses on the miracle of the conversion of water into wine. Being a great truant, he had not time to compose his verses; and, when brought up, he had only made one line of Latin, and two of English:—

" videt et erubet lympba pudica Deum ; "

" The modest water, awed by power divine, Beheld its God, and blushed itself to wine ; "

which so pleased the master, that, instead of being angry, he said it was a presage of future greatness, and gave the youth a crown on this occasion.

2391. GOLDSMITH'S RETURN TO ENGLAND AND SUBSEQUENT TRIALS.

After two years' wanderings on the continent, Goldsmith returned to England, and with but a few halfpence in his pocket, he launched himself on the great metropolis. How for weeks or months he fared, what shifts he made for bed and board, he has never told us. Many years afterwards, in the days of his social elevation, he startled a polite circle at Sir Joshua Reynolds's by humorously dating an anecdote about the time he "lived among the beggars of Axe Lane." Such may have been the desolate quarters with which he was fain to content himself when thus adrift upon the town, with but a few halfpence in his pocket.

The next we hear of him, he became an usher in a school, but soon left it. Next we find him for a few months assistant in the laboratory of a chemist; and next he is practising medicine among the poor of Bankside, Southwark. "His old school-mate and college companion, Beattie, who used to aid him with his purse at the university, met him about this time, decked out in the tarnished finery of a second-hand suit of green and gold, with a shirt and neckcloth which he had worn a fortnight.

Poor Goldsmith endeavored to assume a prosperous air in the eyes of his early associate. He was practising physic, he said, "and doing very well!" At this moment, poverty was pinching him to the bone in spite of his practice and his dirty finery. His fees were necessarily small, and ill paid, and he was fain to seek some precarious assistance from his pen. Here his quondam fellow-student, Dr. Sleigh, was again of service, introducing him to some of the booksellers, who gave him occasional, though starving employment.

According to tradition, however, his most efficient patron just now was a journeyman printer, one of his poor patients of Bankside, who had formed a good opinion of his talents, and perceived his poverty and his literary shifts. The printer was in the employ of Mr. Samuel Richardson, the author of Pamela, Clarissa, and Sir Charles Grandison; who combined the novelist and the publisher, and was in flourishing circumstances. Through the journeyman's intervention, Goldsmith is said to have become acquainted with Richardson, who employed him as reader and corrector of the press, at his printing establishment in Salisbury Court—an occupation which he alternated with his medical duties. Being admitted occasionally to Richardson's parlor, he began to form literary acquaintances, among whom the most important was Dr. Young, the author of Night Thoughts, a poem then in the height of fashion. It is not probable, however, that much familiarity took place at the time between the literary lion of the day and the poor Æsculapius of Bankside, the humble corrector of the press. Still the communion with literary men had its effect to set his imagination teeming.

2392. ALFRED THE GREAT.

Alfred was wholly ignorant of letters until he was twelve years of age. He was greatly loved by his parents, who fondled the boy for his beauty; but that instruction which the poorest child can now acquire with the greatest ease was withheld from the son of the Anglo-Saxon king. Alfred was taught to wind the horn and bend the bow, to hunt and to hawk; and he acquired great skill in the "noble art of the chase," considered throughout the middle ages as the most necessary accomplishment of the nobility, while book learning was thought of little use to them.

Alfred's eager mind, however, did not remain unemployed. Though he could not read, he could attend; and he listened eagerly to the verses which were recited in his father's hall by the minstrels and the glee-men—the masters of Anglo-Saxon song. Day and night would he employ in hearkening to these poems; he treasured them up in his memory, and, during the whole of his life, poetry continued to be his solace and amusement in trouble and care.

It chanced, one day, that Alfred's mother, Osburga, showed to him and his brothers a volume of Anglo-Saxon poetry which she possessed. "He who first can read the book shall have it," said she. Alfred's attention was attracted by the bright gilding and coloring of one of the illuminated capital letters. He was delighted with its gay appearance, and inquired of his mother if she would really keep her word. She confirmed the promise, and put the book into his hands; and he applied so steadily to the task that the book became his own. In spite, however, of his great diligence and perseverance, he was never able wholly to recover this loss of time; and he was accustomed to say, that of all the hardships, privations, and misfortunes that had befallen him, there was none which he felt so grievous as this, the enforced idleness of his youth, when his intellect would have been fitted to receive the lesson, and his time unoccupied.

2393. ISAAC WATTS.

Dr. Watts's inclination for learning was very early displayed. It is stated, that while he was very young, before he could speak plain, when he had any money given him, he would say to his mother, "A book, a book! Buy a book." He began to learn Latin at four years old. When about seven or eight, he was desired by his mother to write her some lines, as was the custom with the other boys, after the school hours were over, for which she used to reward them with a farthing. Isaac obeyed, and presented her with the following couplet:—

Dr. Watts.

"I write not for a farthing, but to try
How I your farthing writers can outvie."

It is even said that he turned every thing into poetry. His father, who was averse to so much rhyming, at length forbade it. But to no purpose; it was but rhyming still. At last he threatened punishment; but as the threat did not operate with sufficient power, the punishment was to be executed. But even here he versified. On his knees, with the rod over his head, he only said.

"Dear father, on me pity take,
And I will no more verses make."

It is almost needless to say that the father was obliged to abandon his plan.

When about seven or eight years old, he wrote the following acrostic on his own name. How fully the prayer here offered was answered, even our youngest readers can hardly need to be told.

"I am a vile, polluted lump of earth;
So I've continued ever since my birth;
Although Jehovah's grace does daily give me,
As sure this monster Satan will deceive me:
Come, therefore, Lord, from Satan's claws relieve me.

Wash me in thy blood, O Christ,
And grace divine impart,
Then search and try the corners of my heart,
That I in all things may be fit to do
Service to thee, and sing thy praises too."

2394. WALTER SCOTT'S BEGINNING.

It is related of Sir Walter Scott that, not long before his Lay of the Last Minstrel made its appearance, while crossing the Frith of Forth in a ferry-boat, with a friend, they proposed to beguile the time by writing a number of verses on a given subject; and, at the end of an hour's poring and hard study, the product of Sir Walter's (then Mr.

Scott) fertile brain, adding thereto the labors of his friend, was six lines. "It is plain," said Scott to his fellow-laborer, then unconscious of his great powers, "that you and I need not think of getting our living by writing poetry."

2395. POPE'S EARLY POPULARITY.

"A remarkable fact," says Professor Wilson, "is the early acknowledgment of Pope by his contemporaries. At sixteen he is a poet for the world by his Pastorals, and at that age he has a literary adviser in Walsh, and a literary patron in Trumbull. He does not seem to court. He is courted. He is the intimate friend, we do not know how soon, of scholars and polite writers, of men and women high in birth, in education, in station. Scarce twenty, by his Essay on Criticism, he assumes a chair in the school of the Muses. At five and twenty, he is an acknowledged dictator of polite letters.

"So early, rapid, untroubled an ascension to fame it would require some research to find a parallel to. Our literature has it not. And this acknowledgment, gratulation, triumph, which friends and circles, and the confined literary world of that day in this country, could furnish, a whole age, and a whole country, and a whole world, the extended republic of letters, confirm.

"At the age of thirty-seven, Pope declares that henceforward he will write from, as well as to, his own mind. The Essay on Man follows. It expresses that graver study of the universal subject, MAN, which appeared to Pope, now self-known, to be, for the time of poetical literature to which he came, the most practicable—for his own ability the aptest; and it embodies that part of anthropology which doubtless was the most congenial to his own inclination—the philosophical contemplation of man's nature, estate, destiny.

"The success of this enterprise was astonishing. Be the philosophy what and whose it may, the poem revived to the latest age of poetry the phenomenon of the first, when precept and maxim were modulated into verse, that they might write themselves in every brain, and live upon every tongue."

2396. KOSTROV.

Kostrov, the Russian poet, was the son of a vassal of the crown, and received the first part of his education at a common school; when, in consequence of the talents which he displayed, he was sent to the University of Moscow, where he soon obtained the rank of bachelor of arts.

His poetry is much admired, particularly a translation of Homer's Iliad. Only six books of this poem have been collected. It is said that Kostrov offered the last six books to a bookseller, and the liberal tradesman offered him only one hundred and fifty roubles, about seven guineas, for his labors; which so offended the poet, that he threw the translation into the fire.

2397. HOW COWLEY BECAME A POET.

Cowley became a poet by accident. In his mother's apartment he found, when very young, Spenser's Fairy Queen; and by a continual study of poetry, he became so enchanted of the muse that he grew irrecoverably a poet.

2398. POPE'S LOVE OF READING.

"When I had done with my priests," says Pope, "I took to reading by myself, for which I had a very great eagerness and enthusiasm, especially for poetry; and in a few years I had dipped into a great number of the English, French, Italian, Latin, and Greek poets. This I did without any design but that of pleasing myself, and got the languages by hunting after the stories in the several poets I read, rather than read the books to get the languages.

"I followed every where as my fancy led me, and was like a boy gathering flowers in the fields and woods, just as they fall in his way. These five or six years I still look upon as the happiest part of my life.

"In these rambles of mine through the poets, when I met with a passage or story that pleased me more than ordinarily, I used to endeavor to imitate it, or translate it into English; and this gave rise to my Imitations, published so long after."

2399. EXCITING CAUSE OF MRS. COWLEY'S GENIUS.

Early in the year 1776, eight years after their marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Cowley were one evening at the theatre, when the former warmly expressed the gratification he felt at the performance. "So delighted with this!" said Mrs. Cowley; "why, I could write as well myself."

He laughed: his laugh passed unnoticed at the moment, but the following morning it was answered by a sketch of the first act of the Runaway; and, though previously to this excitement Mrs. Cowley had never attempted a line of literary composition, she finished the entire play in a few weeks with much facility.

She afterwards wrote the farce of Who's the Dupe? Albina, a tragedy; the Maid of Arragon; the Fate of Sparta; the Belle's Stratagem; Which is the Man? A Bold Stroke for a Husband; More Ways than One; School for Graybeards; and a Day in Turkey—all stock pieces.

2400. SIR WALTER SCOTT.

When Sir Walter Scott was a schoolboy, between ten and eleven years of age, his mother one morning saw him standing still in the street, and looking at the sky, in the midst of a tremendous thunder-storm. She called to him repeatedly, but he did not seem to hear: at length he returned into the house, and told his mother that if she would give him a pencil, he would tell her why he looked at the sky. She acceded to his request, and in a few minutes he laid on her lap the following lines:—

"Loud o'er my head what awful thunders roll!
What vivid lightnings flash from pole to pole!
It is thy voice, O God, that bids them fly;
Thy voice directs them through the vaulted sky;
Then let the good thy mighty power revere,
Let hardened sinners thy just judgments fear."

2401. BURNS AT SIXTEEN.

Burns, in his autobiography, informs us that a life of Hannibal, which he read when a boy, raised the first stirrings of his enthusiasm; and he adds, with his own fervid expression, that "the Life of Sir William Wallace poured a tide of Scottish prejudices into his veins, which would boil along them till the flood-gates of life were shut in eternal rest." He adds, speaking of his retired life in early youth, "This kind of life, the cheerless gloom of a hermit, and the toil of a galley slave, brought me to my sixteenth year, when love made me a poet."

2402. LOVE OF PRAISE STRONG IN MATURITY.

Even in advanced age, the man of genius often dwells on the nutritious praise he caught in his youth from veteran genius; that seed sinks deep into a genial soil, roots there, and, like the aloe, will flower at the end of life.

When Virgil was yet a youth, Cicero heard one of his eclogues, and exclaimed with his accustomed warmth, —

"Magna spes altera Roma!"

(The second great hope of Rome;) intending by the first either himself or Lucretius. The words of Cicero were the secret honey on which the imagination of Virgil fed for many a year; for, in one of his latest productions, the twelfth book of the Æneid, he applies these very words to Ascanias: the voice of Cicero had rung forever in his ear.

§ 236. HABITS IN COMPOSING AND CORRECTING.

2403. RAPID COMPOSING.

Burleigh House,
Where part of the Translation of Virgil was executed.

Lord Bolingbroke, happening to pay a morning visit to Dryden, whom he always respected, found him in unusual agitation of spirits, even to a trembling. On inquiring the cause, "I have been up all night," replied the old bard; "my musical friends made me promise to write them an Ode for the Feast of St. Cæcilia. I have been so struck with the subject which occurred to me, that I could not leave it till I had completed it. Here it is, finished at one sitting." And he immediately showed him this ode, which places the British lyric poetry above that of any other nation.

The rapidity, and yet the perspicuity, of the thoughts, the glow and expressiveness of the images, these certain marks of the first sketch of the master, conspire to corroborate the fact. It is not to be understood that this piece was not afterwards reconsidered, retouched, and corrected.

2404. SOME OF GOETHE'S PECULIARITIES.

The singular facility with which Goethe's poems were produced, resembling improvisation or inspiration rather than composition, has contributed in some cases, no doubt, to enhance their peculiar charm. "I had come," says he, "to regard the poetic talent dwelling in me entirely as nature; the rather that I was directed to look upon external nature as its proper subject. The exercise of this poetic gift might be stimulated and determined by occasion, but it flowed forth most joyfully, most richly, when it came involuntarily, or even against my will.

"I was so accustomed to say over a song to myself without being able to collect it again, that I sometimes rushed to the desk, and, without taking time to adjust a sheet that was lying crosswise, wrote the poem diagonally from beginning to end, without stirring from the spot. For the same reason I preferred to use a pencil, which gives the characters more willingly; for it had sometimes happened that the scratching and spattering of the pen would wake me from my somnambulistic poetizing, distract my attention, and stifle some small product in the birth. For such poetry I had a special reverence. My relation to it was something like a hen to the chickens, which, being fully hatched, she sees chirping about her. My former desire to communicate these things only by reading them aloud renewed itself again. To barter them for money seemed to me detestable."

2405. BYRON'S HABITS AS A POET.

Moore relates, in his Life of Lord Byron, that on a certain occasion he found him occupied with the History of Agathon, a romance, by Wieland; and, from some remarks made at the time, he seemed to be of opinion that Byron was reading the work in question as a means of furnishing suggestions to, and of quickening, his own imaginative powers. He then adds, "I am inclined to think it was his practice, when engaged in the composition of any work, to excite his vein by the perusal of others on the same subject or plan, from which the slightest hint caught by imagination, as he read, was sufficient to kindle there such a train of thought as but for that spark had never been awakened."

2406. THE DIFFICULTIES OF GREAT AUTHORS.

The sheet of paper is still extant on which Ariosto wrote an octave, describing a tempest in sixteen different ways; and it was the last which was preferred. Tasso formed rhymes with great difficulty. Yet these were men of genius. Who, with such examples before them, ought to be contented with first efforts?

2407. DOING OUR BEST.

Lydgate, a scholar of Chaucer, assures us, from what he heard, that the great poet would not suffer petty criticisms to "perturbe his reste." He did not like to groan over, and "pinch at every blot," but always "did his best."

"My master Chaucer, that founde ful many spot,
Hym lyste not gruche, nor pynch at every blot,
Nor move hymself to perturbe his reste;
I have perde tolde, but seyde alway his beste."

LYDGATE'S TROV.

2408. ADDISON AS A WRITER.

"Mr. Addison wrote very fluently," says Pope, "but he was sometimes very slow and scrupulous in correcting. He would show his verses to several friends, and would alter almost every thing that any of them hinted at as wrong. He seemed to be too diffident of himself, and too much concerned about his character as a poet; or, as he expressed it, 'too solicitous for that kind of praise, which, God knows, is a very little matter after all.'

2409. PETRARCH, TOSTATUS, AND DE VEGA.

Great authors have sometimes so much indulged in the seduction of the pen, that they appear to have found no substitute for the flow of their ink, and the delight of stamping blank paper with their hints, sketches, and ideas, the shadows of their mind.

Petrarch exhibits no solitary instance of this passion of the pen. "I read and I write," says he, "night and day; it is my only consolation. My eyes are heavy with watching, my hand is weary with writing. On the table where I dine, and by the side of my bed, I have all the materials for writing; and when I awake in the dark, I write, although I am unable to read the next morning what I have written." Petrarch was not always in his perfect senses.

The Spanish Tostatus wrote three times as many leaves as the number of days he had lived; and of Lope de Vega it is said this calculation came rather short. We hear of another who was unhappy that his lady had produced twins, from the circumstance that hitherto he had contrived to pair his labors with her own, but that now he was a book behindhand.

2410. LITERARY PHENOMENA.

"Wycherley used to read himself asleep o' nights, either in Montaigne, Rochefoucault, Seneca, or Gracian, for these were his favorite authors.

"He would read one or another of them in the evening, and the next morning, perhaps, write a copy of verses on some subject similar to what he had been reading, and have all the thoughts of the author, only expressed in a different mode, and that without knowing that he was obliged to any one for a single thought in the whole poem.

"I have experienced this in him several times," says Pope, "for I visited him, for a whole winter, almost every evening and morning, and look upon it as one of the strangest phenomena that I ever observed in the human mind."

2411. TASSO, POPE, AND DACIER.

It is curious to observe that the manuscripts of Tasso, which are still preserved, are illegible from the vast number of their corrections. The pages of Pope's manuscript Homer are a specimen of his continual corrections and critical razures.

The celebrated Madame Dacier never could satisfy herself in translating Homer; continually retouching the version, even in its happiest passages. There were several parts which she translated in six or seven ways; and she frequently noted in the margin, — "I have not yet done it."

2412. OVID.

Bayle, an experienced observer in literary matters, tells us, that correction is by no means practicable by some authors; as in the case of Ovid. In exile, his compositions were nothing more than spiritless repetitions of what he had formerly written. He confesses both negligence and idleness in the corrections of his works. The vivacity which animated his first productions failing when he revised his poems, he found correction too laborious, and he abandoned it.

2413. LITERARY CAUTIOUSNESS.

Pope published nothing until it had been a year or two before him, and even then the printer's proofs were very full of alterations; and, on one occasion, Dodsley, his publisher, thought it better to have the whole recomposed than make the necessary corrections.

Goldsmith considered four lines a day good work, and was seven years in beating out the pure gold of the Deserted Village.

2414. COMMONPLACE BOOKS.

Rose Street, London, in which Butler died.

"Butler, the author of Hudibras," said Johnson, "had a commonplace book, in which he had reposit-ed, not such events or precepts as are gathered by reading, but such remarks, similitudes, allusions, assemblages, or inferences, as occasion prompted or inclination produced; those thoughts which were generated in his own mind, and might be usefully applied to some future purpose. Such is the labor of those who write for immortality."

2415. SLOW COMPOSITION.

Malherbe, the father of French poetry, tormented himself by a prodigious slowness, and was employed rather in perfecting than in forming works. His muse is compared to a fine woman in the pangs of delivery. He exulted in this tardiness, and, after finishing a poem of one hundred verses, or a discourse of ten pages, he used to say he ought to repose for ten years.

2416. POPE'S INSPIRATION.

"The things," says Pope, "that I have written fastest have always pleased most. I wrote the Essay on Criticism fast, for I had digested all the matter in prose before I began upon it in verse. The Rape of the Lock was written rapidly: all the machinery, you know, was added afterwards; and the making that, and what was published before, hit so well together, is, I think, one of the greatest proofs of judgment of any thing I ever did. I wrote most of the Iliad fast, a great deal of it on journeys, from a little pocket Homer, and often forty or fifty verses on a morning in bed."

2417. INCENTIVES TO IMAGINATION.

It is a remarkable circumstance in the studies of men of genius, that previous to composition they have often awakened their imagination by the imagination of their favorite masters. By touching a magnet they become a magnet. A circumstance has been recorded of Gray, by Mr. Mathias, as worthy of all acceptance among the higher votaries of the divine art, when they are assured that Mr. Gray never sat down to compose any poetry without previously, and for a considerable time, reading the works of Spenser. But the circumstance was not unusual with Malherbe, Corneille, and Racine; and the most fervid verses of Homer, and the more tender of Euripides, were often repeated by Milton.

It is on the same principle of predisposing the mind, that many have first generated their feelings in the symphonies of music. Alfieri often, before he wrote, prepared his mind by listening to music—a circumstance recorded of others.

2418. HABITS OF COMPOSITION.

A Parisian letter-writer gives the following singular account of the celebrated Lamartine's literary habits:—

"For want of other matter, shall I tell you how Lamartine, the poet, writes his verses? He walks forth in his park, with pencil and pieces of paper: whatever ideas strike him he puts down on these. He throws them all into a box, and his secretary afterwards arranges them as he thinks best. They are then taken to a bookseller, and sold for fifteen or sixteen hundred pounds a work. Lamartine declares that he never read La Chute d'un Ange until it had been printed many months, and then only at the instance of his wife. Some say that he intends to read it this summer."

§ 237. PATRONAGE AND BENEFACTIONS.

2419. ROUSSEAU AND SHAKESPEARE.

Rousseau observed that his musical opera, the work of five or six weeks, brought him as much money as he had received for his Emilius, which had cost him twenty years of meditation, and three years of composition. This single fact represents a hundred.

In one of Shakspeare's sonnets he pathetically laments this compulsion of his necessities, which forced him on the trade of pleasing the public; and he illustrates this degradation by a novel image.

"'Chide fortune,' cried the bard,
'The guilty goddess of my harmless deeds,
That did not better for my life provide
Than public means which public manners breeds:
Thence comes it that my name receives a brand,
And almost thence my nature is subdued
To what it works in, like the dyer's hand.'"

2420. TWO LETTERS.

Letter from Frederic of Prussia.

Come, dear Rousseau. I offer you a house, a pension, and liberty.

The Answer of Rousseau.

Your majesty offers me an asylum, and promises me liberty; but you have a sword, and you are a king. You offer a pension to me, who never did you any good; but have you bestowed one on each of the brave men who have lost either a leg or an arm in your service?

2421. BOILEAU AND RACINE.

Boileau and Racine derived little or no profit from the booksellers. Boileau particularly, though fond of money, was so delicate on this point, that he gave all his works away. It was this that made him so bold in railing at those authors qui mettent leur Apollon aux gages d'un libraire, and he declared that he had inserted only these verses,—

"Je sois qu'un noble esprit peut sans honte et sans crime Tirer de son travail un tribut légitime."— to console Racine, who had received some profits from the printing of his tragedies. These profits were, however, inconsiderable: the truth is, the king remunerated the poets.

Racine's first royal mark of favor was an order signed by Colbert for six hundred livres, to give him the means of continuing his studies for the belles-lettres. He received, by an account found among his papers, above forty thousand livres from the cassette of the king, by the hand of the first valet de chambre. Besides these gifts, Racine had a pension of four thousand livres, as historiographer, and another pension as a man of letters.

2422. CHEAPNESS OF LITERARY WORKS.

"As a curious literary fact," says Cottle, "I might mention that the sale of the first edition of the Lyrical Ballads was so slow, and the severity of most of the reviews so great, that their progress to oblivion, notwithstanding the merit which I was quite sure they possessed, seemed to be ordained to be as rapid as it was certain. I had given thirty guineas for the copyright; but the heavy sale induced me at length to part with them at a loss—the largest proportion of the impression of five hundred to Mr. Arch, a London bookseller.

"On my reaching London, having an account to settle with Messrs. Longman and Rees, the booksellers of Paternoster Row, I sold them all my copyrights, which were valued as one lot, by a third party. On my next seeing Mr. Longman, he told me that, in estimating the value of the copyrights, Fox's Achmed and Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads were 'reckoned as nothing.' 'That being the case,' I replied, 'as both these authors are my personal friends, I should be obliged if you would return me again these two copyrights, that I may have the pleasure of presenting them to the respective writers.' Mr. Longman answered, with his accustomed liberality, 'You are welcome to them.' On my reaching Bristol, I gave Mr. Fox his receipt for twenty guineas, and on Coleridge's return from the north, I gave him Mr. Wordsworth's receipt for his thirty guineas; so that whatever advantage has arisen subsequently from the sale of this volume of the Lyrical Ballads, I am happy to say, has pertained exclusively to Mr. Wordsworth."

2423. DRYDEN'S REVENUE.

Dryden's situation, both as historiographer and poet laureate, was worth to him about three hundred pounds a year. It has been said he cleared by his Virgil about twelve hundred pounds, and had sixpence each line for his Fables. For some time he wrote a play at least every year; but in those days ten broad pieces was the usual highest price for a play; and if they got fifty pounds more in the acting, it was reckoned very well. His Virgil was one of the first books that had any thing of a subscription, and even that was a good deal on account of the prints.

2424. CRABBE.

Geo. Crabbe.

When the poet Crabbe once presented one of his poems to the late Lord Chancellor Thurlow, his lordship said, "I have no time to read verses; my avocations do not permit it." Crabbe instantly retorted, "There was a time when the encouragement of literature was considered to be a duty appertaining to the illustrious situation which your lordship holds." Thurlow frankly acknowledged his error, and nobly returned it. He observed, "I ought to have noticed your poem, and I heartily forgive your rebuke." In proof of his sincerity he presented him with one hundred pounds, and subsequently gave him preferment in the church.

2425. LOUIS PHILIPPE AND DELAVIGNE.

The French papers teem with biographical notices of Casimir Delavigne; but they contain nothing worthy of extract.

Louis Philippe is said to have been very much affected at the death of the poet, because he looked upon him as one of his firmest friends, as well as one of the literary celebrities of his reign. It has even been said that Louis Philippe gave him a little estate in the country, in a most delicate manner.

A few years ago, seeing him apparently very unwell, the king said, "My poor Delavigne, Paris does not agree with you. Go into the country, mon cher. There is a little estate of mine in such a province; go—it is at your service." The poet went, found servants to wait upon him, every thing ready for occupation; and in a secrétaire he found a letter from the king, saying that the little estate was henceforth his.

2426. BOILEAU'S GENEROSITY.

M. Patru was a native of the kingdom of France, and had a liberal education given him by his father. He was particularly trained up to plead at the bar; but a violent love to the sciences, and a taste for convivial entertainments, caused him to neglect his proper business. In short, he found his income would not maintain his expenses. He gently intimated to some of his dearest friends that he must sell his library to preserve his honor, and pay his debts.

This was whispered about in the circle of learned men, till at last it reached the ears of M. Boileau, who was at once the richest and best poet of the kingdom of France. Boileau waited on M. Patru, and, after mutual compliments, he said, "Sir, I understand you want to sell your library."

"Yes, sir," replied Patru, "I must sell my library, to preserve my honor."

"Well, sir, and what is the price?"

"The price, sir, is so many thousand livres."

"Sir," replied M. Boileau, "I'll give you that and half as much more. There's the money, sir," laying it down upon the table.

"Well, sir," said M. Patru, "when shall I deliver the books?"

"When you are dead, sir, and till then they are all your own." He took a genteel leave, and left Patru full of gratitude and admiration.

2427. WYCHERLEY.

Wycherley was once in a bookseller's shop at Bath or Tunbridge, when Lady Drogheda came in, and happened to inquire for the Plain Dealer. A friend of Wycherley's, who stood by him, pushed him towards her, and said, "There's the Plain Dealer, madam, if you want him." Wycherley made his excuses, and Lady Drogheda said that she loved plain dealing best.

He afterwards visited that lady, and some time after married her. This proved a great blow to his fortunes. Just before the time of his courtship, he was designed for governor to the late Duke of Richmond, and was to have been allowed fifteen hundred pounds a year from the government; but his absence from court in the progress of this amour, and his being yet more absent after his marriage, disgusted his friends there so much, that he lost all his interest with them.

His lady died; and his misfortunes were such, that he was thrown into the Fleet, and lay there seven years. It was then that Captain Brett got his Plain Dealer to be acted, and contrived to get King James II. to be there. The colonel attended him thither. The king was mightily pleased with the play; asked who was the author of it; and, upon hearing it was one of Wycherley's, complained that he had not seen him for many years, and inquired what was become of him.

The colonel improved this opportunity so well, that the king gave orders that his debts should be discharged out of the privy purse. Wycherley was so unwise as to give an account only of five hundred pounds, and so was confined almost half a year, till his father was at last prevailed on to pay the rest, between two and three hundred pounds more.

2426. LIBERALITY.

Goldsmith was astonished when the bookseller gave him five shillings a couplet for his delightful poem of the Deserted Village, when each line was fairly worth as many pounds; but an instance of liberality has occurred in Russia, which really deserves recording. Alexander Pselikin, a young poet, has recently produced a work, which does not contain above six hundred lines, and for which he has received three thousand roubles, nearly one pound sterling per line.

2429. GENEROSITY OF MADAME DE LA SABLIERE.

It appears to have been the fortune of La Fontaine to be indebted to the discernment and kindness of woman. Among the persons uniting high rank to a taste for literature, with whom he became acquainted at Paris, was Madame de la Sabliere. This accomplished and kind-hearted woman, perceiving La Fontaine's utter inability to regulate the economy of the simplest household, relieved him of all the care, at once, by giving him an apartment in her house.

Here he passed twenty of the happiest years of his life, relieved from all anxiety, his wants supplied, and his humor indulged with the utmost attention and kindness. Some of his pieces are dedicated to his benefactress, and he has celebrated her name in verse, but with reserve and delicacy.

2430. CAMOENS.

When Camoens published his poem of the Lusiad, King Sebastian was so pleased with it that he gave the author a pension of four thousand reals, on condition that he should reside at court; but this salary was withdrawn by Cardinal Henry, who succeeded to the throne of Portugal, which Sebastian had lost at the battle of Alcazar. The bard of the Tagus was utterly neglected by Henry, under whose inglorious reign it was that he perished in poverty.

Camoens had a black servant who was grown old with him, and who had long experienced his master's humanity. This grateful Indian, who was a native of Java, is said by some writers to have saved the life of his master in that unhappy shipwreck by which he lost all his property, except his poems, which he preserved. When Camoens became so reduced as no longer to maintain his servant, this faithful creature begged in the streets of Lisbon for the only man in Portugal on whom God had bestowed those talents which have a tendency to erect the spirit of a sinking age.

2431. LITERARY REMUNERATION.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger tells the following anecdote of a Quaker poetess, which we understand is strictly true. The "distinguished British philanthropist" referred to is said to have been a celebrated Quaker minister, now deceased, who visited this country a number of years ago, and whose writings have lately created much discussion among the orthodox branch of the society.

"Who has not heard of Virgil receiving ten scutrees per line, of the large sums paid Byron or Scott for some of their poems, of Lamartine's asking price — forty thousand francs — for his tragedy, founded on the life of Toussaint l'Ouverture? But what is all this friendly reader, to what I am going to relate to thee? And in order to do it, I must first tell thee a story: listen to me patiently.

"About the year 1831, there appeared in one of the Philadelphia journals, under the quaint caption, Lines suggested by the Presence of the English Friends now in America, a poem — yes, a poem of forty-six lines; no more, nor any less. The effusion was what it professed to be, a congratulatory epistle, addressed to two English Friends, whose visit to this country was a mission of gospel love to the churches here.

"It happened, as it sometimes will accidentally happen, that, in casting their eyes over the journal, they espied the article in question, and were pleased with the friendly feeling by which it seemed to have been inspired.

"The poem was anonymous; yet, upon the inquiry, they found that the writer was a fair countrywoman of ours, whose fame had hitherto scarcely travelled out of the limits of her own quiet country air.

"They sought an interview with this meek, unpretending Quaker girl, who, while she was penning the article in question, was little aware of the feeling it would awaken in the bosom of these warm-hearted Friends; nor did she dream to what this humble tribute of hers was destined to lead.

"The interview was satisfactory, and a firm friendship commenced between the parties, so that when these public Friends, of whom we have spoken, had finished their mission, and were preparing to return to their homes, this young lady, by a warm invitation on their part, was induced to accompany them, and was introduced by them into the circles in which they moved — the Quaker aristocracy of old England.

"Some time after, a distinguished British philanthropist, now deceased, met her, and, we presume, was forcibly smitten with her charms; for, not many years afterwards, we find the acquaintance renewed, which had been ripened into an attachment, and they were accordingly united in marriage. A few years afterwards, the husband died, and by his will it was found he had left his wife seventy thousand—seventy thousand pounds for forty-six lines of poetry!"

2432. VALUE OF A MANUSCRIPT.

The original manuscript of Gray's Elegy was lately sold by auction in London. There was really quite "a scene" in the auction room. Imagine a stranger entering in the midst of a sale of some rusty-looking old books. The auctioneer produces two small half sheets of paper, written over, torn, and mutilated. He calls it a "most interesting article," and apologizes for its condition. Pickering bids ten pounds! Rodd, Foss, Thorpe, Bohn, Holloway, and some few amateurs quietly remark, twelve, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty, and so on, till there is a pause at sixty-three pounds! The hammer strikes. "Hold!" says Mr. Foss. "It is mine," says the amateur. "No, I bid sixty-five in time." "Then I give seventy." "Seventy-five," says Mr. Foss; and fives are repeated again until the two bits of paper are knocked down, amidst a general cheer, to Payne and Foss, for one hundred pounds sterling! On these bits of paper are written the first draught of the Elegy in a Country Churchyard, by Thomas Gray, including five verses which were omitted in publication, and with the poet's interlinear corrections and alterations, — certainly an "interesting article:" several persons supposed it would call for a ten pound note, perhaps even twenty. A single volume, with "W. Shakspeare" in the fly-leaf, produced, sixty years ago, a hundred guineas; but, probably, with that exception, no mere autograph, and no single sheet of paper, ever before produced the sum of five hundred dollars!

2433. DR. YOUNG AND THE DUKE.

A little after Dr. Young had published his Universal Passion, the Duke of Wharton made him a present of two thousand pounds for it.

When a friend of the duke's, who was surprised at the largeness of the present, cried out, on hearing it, "What! two thousand pounds for a poem?" The duke smiled, and said it was the best bargain he ever made in his life, for it was fairly worth four thousand.

When the doctor was deeply engaged in writing one of his tragedies, that nobleman made him a very different kind of present. He procured a human skull, fixed a candle in it, and gave it to the doctor as the most proper lamp for him to write a tragedy by.

§ 238. POETS AND THEIR BOOKSELLERS.

2434. COWPER'S POEMS AND THEIR PUBLISHER.

Johnson, the bookseller in St. Paul's Churchyard, obtained the copyright of Cowper's Poems, which proved a source of great profit to him, in the following manner: A relation of Cowper's called one evening, in the dusk, on Johnson, with a bundle of those poems, which he offered to him for publication, provided he would publish them at his own risk, and let the author have a few copies to give to his friends. Johnson perused and approved of them, and accordingly printed and published them.

Soon after they had appeared before the public, there was not a review which did not load them with the most scurrilous abuse, and condemn them to the butter shops. In consequence of the public taste being thus terrified or misled, these charming effusions lay in a corner of the bookseller's shop, as an unsalable pile, for a long time.

Some time afterwards, the same person appeared with another bundle of manuscripts from the same author, which were offered and accepted upon the same terms. In this fresh collection was the divine poem of the Task. Not alarmed at the fate of the former publication, and thoroughly assured as he was of their great merit, he resolved upon publishing them.

Soon after they had appeared, the tone of the reviewers became instantly changed, and Cowper was hailed as the first poet of his age. The success of this second publication set the first in motion, and Johnson immediately reaped the fruits of his undaunted judgment, and Cowper's Poems enriched the publisher, when the poet was languishing under decaying circumstances.

2435. LAMARTINE.

Before the appearance of Lamartine's first volume, Poetic Meditations, poetry had fallen into a sad decline. "The mythological, descriptive, and double-refined writers of the Voltaire school," says a French author, "had so entirely killed poetry that no one would have anything more to do with it." But after the "hundred days," and Lamartine had left the service of the empire, "one passion then completely absorbed him; that passion made his glory. Love came to agitate the source of poetry, which was sleeping in the depths of his soul. The object of this mysterious passion, that loving and beloved Elvira, torn from his arms by death; will live again in his verse. Lamartine will sing to immortalize her name, and France will owe her its poet."

It was in 1820, a young man scarce recovered from a cruel sickness, his face pale with suffering, and shaded with a veil of sadness on which might be read the recent loss of an adored object, was to be seen carrying timidly from publisher to publisher a little manuscript book of verses steeped in tears.

The poet and the poetry were every where bowed out. At last a bookseller, more acute than his compeers, or fascinated by the manners of the young man, decided on accepting the manuscript: the fortunate individual was named, we believe, Nicolle. Thanks to you, M. Nicolle! posterity owes you remembrance. Who knows, had it not been for you, but the disheartened poet might have consigned his precious treasure to the flames, and the world might have lost Lamartine?

The book accordingly was printed, and cast without name, without aid, upon that stormy sea which then, as now, was swallowing up so many thousands of volumes. The thought of the age, hitherto concealed in the recesses of the soul, at last had found a tongue, a form,—and what a form!—a rhythm of celestial melody, a versification flexible, harmonious, sonorous, that vibrates like the Æolian harp, trembling in the evening breeze.

Every thing that can be said about this first production of the poet has already been uttered. Every body knows by heart the Ode to Byron, Evening, the Lake, Autumn, &c. In the space of four years, forty-five thousand copies of the Meditations were spread throughout the world. At an interval of twenty years, the sublime voice of René found an harmonious echo, and with a single bound, M. de Lamartine placed himself on the same pedestal with the demi-gods of the epoch, Chateaubriand, Goethe, and Byron. This literary success, the most brilliant of the age since the appearance of the Génie du Christianisme, opened the diplomatic career to Lamartine.

2436. PARADISE LOST.

Remains of Milton's House at Forest Hill, near Oxford.

Paradise Lost was published in the year 1667. By what degree it rose to that reputation in the literary world, from which it is destined at no future period to decline, it is not now possible minutely to ascertain. There is no reason, however, to suppose that it ever passed through an ordeal of obscurity, though it is quite certain that by some eminent men it was greatly undervalued. Even the celebrated Waller thus spoke of it: "The old blind school-master, John Milton, hath published a tedious poem on the fall of man; if its length be not considered a merit, it has no other."

We know that thirteen hundred copies of the work were sold in two years from the date of the contract by which Milton disposed of the copyright to the bookseller. The second edition, which was brought out under the superintendence and correction of the author, in 1674, is ushered in by two copies of verses; the first in English, by Andrew

Marvel; and the second in Latin, by Samuel Barrow, physician to the army under General Monk, and who had been actively concerned in bringing about the restoration; in the latter of which the poem is expressly placed "above all Greek, above all Roman fame."

Dryden, the poet laureate, and the most popular writer of verses in that period, had, with the author's permission, turned Milton's story into an opera, entitled the State of Innocence, which was also published in 1674. In the preface to this performance Dryden observes, "What I have here borrowed will be so easily discerned from my mean productions, that I shall not need to point the reader to the places, the original being undoubtedly one of the greatest, most noble, and sublime poems which either this age or nation has produced." Milton died in the same year in which the second edition of Paradise Lost was published.

2437. POPE'S FIRST EDITION OF THE ESSAY ON CRITICISM.

"The first publisher of the Essay on Criticism," says D'Israeli, "must have been a Mr. Lewis, a Catholic bookseller in Covent Garden; for, from a descendant of this Lewis, I heard that Pope, after publication, came every day, persecuting with anxious inquiries the cold, impenetrable bookseller, who, as the poem lay uncalled for, saw nothing but vexatious importunities in a troublesome youth."

"One day, Pope, after nearly a month, entered, and in despair tied up a number of the poems, which he addressed to several who had a reputation in town, as judges of poetry. The scheme succeeded, and the poem, having reached its proper circle, soon got into request."

2438. VALUE OF COWPER'S POEMS.

In October, 1812, the copyright of Cowper's Poems was put up to sale among the members of the trade, in thirty-two shares. Twenty of these shares were sold at two hundred and twelve pounds a share, including printed copies in quires to the amount of eighty-two pounds, which each purchaser was to take at a stipulated price, and twelve shares were retained in the hands of the proprietor. This work, consisting of two octavo volumes, was satisfactorily proved at the sale to net eight hundred and thirty-four pounds per annum. It had only two years of copyright; and yet this same copyright, with printed copies, produced, estimating the twelve shares which were retained at the same price as those which were sold, the sum of six thousand seven hundred and sixty-four pounds.

2439. SALE OF LITERARY WORKS.

The ultimate sale of the copyright of Paradise Lost produced to Milton's widow eight pounds; and Dryden received from Tonson two pounds thirteen shillings and nine pence for every hundred lines of his poetry.

From an old account book of Bernard Lintot, the bookseller, the following information respecting the prices paid heretofore for the copyright of plays is obtained. Tragedies were then the fashionable drama, and obtained the best price. Dr. Young received for his Busiris eighty-four pounds; Smith for his Phædra and Hippolytus fifty pounds; Rowe for his Jane Shore fifty pounds and fifteen shillings; and for Lady Jane Gray, seventy-five pounds and five shillings; and Cibber, for his Nonjuror, obtained one hundred and five pounds. About the middle of the last century, a hundred crowns were paid in Paris to the author of a successful play. Till the year 1722, farces were not given after plays till the eighth or ninth representation. This leading to the opinion that a farce was a symptom that the main piece was on the decline, La Mothe desired that a farce might be given after the first representation of his Romulus. The example became universal.

2440. LALLA ROOKH.

The publisher of Lalla Rookh gave three thousand guineas for the copyright of that poem; and the spirited purchasers of the work have had no reason to repent of their bargain.

2441. JACOB TONSON AND DRYDEN.

Jacob Tonson, the most eminent of his profession as a publisher, having refused to advance Dryden a sum of money for a work in which he was engaged, the enraged bard sent a message to him, and the following lines, adding, "Tell the dog that he who wrote these can write more:—

"With leering looks, bull-faced, and freckled skin,
With two left legs, and Judas-colored hair,
And frowzy pores, that taint the ambient air."

The bookseller felt the force of the description, and to avoid the completion of the portrait, immediately sent the money.

2442. STORY OF COLLINS.

About 1744, Collins suddenly left Oxford, and came to London—a literary adventurer, with many projects in his head, and very little money in his pocket. He designed many works, but either had not perseverance in himself, or the frequent calls of immediate necessity broke his schemes, and suffered him to pursue no settled purpose. While thus living loosely about town, he occasionally wrote many short poems in the house of a friend, who witnesses that he burnt as rapidly as he wrote.

In 1746, he offered his Odes, descriptive and allegorical, to Mr. Millar, who gave him a price for them, which was handsome, as poetry was then estimated; but all the interest of that great bookseller could never introduce them into notice, and the sale of them is said not to have been sufficient to pay the expense of printing. Yet among these odes is one of the most popular now in the language—the Ode to the Passions.

What the outraged feelings of the poet were, appeared when, some time afterwards, he became rich enough to express them. Having obtained some fortune by the death of an uncle, he made good to the publisher the deficiency of the unsold Odes, and, in his haughty resentment of the public taste, consigned the impression to the flames.

Much has been said of the state of insanity to which this admirable poet was ultimately reduced; or rather, as Dr. Johnson happily described it, "a depression of mind, which enchains the faculties without destroying them, and leaves reason the knowledge of right, without the power of pursuing it."

What Dr. Johnson has further said on this melancholy subject shows, perhaps, more nature and feeling than any thing he ever wrote; and yet it is remarkable, that, among the causes to which the poet's malady was owing, he never hints at the most exciting of the whole. He tells us how he "loved fairies, genii, giants, and monsters;" how he "delighted to rove through the meanders of enchantment; to gaze on the magnificence of golden palaces; to repose by waterfalls of Elysian gardens;" but never does he seem to have imagined how natural it was for such a mind or such a temperament to give an Eve to the paradise of his creation.

Johnson indeed, though, as he tells us, he gained the confidence of Collins, was not just the sort of a man into whose ear a lover would choose to pour his secrets. The fact was, that Collins was greatly attached to a young lady, who did not return his passion; and there seems little doubt that to the consequent disappointment which preyed upon his mind much of that abandonment of soul which marked the close of his life may be ascribed.

2443. THE SALE OF CHURCHILL'S ROSCIAD PROMOTED BY FLATTERY.

When Churchill finished his Rosciad, he waited on an eminent bookseller with the copy; but he had suffered so severely by the publication of poetry, that he was determined to have nothing more to do with any of the rhyming sons of Apollo, unless he was indemnified from sustaining any loss.

This condition Churchill could not comply with. The bookseller, however, recommended a worthy young man to him, who had just ventured his little fortune in the uncertain sea of ink, and who would probably run the risk of publication.

Churchill waited on him, and found every thing to his wish. The poem was printed, advertised, and at the end of five days ten copies were sold. Churchill was thunderstruck, and the bookseller was little less chagrined. At the end of four days more he found that six more copies were sold. The poet was almost frantic, and hurried away to a friend to acquaint him with his hard fate.

His friend, who was intimate with Garrick, posted to him the next morning, and informed him what a beautiful picture of his astonishing abilities had just appeared in the Rosciad. Garrick swallowed the gilded pill, instantly sent for the poem, read it, and sounded its praises wherever he went. The next evening the publisher had not a single copy left, and in a few weeks so many editions went off, that Churchill found himself richer than any poet whose estate lay at that time on Parnassus.

2444. ROGERS'S EDITION OF HIS POEMS.

Mr. Rogers is a munificent patron of the fine arts. Unlike many who have wealth at their disposal, he, as may be readily supposed, possesses an exquisite taste—he is, indeed, fastidious almost to a fault. When he resolved, some few years ago, on publishing a new edition of his poems, he determined on having them illustrated in a style which should be superior to any thing of the kind which had ever appeared before. He therefore commissioned Turner, Corbould, Creswick, Stothard, and others to make a series of designs for the work.

These celebrated painters sent in each a number of water-color drawings of the choicest kind; but so particular was Mr. Rogers, that from twenty or thirty by an artist he would select, perhaps, but one, although he paid liberally for the whole. And even after he had expended a large sum on the engraving of the chosen drawing, he would frequently alter his mind, cancel the plate, and have fresh designs made, until his taste or fancy was gratified.

Money, to a man who could hang up a million of money in his library, was, of course, no object; and he had determined that his verses should go down to posterity associated with all that was beautiful and refined in art. This work, it is said, cost Mr. Rogers (for he undertook to pay the publisher the whole of the expenses, which no tradesman would have the boldness to risk, however enterprising he might be) about ten thousand pounds; and it will always remain as a memento of his wealth, genius, and taste.

§ 239. EGOTISM, VANITY, AND AMBITION.

2445. HEYWOOD'S VANITY.

John Heywood was a favorite at court, both in the reign of Henry VIII. and Queen Mary, as a poet and a jester. He was one of the first who wrote English plays.

He wrote a work called the Spider and the Fly, a Parable, in 1556. It contains no less than seventy-seven chapters. At the beginning of every one of these chapters is a portrait of the author, either standing or sitting before a table, with a book upon it, and a window near it hung round with cobwebs, flies, and spiders.

Can there be found in the annals of authorship an instance of such consummate vanity?

2446. VANITY OF SIGERUS.

Sigerus, who flourished in Germany in the seventeenth century, was both vain and visionary. He was at the expense of having a plate engraved, in which he was represented kneeling before a crucifix, with a label from his mouth, "Lord Jesus, do you love me?" From that of Jesus proceeded another label—"Yes; most illustrious, most excellent, and most learned Sigerus, crowned poet of his imperial majesty, and most worthy rector of the university of Wittenburg, yes, I love you."

2447. MAMMOTH EGOTISM.

The former editor of the American Quarterly Review, Philadelphia, considered himself a poet of the first order. In one of his reviews he stated that we had "yet no great long poem, no big book of American metre," and that there was now a want of it. But this was only to herald a manuscript volume of his in some nineteen books, which he had just been obliged to send to London, because the publishers on this side of the water could not see his merits.

It had been shown about very generally, and, we learn, was similar to Emmons's Fredonia, only of greater length. It was yeclpt the Antediluvians; and some one ventured to say, if any hapless London bookseller was seduced into its publication, that the first copy which reached America would be lauded in a certain quarter, under the author's immediate supervision, as a work unparalleled, unpaired, equal to Klopstock or Milton in sublimity, superior to Pope in harmony, and a touch beyond any thing ever produced in the United States for sweetness, tenderness, and simplicity.

The work was subsequently published in London by the author, but it dropped stillborn from the press. Christopher North, indeed, revived a copy of it for a sort of galvanic experiment in criticism, which established an electrical communication with the risible nerves of his fifty thousand readers. The critique commenced, if we rightly remember, with these flattering words: "To compare these two volumes with a couple of bottles of small beer would be greatly to belie that fluid."

2448. AMBROSE PHILLIPS.

Ambrose Phillips was a neat dresser, and very vain. In a conversation between him, Congreve, Swift, and others, the discourse ran a good while on Julius Cæsar. After many things had been said to the purpose, Ambrose asked what sort of person they supposed Julius Cæsar was. He was answered, that from medals, &c., it appeared that he was a small man, and thin faced. "Now, for my part," said Ambrose, "I should take him to be of a lean make, pale complexion, extremely neat in his dress, and five feet seven inches high,"—an exact description of Phillips himself. Swift, who understood good breeding perfectly well, and would not interrupt any body while speaking, let him go on, and when he had quite done, said, "And I, Mr. Phillips, should take him to have been a plump man, just five feet five inches high, not very neatly dressed, in a black gown with pudding sleeves."

2449. LOVE OF TITLES.

It is painful to remark the value which Byron attached to his aristocratical pretensions. To have his early poems praised by a duchess seems to have afforded him more pleasure than the admiration of a thousand untitled readers.

Scott, we grieve to say, had also this weakness. He revered a lord. Some authentic writer relates of him, that at Abbotsford, one day at dinner, while Scott was in the richest vein, a Lord Nobody was announced, when all ease and freedom at once subsided, and the "Northern Wizard" had not a spell for any one save his newly-arrived titled guest.

2450. LITERARY SELF-EXALTATION.

Dryden honestly declares that it was better for him to own his failing of vanity than the world to do it for him, and adds, "For what other reason have I spent my life in so unprofitable a study?"

Why am I grown old in seeking so barren a reward as fame? The same parts and application which have made me a poet might have raised me to any honors of the gown."

Cervantes was evidently very sensible to his own merits when a rival started up; and did he not assert them, too, when, passing sentence on the bad books of the times, he distinguishes his own work by a handsome compliment?

Nor was Butler less proud of his own merits; for he has done ample justice to his Hudibras, and traced out, with great self-delight, its variety of excellences.

Richardson, the novelist, exhibits one of the most striking instances of what is called literary vanity—the delight of an author in his works: he has pointed out all the beauties of his three great works in various manners. He always taxed a visitor by one of his long letters. It was this intense self-delight which produced his voluminous labors.

2451. BURNS'S PRIDE.

No man was more afflicted with that miserable pride, the infirmity of men of imagination, which exacts from its best friends a perpetual reverence and acknowledgment of its powers, than the poet Burns. With all his gratitude and veneration for "the noble Glencairn," he was "wounded to the soul" because his lordship showed "so much attention—engrossing attention—to the only blockhead at table. The whole company consisted of his Lordship, Dunderpate, and myself." This Dunderpate, who dined with Lord Glencairn, might have been of more importance to the world than even a poet—one of the best and most useful men in it.

Burns was equally offended with another of his patrons, and a literary brother, Dr. Blair. At the moment, he too appeared to be neglecting the irritable poet "for the mere carcass of greatness—or when his eye measured the difference of their point of elevation; I say to myself, with scarcely any emotion," (he might have added, except a good deal of contempt,) "what do I care for him, or his pomp either?" "Dr. Blair's vanity is proverbially known among his acquaintance," adds Burns, at the moment that the solitary haughtiness of his own genius had entirely escaped his self-observation.

2452. THE TYRO IN BLANK VERSE.

"Some years ago," says the Vermont Journal, "a student at Dartmouth College, having assigned to him the task of writing a composition, and feeling under the divine influence of Apollo and the Nine at the time, produced what he considered an elegant and finished piece of blank verse.

"He handed it to the preceptor, a plain, matter-of-fact man, who knew nothing of the flights of fancy, while a smile of self-complacency illuminated his countenance.

"The professor, 'with spectacles on nose,' ran his eye rapidly over the page, then turning to the exulting student, said, in his peculiar low and dignified manner, 'I have more than once already told you that capital letters should be used only at the beginning of a sentence, when commencing the name of the Deity, and all proper names; but I find you have commenced every line with capitals.' 'True, sir, but this is poetry,' said the student, somewhat chopfallen. 'O, ho! this is poetry, is it? Indeed, I was not aware of that!'"

2453. ALEXANDER AND HIS POET.

An Eastern tale informs us that Alexander the Great had a court poet, whose vanity was fully equal to his talents, as is apt, by the way, to be the case with the votaries of the Muses. The poet sought one day the presence of his sovereign, and addressed him thus:—

"Mighty sovereign, thy fame extends from pole to pole, and thy exploits have been made known in the farthest corners of the habitable globe. But remember that tradition is fleeting and uncertain, and he who trusts his fame to the song of man will soon be forgotten. Let me celebrate thy exploits in strains worthy of my theme, which may carry down thy name and fame to all ages. Only, as the sons of Phœbus are subject to the same wants as meaner mortals, let me know what thou wilt give me if I fulfil my task."

The monarch smiled at the mercenary eagerness of the poet, and, after a moment's thought, told him that he should have a piece of gold for every good line, and a blow for every bad one. The laureate accepted the conditions, full of confidence that it would rain gold, and not blows. But when the work was read, although he got here and there a good many gold pieces, the blows predominated so fearfully, that, before he got through the sixth canto, he was a dead man.

2454. BUTLER'S PRIDE.

It is said that Butler, the celebrated author of Hudibras, was equally remarkable for poverty and pride. A friend of his one evening invited him to supper, and contrived to place in his pocket a purse containing one hundred guineas. This was found by the poet the following morning, and, feeling uneasy, he ascertained by whom it was given, and then returned it, expressing his warm displeasure at the insult which had been thus offered him.

2455. BOSWELL'S EXCESS OF VANITY.

Boswell affected to undervalue Goldsmith, and a lurking hostility to him is discernible throughout his writings. Before the intrusive sycophancy of the former had made its way into Johnson's confidence, he envied Goldsmith's intimacy with the great lexicographer. Speaking of an invitation from Johnson, to fulfil which he says Goldsmith "went strutting away," the toady observes, "I confess I then envied him this mighty privilege, of which he seemed to be so proud; but it was not long before I obtained the same mark of distinction."

Obtained! but how? Not like Goldsmith, by the force of unpretending but congenial merit, but by a course of the most pushing, contriving, and spaniel-like subservency. Really, the ambition of the man to illustrate his mental insignificance, by continually placing himself in juxtaposition with the great lexicographer, has something in it perfectly ludicrous. Never, since the days of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, has there been presented to the world a more whimsically contrasted pair of associates than Johnson and Boswell.

"Who is this Scotch cur at Johnson's heels?" asked some one, when Boswell had worked his way into incessant companionship. "He is not a cur," replied Goldsmith; "you are too severe; he is only a bur. Tom Davies flung him at Johnson in sport, and he has the faculty of sticking."

2456. THE AMERICAN GOETHE.

When the young gentleman who styles himself the American Goethe was asked why he did not write something equal to Goethe's, he testily answered, "Because I haven't a mind to."

§ 240. POVERTY AND VARIOUS MISFORTUNES.

2457. MISS LANDON.

L. E. Landon

Our readers will remember that at the time of the death of Miss Landon, the celebrated L. E. L. of literary celebrity, at the Cape of Good Hope, to which place she had accompanied her husband, there was much discussion as to whether she had taken poison by accident or design. The following anecdote, which has been for the first time published in Howitt's Homes and Haunts of British Poets, leaves but little doubt that the unhappy and too impulsive poetess perished by her own conscious and premeditated act:—

"During the agonies of mind which Miss Landon suffered at a time when calumny was dealing very freely with her name, her old friend, and for a long time co-inmate, Miss Roberts, came in one day and found her very much agitated. 'Have those horrid reports,' she eagerly inquired, 'got into the papers, Miss Roberts?' Miss Roberts assured her they had not. 'If they do,' she exclaimed, opening a drawer in the table, and taking out a vial, 'I am resolved—here is my remedy.' The vial was a vial of prussic acid. This fact I have on the authority of the late Emma Roberts herself. There remains, therefore, no question that Miss Landon was well acquainted with the nature of prussic acid, for she kept it by her, and had declared, under circumstances of cruel excitement, her resolve to use it on a certain contingency. Being found with an empty vial of this very poison in her hand, and dead on the floor, can leave no rational doubt that she died by it, and by her own hand."

The mystery relative to the calumnious reports alluded to in the above extract has never been cleared up. The probability is, that in Miss Landon's case, as in that of so many others of her sex, imprudence was magnified into guilt. As to her unhappiness at Cape Coast Castle the cause of that is well known. Her husband, who was the governor of the colony, treated her with marked disrespect; even going so far, it is said, as to introduce a favorite mistress into the castle. Poor "L. E. L!" many a young heart has mourned over thy unhappy life and early death. Thy verse always seemed steeped in sorrow, as if over thy heart ever loomed the dark shadow of thy approaching fate.

2458. GOLDSMITH'S FURNITURE.

Some idea of Goldsmith's early residence in a metropolis which afterwards rang with his name may be gathered from the following extract:—

"I called on Goldsmith, at his lodgings, in March, 1759, and found him writing his Inquiry, in a miserable, dirty-looking room, in which there was but one chair; and when, from civility, he resigned it to me, he himself was obliged to sit in the window.

"While we were conversing together, some one tapped gently at the door, and, being desired to come in, a poor, ragged little girl, of very becoming demecanor, entered the room, and dropping a courtesy said, 'My mamma sends her compliments, and begs the favor of you to lend her a chamberpot full of coals.'"

2459. EARLY STRUGGLES OF JEAN PAUL.

Jean Paul's first attempts at authorship were not successful; his situation was perplexing, and the future looked grimly on the penniless youth. "Fortune seemed to have let loose her ban-dogs, and hungry ruin had him in the wind." His mother had removed to Hof, her birthplace, and there Jean Paul joined her, in a house which had but one apartment, pursuing his studies amid "the jingle of household operations;" writing books which would not sell, and tasting all the bitterness of extreme penury.

"The prisoner's allowance," he says, "is bread and water; but I had only the latter. Nevertheless, I cannot help saying to poverty, 'Welcome! so thou come not at too late a time. Wealth bears heavier on talent than poverty. Under gold mountains and thrones who knows how many a spiritual giant may lie crushed down and buried! When among the flames of youth, and, above all, of hotter powers, the oil of riches is also poured in, little will remain of the phoenix but his ashes; and only a Goethe has force to keep, even at the sun of good fortune, his phoenix wings unsinged."

For ten years and upwards he fought this fight, during which time his only support was the money earned by the occasional but rare admission of one of his contributions to the public journals. Nevertheless, he refused the situation of a private tutor, determined to succeed as author, or starve in the attempt; and he triumphed at last. After repeated failures, the publication of the Invisible Lodge, in 1793, brought money, fame, troops of friends, and altogether decided his future.

2460. CHRISTOPHER SMART.

In 1763 we find the poor poet Christopher Smart confined in a mad-house. "He has as much exercise, for a part of the time," said Johnson, "as he used to have, for he digs in the garden. Indeed, before his confinement, he used, for exercise, to walk to the alehouse; but he was carried back again. He insisted on people's praying with him. He would even fall upon his knees and say his prayers in the street, or in any other unusual place." Another charge was, that he did not love clean linen. During his confinement, it is said, writing materials were denied him, and Smart used to indent his poetical thoughts with a key on the wainscot of his walls. A religious poem, — the Song of David, — written at this time, in his saner intervals, possessed passages of considerable power and sublimity, and must be considered as one of the greatest curiosities of our literature. What the unfortunate poet did not write down (and the whole could not possibly have been committed to the walls of his apartment) must have been composed and retained from memory alone.

Smart was afterwards released from his confinement; but his ill fortune — the result, as we suppose, of his intemperate habits — again pursued him. He was committed to the King's Bench prison for debt, and died there, after a short illness, in 1770.

2461. BOYSE.

Samuel Boyse, author of the Deity, a poem, was a fag author, and, at one time, employed by Mr. Ogle to translate some of Chaucer's tales into modern English, which he did with great spirit, at the rate of threepence a line for his trouble. Poor Boyse wore a blanket, because he was destitute of breeches; and was, at last, found famished to death, with a pen in his hand.

2462. CHATTERTON'S MISERY.

A prodigy of genius, the unfortunate Chatterton, was amusing himself one day, in company with a friend, reading the epitaphs in Pancreas Churchyard. He was so deep sunk in thought as he walked on, that, not perceiving a grave that was just dug, he tumbled into it.

His friend, observing his situation, ran to his assistance, and, as he helped him out, told him, in a jocular manner, he was happy in assisting at the resurrection of genius. Poor Chatterton smiled, and, taking his companion by the arm, replied, "My dear friend, I feel the sting of a speedy dissolution. I have been at war with the grave for some time, and find it is not so easy to vanquish it as I imagined.

We can find an asylum to hide from every creditor but that."

His friend endeavored to divert his thoughts from the gloomy reflection: but what will not melancholy and adversity combined subjugate? In three days after, the neglected and disconsolate youth put an end to his miseries by poison.

2463. DRYDEN'S POVERTY.

John Dryden.

It was after preparing a second edition of Virgil, that the great Dryden, who had lived, and was to die, in harness, found himself still obliged to seek for daily bread. Scarcely relieved from one heavy task, he was compelled to hasten to another; and his efforts were now stimulated by a domestic feeling — the expected return of his son in ill health from Rome.

In a letter to his bookseller he pathetically writes, "If it please God that I must die of over-study, I cannot spend my life better than in preserving his."

It was on this occasion, on the verge of his seventieth year, as he describes himself in the dedication of his Virgil, that, "worn out with study, and oppressed with fortune," he contracted to supply the bookseller with ten thousand verses at sixpence a line.

2464. DU RYER.

Du Ryer, a celebrated French poet, was constrained to labor with rapidity, and to live in the cottage of an obscure village. His booksellers bought his heroic verses for one hundred sols the hundred lines, and the smaller ones for fifty sols.

What an interesting picture has a contemporary given of his reception by a poor and ingenious author in a visit he paid to Du Ryer!

"On a fine summer day we went to him, at some distance from town. He received us with joy, talked to us of his numerous projects, and showed us several of his works. But what more interested us was, that, though dreading to show us his poverty, he contrived to give us some refreshments. We seated ourselves under a wide oak; the table-cloth was spread on the grass; his wife brought us some milk, with fresh water and brown bread, and he picked a basket of cherries. He welcomed us with gayety; but we could not take leave of this amiable man, now grown old, without tears, to see him so ill treated by fortune, and to have nothing left but literary honor."

2465. OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

In 1758, two years after Goldsmith's return from his wanderings on the continent, he presented himself at Surgeon's Hall for examination as a hospital mate, with the view of entering the army or navy; but he had the mortification of being rejected as unqualified.

That he might appear before the examining surgeon suitably dressed, Goldsmith obtained a new suit of clothes, for which Griffiths, publisher of the Monthly Review, became security. The clothes were immediately to be returned when the purpose was served, or the debt was to be discharged. Poor Goldsmith, having failed in his object, and probably distressed by urgent want, pawned the clothes. The publisher threatened, and the poet replied as follows:—

"I know of no misery but a jail, to which my own imprudences and your letter seem to point. I have seen it inevitable these three or four weeks, and, by Heavens! request it as a favor—as a favor that may prevent something more fatal. I have been some years struggling with a wretched being—with all that contempt and indigence bring with it—with all those strong passions which make contempt insupportable. What, then, has a jail that is formidable?"

Such was the almost hopeless condition, the deep despair, of this imprudent but amiable author, who has added to the delight of millions, and to the glory of English literature.

2466. BUSCHINS.

The celebrated poet and professor Buschin, who was very careless in his dress, went out one day in an old dressing-gown, and met in the streets a citizen with whom he was acquainted. The gentleman, however, passed him without even raising his hat. Divining the cause, the poet hastened home and put on a cloak of velvet and ermine, in which he again went out, and contrived once more to meet the same citizen, who this time raised his hat and bowed profoundly. This made the poet still more angry when he saw that his velvet cloak claimed more respect than his professorship and poetical fame. He hastened home, threw his cloak on the floor, and stamped on it, saying, "Art thou Buschin, or am I?"

2467. FARQUHAR.

When Farquhar was in the lowest state of dependency from the poorness of his circumstances, Wilks advised him to write another play. "Write!" cried Farquhar, starting from his chair; "is it possible that a man can write, who is friendless, and has not one shilling in his pocket?"

"Come, come, George," replied Wilks, "banish melancholy; draw your drama, and bring your sketch with you to-morrow, for I expect you to dine with me. But as an empty pocket may cramp your genius, I desire you to accept my mite." And he presented him with twenty guineas.

When Wilks was gone, Farquhar retired to his study, and drew the plot of the Beaux' Stratagem, which he delivered to Wilks next day; and the design being approved, he was desired to proceed, and not to lose a day with the composition. This comedy, which is one of the best extant, was begun, finished, and acted in the space of six weeks; but too late for the advantage of the author: on the third night, which was for his benefit, Farquhar died of a broken heart.

2468. FAIRFIELD.

Sumner Lincoln Fairfield died in New Orleans, in 1844, of epilepsy, in the 41st year of his age. He was a man of learning, and no inconsiderable share of what bore some resemblance to genius. His Quarterly Magazine, published in Philadelphia, exhibited much research, and a mind fitted to grapple with any intellectual subject. Its fault was an excess of scholasticism. It had too much hard learning, or an affectation of it, to come home to the bosoms of the multitude. This, in connection with the personal unpopularity of the editor, killed it.

Fairfield's poetry was the best of his writings. It manifested a most pregnant, rich, and strong imagination, and an intensity which showed the true poet. Like his prose, it was characterized by hardness of style, scholastic affectation, and many very careless lines, which materially marred its beauty. Bulwer evidently, however, filched from one of these poems the idea of his Last Days of Pompeii. Any person who will read both will readily see this.

A very sharp newspaper warfare was carried on by the poet, touching this literary theft; but if we recollect aright, the novelist thought the obscurity of Fairfield a sufficient reason for not replying to his just and bitter complaints.

The greatest obstacle to Fairfield's success was his vanity and infirmity of temper. In his better days he had few friends, and in adversity, brought about by dissipation, his faults as a writer were forgotten, and meek-eyed pity turned men aside where defiance before had alienated them. He died a miserable, hopeless, disappointed man—his genius degraded, and his strong intellect debased, by vice, to a level with the meanest of God's creatures.

2469. JAMES MONTGOMERY.

A writer in the Boston Atlas gives the following account of an interview with Montgomery, the Cowper of his age:—

"I found Montgomery, in conversation, delightful. There was nothing of the 'I am a poet' about him; but he entered freely and familiarly into conversation, and expressed his opinions on the literature of the day with as much diffidence as if he had himself only worshipped the muse 'afar off.'

"In the course of the evening, the conversation turned on Robert Montgomery's poetry, which was then making some noise. James, for some time, took no part in what was going on, but was an attentive listener. At last it seemed as if flesh and blood could bear it no longer, for he commented on the meanness of Satan Bob in assuming his name, for the purpose of cheating the public into the purchase of his wares. 'It has been a serious business to me,' said the true Montgomery, 'for I am constantly receiving letters, evidently intended for another person, in which I am either mercilessly abused for what I never wrote, or bespattered with compliments of the most nauseating character. Many, to this day, do not distinguish between me and Robert Montgomery; and so I am, in a great measure, robbed of what little hard-earned fame I possess.'

The poet, evidently, was much mortified by Robert's assumption of his name, and did not endeavor to disguise his contempt for the literary pirate, who sailed under false colors. His intimate friends say that this is the only subject which ruffles the habitual serenity of his mind; and well it may, for it must be no trifling annoyance to see that fame, which was acquired by years of toil and patient endurance, perilled in the minds of many by the productions of such a popinjay as the author of Oxford and Woman."

2470. HUDIBRAS AND STARVATION.

Samuel Butler.

Butler was fortunate, for a time, in having Charles II. to admire his Hudibras. That monarch carried one in his pocket: hence his success, though the work has great merit. Yet merit does not sell a work in one case out of twenty. Butler, after all, was left to starve; for, according to Dennis, the author of Hudibras died in a garret.

2471. HOW LEIGH HUNT WAS TREATED

"The story of Rimini had not long appeared," says Leigh Hunt, "when I received a copy of it, which looked like witchcraft. It was the identical poem, in type and appearance, bound in calf, and sent me without any explanation; but it was a little smaller. I turned it over a dozen times, wondering what it could be, and how it could have originated.

"The simple solution of the puzzle I did not consider, till I had summoned other persons to partake my astonishment. At length we consulted the title page, and there saw the names of 'Wells & Lilly, Boston, and M. Carey, Philadelphia.' I thought how the sight would have pleased my father and mother.

"A few years ago, I received a copy of another Boston edition, preceded by the like piracy of another poem, the publisher of which was so good as to say, that he had heard of a new one from my pen, which he should be very happy to print also, if I would send it to him. Not a syllable did he add about the happiness of disbursing a little for the permission.

"How many poems of mine, or editions of poems, or editions of prose writings, have appeared in America, before or since, I cannot say; but I believe the booksellers there have republished every thing I have written; and I confess I cannot but be sensible of the shabby honor thus done me, and heartily glad of every genial hand into which my productions may be carried in consequence.

"But I should like to know what an American publisher would say, if some English traveller were to help himself to the fruits of his labor out of the till, and make off with them on board ship. Being a cousin-german of the Americans, I am very popular in their country, and receive from them every compliment imaginable, except a farthing's payment. How came my mother to be born in such a country?"

2472. GEORGE BUCHANAN.

This illustrious scholar, compelled to fly from his own country by the blood-seeking animosity of a priestly cabal, whose vices he had made the theme of his satire, sought refuge and protection under Henry VIII. of England. His appeal to that monarch was couched in terms of great pathos and elegance. "Look not," said the poet, "with an unrelenting countenance upon the humble advance of a man whose soul is devoted to your service; one who, a beggar, a vagrant, and an exile, has endured every species of misfortune which a perfidious world can inflict. A savage host of inveterate enemies pursued him, and the palace of his sovereign resounds with their menaces. Over mountains covered in snow, and valleys flooded with rain, I come a fugitive to the Athenian altar of mercy, and, exhausted by calamities, cast myself at your feet."

Alas! London was not the Athens the fugitive sought, nor Henry the Pericles whose generosity was to succor him. But who can wonder that, after sacrificing to the axe that beauty on which he once reposed with delight, neither the misfortune of greatness, nor the eloquence of genius, should have been able to make the least impression on the heart of the savage Henry?

§ 241. COMPLIMENTS, HONORS, AND POPULARITY.

2473. PETRARCH AND THE OLD MAN.

While he was receiving his public examination at the court of King Robert of Naples, a schoolmaster of Pontremoli, blind and enfeebled by age, hastened to Naples in order to see him. Petrarch had already started for Rome, but the report of so extraordinary an occurrence spread rapidly through the city, and soon reached the ears of the king.

It was natural that so great a lover of letters should be struck with this burst of enthusiasm; and after having received a confirmation of the story from the lips of the old man himself, he supplied him with some conveniences for his journey, and urged him to hasten towards Rome, where he might perhaps be in time to satisfy his curiosity.

But here, also, the poor old man was too late, for Petrarch had already started for France. He returned to Pontremoli almost broken-hearted with his disappointment, but had hardly reached home, when he was told that Petrarch, instead of returning to Avignon, had stopped at Parma.

Not discouraged by his former disappointment, he again set out to seek him, and crossing the Apennines through snow and cold, with no support but the arm of his son and of one of his scholars, he at length reached the house in which Petrarch was lodged. It would be impossible to describe the rapture with which he embraced him, listening with ecstasy to every word that he uttered, and alternately kissing the hand that had written, and the head that had composed, such noble verses. After having passed three days in the enjoyment of his society, the old man returned home joyful and contented.

2474. CORONATION OF PETRARCH.

In the year 1340, Petrarch had the honor to receive two letters in one day, one from the Roman senate, the other from the University of Paris, inviting him to accept the laurel crown.

Having given the preference to Rome, on his arrival in that city, in 1341, during the pontificate of Benedict XII., he found every thing prepared for the ceremony of his coronation, by the senator, Count Orso dell' Anguillara. The design was announced in the morning by the sound of trumpets, when the people, curious to see a festival which had been interrupted for so many ages, assembled in great crowds from all quarters.

Petrarch marched to the Capitol, preceded by twelve youths of the first families in Rome, dressed in scarlet, singing verses composed by the poet, who was attired in a robe presented to him by Robert the Good, King of Naples, who had taken it off his own back, and desired him to wear it on the day of his coronation.

The principal citizens of Rome, habited in a green uniform, and crowned with chaplets of flowers, attended Petrarch in procession. After these marched the senator, accompanied by the chief members of the Roman council. When he was seated, Petrarch, being summoned by a herald, pronounced a short oration. Afterwards when he had thrice exclaimed, "Viva lo popolo Romana! Viva lo senatore! Dio lo mantenga in libertade!" (Long live the Roman people! Long live the senator! May God preserve their liberty!) he kneeled before the senator, who, after a short speech, took from his own head a crown of laurel, and placed it on that of Petrarch, saying, "Corona premia la virtù!" (The crown is the recompense of merit!)

The poet then recited a beautiful poem upon the heroes of Rome, which is not published in his works; and the people expressed their approbation by repeated shouts and exclamations of "Long live the poet!" and "Long may the Capitol endure!" Stephen Colonna, as the poet himself tells us, afterwards spoke, and, having a great affection for Petrarch, bestowed on him such praise as flowed from the heart.

His friends, who were present on this occasion, shed tears of delight. "And though," says Petrarch of himself, "I was almost overcome with joy, I was not unconscious that these honors were superior to my desert. I blushed at the applause of the people, and at the excess of commendation with which I was overwhelmed."

2475. ALLSTON AND COLERIDGE AT ROME.

At Rome Allston met Coleridge. He passes the following high eulogium upon the author of the Ancient Mariner: "To no other man whom I have known do I owe so much, intellectually," said he, "as to Mr. Coleridge, with whom I became acquainted in Rome, and who has honored me with his friendship for more than five and twenty years."

"He used to call Rome the silent city; but I never could think of it as such while with him; for, meet him when or where I would, the fountain of his mind was never dry; but, like the far-reaching aqueducts that once supplied this mistress of the world, its living streams seemed specially to flow for every classic ruin over which we wandered."

"And when I recall some of our walks under the pines of the Villa Borghese, I am almost tempted to dream that I had once listened to Plato in the groves of the Academy. It was there he taught me this golden rule—never to judge of any work of art by its defects; a rule as wise as benevolent, and one that, while it has spared me much pain, has widened my sphere of pleasure."

2476. GOLDSMITH'S SELF-DISTRUST. THE TRAVELLER.

Goldsmith distrusted his qualifications to succeed in poetry, and doubted the disposition of the public mind in regard to it. "I fear," said he, "I have come too late into the world. Pope and other poets have taken up the places in the temple of Fame; and, as few at any period can possess poetical reputation, a man of genius can now hardly acquire it." Again, on another occasion, he observes, "Of all kinds of ambition, as things are now circumstanced, perhaps that which pursues poetical fame is the wildest. What from the increased refinement of the times, from the diversity of judgment produced by opposing systems of criticism, and from the more prevalent divisions of opinion influenced by party, the strongest and happiest efforts can expect to please but in a very narrow circle."

At this very time he had by him his poem of the Traveller. The plan of it, as has already been observed, was conceived many years before, during his travels in Switzerland, and a sketch of it sent from that country to his brother Henry in Ireland. The original outline is said to have embraced a wider scope; but it was probably contracted through diffidence, in the process of finishing the parts. It had lain by him several years in a crude state, and it was with extreme hesitation, and after much revision, that he at length submitted it to Dr. Johnson. The frank and warm approbation of the latter encouraged him to finish it for the press; and Dr. Johnson himself contributed a few lines towards the conclusion.

The poem was published on the 19th of December, 1764, in a quarto form, by Newbery, and was the first of his works to which Goldsmith prefixed his name. As a testimony of cherished and well-merited affection, he dedicated it to his brother Henry. There is an amusing affectation of indifference as to its fate expressed in the dedication. "What reception a poem may find," says he, "which has neither abuse, party, nor blank verse to support it, I cannot tell, nor am I solicitous to know." The truth is, no one was more emulous and anxious for poetic fame; and never was he more anxious than in the present instance, for it was his grand stake.

Dr. Johnson aided the launching of the poem by a favorable notice in the Critical Review; other periodical works came out in its favor. Some of the author's friends complained that it did not command instant and wide popularity; that it was a poem to win, not to strike. It went on rapidly increasing in favor: in three months a second edition was issued; shortly afterwards, a third; then a fourth; and before the year was out, the author was pronounced the best poet of his time.

The appearance of the Traveller at once altered Goldsmith's intellectual standing in the estimation of society; but its effect upon the club, if we may judge from the account given by Hawkins, was almost ludicrous. They were lost in astonishment that a "newspaper essayist" and "bookseller's drudge" should have written such a poem. On the evening of its announcement to them, Goldsmith had gone away early, after "rattling away as usual;" and they knew not how to reconcile his heedless garrulity with the serene beauty, the easy grace, the sound good sense, and the occasional elevation of his poetry. They could scarcely believe that such magic numbers had flowed from a man, to whom, in general, says Johnson, "it was with difficulty they could give a hearing." "Well," exclaimed Chamier, "I do believe he wrote this poem himself; and let me tell you that is believing a great deal."

At the next meeting of the club, Chamier sounded the author a little about his poem. "Mr. Goldsmith," said he, "what do you mean by the last word in the first line of your Traveller? 'Remote, unfriended, solitary, slow.' Do you mean tardiness of locomotion?" "Yes," replied Goldsmith, inconsiderately, being probably flurried at the moment. "No, sir," interposed his protecting friend Johnson, "you did not mean tardiness of locomotion; you meant that sluggishness of mind which comes upon a man in solitude." "Ah," exclaimed Goldsmith, "that was what I meant."

Chamier immediately believed that Johnson himself had written the line, and a rumor became prevalent that he was the author of many of the finest passages. This was ultimately set at rest by Johnson himself, who marked with a pencil all the verses he had contributed, nine in number, inserted towards the conclusion, and by no means the best in the poem. He moreover, with generous warmth, pronounced it the finest poem that had appeared since the days of Pope.

But one of the highest testimonials to the charm of the poem was given by Miss Reynolds, who had toasted poor Goldsmith as the ugliest man of her acquaintance. Shortly after the appearance of the Traveller, Dr. Johnson read it aloud from beginning to end in her presence. "Well," exclaimed she, when he had finished, "I never more shall think Dr. Goldsmith ugly."

On another occasion, when the merits of the Traveller were discussed at Reynolds's board, Langton declared "there was not a bad line in the poem, not one of Dryden's careless verses." "I was glad," observed Reynolds, "to hear Charles Fox say it was one of the finest poems in the English language." "Why, were you glad?" rejoined Langton; "you surely had no doubt of this before." "No," interposed Johnson, decisively; "the merit of the Traveller is so well established that Mr. Fox's praise cannot augment it, nor his censure diminish it."

Boswell, who was absent from England at the time of the publication of the Traveller, was astonished, on his return, to find Goldsmith, whom he had so much undervalued, suddenly elevated almost to a par with his idol. He accounted for it by concluding that much both of the sentiments and expression of the poem had been derived from conversations with Johnson. "He imitates you, sir," said this incarnation of toadyism. "Why, no, sir," replied Johnson; "Jack Hawke is one of my imitators, but not Goldsmith. Goldy, sir, has great merit." "But, sir, he is much indebted to you for his getting so high in the public estimation." "Why, sir, he has, perhaps, got sooner to it by his intimacy with me."

The poem went through several editions in the course of the first year, and received some few additions and corrections from the author's pen. It produced a golden harvest to Mr. Newbery, but all the remuneration on record, doled out by his niggard hand to the author, was twenty guineas.

2477. ANECDOTE OF DR. JOHNSON.

A lady having expressed her wonder to the doctor, that "Milton, who had written so sublime a poem as the Paradise Lost, should have been so inferior to himself in the composition of the Sonnets," he replied, "Is it a matter of surprise, madam, that the hand which was able to scoop a colossus, of the most perfect symmetry, from a rock, should fail in an attempt to form the head of Venus out of a cherry stone?"

2478. LOPE DE VEGA.

Other writers, of the same age with Lope de Vega, obtained a wider celebrity. Don Quixote, during the life of its ill-requited author, was naturalized in countries where the name of Lope de Vega was not known, and Du Bartas was translated into the language of every reading people; but no writer ever has enjoyed such a share of popularity.

"Cardinal Barberini," says Lord Holland, "followed Lope with veneration in the streets. The king would stop to gaze at such a prodigy; the people crowded round him wherever he appeared; the learned and studious thronged to Madrid from every part of Spain, to see this phoenix of their country, this monster of literature; and even Italians, no extravagant admirers, in general, of poetry that is not their own, made pilgrimages from their country for the sole purpose of conversing with Lope. So associated was the idea of excellence with his name, that it grew, in common conversation, to signify any thing perfect in its kind; and a Lope diamond, a Lope day, or a Lope woman, became fashionable and familiar modes of expressing their good qualities."

Lope's death produced a universal commotion in the court and in the whole kingdom. Many ministers, knights, and prelates were present when he expired; among others, the Duke of Sesa, who had been the most munificent of his patrons, whom he appointed his executor, and who was at the expense of his funeral—a mode by which the great men in that country were fond of displaying their regard for men of letters. It was a public funeral, and it was not performed till the third day after his death, that there might be time for rendering it more splendid, and securing a more honorable attendance. The grandes and nobles who were about the court were all invited as mourners; a novenary, or service of nine days, was performed for him, at which the musicians of the royal chapel assisted; after which there were exequies on three successive days, at which three bishops officiated in full pontificals; and on each day a funeral sermon was preached by one of the most famous preachers of the age. Such honors were paid to the memory of Lope de Vega, one of the most prolific, and, during his life, the most popular of all poets, ancient or modern.

2479. ANNE OF BRETAGNY.

Anne of Brittany in various ways showed her regard to literature. Among other anecdotes told of her, one is, that once passing from her own apartment towards that of the king, she observed in the gallery, asleep and leaning on a table, Allaine Chartier, one of the poets of that day. In the presence of her ladies she stopped, bent down, and saluted him; which having done, she said to them, "We may not, of our princely courtesy, pass by and not honor with our kiss the mouth whence so many sweet ditties and golden poems have issued."

2480. THE MODEST POET.

Lucius Valerius was born at Hirconium, in the reign of Trajan. At thirteen years of age, he became a competitor for the prize of poetry. This prize was a beautiful gold medal, and an ivory lyre, which was, every five years, adjudged to the author who produced the best poem. Valerius, though opposed by a number of poets double his age, was victorious. Among other honors paid to him, it was determined to erect a brazen statue, which should be placed in the most conspicuous part of the city. The day of the presentation of this statue to public view presented a trait in the character of Valerius still more lovely than his talents.

At the moment in which the chief magistrate was placing a crown of laurel on the head of the statue, Valerius perceived a young man, who had contested the prize with him, and who was, in the opinion of many, little inferior to him, looking upon this scene with a sorrowful and dejected countenance. Valerius instantly discovered the cause of his chagrin, and determined to remove it, which he did in the following manner: He seized the laurel crown, and pressing towards his disappointed rival, placed it on his head, saying, "You are more deserving of it than I am: I obtained it more on account of my youth than my merit, and rather as an encouragement than a reward."

This generous conduct called forth enthusiastic admiration from the spectators; and the astonished youth, who thus unexpectedly received the crown of victory from the hands of the victor, was overcome with gratitude and joy. To preserve the remembrance of an action which evinced at once so much modesty and such kind feelings, the people conferred on Valerius the surname of Pudens, which signifies modest—an honor greater even than that which he derived from his poetry.

2481. BERANGER'S CHANSONS.

It is difficult to conceive the power of Beranger over the popular mind in France. There is no doubt that his Chansons had an immense influence in producing the revolution in 1830, although he does not view the existing government with approbation, and has refused every thing in the shape of boon or favor at its hands. At the funeral of his friend Lafitte, not long ago, which was attended by the king and princes, the royal carriage passed onward unnoticed; but when that of Beranger appeared, a burst of acclamation welcomed the poet of the people—his horses were unyoked, and hundreds strove for the honor of drawing him in triumph; it was with difficulty he persuaded them to desist.

2482. SINCERE MOURNERS.

A solemn funeral honored the remains of Klopstock, led by the senate of Hamburg, with fifty thousand votaries, so penetrated by one universal sentiment, that this multitude preserved a mournful silence, and the interference of the police ceased to be necessary through the city at the solemn burial of the man of genius.

2483. QUEEN VICTORIA AND THOMAS CAMPBELL.

The following story narrates the most graceful compliment and delicate return ever made by royalty:—

"I was at her majesty's coronation, in Westminster Abbey," said Campbell, "and she conducted herself so well, during the long and fatiguing ceremony, that I shed tears many times. On returning home, I resolved, out of pure esteem and veneration, to send her a copy of all my works.

"Accordingly, I had them bound up, and went personally with them to Sir Henry Wheatly, who, when he understood my errand, told me that her majesty made it a rule to decline presents of this kind, and that she could not touch with her sceptre in any of her dominions which I covet; and I therefore entreat you, in your office, to present them with my devotion as a subject.' But the next day they were returned.

"I hesitated," continued Campbell, "to open the parcel; but, on doing so, I found, to my inexpressible joy, a note enclosed, desiring my autograph on them. Having complied with the wish, I again transmitted the books to her majesty; and, in the course of a day or two, received in return this elegant engraving, with her majesty's autograph, as you see below." He then directed particular attention to the royal signature, which was in her majesty's usual bold and beautiful handwriting.

2484. VOLTAIRE'S HEAD.

During the extraordinary popularity which Voltaire enjoyed at Paris, the number of his portraits in circulation was immense.

One ingenious artist in particular, of the name of Huber, had acquired such a facility in forming his countenance, that he could not only cut most striking likenesses of him out of paper, with scissors held behind his back, but could mould a little bust of him in half a minute, out of a bit of bread; and at last used to make his dog manufacture most excellent profiles, by making him bite off the edge of a biscuit which he held to him in three or four different positions.

2485. MONUMENT TO MILTON.

Considerable curiosity was created, the other day, in Wathing Street, by the erection of a large tablet on the walls of All-hallows Church to the memory of Milton, the poet. It bears an inscription the following well-known lines:—

"Three poets in three distant ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England did adorn;
The first in majesty of thought surpassed;
The next in gracefulness; in both the last.
The force of nature could no further go;
To make a third, she joined the other two."

"John Milton was born in Bread Street, the 9th day of December, 1608, and was baptized in the parish Church of All-hallows, Bread Street, on Tuesday, the 29th of December, 1608."

2486. REVERENCE FOR PETRARCH AND LAURA.

There is scarce a genteel family at Avignon but have the pictures of Petrarch and Laura in their houses. A lady of that country, who piques herself much on being descended from Laura, took it very ill of Mr. Ramsay that he should say Petrarch's love for Laura was only Platonic. Ramsay was obliged to recant the heresy, and write a fable against Platonic love.

2487. RESPECT PAID TO WIELAND.

The night that followed the battle of Jena was a terrible one to the inhabitants of Weimar. The contest raged in its streets and walks; showers of balls fell into the town; all around houses were in flames; plunder and devastation were at their height. But amidst this general confusion, Wieland, the poet, received a proof of the high estimation in which his talents were held by him who had thus directed the storm of war; for by Bonaparte's orders a guard was placed before his house for its protection.

Next morning Marshal Ney waited upon him in person. He found him in his room, which had been stripped of its furniture before the guard had been placed. Wieland had only one chair remaining, which he offered to the marshal; but Ney, with politeness and kindness, gently reseated the old man in his chair, and observed that he knew better whose duty it was to stand in the presence of Wieland.

2488. DUKE OF YORK AND MILTON.

The Duke of York, in the heyday of his honors and greatness, went to satisfy a malignant curiosity, by visiting Milton in his own house. He asked him if he did not regard the loss of his sight as a judgment for his writing against the king. Milton replied, calmly, "If your highness thinks calamity is an indication of Heaven's wrath, how do you account for the fate of the king your father? I have lost but my eyes—he lost his head."

On the duke's return to court, he said to the king, "Brother, you are greatly to blame that you don't have that old rogue, Milton, hanged."

"What!" said the king, "have you seen Milton?"

"Yes," answered the duke, "I have seen him."

"In what condition did you find him?"

"Condition! Why, he is old and very poor."

"Old and poor," said the king, "and blind too? You are a fool, James, to have him hanged; it would be doing him a service. No; if he is poor, old, and blind, he is already miserable enough in all conscience. Let him live on."

2489. A POET INSTRUCTING A KING.

The sphere of a poet's influence is far wider than that of his own age; and whatever we may now think of the grave and ancient poet Gower, he found understanding admirers so late as in the reign of Charles I. In the curious "conference" which took place when Charles I. visited the Marquis of Worcester, at Ragland Castle, with his court, there is the following anecdote respecting the poet Gower:—

The marquis was a shrewd though whimsical man, and a favorite of the king for his frankness and his love of the arts. His lordship entertained the royal guest with extraordinary magnificence. Among his rare curiosities was a sumptuous copy of Gower's volume. Charles I. usually visited the marquis after dinner. Once he found his lordship with the book of John Gower lying open, when the king said he had never before seen. "O," exclaimed the marquis, "it is a book of books!"

istotle brought up and instructed Alexander the Great in all the rudiments and principles belonging to a prince." And under the persons of Aristotle and Alexander, the marquis read the king such a lesson that all the standers-by were amazed at his boldness. The king asked whether he had his lesson by heart, or spoke out of the book. "Sir, if you would read my heart, it may be that you might find it there; or if your majesty pleased to get it by heart, I will lend you my book." The king accepted the offer. Some of the new-made lords fretted and bit their thumbs at certain passages in the marquis's discourse, and some protested that no man was so much for the absolute power of a king as Aristotle. The marquis told the king that he would indeed show him one remarkable passage to that purpose, and turning to the place, read,—

"A king can kill, a king can save;
A king can make a lord a knave;
And of a knave a lord also."

On this several new-made lords slunk out of the room, which the king observing, he told the marquis, "My lord, at this rate, you will drive away all my nobility."

This amusing anecdote is an evidence that this ethical poet, after two centuries and a half, was not forgotten; his spirit was still vital; his volume still lay open on the library table; it afforded a pungent lesson to the courtiers of Charles I., as it had to those of Richard II.

242. BENEVOLENCE AND SYMPATHY.

2490. LAST MOMENTS OF SIDNEY.

Philip Sidney.

Sir Philip Sidney was regarded by his contemporaries as not only a highly-accomplished scholar, and a gallant and most true-hearted man, but also a great statesman and soldier, and, with scarcely an exception, the greatest of living poets. He was born in 1554; his father, Sir Henry Sidney, being described as a man "of excellent natural wit, large heart, and sweet conversation."

Our readers will remember the famous anecdote told of Sidney at the battle of Zutphen, where he lost his life. Whilst being carried through the camp fatally wounded, feeling thirsty with excess of bleeding, he called for drink, which was brought to him. At this moment a soldier still more dangerously hurt, and who, as Lord Brooke observes, "had eaten his last at this same feast," was borne by, and was observed by Sidney to fix his ghastly and imploring looks upon him. He immediately handed the bottle to the poor soldier, saying simply, "Thy necessity is greater than mine."

It is painful to know that but for a chivalric imprudence Sidney's wound might have been averted. He had fully armed himself according to the custom of the time, but seeing the marshal of the camp comparatively defenceless, he threw off his own armor, and thus opened a free passage for his mortal wound. "Nothing in life, however, became him like the leaving of it."

Sidney's death occurred at the age of thirty-two; and nothing gives so high an idea of his heroic and generous character, as the fact that he was able, at so early an age, to have made so strong an impression upon his contemporaries. The national grief at his death was extraordinary; the whole kingdom went into mourning.

2491. SHELLEY'S GENEROSITY.

As an instance of Shelley's extraordinary generosity, a friend of his, a man of letters, enjoyed from him, at that period, a pension of a hundred a year, though he had but a thousand of his own; and he continued to enjoy it till fortune rendered it superfluous.

But the princeliness of his disposition was seen most in his behavior to another friend, the writer of this memoir, who is proud to relate that, with money raised with an effort, Shelley once made him a present of fourteen hundred pounds, to extricate him from debt. "I was not extricated," says he, "for I had not yet learnt to be careful; but the shame of not being so, after such generosity, and the pain which my friend afterwards underwent when I was in trouble and he was helpless, were the first causes of my thinking of money matters to any purpose. His last sixpence was ever at my service, had I chosen to share it."

In a poetical epistle written some years after, and published in the volume of Posthumous Poems, Shelley, in alluding to his friend's circumstances, which, for the second time, were then straitened, only made an affectionate lamentation that he himself was poor; never once hinting that he had himself drained his purse for his friend.

2492. SHELLEY AND THE POOR WOMAN.

"I was returning home one night," says Leigh Hunt, "to Hampstead, after the opera. As I approached the door, I heard strange and alarming shrieks, mixed with the voice of a man. The next day; it was reported by the gossips that Mr. Shelley, no Christian,—for it was he who was there,—had brought some ‘very strange female’ into the house, no better, of course, than she ought to be.

“Shelley, in coming to our house that night, had found a woman lying near the top of the hill in fits. It was a fierce winter night, with snow upon the ground; and winter loses nothing of its fierceness at Hampstead. My friend, always the promptest as well as most pitying on these occasions, knocked at the first houses he could reach, in order to have the woman taken in. The invariable answer was, that they could not do it.

“He asked for an outhouse to put her in, while he went for a doctor. Impossible! In vain he assured them that she was no impostor. They could not dispute the point with him; but doors were closed, and windows were shut down. Time flies; the poor woman is in convulsions; her son, a young man, lamenting over her.

“At last my friend sees a carriage driving up to a house at a little distance. The knock is given; the warm door opens; servants and lights pour forth. Now, thought he, is the time. He puts on his best address, which any body might recognize for the highest gentleman as well as an interesting individual, and plants himself in the way of an elderly person, who is stepping out of the carriage with his family. He tells his story. They only press on the faster. ‘Will you go and see her?’ ‘No, sir; there’s no necessity for that sort of thing, depend upon it. Impostors swarm every where: the thing cannot be done: sir, your conduct is extraordinary.’

“‘Sir,’ cried Shelley, assuming a very different manner, and forcing the flourishing householder to stop out of astonishment, ‘I am sorry to say that your conduct is not extraordinary; and if my own seems to amaze you, I will tell you something which may amaze you a little more, and I hope will frighten you. It is such men as you who madden the spirits and the patience of the poor and wretched; and if ever a convulsion comes in this country,—which is very probable,—recollect what I tell you. You will have your house, that you refuse to put the miserable woman into, burnt over your head.’ ‘God bless me, sir! Dear me, sir!’ exclaimed the poor frightened man, and fluttered into his mansion.

“The woman was then brought to our house, which was at some distance, and down a bleak path; and Shelley and her son were obliged to hold her till the doctor could arrive.

“It appeared that she had been attending this son in London, on a criminal charge made against him, the agitation of which had thrown her into fits on her return. The doctor said that she would have perished had she lain there a short time longer. The next day my friend sent mother and son comfortably home to Hendon, where they were known, and whence they returned him their hearts full of gratitude.”

was considered flush, to levy continual taxes upon his purse.

Among others, one Pilkington, an old college acquaintance, but now a shifting adventurer, duped him in the most ludicrous manner. He called on him with a face full of perplexity. A lady of the first rank having an extraordinary fancy for curious animals, for which she was willing to give enormous sums, he had procured a couple of white mice to be forwarded to her from India. They were actually on board of a ship in the river. Her grace had been apprised of their arrival, and was all impatience to see them. Unfortunately, he had no cage to put them in, nor clothes to appear in before a lady of her rank. Two guineas would be sufficient for his purpose; but where were two guineas to be procured?

The simple heart of Goldsmith was touched; but, alas! he had but half a guinea in his pocket. It was unfortunate; but, after a pause, his friend suggested, with some hesitation, that “money might be raised upon his watch; it would be but the loan of a few hours.” So said, so done: the watch was delivered to the worthy Mr. Pilkington, to be pledged at a neighboring pawn-brokers; but nothing further was ever seen of him, the watch, or the white mice. The next that Goldsmith heard of the poor shifting scapegrace, he was on his death bed, starving with want; upon which, forgetting or forgiving the trick he had played upon him, he sent him a guinea. Indeed, he used often to relate, with great humor, the foregoing anecdote of his credulity, and was ultimately in some degree indemnified by its suggesting to him the amusing little story of Prince Bonbennin and the White Mouse, in the Citizen of the World.

2494. PEEL AND BYRON.

Sir Robert Peel was a contemporary of Byron’s. and a scholar at the same university. It is related that when a great fellow of a boy-tyrant, who claimed little Peel as a fag, was giving him a castigation, Byron happened to come by. While the stripes were succeeding each other, and poor Peel was writhing under them, Byron saw and felt for the misery of his friend; and although he was not strong enough to fight the tyrant with any hope of success, and it was dangerous even to approach him, he advanced to the scene of action, and with a blush of rage, tears in his eyes, and in a voice trembling with terror and indignation, asked very humbly if he would be pleased to tell him “how many stripes he meant to inflict.”

“Why,” replied the executioner, “you little rascal, what is that to you?”

“Because, if you please,” said Byron, “I would take half!”

That Byron was thus originally of a noble nature, is proved beyond all contradiction by this little anecdote.

2495. BYRON AND COLERIDGE.

2493. GOLDSMITH DUPED BY AN OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

In his new lodgings, in Wine Office Court, Goldsmith began to receive visits of ceremony, and to entertain his literary friends. Among the latter he now numbered several names of note. He had also a numerous class of hangers-on, the small fry of literature, who, knowing his almost utter incapacity to refuse a pecuniary request, were apt, now that he

A generous mind will naturally seek to make reparation for wrongs done to another. Mean souls never acknowledge their faults, and seldom forgive those who point them out. In a letter to Coleridge, written in 1815, Lord Byron evinces that true magnanimity of mind which ever characterized the better feelings of the noble poet. He says, “You mention my ‘Satire,’ lampoon, or whatever you or others please to call it. I can only say that it was written when I was very young and very angry, and has been a thorn in my side ever since; more particularly as almost all the persons animadverted upon became subsequently my friends; which is heaping coals of fire upon an enemy's head, and forgiving me too readily to permit me to forgive myself. The part applied to you is pert and petulant, and shallow enough; but although I have done every thing in my power to suppress the circulation of the whole thing, I shall always regret the wantonness or generality of many of its attempted attacks."

The lines referred to by Byron are familiar to the readers of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers:—

"Shall gentle Coleridge pass unnoticed here,
To turgid ode and tumid stanza dear?
Though themes of innocence amuse him best,
Yet still obscurity's a welcome guest.
If inspiration should her aid refuse
To him who takes a paxy for a muse,
Yet none in lofty numbers can surpass
The bard who soars to elegize an ass.
So well the subject suits his noble mind,
He brays, the laureate of the long-eared kind."

2406. A POET'S GENEROSITY.

Pope's conduct towards Gay should always be remembered to his honor. "I remember a letter," says Aaron Hill, "wherein he invited him to partake of his fortune, (at that time but a small one,) assuring him, with a very unpoetical warmth, that as long as himself had a shilling, Mr. Gay should be welcome to a sixpence of it, nay, to eightpence, if he could but contrive to live on a groat."

2497. PIRON.

Piron, the celebrated French academician, was walking homewards from Notre Dame, when he was accosted by a blind man, who asked him for charity. He replied in the language of St. Peter, "Silver and gold have I none: but of what I have, I shall willingly give you part;" and immediately took out his tablets, and wrote upon them the following verses, which he pinned to the old man's coat:—

"You that enjoy the light of day,
Relieve a wretched, blind man, pray.
Unseen by me, your alms let fall;
He sees them clear who sees us all;
And when his eyes remove all shade,
In sight of all, you'll be repaid."

2498. POPE'S EXPENDITURE.

"Mr. Pope's not being richer," says Spence, "may be easily accounted for. He never had any love for money; and, though he was not extravagant in any thing, he always delighted, when he had any sum to spare, to make use of it in giving, lending, building, and gardening; for those were the ways in which he disposed of all the overplus of his income. If he was extravagant in any thing, it was in his grotto; for that, from first to last, cost him above a thousand pounds."

2499. GENEROSITY OF HUME.

David Hume.

Blacklock, the poet, certainly much better known for his blindness than for his genius, happened to call upon Hume, the historian, one day, and began a long dissertation on his misery, bewailing his loss of sight, his large family of children, and his utter incapacity to provide for them, or even to supply them, at that moment, with the necessaries of life.

Hume himself was, at that period, so little a favorite of fortune, from the smallness of his paternal estate, and the scantiness of his collegiate stipend, being then a member of the university, that he had solicited, and just then received, through the strenuous interest of a friend, a university appointment worth about forty pounds per annum.

The heart of the philosopher, however, was softened by the complaint of his friend; and being destitute of the pecuniary means of immediate assistance, he ran to his desk, took out the newly-received grant, and presented it to the unhappy poet, with a promise, which he faithfully performed, of using his best interest to have the name of Hume changed for that of Blacklock. In this generous attempt he was finally successful, and, by his noble philanthropy, had the pleasure of saving his friend and family from starvation.

§ 243. VARIOUS EXCELLENCES.

2500. POPE'S HATRED OF FLATTERY.

Mr. Pope never flattered any body for money in the whole course of his writing.

Alderman Barber had a great inclination to have a stroke in his commendation inserted in some part of Mr. Pope's writings. He did not want money, and he wanted fame. He would probably have given four or five thousand pounds to have been gratified in this desire, and gave Mr. Pope to understand as much; but Mr. Pope would never comply with such a baseness. And when the alderman died, he left him a legacy only of a hundred pounds, which might have been some thousands if he had obliged him only with a couplet.

2501. THOMSON'S PATIENCE.

Thomson, the poet, was considered one of the most patient men that ever existed, and at the same time one of the most indolent; indeed, it was common in his lifetime for his friends to observe that such a one was "as patient as Thomson." This (almost a failing) gave rise to a bet between two gentlemen that he could be provoked. He was exceedingly fond of his bed, and of course liked it comfortably and easily made: his servant was therefore bribed to leave it altogether unmade. Thomson, the next morning, gently reminded her of her neglect; but the following night, the same fault occurred: again he reminded her; but again he was doomed to sleep in a tumbled bed. On the third morning, he merely observed, "Since it does not suit you to make my bed, you can leave it alone altogether, for I am quite accustomed to a tumbled one now."

2502. SWIFT'S GENEROSITY.

Standing one morning at the window of his study, the dean observed a decent old woman offer a paper to one of his servants, which the fellow at first refused, in an insolent and surly manner. The woman, however, pressed her suit with all the energy of distress, and in the end prevailed. The dean, whose soul was compassionate, saw, felt, and was determined to alleviate her misery. He waited most anxiously for the servant to bring the paper; but, to his surprise and indignation, an hour elapsed, and the man did not present it.

The dean again looked out. The day was cold and wet, and the wretched petitioner still retained her situation, with many an eloquent and anxious look at the house. The benevolent divine lost all patience, and was going to ring the bell, when he observed the servant cross the street, and return the paper with the utmost sang froid and indifference.

The dean could bear it no longer. He threw up the sash, and loudly demanded what the paper contained. "It is a petition, please your reverence," replied the woman. "Bring it up, rascal," cried the enraged dean. The servant, surprised and petrified, obeyed.

With Swift, to know distress was to pity it; to pity, to relieve.

The poor woman was instantly made happy, and the servant almost as instantly turned out of doors, with the following written testimonial of his conduct. "The bearer," says he, "lived two years in my service, in which time he was frequently drunk and negligent of his duty; which, conceiving him to be honest, I excused; but at last detecting him in a flagrant instance of cruelty, I discharged him." Such were the consequences of this paper, that for seven years the fellow was an itinerant beggar, after which the dean forgave him; and in consequence of another paper, equally singular, he was hired by Mr. Pope, with whom he lived till his death.

2503. PIRON'S INDEPENDENCE.

Piron would not suffer the literary character to be lowered in his presence. Entering the apartment of a nobleman, who was conducting another peer to the stairs' head, the latter stopped to make way for Piron. "Pass on, my lord," said the noble master; "pass, he is only a poet." Piron replied, "Since our qualities are declared, I shall take my rank," and placed himself before the lord.

2504. POPE'S ACCURACY.

"At fifteen years of age," says Pope, "I got acquainted with Mr. Walsh. He encouraged me much, and used to tell me that there was one way left of excelling; for though we had several great poets, we never had any one great poet that was correct. He ended his remarks by desiring me to make accuracy my study and aim."

This, perhaps, first led Mr. Pope to turn his lines over and over again so often. This habit he continued to the last, and he did it with a surprising facility.

2505. PARINI.

Parini, a native of Milan, was not only one of the first poets of modern Italy, but a dignified, philanthropic, and most amiable man.

When the government of his country was changed, and a republic first instituted under the protection of the French arms, Milan became the scene of very natural excitement, and occasionally of violence. The people had been too long deprived of liberty to be able to bear their new condition with moderation.

Things even went so far that a young and beautiful girl was seen to ascend the republican tribune, and to promise her virgin love to the man who should bring in the head of that foe to liberty—the poor old pope; and the father of this virago was seen to embrace her with transport and tears excited by this heroic virtue!

It was at this time that some violent demagogue tried to force Parini, one night at the theatre, to join the mob in crying, "Death to the aristocrats!" "Long live the republic!" exclaimed the poet. "Life to the republic, but death to no one!" In an instant tranquillity was restored.

2506. FERDOSI, THE PERSIAN HOMER.

When the Persian Homer, Ferdosi, had finished his noble epic poem of the Shah Nameh, or Book of Kings, Mahmood was persuaded, by envious rivals, to diminish the reward that he had promised him. The bard spurned the present which he sent him, and added to his poem a bitter satire upon the king's want of generosity; but after he had given vent to his feelings, he thought it prudent to leave the court, and to retire to his native city of Too, the modern Mushed, in Khorassan.

Some time elapsed before Mahmood saw the verses he had written; and sensible too late of his error, he tried to retrieve his fame, by sending an immense sum to the poet; but the rich present reached the gates of Too as the body of Ferdosi was being carried to its last mansion; and it was rejected by his virtuous daughter, who scorned to accept that wealth which had been once denied to the merit of her illustrious father.

§ 244. ECCENTRICITIES. IDIOSYNCRASIES, AND CAPRICES.

2507. DEAN SWIFT AND HIS GUESTS.

Jonat: Swift.

One of the letters of Mr. Pope has the following anecdote of this celebrated but eccentric man:—

"Dean Swift has an odd, blunt way, that is mistaken by strangers for ill nature: it is so odd that there is no describing it but by facts. I'll tell you one that first comes into my head.

"One evening, Gay and I went to see him: you know how intimately we were all acquainted. On our coming in, 'Heyday, gentlemen,' says the doctor, 'what's the meaning of this visit? How came you to leave all the great lords that you are so fond of, to come hither to see a poor dean?' 'Because we would rather see you than any of them.' 'Ay, any one that did not know you so well as I do might believe you. But since you have come, I must get some supper for you, I suppose.' 'No, doctor, we have supped already.' 'Supped already? That's impossible: why, it is not eight o'clock yet. That's very strange: but if you had not supped, I must have got something for you. Let me see; what should I have had? A couple of lobsters? Ay, that would have done very well—two shillings; tarts, a shilling.

"But you will drink a glass of wine with me, though you supped so much before your usual time only to spare my pocket.' 'No, we had rather talk with you than drink with you.' 'But if you had supped with me, as in all reason you ought to have done, you must then have drunk with me. A bottle of wine, two shillings. Two and two are four, and one is five; just two and sixpence apiece. There, Pope, there's half a crown for you; and there's another for you, sir; for I won't save any thing by you, I am determined.'

"This was all said and done with his usual seriousness on such occasions; and in spite of every thing we could say to the contrary, he actually obliged us to take the money."

2508. COLERIDGE'S SATIRE ON HIMSELF.

Coleridge had a singular taste for satirizing himself. He has spoken of ludicrous consequences arising out of this indulgence.

"An amateur performer in verse," says he, "expressed to a common friend a strong desire to be introduced to me, but hesitated in accepting my friend's immediate offer, on the score that he was, he must acknowledge, the author of a very severe epigram on Mr. C.'s Ancient Mariner, which had given him great pain.

"I assured my friend that, if the epigram was a good one, it would only increase my desire to become acquainted with the author, and begged to hear it recited; when, to my no less surprise than amusement, it proved to be one which I had myself, some time before, written and inserted in the Morning Post:—

TO THE AUTHOR OF THE ANCIENT MARINER.

"Your poem must eternal be;
Dear sir, it cannot fail,
For 'tis incomprehensible,
And without head or tail."

2509. COLERIDGE AND ARCHITECTURE.

Cottle says it was a remarkable trait of Mr. Coleridge's character that edifices excited in his mind very little interest.

"On his return from Italy, and after having resided for some time in Rome, I remember his describing to me the state of society; the characters of the pope and cardinals; the gorgeous ceremonies, with the superstitions of the people; but not one word did he utter concerning St. Peter's, the Vatican, or the numerous antiquities of the place.

"As a further confirmation of this view of his character, I remember to have been with Mr. Coleridge at York, on our journey into Durham, to see

Mr. Wadsworth, when, after breakfast at the inn, perceiving Mr. C. engaged, I went out alone to see the York Minster, being on the way detained in a bookseller's shop. In the mean time, Mr. C., having missed me, set off in search of his companion.

"Supposing it probable that I was gone to the Minster, he went up to the door of that magnificent structure, and inquired of the porter whether such an individual as myself had gone in there. Being answered in the negative, he had no further curiosity, not even looking into the interior, but turned away to pursue his search.

"So that, for aught which appears, Mr. C. left York without beholding, or wishing to behold, the chief attraction of the city, or being at all conscious that he had committed, by his neglect, high treason against all architectural beauty! This deficiency in his regard for edifices, while he was feverishly alive to all the operations of the mind, and to all intellectual inquiries, formed a striking and singular feature in Mr. C.'s mental constitution worthy of being noticed."

2510. ECCENTRICITIES OF POETS IN THE SELECTION OF THEIR THEME.

It has been the pride of many writers to choose subjects apparently the most barren and insignificant, in order to show off to the greater advantage their powers of imagination and description.

Homer sung the wars of the frogs and mice; Apuleius, the sensibility of the ass; Lucian, the rambles of a fly; Julius Scaliger, the wisdom of the goose.

A parasitical life had its eulogist in Lucian; folly, an apologist in Erasmus; and the mad freaks of the tyrant Nero, a vindicator in Cardan. While Libanus selects the ox for his theme, Michael Pfellus is content with a gnat; and Antonius Majoragius, who deems nothing worthier of his praise than the clay from which we are all sprung, and to which all must sooner or later return, is outvalled by James Donyssa, the son, who sees in a shadow the essence of all human pursuits since time began, and even until time shall be no more.

2511. ALFIERI.

The poet Alfieri's hair was fated to bring into play one of his leading eccentricities; for being alone at the theatre at Turin, and hanging carelessly with his head backwards over the corner of his box, a lady in the next seat, on the other side of the partition, who had on other occasions made several attempts to attract his attention, broke into violent and repeated encomiums on his auburn locks, which were flowing down close by her hand.

Alfieri spoke not a word, and continued in his posture until he left the theatre. The lady the next morning received a parcel, the contents of which she found to be the tresses she had so much admired, and which the count had cut off close to his head. There was no billet with the present, but words could not have more clearly expostulated, "If you like the hair, here it is, but leave me alone."

2512. A STRANGE WHIM OF BYRON.

Byron, having found a skull in the cemetery of his ancestors, formed the strange idea of having it converted into a drinking cup; and being mounted on a silver stand, he wrote an inscription, which was engraven round it, and which says, —

"Quaff while thou canst; another race,
When thou and thine like me are sped,
May rescue thee from earth's embrace
And rhyme and revel with the dead."

2513. HARTOP AND MILTON.

Hartop lent Milton fifty pounds, soon after the restoration, which the bard returned him with honor, though not without much difficulty, as his circumstances were very low. The creditor would have declined; but the pride of the poet was equal to his genius, and he sent the money with an angry letter, which was found among the curious possessions of that venerable old man.

2514. THE POET CAMPBELL.

"It is well known," says Frazer, "that Campbell's own favorite poem was his Gertrude. I once heard him say, 'I never like to see my name before the Pleasures of Hope; why, I cannot tell you, unless it was that, when young, I was always greeted among my friends as "Mr. Campbell, author of the Pleasures of Hope." "Good morning to you, Mr. Campbell, author of the Pleasures of Hope." When I got married, I was married as the author of the Pleasures of Hope; and when I became a father, my son was the son of the author of the Pleasures of Hope.' A kind of grim smile, ill subdued, we are afraid, stole over our features, when, standing beside the poet's grave, we read the inscription on his coffin:—

"Thomas Campbell, LL. D., author of the Pleasures of Hope, died June 15, 1844, aged 67."

"The poet's dislike occurred to our memory—there was no getting the better of the thought."

2515. ANECDOTE OF SHERIDAN.

The circumstance of Sheridan's well-known duel having been misrepresented, he came to town, resolved to set the British public right; and as Perry, the editor of the Morning Chronicle, was his friend, he resolved to do so through the channels of that paper. It was agreed by them that Sheridan, under a fictitious name, should write a history of the affair as it had been misrepresented, and that he should subsequently reply to it in his own name, giving the facts of the case. The first part he accomplished, and there appeared in the Chronicle a bitter article against him, written, in fact, by himself; but he was too lazy to write the reply, and it never was written.

2516. YOUNG AND HIS NIGHT THOUGHTS.

"When one begins to find pleasure in sighing over Young's Night Thoughts in a corner," says Beattie, "it is time to shut the book, and return to the company. I grant, that while the mind is in a certain state, those gloomy ideas give exquisite delight; but their effect resembles intoxication upon the body.

"They may produce a temporary fit of exaltation, but qualms, and weakened nerves, and de pression of spirits are the consequence. Yet I have great respect for Dr. Young, both as a man and as a poet. I even used to devour his Night Thoughts with a satisfaction not unlike that which, in my younger years, I have found in walking in a churchyard alone, or on a wild mountain by the light of the moon at midnight.

"When I first read Young, my heart was broken to think of the poor man's afflictions. Afterwards I took it in my head that where there was so much lamentation there could not be excessive suffering, and I could not help applying to him sometimes those lines of a song,—

'Believe me, the shepherd but feigns
He's wretched, to show he has wit.'

On talking with some of Dr. Young's friends in England, I have since found that my conjectures were right, for while he was composing the Night Thoughts, he was really as cheerful as any other man."

2517. RABELAIS'S OPINION OF THE WORLD.

Rabelais had written some sensible pieces, which the world did not regard at all. "I will write something," says he, "that they shall take notice of." And so he sat down to writing nonsense.

2518. SOMETHING ORIGINAL.

Campbell, the poet, received a request from a young lady to write something original in her album. He answered as follows:—

"An original something, dear maid, you would win me
To write; but how shall I begin?
For I'm sure I have nothing original in me,
Excepting original sin."

2519. JOHNSON'S PORTRAIT BY HIMSELF.

"He told me," says Mrs. Piozzi, "that the character of Sober, in the Idler, was by himself intended as his own portrait; and that he had his own outset into life in his eye, when he wrote the Eastern story of Gelaeddin."

2520. POPE AT FOURTEEN.

Little people mistook the excess of Pope's genius for madness. Ray Smith, after being in Mr. Pope's company when about fourteen, exclaimed, "Egad! that young fellow will either be a madman, or make a very great poet."

2521. McDONALD CLARKE.

The following account of a very singular man appeared in the Portland Transcript in 1850:—

"Some of our readers, perhaps, have heard of McDonald Clarke, sometimes called the mad poet. Our thoughts are at this moment directed to him by observing, in an exchange, one of his poems. credited to that most prolific genius, Mr. Anonymous. Poor fellow! he died in a mad-house, and now the orphaned offspring of his brain and heart wander, unowned, through the highways and byways of literature.

"McDonald Clarke was a singular, unfortunate, but gifted being. Amid a thousand absurd vagaries shone out gleams of the highest genius. Two or three years ago, we came into possession of a small, miserably-printed collection of his rhymings, published during his lifetime. It probably fell dead from the press. It was full of bad grammar and worse orthography, yet it contained snatches of poetry that would not disgrace the proudest of the children of song. The following strangely worded, but touchingly beautiful paragraphs are from his introduction to the literary volume referred to:—

"I won't pester folks with apologies. Here's a rough handful of flowers—a little dirt about the roots—a tear'll wash off.

"If the life of my poetry is wholesome, 'twill breathe after the wild spirit that inspired it has been sobered at the terrible tribunal of eternity, and the weak hand that traced it long wasted to ashes."

"He is the author of those oft-quoted lines,—

'Now twilight lets her curtain down,
And pins it with a star.'

"In his wilder moments, he set all rules at defiance, and mingled the startlingly sublime and the laughably ridiculous in the oddest confusion. He talks thus madly of Washington:—

'Eternity—give him elbow room;
A spirit like his is large;
Earth, fence with artillery his tomb,
And fire a double charge
To the memory of America's greatest man:
Match him, posterity, if you can.'

"In the following lines, he sketches, with a few bold touches, a well-known place, sometimes called a rum hole:—

'Ha! see where the wild-blazing grogshop appears,
As the red waves of wretchedness roll,
How it burns on the edge of tempestuous years,
The horrible light-house of hell!'

"A reviewer having made a sneering allusion to Clarke, and used the word zigzag in reference to brains, Clarke called at the office of the paper which published it, and wished permission to reply. It was granted, on condition that he would occupy only four lines. This was his reply:—

'I will tell Johnny —, in the way of a laugh,
Since he's dragged my name into his pen-and-ink scrawl,
That most people think it is better by half
To have brains that are 'zigzag' than no brains at all.'

"Here is a tribute to the Sabbath, which, in sweetness and simplicity, is not often equalled:—

'I feel the happier all the week,
If my foot has pressed the sacred aisle;
The pillow seems softer to my cheek;
I sink to slumber with a smile;
With sinful passions cease to fight,
And sweetly dream on Sunday night.'

"Mrs. Child speaks of McDonald Clarke as one of the purest-hearted and most affectionate of beings. 'He was,' says she, 'simple and temperate in all his habits; and in his deepest poverty he always kept up the neat appearance of a gentleman.'

"He died, a few years ago, in a lunatic asylum, on Blackwell's Island, New York, at the age of forty-four, and was buried in Greenwood Cemetery, agreeably to a wish often expressed by him during his brief and sad career. He is said to have expressed a childlike delight when told what arrangements should be made at his funeral. 'I hope the children will come,' said he; 'I want to be buried by the side of children. Four things I am sure there will be in heaven—music, flowers, pure air, and plenty of little children.”

2522. ANECDOTE OF L. E. L.

Birthplace of Miss Landon.

We quote the following paragraphs from William Howitt:—

“On the other hand, in mixed companies, witty and conversant as she was, you had a feeling that she was playing an assumed part. Her manner and conversation were not only the very reverse of the tone and sentiment of her poems, but she seemed to say things for the sake of astonishing you with the very contrast. You felt not only no confidence in the truth of what she was asserting, but a strong assurance that it was said merely for the sake of saying what her hearers would least expect to hear her say.

“I recollect once meeting her in company, at a time when there was a strong report that she was actually though secretly married. Mrs. Hofland, on her entering the room, went up to her in her plain, straightforward way, and said, ‘Ah! my dear, what must I call you?—Miss Landon, or whom?’

“After a well-feigned surprise at the question, Miss Landon began to talk in a tone of merry ridicule at this report, and ended by declaring that as to love or marriage, they were things that she never thought of. ‘What, then, have you been doing with yourself this last month?’

“‘O, I have been puzzling my brain to invent a new sleeve; pray, how do you like it?’ showing her arm.

“‘You never think of such a thing as love!’ exclaimed a sentimental young man; ‘you, who have written so many volumes of poetry upon it!’

“‘O that’s all professional, you know,’ exclaimed she, with an air of merry scorn.

“‘Professional!’ exclaimed a grave Quaker, who stood near; ‘why dost thou make a difference between what is professional and what is real? Dost thou write one thing and think another? Does not that look very much like hypocrisy?’

“To this the astonished poetess made no reply, but by a look of genuine amazement. It was a mode of putting the matter to which she had evidently never been accustomed. And, in fact, there can be no question that much of her writing was professional. She had to win a golden harvest for the comfort of others as dear to her as herself; and she felt, like all authors who have to cater for the public, that she must provide, not so much what she would of her free-will choice, but what they expected from her.”

2523. BYRON'S INCONSISTENCIES AND AFFECTATION.

Lord Byron.

He began his course in affecting to despise money, and he ended in affecting to love it. At first, he pretended to disdain remuneration for his works, but subsequently his publisher found him an exacting author.

This is not the only inconsistency which we observe in him with respect to his compositions. With the sternness of a literary Brutus, he seems at times to give up his intellectual offspring to the death sentence of criticism: a literary Brutus, however, has this advantage over the old Roman, that the life of his darling may be sung in another copy; and so it was with Byron's. Shelley had given judgment against the Deformed Transformed; Byron, in the presence of Shelley and other witnesses, consigned the manuscript to the flames, with the tranquillity of an inquisitor burning a heretic; but a short while after, the drama appeared in its unimpaired integrity.

He assumed, on occasions, a supreme indifference for his writings. “I don't care,” he says, “two lumps of sugar for my poetry, but for my costume and correctness; on these points I will combat lustily.”

Some instances of whims mark his conduct with respect to his works, which would better suit a petted opera singer than a mighty poet. He corresponded at one time with Murray, to repurchase and recall his copyrights; he even refunded money he had just received. Murray doubted the seriousness of the whole matter; and from the ease with which Byron was dissuaded we may doubt it also.

2524. LORD BYRON'S MOTHER.

Lord Byron was afflicted with a club foot, and when young he submitted to some very painful operations to have the deformity removed, but with no success. His mother was a proud, passionate, and wicked woman, and even the yearnings of natural affection seemed stifled. Let us see the influence his mother exerted on this brilliant and powerful mind.

The readers of Byron's Life must have shuddered to hear him speak of his mother. Moore, the biographer of Byron, speaks three times of this fact, and the passages are so remarkable that we will transcribe them literally. The first is brief, but significant:—

"On the subject of his deformed foot," says Moore, in his Byron, (vol. i. p. 21.) Byron described the feeling of horror and humiliation that came over him when his mother, in one of her fits of passion, called him a 'lame brat!'"

The second passage is scarcely less significant:—

"But in the case of Lord Byron, disappointment met him at the very threshold of life. His mother, to whom his affections first naturally and with order turned, either repelled them rudely, or capriciously trifled with them. In speaking of his early days to a friend at Genoa, a short time before his departure for Greece, he traced his first feelings of pain and humiliation to the coldness with which his mother had received his caresses in infancy, and the frequent taunts on his personal deformity with which she wounded him."

This passage, found on the 146th page, is only excelled in dreadfulfulness by the following, on the 198th page:—

"He had spoken of his mother to Lord Sligo, and with a feeling that seemed little short of aversion. 'Some time or other,' said Byron, 'I will tell you why I thus feel towards her.' A few days after, when they were bathing together in the Gulf of Lepanto, he referred to his promise, and pointing to his naked leg, exclaimed, 'Look there! it is to her false delicacy at my birth I owe that deformity; and yet, as long as I can remember, she has never ceased to taunt and reproach me with it. Even a few days before we parted for the last time, on my leaving England, she, in one of her fits of passion, uttered an imprecation on me, praying that I might prove as ill formed in mind as I am in body!' His look and manner, in relating the frightful circumstance, can only be conceived by those who have seen him in a similar state of excitement."

What an imprecation from the lips of a woman, and that woman a mother—"Praying that I might prove as ill formed in mind as I am in body!"

2525. POPE AS A MAN.

Lord Chesterfield says of Mr. Pope, "In conversation he was below himself: he was seldom easy and natural, and seemed afraid that the man should degrade the poet, which made him always attempt wit and humor, often unsuccessfully, and too often unseasonably. I have been with him a week at a time, at his house in Twickenham, where I necessarily saw his mind in its undress, when he was, both an agreeable and instructive companion."

"His moral character has been warmly attacked, and but weakly defended; the natural consequence of his shining turn to satire, of which many felt, and all feared, the smart. It must be owned that he was the most irritable of all the genus irritabile offended with trifles, and never forgetting or forgiving them; but in this I really think the poet was more in fault than the man."

"He was as great an instance as any he quotes of the contrarities and inconsistencies of human nature; for, notwithstanding the malignancy of his satires, and some blamable passages of his life, he was charitable to his power, active in doing good offices, and piously attentive to an old bed-ridden mother, who died but a little time before him. His poor, crazy, deformed body was a mere Pandora's box, containing all the physical ills that ever afflicted humanity. This, perhaps, whetted the edge of his satire, and may in some degree excuse it."

"I will say nothing of his works; they speak sufficiently for themselves: they will live as long as letters and taste shall remain in this country, and be more and more admired as envy and resentment shall subside. But I will venture this piece of classical blasphemy, which is, that however he may be supposed to be obliged to Horace, Horace is more obliged to him."

§ 254. COLLISIONS AND CONTROVERSIES.

2526. HANNAH MORE AND ANN YEARSLEY.

"I was well acquainted with Ann Yearsley," says Cottle, "and my friendship for Hannah More did not blind my eyes to the merits of her opponent. Candor exacts the acknowledgment that the Bristol milkwoman was a very extraordinary individual. Her natural abilities were eminent, united with which she possessed an unusually sound masculine understanding, and altogether evinced, even in her countenance, the unequivocal marks of genius."

"It has been customary to charge her with ingratitude, (at which all are ready to take fire,) but without sufficient cause, as the slight services I rendered her were repaid with a superabundant expression of thankfulness. What then must have been the feelings of her heart towards Mrs. Hannah More, to whom her obligations were so surpassing?"

"The merits of the question involved in the disension between Ann Yearsley and Mrs. Hannah More lie in a small compass, and they deserve to be faithfully stated. The public are interested in the refutation of charges of ingratitude, which, if substantiated, would tend to repress assistance towards the humbler children of genius. The baneful effects arising from a charge of ingratitude in Ann Yearsley towards her benefactress might be the proximate means of dooming to penury and death some unborn Chatterton, or of eclipsing the sun of a future Burns.

"Hannah More discovered that the woman who supplied her family daily with milk was a respectable poetess. She collected her productions, and published them for her benefit, with a recommendatory address. The poems, as they deserved, became popular, doubtless, in a great degree, through the generous and influential support of Mrs. H. More; and the profits of the sale amounted to some hundreds of pounds."

Hannah More

"The money thus obtained the milkwoman wished to receive herself, for the promotion of herself in life, and the assistance of her two promising sons, who inherited much of their mother's talent. Hannah More, on the contrary, in conjunction with Mrs. Montague, thought it most advisable to place the money in the funds, in the joint names of herself and Mrs. Montague, as trustees for Ann Yearsley, so that she might receive a small permanent support through life.

"The great error on the part of the milkwoman was in not prevailing on some friend thus to interfere, and calmly to state her case; instead of which, in a disastrous moment, she undertook to plead her own cause, and, without the slightest intention of giving offence, called on her patroness. Ann Yearsley's suit, no doubt, was urged with a zeal approaching to impetuosity, and not expressed in that measured language which propriety might have dictated, and any deficiency in which could not fail to offend her polished and powerful patroness.

"Ann Yearsley obtained her object, but she lost her friend. Her name, from that moment, was branded with ingratitude; and severe indeed was the penalty entailed on her by this act of indiscretion. Her good name, with the rapidity of the eagle's pinion, was forfeited. Her talents, in a large circle, at once became questionable, or vanished away. Her assumed criminality also was magnified into audacity, in daring to question the honor or oppose the wishes of two such women as Mrs. Hannah More and Mrs. Montague. And thus, through this disastrous turn of affairs, a dark veil was suddenly thrown over prospects so late the most unsullied and exhilarating; and the favorite of fortune sank to rise no more.

"Gloom and perplexities in quick succession oppressed the Bristol milkwoman, and her fall became more rapid than her ascent. The eldest of her sons, William Cromartie Yearsley, who had bidden fair to be the prop of her age, and whom she had apprenticed to an eminent engraver, with a premium of one hundred guineas, prematurely died; and his surviving brother soon followed him to the grave. Ann Yearsley, now a childless and desolate widow, retired, heart-broken, from the world, on the produce of her library, and died many years after, in a state of almost total seclusion, at Melksham. An inhabitant of the town lately informed me that she was never seen, except when she took her solitary walk in the dusk of the evening. She lies buried in Clifton Churchyard."

2527. FONTENELLE AND VOLTAIRE.

During Goldsmith's brief sojourn in Paris, he appears to have gained access to valuable society, and to have had the honor and pleasure of making the acquaintance of Voltaire, of whom, in after years, he wrote a memoir. "As a companion," says he, "no man ever exceeded him, when he chose to lead the conversation; which, however, was not always the case.

"In company, which he either disliked or despised, few could be more reserved than he; but when he was warmed in discourse, and got over a hesitating manner, which sometimes he was subject to, it was rapture to hear him. His meagre visage seemed insensibly to gather beauty: every muscle in it had meaning, and his eye beamed with unusual brightness.

"The person who writes this memoir," continues he, "remembers to have seen him in a select company of wits of both sexes at Paris, when the subject happened to turn upon English taste and learning. Fontenelle, then nearly a hundred years old, who was of the party, and who was unacquainted with the language or authors of the country he undertook to condemn, with a spirit truly vulgar began to revile both.

"Diderot, who liked the English, and knew something of their literary pretensions, attempted to vindicate their poetry and learning, but with unequal abilities. The company quickly perceived that Fontenelle was superior in the dispute, and were surprised at the silence which Voltaire had preserved all the former part of the evening, particularly as the conversation happened to turn upon one of his favorite topics.

"Fontenelle continued his triumph until about twelve o'clock, when Voltaire appeared at last roused from his reverie. His whole frame seemed animated. He began his defence of the English with the utmost defiance, mixed with spirit, and now and then let fall the finest strokes of raillery upon his antagonist; and his harangue lasted till three in the morning. I must confess that, whether from national partiality, or from the elegant sensibility of his manner, I never was so charmed, nor did I ever remember so absolute a victory as he gained in this dispute."

2528. VOLTAIRE AND ROUSSEAU.

Voltaire's quarrel with Rousseau is characteristic of the man. He visited Holland, in 1722, with Madame Rupelmonde. When passing through Brussels, he sought out the poet whom he had befriended in his need, and whose talents he had admired. They met with delight. Voltaire called him his master and judge: he placed his Henriade in his hand, and read him various of his epistles. All went smilingly for a short time. Rousseau read some of his poetry in return. Voltaire did not approve; Rousseau was piqued. Various sarcasms were interchanged. Rousseau had composed an Ode to Posterity. Voltaire told him that it would never reach its address. A violent quarrel ensued, and Rousseau became his bitter enemy.

2529. POPE'S ENEMIES.

According to the scandalous chronicle of the day, Pope, shortly after the publication of the Dunciad, had a tall Irishman to attend him. Colonel Duckett threatened to cane him for a licentious stroke aimed at him, which Pope recanted. Thomas Bentley, nephew to the doctor, for the treatment his uncle had received, sent Pope a challenge. The modern like the ancient Horace was of a nature liable to panic at such critical moments. Pope consulted some military friends, who declared that his person ought to protect him from any such redundancy of valor as was thus formally required; however, one of them accepted the challenge for him, and gave Bentley the option of fighting or apologizing, who, on this occasion, proved what is usual—that the easiest of the two is the quickest performed.

2530. VOLTAIRE AND POPE.

Voltaire, when in London, was very intimate with Pope: he was familiar at his table, and introduced to the circle of his acquaintance. But gratitude, and a respect to the laws of hospitality, seemed not to govern the conduct of Voltaire.

One day, when he knew Pope was from home, he called on his ancient mother, who lived with him, and told her that he should be very sorry to do any thing to displease her, but really it was very hard living in London; that he had a poem, a severe lampoon upon her, which he was going to publish, but which he would recommend her to give him a sum of money to suppress.

The fear of the poor old woman at length prevailed over her indignation, and she bribed him not to publish, which he agreed to, on one condition—that she would never mention the subject. She promised, and she kept her word. Having so well succeeded once, he made a second attempt on the yielding prey. The indignation of the injured lady was at its height, when Pope entered the room, and, perceiving her agitation, insisted on knowing the cause. She informed him, in half-stifled accents.

Voltaire had neither time to run off nor to make up an excuse, when the enraged poet, who was never deficient in filial respect, flew with resentment on the unfeeling Frenchman, striking him vehemently. Voltaire, in the attempt to retreat precipitately, fell over a chair.

2531. STUBBORN FACTS.

The lives of authors and artists exhibit a most painful disease in that jealousy which is the perpetual fever of their existence. Plato never mentions Xenophon, and Xenophon inveighs against Plato, studiously collecting every report which may detract from his fame. They wrote on the same subject.

Corneille, tottering on the grave, when Racine consulted him on his first tragedy, advised the author never to write another. Voltaire continually detracts from the sublimity of Corneille, the sweetness of Racine, and the fire of Crebillon; and when Boccaccio sent to Petrarch a copy of Dante, declaring that the work was like a first light, which had illuminated his mind, Petrarch coldly observed that he had not been anxious to inquire after it, having intended to compose in the vernacular idiom, and not wishing to be considered as a plagiarist, while he only allowed Dante's superiority from having written in the vulgar idiom, which he did not think was an enviable, but an inferior merit.

Thus frigidly Petrarch took the altitude of the solitary Ætna before him, in the Inferno, while he shrunk into himself with the painful consciousness of the existence of another poet, who obscured his own solitary majesty.

Waller is silent on the merits of Cowley, nor does he give one verse to return the praise with which Dryden honored him, while he is warm in panegyric on Beaumont and Fletcher, on Sandys, Ware, and Davenant. And why? Because of some of these their species of composition was different from his own, and the rest he could not fear.

2532. LAMB versus COLERIDGE.

"Charles Lamb," says Cottle, "and Charles Lloyd, between whom a strong friendship had latterly sprung up, became alienated from Mr. Coleridge, and cherished something of an indignant feeling. Strange as it may appear, Charles Lamb determined to desert the inglorious ground of neutrality, and to commence active operations against his late friend; but the arrows were taken from his own peculiar armory, tipped, not with iron, but wit.

"He accordingly sent Mr. Coleridge the following letter. Mr. Coleridge gave me this letter, saying, 'These young visionaries will do each other no good.' The following is Charles Lamb's letter to Mr. C.:—

Learned Sir, my Friend:—

Presuming on our long habits of friendship, and emboldened further by your late liberal permission to avail myself of your correspondence, in case I want any knowledge,—which I intend to do, when I have no Encyclopædia, or Ladies' Magazine at hand to refer to in any manner of science,—I now submit to your inquiries the above theological propositions, to be by you defended or opposed, or both, in the schools of Germany, whither, I am told, you are departing, to the utter dissatisfaction of your native Devonshire, and regret of universal England; but to my own individual consolation, if, through the channel of your wished return, learned sir, my friend, may be transmitted to this our island, from those famous theological wits of Leipsic and Göttingen, any rays of illumination, in vain to be derived from the home growth of our English halls and colleges. Finally, wishing, learned sir, that you may see Schiller, and swing in a wood, (vide poems.) and sit upon a tun, and eat fat hams of Westphalia,

I remain your friend,

And docile pupil to instruct,

CHARLES LAMB.

"Mr. Coleridge, at first, appeared greatly hurt at this letter—an impression which I endeavored to counteract, by considering it as a slight ebullition of feeling that would soon subside, and which happily proved to be the case."

§ 246. YOUTHFUL LOVE, DOMESTIC LIFE, &c.

2533. LONGFELLOW.

Henry W. Longfellow.

We know of nothing which, in few words, gives more information concerning this distinguished American poet than the following anecdote—none the less valuable for being of transatlantic origin.

"About the year 1837, Longfellow," says a Dublin paper, "being engaged in making the tour of Europe, selected Heidelberg for a permanent winter residence. There his wife was attacked with an illness which ultimately proved fatal.

"It so happened, however, that some time afterward there came to the same romantic place a young lady of considerable personal attractions. The poet's heart was touched—he became attached to her; but the beauty of sixteen did not sympathize with the poet of six-and-thirty, and Longfellow returned to America, having lost his heart as well as his wife.

"The young lady, also an American, returned home shortly afterwards. Their residences, it turned out, were contiguous, and the poet availed himself of the opportunity of prosecuting his addresses, which he did for a considerable time with no better success than at first. Thus foiled, he set himself resolutely down, and instead, like Petrarch, of laying siege to the heart of his mistress through the medium of sonnets, he resolved to write a whole book; a book which would achieve the double object of gaining her affections, and of establishing his own fame. Hyperion was the result.

"His labor and his constancy were not thrown away: they met their due reward. The lady gave him her hand as well as her heart; and they now reside together at Cambridge, in the same house which Washington made his headquarters when he was first appointed to the command of the American armies. These interesting facts were communicated to us by a very intelligent American gentleman, whom we had the pleasure of meeting in the same place which was the scene of the poet's early disappointment and sorrow."

2534. A POET LOVE STORY.

Helen Irving, a young lady of extraordinary beauty and uncommon qualifications,—the subject of the song, "I wish I was where Helen lies,"—was descended from the ancient and respectable family of Kirconnell, in Annandale, whose estate is at present in the possession of Sir William Maxwell, of Springkell, Bart.

She had for some time been courted by two gentlemen whose names were Bell and Fleeming. Bell was proprietor of Blackwood, properly Blacket House; and Fleeming of Fleeming Hall, situate near Mossknow, at present in the possession of Captain Graham. Bell one day told the young lady that if he at any time afterwards found her in Fleeming's company, he would certainly kill him.

She, however, had a great regard for Fleeming, and being one day walking along with him on the pleasant, romantic banks of the Kirtle, she observed his rival on the other side of the river, among the bushes. Conscious of the danger her lover was in, she passed betwixt him and his enemy, who, immediately firing, shot her dead, whilst she leaped into Fleeming's arms. He drew his sword, crossed the river, and cut the murderer to pieces.

A cairn, or heap of stones, was raised on the place where she fell, as a common memorial in similar incidents, from the earlier times, among the Celtic colonies, and continues over Scotland to this day. She was buried in the adjacent churchyard of Kirconnell; and the poor, forlorn, disconsolate Fleeming, overwhelmed with love and oppressed with grief, is said to have gone abroad for some time, returned, visited her grave, upon which he stretched himself and expired, and was buried in the same place.

2535. BYRON'S MATHRIMONIAL CAREER.

Byron's second proposal for his future wife, Miss Milbanke, was made under circumstances not by any means the most poetical. The circumstances were as follows:—

A person, who had for some time stood high in his affectionate confidence, observing how cheerless and unsettled was his mind and prospects, advised him strenuously to marry. This person was Lady Melbourne.

She suggested to him one lady, Lord Byron mentioned another, and that other was Miss Milbanke. "No," said Lady Melbourne, "Miss Milbanke will not suit you. In the first place, she has no fortune now, and you want money immediately. In the next place, you want a person who will have a great admiration for your genius; and she has too great an admiration of her own."

"Well," said Lord Byron, "as you please." And, sitting down, he wrote a letter to the lady recommended by Lady Melbourne. He received a refusal. "Now, you see," said Lord Byron, "that after all Miss Milbanke is to be the person; I will write to her."

He wrote to her on the moment, and as soon as he had finished, his friend, remonstrating still strongly against his choice, took up the letter, but on reading it over, observed, "Well, really, this is a very pretty letter; it is a pity it should not go. I never read a prettier one." "Then it shall go," said Lord Byron; and in so saying, sealed and sent off, on the instant, this fiat of his fate.

2536. MRS. SOUTHEY.

And who was Mrs. Southey?—who but she who was so long known, and so great a favorite, as Caroline Bowles; transformed by the gallantry of the laureate, and the grace of the parson, into her matrimonial appellation. Southey, so long ago as the 21st of February, 1829, prefaced his most amatory poem of All for Love with a tender address, that is now, perhaps, worth reprinting.

"Could I look forward to a distant day,
With hope of building some elaborate lay,
Then would I wait till worthier strains of mine
Might have inscribed thy name, O Caroline!
For I would, while my voice is heard on earth,
Bear witness to thy genius and thy worth.
But we have been both taught to feel with fear
How frail the tenure of existence here;
What unforeseen calamities prevent,
Alas! how oft, the best resolved intent;
And, therefore, this poor volume I address
To thee, dear friend, and sister poetess!

"KEWICK, Feb. 21, 1829. ROBERT SOUTHEY."

The laureate had his wish; for in duty he was bound to say, that worthier strains than his bore inscribed the name of Caroline connected with his own; and, moreover, she was something more than a dear friend and sister poetess.

"The laureate," observes a writer in Fraser's Magazine, "is a fortunate man; his queen supplies him with butts, (alluding to the laureateship,) and his lady with Bowls: then may his cup of good fortune be overflowing."

2537. HIGHLAND MARY'S MONUMENT.

The Glasgow Herald informs us that a monument has now been completed over the grave of Highland Mary, in the West Churchyard, Greenock; and it will be no longer noticed with regret, as has often been done by strangers, that there is not even a stone to mark the resting-place of a maiden whose love inspired some of the most impassioned lyrics which have enriched our own or any other language.

The erection is more of the Roman than the Grecian style of architecture, is pyramidal in form, and may be said to be divided into two compartments, the cornice stones between which are beautifully and elaborately carved. The first or lower compartment contains the inscription tablet.

The second bears a bass-relief of Burns and Mary Campbell, representing their parting scene, when they plighted troth and exchanged Bibles across the "stream around the Castle of Montgomery."

The artist has been peculiarly happy in depicting the position of the young pair at this hallowed parting; and few, who have seen a correct likeness of the bard, can fail to recognize it upon the beautiful Ayrshire stone which has been used, although it has been necessary, to be in keeping with the truth, to impart to the features a more juvenile cast than those with which Robert Burns is usually represented.

The third compartment contains a figure emblematical of Grief, bending over an urn, with her arms encircled, and on which is carved the word "Mary." Above her head, and almost at the apex of the pyramid, a star with rays is cut, in remembrance of the beautiful invocation of "Mary in Heaven."

The inscription on the monument is simply couched as follows: "Sacred to Genius and Love—to Burns and Highland Mary." The monument stands about seventeen feet high, was erected at the cost of one hundred pounds, and is by far the most imposing object in this old churchyard.

2538. BURNS'S HIGHLAND MARY.

The mother of Burns's Highland Mary, who resided in Greenock for a long period, died there on the 27th of September, 1827, at the advanced age of eighty-five years. The venerable looking woman remembered, almost to the last moment of her existence, with an affectionate regard, the one who had inspired Burns's finest effusions, and was the object of his purest attachment; and it was impossible to hear her enter minutely into the particulars of her daughter's life, and the amiable qualities of her heart, without feeling convinced that Mary Campbell had something more than ordinary attractions to fascinate the mind of the poet.

We were to judge from the appearance of the mother, whose fine eye and regular features at her advanced age gave indications of early beauty, we would say that Highland Mary probably had also personal charms, which would have influenced a less sensitive mind than that of Robert Burns. Among the little stores of the deceased, there was nothing to be found, as mementoes of our gifted bard, but the Bibles which he gave his beloved Mary on that day when they met on the banks of the Ayr, "to live one day of parting love." They are indeed curious, and have, written in the first leaf, in Burns's handwriting, the following passage of Scripture, which is strikingly illustrative of the poet's feelings and circumstances: "Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but perform unto the Lord thine oaths."

It is well known that after this they never met again, and that time could not efface the solemnity of this parting from his mind; and it is to be regretted that two letters, which he wrote after her death to the afflicted mother, have been destroyed, the old woman saying "she could never read them without shedding tears."

2539. GOETHE IN LOVE.

Goethe had become a declared and accepted lover—the betrothed of the beautiful Lili; "since," says he, "it was the strange ordination of the Most High Ruler, that, in the progress of my wondrous life-course, I should also experience the feelings of a betrothed."

But ere his intended marriage, he determined on accomplishing a long and warmly-cherished project of visiting Italy. Full of enthusiasm, he commences and proceeds for a time on his journey. Now see him—this cold, impassive, self-sufficing Goethe, as he has been depicted—the man who lived only for self and art—see him, on the summit of the Alps, turning his back upon Italy, the land of his youthful dreams, the pilgrim goal of the artist, and hastening home, unable to resist any longer the passion which drew him back to his beloved, and that after the resolution to separate himself from her, wrung from him by his sister, was already formed or forming within him.

Hear his own account of the matter: "It seems to me as if man, in such cases, had no power of decision in himself, but was rather governed and determined by earlier impressions. Lombardy and Italy lay as something wholly foreign before me, Germany as something known and love-worthy, full of friendly, domestic prospects. And—let me confess it—that which had so long compassed me about, which had borne up my existence, continued, at this moment also, to be the most indispensable element, out of whose limits I did not trust myself to pass. A small golden heart, which I had received from her in the fairest hours, hung still, by the same ribbon by which she had fastened it, love-warmed upon my neck. I seized and kissed it. And here let me insert the poem occasioned by this circumstance:—

'Memorial thou of a joy whose sound has died away,
Which I yet wear about my neck,
Holdest thou, longer than the soul band, us two?
Prolongest thou the brief days of love?
Do I flee, Lili, before thee? Must I, still led by thy band,
Through distant vales and forests wander?
Ah, Lili's heart could not so quickly
From my heart fall.
Like a bird who breaks his string
And returns to the forest,
He drags—captivity's dishonor—
A bit of the string still after him.
He is the old, free-born bird no longer;
He has already been some one's property.'

"I rose quickly, that I might get away from the steep spot, and that the friend storming towards me, with the knapsack-bearing guide, might not whirl me away with him into the steep abyss. I likewise greeted the pious pater, and turned myself, without losing a word, towards the path by which we had come. A little lingering, the friend followed, and, notwithstanding his love and attachment to me, he remained for a while some distance behind, until, at last, the glorious waterfall brought us together again, kept us together, and that which had once for all been determined was also finally accepted as wholesome and good. This connection, however, was sundered for reasons which are not very obvious; but not till after long and dire struggles through 'a cursed state which, in some respects, might be likened to Hades,' and a 'torture which, even in the remembrance, is well nigh insupportable.'

Goethe was most diligent, and he manifested his faculties unabated till the last. He died in 1832, in the eighty-third year of his age. It was after eighty that he wrote his own life. "In a fortnight he had nearly completed the fourth volume of his Life, when Nature avenged herself for the violence he had done her. The bursting of a blood-vessel brought him to the brink of the grave."

He entirely recovered from this attack, and resumed his task. In the year preceding that of his death, he had still to finish the second part of Faust. God willing, he would not die till that was accomplished. "He laid it down as a law to himself to complete it worthily; and on the day before his last birthday, he was enabled to announce that the highest task of his life was completed. He sealed it under a tenfold seal, escaped from the congratulations of his friends, and hastened to revisit, after many years, the scenes of his earliest cares and endeavors, as well as of the richest and happiest hours of his life. He went to Ilmenau. The deep calm of the woods, the fresh breath of the hills, breathed new life into him. With refreshed and invigorated mind he returned home, and felt himself inspired to undertake new observations of nature. The Theory of Colors was revised, completed, and confirmed, the nature of the rainbow more accurately examined, and unwearied thought bestowed on the spiral tendency of vegetation.

2540. BURNS AND MISS JEFFREY.

Robert Burns.

During the three years he spent at Ellisland, Burns was so deeply engaged in the labors of his farm, and those connected with his appointment in the excise, that he had little of either time or inclination for the cultivation of his poetical gift. Yet, even in this busy time, he contrived to celebrate the charms of one or two local divinities.

One of these was Miss Jeffrey, daughter of the minister of Lochmaben. Spending an evening at the manse, he was greatly pleased with this young lady, who did the honors of the table; and he next morning presented at breakfast the lines which have made her immortal:—

"I gaed a waefu' gate yestreen,
A gate, I fear, I'll dearly rue;
I gat my death frae twa sweet een,
Twa lovely een o' bonnie blue.
'Twas not her golden ringlets bright,
Her lips like roses wat wi' dew,
Her heaving bosom, lily white—
It was her een sae bonnie blue.

"She talked, she smiled, my heart she wiled,
She charmed my soul— I wist nae how;
And aye the stound, the deadly wound,
Cam frae her een sae bonnie blue.
But spare to speak, and spare to speed,
She'll siblin listen to my vow;
Should she refuse, I'll lay my dead
To her twa een sae bonnie blue."

Miss Jeffrey married a man named Renwick, and accompanied him to New York. George Thompson, in the second edition of his Scottish Melodies, (1830,) gives an interesting note respecting her.

"The editor's son," says he, "who happened to be at New York about eight years ago, gave him the following gratifying account of her, and of what fell from her respecting the poet: 'I was introduced to Mrs. Renwick by her son, the professor of chemistry in Columbia College. She is a widow—has still the remains of Burns's delightful portrait of her; her two sweet een, that gave him his death, are yet clear and full of expression; she has great suavity of manners, and much good sense.

"She told me that she often looks back with a melancholy satisfaction on the many evenings she spent in the company of the great bard, in the social circle of her father's fireside, listening to the bright sallies of his fine imagination, and to his delightful conversation. Many times, said she, have I seen Burns enter my father's dwelling in a cold, rainy night, after a long ride over the dreary moors. On such occasions, one of the family would help to disencumber him of his dreadnought and boots, while others brought him a pair of slippers, and made him a warm dish of tea.

"It was during these friendly visits that he felt himself perfectly happy, and opened his whole soul to us, repeated, and even sang, many of his admirable songs, and enchanted all who had the good fortune to be present with his manly, luminous observations and artless manners."

§ 247. DEAF, DUMB, AND BLIND POETS.

2541. NACK, THE DEAF AND DUMB POET.

"Among the most remarkable instances of precocious talents and acquirements," says R. W. Griswold, "is James Nack, the deaf and dumb poet of the city of New York. He is now not far from twenty years of age; but young as he is, he has written more voluminously than any poet among all those I have named. Only one volume of his works is as yet printed, though he has many manuscripts on hand, which will probably see the light when he has become more known."

This young man's growth has been most wonderful. He was born with perfect organs of hearing and of speech, and retained them until he was nine years old, when, by an accident, his head was so crushed as to have destroyed his auditory nerves, and by degrees his faculty of speech was lost—a very natural consequence of his misfortune.

His father had been unfortunate in business as a merchant in Nack's infancy, and he had no advantages of schooling but what he picked up from his sisters, yet was considered a good reader at four years of age; and he had a passion, a very common one in forward children, of preaching—that is, in a solemn way muttering over their fancies.

Any bright and observing child sees the great attention and reverence that are paid to the services of the clergyman, not only by his parents and his brothers and sisters, but by all in the church. He is taught that the speaker is a good man, and in the first awakenings of his mind he attempts to imitate him. Nack had heard the singers in the church, and had caught something of the chiming of words; and once, being without a hymn book, he framed a couplet, for which he was applauded, and this encouraged him to make a few lines every day; and before he was in his ninth year he had a good knowledge of rhythm and rhyme from a cultivated ear. This he has so completely kept in his memory that I question very much whether there is any poet living who has a better knowledge of rhyming words in the English language than Nack.

As soon as he recovered from the injury done to his head, as far as he ever recovered, he was sent to the asylum for the deaf and dumb. But it is quite questionable whether the instructors of that excellent institution ever precisely understood the bent and the extent of his genius.

At about twelve years of age Nack wrote a tragedy: this he destroyed; but his mind, at that time, was in one constant dramatic effort: it was an expedient he resorted to to get rid of the deep wretchedness he felt at being, as it were, left alone with himself to contemplate his misfortune in losing his hearing and speech. In the regions of imagination he was soothed, and warmed with all the dreamy delights to be found in such fairy land—an expedient that riper minds have resorted to, to soften the agonies of the heart.

The productions of his fourteenth year were numerous, but, to use his own words, "most of these have perished, except two or three small pieces inserted in my published volume. Most of the minor pieces in that volume were written in my fifteenth year, among which those I am proudest of are Blue Eyed Maid, the Grave of Mary, and the Gallant Highland Rover."

In his fifteenth year he wrote another tragedy. It was written under peculiar circumstances. At the early dawn of the morning in the winter season, in the garret where he lodged, without a spark of fire, and only a stump of a pen, and without a table, he stole the moments to write a long tragedy on his knees. He had no sooner finished than he concealed it, and has never suffered it to be seen.

In his sixteenth year he wrote, with many other poems, that beautiful effort of genius, the Minstrel Boy. This came from his heart, and it reaches the heart of every reader. It has a deep tone of feeling, a sweetness of language, and an ease of versification that will secure its immortality.

Until his sixteenth year he had never found any one who was capable of understanding his character, and of giving him advice and encouragement united to friendship. It was then he began to feel the balmy soothings of kindness that came with advice and patronage. It was not until this period that he had found books, except by accident. He now was in the library of a gentleman of taste who was as kind to him as a father.

This situation opened a new world to him. He revelled in fresh delights; devoured books upon poetry, history, philosophy, fiction, mathematics, politics, ethics, criticism, and theology; formed a thousand theories, and tore them up, root and branch, for new creations; and these again shared the same fate. He wrote, as well as read, on all these subjects, and piled manuscript upon manuscript, which he sometimes viewed with all the rapture of genius, and then, with freakish untowardness, turned from his numerous progeny with loathing. With all the irritation of wounded sensibility he grows feverish over his reminiscences, and then again hurries on to perform some new task. He seems to have no dread of any labor, however severe it may be, if it will please a friend or come to any account for himself or others.

His acquirements, at this early age, in the languages and all the branches of knowledge, ordinary and extraordinary, is superior to that of any young man of the same age I have ever met with. There is a strength and maturity about his mind not to be found in one who has had the use of his ears and tongue. His criticisms have a sagacity and shrewdness unequalled by those who were critics long before he was born. He acquires a language with the most astonishing facility. No one I ever knew could do it with the same readiness, except the late learned Orientalist, George Bethune English.

Nack unites in a most astonishing degree those two seemingly inconsistent qualities, restlessness and perseverance. He reads, writes, and does all things as though he had just breathed the Delphi vapor, and perseveres as though he were chained to the spot by some talismanic power. He is a bunch of delicate fibres, too susceptible for composure, or rather of nerves, jarred to agony if struck by a rude hand.

Poetical beings are often too sensitive when in possession of every natural property and gift; but when deprived of the charms of hearing and speaking, the pulses of the heart seem to beat in our own sight, without even the thinnest skin to hide them; open to every blast of a cold and cruel world. But in a few years he will find things changing around him, and these youthful labors, now viewed as useless, will become, in his opinion, as the foundation stones of a goodly edifice, in the fashioning of which he has learnt the skill of a literary architect, and acquired the strength to raise a temple of imperishable fame, for his own and his country's glory.

3542. BLACKLOCK, THE BLIND POET.

Before he was six months old, Blacklock lost his sight by the small-pox. His father and friends endeavored to lessen the calamity by reading to him those books which might convey the instruction suitable to infancy; and as he advanced, they proceeded to others, which he appeared to relish and remember, particularly the works of Spenser, Milton, Prior, Pope, and Addison.

In 1754 he became known to the Rev. Joseph Spence, poetry professor of Oxford, who introduced him to the English public by An Account of the Life, Character, and Poems of Mr. Blacklock. Student of Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. In this pamphlet Mr. Spence detailed the extraordinary circumstances of his education and genius with equal taste and humanity, and a subscription was immediately opened at Dodsley's shop for a quarto edition, to be published at a guinea the large, and half a guinea the small paper.

"His manner of life," says Mr. Jameson, "was so uniform, that the history of it during one day, or one week, is the history of it during the seven years that our personal intercourse lasted. Reading, music, walking, conversing, and disputing on various topics, in theology, ethics, &c., employed almost every hour of our time. It was pleasant to hear him engaged in a dispute, for no man could keep his temper better than he did on such occasions.

"I have known him frequently very warmly engaged for hours together, but never could observe one angry word to fall from him. Whatever his antagonist might say, he always kept his temper. He was, however, extremely sensible to what he thought ill usage, and equally so whether it regarded himself or his friends. But his resentment was confined to a few satirical verses, which were generally burnt soon after."

"I have frequently admired," says Mr. Spence, "with what readiness and rapidity he could sometimes make verses. I have known him dictate from thirty to forty verses, and by no means bad ones, as fast as I could write them; but the moment he was at a loss for a rhyme or a verse to his liking, he stopped altogether, and could very seldom be induced to finish what he had begun with so much ardor.

"All those who ever acted as his amanuenses agree in this rapidity and ardor of composition which Mr. Jameson ascribes to him in the account I have copied above. He never could dictate till he stood up; and as his blindness made walking about without assistance inconvenient or dangerous to him, he fell insensibly into a vibratory sort of motion of his body, which increased as he warmed with his subject, and was pleased with the conceptions of his mind.

"This motion at last became habitual to him, and though he could sometimes restrain it when on ceremony, or in any public appearance, such as preaching, he felt a certain uneasiness from the effort, and always returned to it when he could indulge it without impropriety."

"He entered," says his biographer, "with the cheerful playfulness of a young man, into all the sprightly narrative, the sportive fancy, the humorous jest that rose around him. It was a sight highly gratifying to philanthropy to see how much a mind endowed with knowledge, kindled by genius, and above all lighted up with innocence and piety, like Blacklock's, could overcome the weight of its own calamity, and enjoy the content, the happiness, and the gaiety of others.

"He generally carried in his pocket a small flageolet, on which he played his favorite tunes, and was not displeased when asked in company to play or to sing them—a natural feeling for a blind man, who thus adds a scene to the drama of his society.

"As he had the best English poets frequently read to him, he attained a free command of the language of poetry, both in simple and compound words; and we know that all poets consider those as common property. It is not, therefore, wonderful that he speaks so often of mountains, valleys, rivers, nor that he appropriates to visible objects their peculiar characteristics, all which he must have heard repeated until they became fixed in his memory; but as no man pursues long what affords little more than the exercise of conjecture, we are still perplexed to discover what pleasure Mr. Blacklock could take, first in a species of reading which could give him no ideas, and then in a species of writing in which he could copy only the expressions of others.

"It will be thought a fiction, a paradox, that a man blind from his infancy, besides having made himself so much a master of various foreign languages, should be a great poet in his own, and, without having hardly ever seen the light, should be so remarkably happy in description."

§ 248. AMUSING AND MIRTHFUL DETAILS.

2543. GRAY IN A TUB OF WATER.

The poet Gray was remarkably fearful of fire, and always kept a ladder of ropes in his bed-room. Some mischievous brother collegians at Cambridge knew this, and in the middle of a dark night roused him with the cry of fire! The staircase, they said, was in flames.

Gray's Window, St. Peter's College, Cambridge.

Up went the window, and Gray hastened down his rope ladder, as quick as possible, into a tub of water, which had been placed at the bottom to receive him. The joke cured Gray of his fears, but he would not forgive it, and immediately changed his college.

2544. ARIOSTO AND THE POOR POTTER.

In the city of Ferrara, which Tasso and Ariosto have so celebrated, dwelt a potter, whose busy hours were passed in moulding the dull clay into classic forms, for garden vases, fountains, water pitchers, and the like. He had a good conception of the beautiful, as many a well-turned vase and graceful urn could testify; and he prided himself not a little upon his superiority to his brother potters, not only in the excellence of his taste in the works of his hands, but upon his poetical genius, the melody of his voice, and the beauty of his recitations.

Many a dark-eyed daughter of Ferrara had sighed for the handsome young potter, who sang the praises of Laura and of Beatrice, as well as Dante or Petrarch themselves could have done. Indeed it was often whispered that had the potter been Petrarch, or Petrarch been the potter, he would not have mourned the coldness of his lovely mistress. A picturesque looking establishment was the potter's studio, with its classic models and variously-moulded forms; and many an idle citizen did he gather in early morning, or towards eventide, under his low walls, to listen to those melodies which printing was too rare an art to have placed in the hands of all the people.

One day quite a crowd had gathered about the potter, who was just putting the finishing touch to a beautiful vase which he had been making for the gardens of Ippolito, Cardinal d'Este. It was tall and delicate; the model, of Grecian make, was before him. Animated by the success of his work, and gratified by the praises lavished upon it, he had chanted with more than usual spirit many of the thrilling scenes of the Inferno; then gayly sung of Boccaccio and his gardens of pleasure.

As he paused for a few moments, the gathered crowd called upon him for some stanzas from Ariosto. Ludovico, or Lewis Ariosto, had just begun to charm the people by the vigor of his muse, which, versatile and yet powerful, passed with the greatest ease from the terrible to the tender, from the soft to the sublime; enchaining all hearts by the wonderful strength of his language, and the lightning flashes of his genius.

The potter, yielding to the request of his attentive auditors, began the introduction to the Orlando Furioso, and soon became so interested in it that he did not notice that one had drawn near the window of his establishment, whose restlessness and grimaces indicated that he listened with no pleased ear to the charming poem.

Once or twice he turned to leave, but an invisible spell kept him chained to the spot. Occasionally he raised his hand, as if in deprecation of some sentiment uttered by the unconscious reciter. Finally, as if moved by an irresistible impulse, he seized a large ewer which stood upon the window, and hurled it with great force at the potter. It dashed the beautiful vase he had just completed from his hand, and broke it into a thousand fragments. Another and another quickly followed, and the poor potter could hardly escape being wounded by the creations of his own hand. The people rushed out from the shop to seize the madman, as they deemed him, when what was their surprise to behold Ariosto himself.

The potter began to expostulate. Ariosto exclaimed, "Beware! I have not yet revenged myself!" "What mean you? What have I done to incur your displeasure?" said the poor man, who, knowing Ariosto's connection with the noblest family of Ferrara, dared not resist him. "Villain," said the enraged poet, "I have only broken a few worthless pots; you have spoiled my most beautiful compositions to my face."

Celebrated men are often much annoyed by the visits of strangers. A student once called at Goethe's house, and requested to see him. Goethe, contrary to his usual custom, consented to be seen; and after the student had waited a short time in the antechamber, he appeared, and, without speaking, took a chair, and seated himself in the middle of the room. The student, far from being embarrassed by this unexpected proceeding, took a lighted wax candle in his hand, and walking round the poet, deliberately viewed him on all sides; then, setting down the candle, he drew out his purse, and taking from it a small piece of silver, put it on the table, and went away without speaking a word.

2546. SHOOTING A BOOKSELLER.

Campbell produced the Pleasures of Hope at Edinburgh, being then but twenty-one years of age. This fine performance at once gave him fame, and for twenty years afterward gave to the publishers between two and three hundred pounds annually. They had originally given him ten pounds for the poem. Afterwards he received some further remuneration, and was allowed the profit accruing from a quarto edition of his works.

"Many a true word is spoken in jest," the proverb teaches; and an anecdote told of Campbell may be thought to indicate a feeling within not very favorable to those who had given his poem to the world. Being in a festive party at a period when the actions of Bonaparte were most severely condemned, on being called upon for a toast, Campbell gave, 'The health of Napoleon.' This caused great surprise to all the company, and an explanation was called for.

"The only reason I have for proposing to honor Bonaparte," said he, "is, that he had the virtue to shoot a bookseller." Palm, a bookseller, had recently been executed in Germany by order of the French chief.

2547. DEAN SWIFT OUTWITTED.

The duchess of — was patroness of Gay, and being fond of the company of his brother wits, invited a party, consisting of Addison, Pope, Swift, and Arbuthnot, to dine with him at her table.

Addison talked little; and what he said was with such embarrassment that he could hardly finish a sentence. Pope was the orator of the company: his voice was shrill, and he made many tart observations. Swift was in one of his odd humors, and was determined to tease the duchess.

Accordingly, as soon as the company were seated at dinner, he complained that he had left his snuff-box behind him, and requested one of the servants might be sent for it. He soon after complained of the want of his toothpick case, and a second servant was despatched for that, which he described as an indispensable requisite to his comfort. He then complained of the want of his pocket book, and a third servant was sent for that. In short, he contrived to have so many distinct wants that not a single servant was left in the room.

The duchess looked around, and seeing no servants, "Gentlemen," said she, "we are reduced to such a state that we must wait upon ourselves. If I want a piece of bread or a clean plate, I shall rise and help myself, and you must do the same."

Swift, finding his scheme of putting the duchess out of humor had failed, sat in sullen silence; but Gay, a fat, jolly figure, threw himself back in his chair in an immoderate fit of laughter, delighted at his mortification. "I am now fully convinced," said he, "of what I have often heard, that her grace, our noble hostess, is the best natured woman in the world."

2548. MILTON'S STRATAGEM.

The freedom and asperity of Milton's various attacks on the character and prerogative of the king rendered him peculiarly obnoxious when the restoration was accomplished. To save himself, therefore, from the fury of a court which he had so highly incensed, and the vigilance of which, from the emissaries employed, it was become so difficult to elude, he connived with his friends in effecting the following imposture.

The report of his death was so industriously circulated, the credulity of the public swallowed the bait prepared for them. The coffin, the mourners, and other apparatus of his burial, were exhibited at his house with the same formality as if he had been really dead. A figure of him, as large and as heavy as life, was actually formed, laid out, and put in a lead coffin, and the whole funeral solemnity acted in all its parts.

It is said, when the truth was known, and he was found to be alive, notwithstanding the most incontestable evidence that he had been thus openly interred, the wits about the court of King Charles I. made themselves extremely merry with the stratagem by which the poet had preserved his life. The lively and good-natured monarch discovered, too, himself, not a little satisfaction, in finding that, by this ingenious expedient, his reign had not been tarnished with the blood of a man already blind by application, infirmity, and age, and who, under all his dreadful misfortunes, had written Paradise Lost.

2549. ANECDOTE OF CHARLES LAMB.

Lamb was once invited by an old friend to meet an author, who had just published a volume of poems. When he arrived, being somewhat early, he was asked by his host to look over the volume of the expected visitor. A few minutes convinced Elia that it possessed very little merit, being a feeble echo of different authors.

This opinion of the poetaster was fully confirmed by the appearance of the gentleman himself, whose self-conceit, and confidence in his own book, were so manifest as to awaken in Lamb that spirit of mischievous waggery so characteristic of the humorist. Lamb's rapid and tenacious memory enabled him during the dinner to quote fluently several passages from the pretender's volume. These he gave with this introduction—"This reminds me of some verses I wrote when I was very young." He then, to the astonishment of the gentleman in question, quoted something from the volume.

Lamb tried this a second time: the gentleman looked still more surprised, and seemed evidently bursting with suppressed indignation. At last, as a climax to the fun, Lamb coolly quoted the well-known opening lines of Paradise Lost as written by himself.

"This was too much for the versemonger. He immediately rose to his legs, and with an impressive solemnity of manner thus addressed the claimant to so many poetical honors: "Sir, I have tamely submitted all this evening to hear you claim the merit that may belong to any little poems of my own; this I have borne in silence; but, sir, I never will sit quietly by and see the immortal Milton robbed of Paradise Lost."

2550. GOLDSMITH IN A DILEMMA.

Towards the close of 1762, Goldsmith removed to "merry Islington," then a country village, though now swallowed up in omnivorous London. He went there for the benefit of country air,—his health being injured by literary application and confinement,—and to be near his chief employer, Mr. Newbery, who resided in the Canonbury House. In this neighborhood he used to take his solitary rambles, sometimes extending his walks to the gardens of the White Conduit House, so famous among the essayists of the last century.

While strolling one day in these gardens, he met three females of the family of a respectable tradesman to whom he was under some obligation. With his prompt disposition to oblige, he conducted them about the garden, treated them to tea, and ran up a bill in the most open-handed manner imaginable. It was only when he came to pay that he found himself in one of his old dilemmas—he had not the wherewithal in his pocket.

A scene of perplexity now took place between him and the waiter, in the midst of which came up some of his acquaintances, in whose eyes he wished to stand particularly well. This completed his mortification. There was no concealing the awkwardness of his position. The sneers of the waiter revealed it. His acquaintances amused themselves for some time at his expense, professing their inability to relieve him. When, however, they had enjoyed their banter, the waiter was paid, and poor Goldsmith enabled to convoy off the ladies with flying colors.

2551. MAURICE'S PECULIARITIES.

"Among those with whom my book made me acquainted," says Leigh Hunt, "was the late Rev. Mr. Maurice, of the British Museum, author of Indian Antiquities.

"I mention him more particularly, as I do others, because he had a character of his own, and makes a portrait. I had seen an engraving of him, representing a slender, prim-eyed, enamel-faced person, very tightly dressed and particular, with no expression but that of propriety. What was my surprise, when I beheld a short, chubby, good-humored companion, with boyish features, and a lax dress and manner, heartily glad to see you, and tender over his wine!

"He was a sort of clerical Horace. He might, by some freak of patronage, have been made a bishop; and he thought he deserved it for having proved the identity of the Hindoo with the Christian Trinity, which was the object of his book. But he began to despond on that point, when I knew him; and he drank as much wine for sorrow, as he would, had he been made a bishop, for joy. He was a man of a social and overflowing nature; more fit, in truth, to set an example of charity than faith; and would have made an excellent Brahmin of the Rama-Deeva worship.

"Maurice's Hymns to the gods of India were as good as Sir William Jones's; and his attention to the amatory theology of the country—allowing for his deficiency in the language—quite as close. He was not so fortunate as Sir William in retaining a wife whom he loved. I have heard him lament, in very genuine terms, his widowed condition, and the task of finishing the great manuscript catalogue of the Museum books, to which his office had bound him.

"This must have been a torture, physical as well as moral; for he had weak eyes, and wrote with a magnifying glass as big round as the palm of his hand. With this, in a tall, thick handwriting, as if painting a set of rails, he was to finish the folio catalogues, and had produced the seven volumes of Indian Antiquities. Nevertheless, he seemed to lament his destiny, rather in order to accommodate the weakness of his lachrymal organs, than out of any mental uneasiness; for with the aspect he had the spirits of a boy, and his laughter would follow his tears with a happy incontinence. He was always catching cold, and getting well of it after dinner."

2552. MOORE'S PEDIGREE.

When Moore's celebrity was in its first glow, he received a flattering invitation to dine with the Prince of Wales. His royal host was delighted with him, and after dinner fell into familiar chat, directing the greatest portion of his remarks exclusively to him, and exhibiting the most gracious interest in all that concerned his guest.

Amongst other points, the prince, assuming that his illustrious visitor must be of high descent, questioned him respecting the particular family to which he belonged, naming in turn several ancient houses in Ireland, begging to know if he were not allied to one of them. To each of these inquiries the poet at first simply replied in the negative.

The prince, whose strong prepossession that "gentle blood" flowed in his accomplished visitor's veins made him in effect less polite than he was wont to be, reiterated his question, turning from one point to another, in the hope of hitting his mark: thus exciting, unintentionally, the curiosity of all present, and directing them to the questioned party. All at once it occurred to his royal highness that his guest must, as he told him, be the son of a certain Mr. Moore—a man of large fortune and distinguished birth—of —. Thus pressed, the poet put an end to his royal host's persevering inquiry, and with admirable and magnanimous simplicity replied to the last suggestion, "No, sir, I have not the honor of being descended from any of the distinguished families you have named. I am, sir, the son of one of the honestest tradesmen in all Dublin."

2553. POETIC PASTRY.

A toothsome poet, having written a few lines of transcendental sublimity on the excellence of a pastry cook's productions, the cook, in the overflowing of his gratitude, prepared one of his best pastry articles, and enclosed the poetic offering inside, thus "baking it brown." The poet was delighted with the appearance of the pie, and not a whit the less so with its luxurious taste; but on finding the song within, he questioned the cook why he perpetrated such an indignity.

"Not in the least," said the cook; "I merely followed your own bright example. You made a beautiful song on my pastry, and I made my beautiful pastry on your song." But it was out of correct taste to cause a poet to eat his own words, even in a sweet syllabus or turnover.

2554. UNION OF LITERARY COMPOSITIONS.

At a large literary party in Edinburgh some years ago, it was mentioned that a certain well-known literary character had written two poems, one called the Bible, the other the Ocean; that he was offering them to the booksellers, who, however, would not accede to his terms of publication; and that the worthy author was therefore puzzled not a little as to what he should do with his productions. "Why," remarked a sarcastic gentleman, who was present, "I think the doctor could not do better than to throw the one of his poems into the other."

2555. DR. WATTS AND MRS. ROWE.

Dr. Watts, whose passion for the justly celebrated Mrs. Rowe, then Miss Singer, is well known, having called one winter morning upon that lady, and perceiving that the fire and the conversation were getting dull, took up the poker, and putting it in the fire, said, "Allow me, madam, to raise a flame."

2556. DRYDEN AND DORSET.

Dryden, who was notoriously poor, was one evening in company with the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Dorset, and some other noblemen of wit and genius. It happened that the conversation, which was literary, turned on the art of composition, and elegance of style; and, after some debate, it was agreed that each party should write something on whatever subject chanced to strike his imagination, and place it under the candlestick for Mr. Dryden's judgment.

Most of the company took uncommon pains to outdo each other; while Lord Dorset, with much composure, wrote two or three lines, and carelessly threw them to the place agreed on. The rest having finished, the arbiter opened the leaves of their destiny. In going through the whole, he discovered strong marks of pleasure and satisfaction; but at one, in particular, he seemed in raptures. "I must acknowledge," says Dryden, "there are abundance of fine things in my hands, and such as do honor to the personages who wrote them; but I am under an indispensable necessity of giving the highest preference to my Lord Dorset. I must request that your lordships will hear it, and I believe all will be satisfied with my judgment.

"I promise to pay John Dryden, or order, on demand, the sum of five hundred pounds.

'DORSET.'

2557. A ROBBER'S REMORSE.

The Lady's Book says that somebody once robbed the poet Montgomery of an inkstand, presented to him by the ladies of Sheffield. The public execration was so loud, that the thief restored the booty with the following note:—

"BIRMINGHAM, March, 1812.

"Honored Sir: When we robbed your house we did not know that you wrote such beautiful verses as you do. I remember my mother told some of them to me when I was a boy. I found what house we robbed by the writing on the inkstand. Honored sir, I send it back. It was my share of the booty, and I hope you and God will forgive me."

2558. NEW ENGLAND PSALM SINGERS.

How strange it is that those who cannot write prose always imagine that nevertheless they can produce poetry! Something is made to jingle, and they take it for granted that it must be the music of the heart. It was always so.

Here is the motto of a book called the New England Psalm Singer, or American Chorister, by William Billings, a Native of Boston, in New England. The book was published in 1770. We hope it was better than his rhymes:—

"O, praise the Lord with one consent,
And in this grand design,
Let Britain and the colonies
Unanimously join."

The historian wickedly adds, "This opened a new era for the history of psalmody in the colonies."

2559. THE POETS IN A PUZZLE.

Cottle, in his Life of Coleridge, relates the following amusing incident:—

"I led the horse to the stable, when a fresh perplexity arose. I removed the harness without difficulty; but, after many strenuous attempts, I could not remove the collar. In despair, I called for assistance, when aid soon drew near. Mr. Wordsworth brought his ingenuity into exercise; but, after several unsuccessful efforts, he relinquished the achievement, as a thing altogether impracticable.

"Mr. Coleridge now tried his hand, but showed no more grooming skill than his predecessors; for, after twisting the poor horse's neck almost to strangulation and the great danger of his eyes, he gave up the useless task, pronouncing that the horse's head must have grown (gout or dropsy?) since the collar was put on; for he said 'it was a downright impossibility for such a huge os frontis to pass through so narrow a collar!'

"Just at this instant, a servant girl came near, and, understanding the cause of our consternation, 'La! master,' said she, you don't go about the work in the right way. You should do like this; when, turning the collar completely upside down, she slipped it off in a moment, to our great humiliation and wonderment, each satisfied afresh that there were heights of knowledge in the world to which we had not yet attained."

2560. RACAN AND MADEMOISELLE GOURNAIL.

One of the best of Bois Robert's stories was that of the Three Racans.

Two friends of the Marquis de Racan were aware that he intended waiting upon Mademoiselle de Gournai, the poetess. She was of Gascony, of a temper somewhat lively and passionate; and being a woman of talent, had expressed considerable impatience, on arriving at Paris, to be introduced to Racan, whom she had never seen.

One of these gentlemen anticipating, by an hour or two, the period of the intended visit, ordered the servant to announce M. Racan. He was received with transport. He talked for a long time of Mademoiselle Gournai's works, which he had studied on purpose, and took his departure, leaving her quite delighted with the conversation of M. Racan.

Scarcely had he gone when the servant announced another M. Racan. She thought at first that her visitor had forgotten something, and had returned on that account. She was just preparing to address him, when a stranger entered, and saluted her with much gravity. Mademoiselle de Gournai was still better pleased with this visitor than the last, for he praised her works still more warmly.

He had scarcely effected his retreat, when the real Racan was announced. The lady lost all patience. "What," said she, "more Racans still! Show him up, however." The moment he entered, Mademoiselle de Gournai, assuming a high tone, asked whether he came there for the purpose of insulting her.

M. de Racan, who was not a very ready orator, and who had anticipated a very different reception, was so confounded that he could only stammer out a reply. The lady, conceiving that this was really some person who had been sent for the purpose of insulting her, now lost all temper, and pulling off her slipper, belabored the unfortunate author till he was glad to make a precipitate retreat from the house.

2561. THE LATIN MOTTO.

"The Latin motto," says Cottle, "prefixed to the second edition of Mr. Coleridge's poems, puzzled every body to know from what author it was derived. One and another inquired of me, to no purpose, and expressed a wish that Mr. C. had been clearer in his citation, as 'no one could understand it.' On my naming this to Mr. Coleridge, he laughed heartily, and said, it was all a hoax. 'Not meeting,' said he, 'with a suitable motto, I invented one, and with references purposely obscure.'

The motto was the following :—

Duplex nobis vinculum, et amicitie et similitum juncturarumque Camænarum; quod utinam neque mors solvat, neque temporis longinquitas! — Groscoil. Epist. ad Car. Utenhov. et. Ptol. Lux. Tast.

2562. SWIFT ON TAXATION IN IRELAND.

Voltaire related to Mr. Sherlock the following anecdote of Swift :—

Lady Carteret, wife of the lord lieutenant, said to Swift, "The air of Ireland is very excellent and healthy." "For God's sake, madam," said Swift, falling down on his knees before her, "don't say so in England; for if you do, they will certainly tax it."

2563. MOLIERES AND THE THIEF.

The Abbé Privat de Molières was a man of very distinguished literary abilities, but, like too many learned men, extremely poor. In the winter he was obliged to write and read in bed, not having any other means to defend himself from the rigor of the season. He was professor of philosophy at the royal college, and seldom went from the room he had there. One day a thief knocked at his chamber door; the abbé opened it; the man entered boldly, and demanded our philosopher's purse.

As he was more attached to his studies than to his money, he, with his usual sang froid, said, "Open one of the drawers of my secretary, and take whatever you find." The thief, mistaking the drawer, pulled out a number of manuscripts. Privat de Molières, perceiving the confusion which the robber was making among his papers, very gravely said, "O, sir, you have mistaken the drawer, and you will give me a great deal of trouble." The thief, more desirous of money than papers, ransacked the poor abbé's premises, and went off without shutting the door. Our philosopher called after him, "Mr. Thief, be at least polite; shut my door."

2564. HABITS OF GREAT AUTHORS.

Shelley usually ate a baked potato previous to sitting down to write. He has been heard to assert that some of his finest ideas came whilst putting in the butter. Whether he purchased his potatoes in the street, or had them dressed at home, does not appear.

2565. DICKENS'S FIRST QUESTION.

Dickens asked the first man who boarded the Britannia, and welcomed him to America, where Bryant lived.

This sounds a little like the story of the Scotch peasant girl, who, arriving at the turnpike gate nearest Glasgow, knocked and inquired, "Is this Glasgow?" and on being answered yes, asked, "Is Peggy in?"

2566. RARE VERSIFYING.

A London poet, some years ago, offered fifty pounds for a word that would rhyme with "porringer." This was done about the time the Duke of York married his daughter to the Prince of Orange. The next morning after the offer, the papers contained the following :—

"The duke of York a daughter had;
He gave the prince of Orange her;
You see, my friend, I've found a word
Will rhyme with yours of porringer."

2567. STORY OF WYNNE.

The following story is told of the eccentric Wynne. A short time previous to his publishing his History of Ireland, he expressed a desire to dedicate it to the Duke of Northumberland, who had just returned from being lord lieutenant of that country. For this purpose he waited on Dr. Percy, and met with a very polite reception. The duke was made acquainted with his wishes, and Dr. Percy went as the messenger of good tidings to the author.

But there was more to be done than a formal introduction. The poor writer intimated this to the good doctor, who, in the most delicate terms, begged his acceptance of an almost new suit of black, which, with a very little alteration, might be made to fit. This, the doctor urged, would be best, as there was not time to provide a new suit, and other things necessary for his debut, as the duke had appointed Monday in the next week to give the historian an audience.

Mr. Wynne approved of the plan in all respects, and in the mean time had prepared himself with a set speech, and a manuscript of the dedication. But it must be understood that Dr. Percy was considerably in stature above Mr. Wynne, and his coat sufficiently large to wrap round the latter, and conceal him.

The morning came for the author's public entry at the Northumberland House; but, alas! one grand mistake had been made: in the hurry of business, no application had been made to the tailor for the

the third time, "it's now too late. I tell you that I am—no, that I was to be di—di—di—dipped only once."

and then remained silent to receive their compliments. He used to call this trying on his romance, as a tailor tries his coat.

2575. SCARRON.

Segraï informs us that when Scarron was visited, previous to general conversation, his friends were taxed with a perusal of whatever he had written since he saw them before. One day Segraï and a friend calling on him, "Take a chair," said our author, "and let me try on you my Roman Comique." He took his manuscript, read several pages, and when he observed that they laughed, he said, "Good! this goes well; my book can't fail of success, since it obliges such able persons as yourselves to laugh;"

2576. POPE'S EPITAPH ON MACKLIN.

Several years before his death, Mr. Macklin happened to be in a large company of ladies and gentlemen, among whom was Mr. Pope. The conversation having turned upon Mr. Macklin's age, one of the ladies addressed herself to Mr. Pope, in words to the following effect: "Ma Pope, when Macklin dies, you must write his epitaph." "That I will, madam," said Pope: "nay, I will give it you now:—

'Here lies the Jew
That Shakespeare drew.'"

§ 249. SARCASMS, PUNS, AND JEUX D'ESPRITS.

2577. DRYDEN AND OTWAY.

Thomas Otway.

The renowned Dryden and Otway were contemporaries, and lived for some time opposite each other in Fetter Lane. One morning the latter happened to call upon his brother bard about breakfast time, but was told by his servant that his master was gone to breakfast with the Earl of Pembroke. "Very well," said Otway; "tell your master that I will call to-morrow morning."

Accordingly he called the next day, about the same hour. "Well, is your master at home now?" "No, sir; he is just gone to breakfast with the Duke of Buckingham." "The devil he is!" cried Otway; and, actuated either by envy, pride, or disappointment, in a kind of involuntary manner, took up a piece of chalk, that lay on the table, which stood upon the landing-place near Dryden's chamber, and wrote over the door,—

"Here lives Dryden, a poet and a wit."

The next morning, at breakfast, Dryden recognized the handwriting, and told the servant to go to Mr. Otway, and desire his company to breakfast with him. In the mean time, with the same piece of chalk, he added to Otway's line of—

"Here lives Dryden, a poet and a wit,"—

"This was written by Otway, opposite."

When Otway arrived, and saw that his line was linked with a rhyme, being a man of rather a petulant disposition, he took it in dudgeon, and, turning upon his heel, told his friend that he was welcome to keep his wit and his breakfast to himself.

2578. SWIFT versus LAWYERS.

The celebrated Dean Swift, in preaching an assize sermon, was severe against the lawyers for pleading against their consciences. After dinner, a young counsel said some severe things against the clergy, and added, that he did not doubt, were the devil to die, a parson might be found to preach his funeral sermon.

"Yes," said Swift, "I would, and would give the devil his due, as I did his children this morning."

2579. ANECDOTE OF COLERIDGE.

Mr. Coleridge was a remarkably awkward horseman, so much so as generally to attract notice.

On a certain occasion he was riding along the turnpike road, in the county of Durham, when a wag, approaching him, noticed his peculiarity, and, quite mistaking his man, thought the rider a fine subject for a little sport; when, as he drew near, he thus accosted Mr. C.: "I say, young man, did you meet a tailor on the road?" "Yes," replied Mr. C., who was never at a loss for a rejoinder, "I did; and he told me if I went a little farther I should meet a goose!" The assailant was struck dumb, while the traveller jogged on.

2580. DEAN SWIFT AND THE BARBER.

The dean, while resident on his living in the county of Meath, before his promotion to the deanery of St. Patrick's, was daily shaved by the village barber, who at length became a great favorite with him. Razor, while lathering him one morning, said he had a great favor to request of his reverence—that his neighbors had advised him to take the little public house at the corner of the churchyard, which he had done, in the hope that by uniting the profession of publican with his own, he might gain a better maintenance for his family.

"Indeed," said the dean, "and what can I do to promote this happy union?"

"And please you," said Razor, "some of our customers have heard much about your reverence's poetry; so that, if you would but condescend to give me a smart little touch in that way to clap under my sign, it might be the making of me and mine forever."

"But what do you intend for your sign?" says the dean.

"The jolly barber, if it please your reverence, with a razor in one hand and a full pot in the other."

"Well," rejoined the dean, "in that case there can be no great difficulty in supplying you with a suitable inscription." So taking up his pen, he instantly scratched the following couplet, which was affixed to the sign, and remained there for many years:—

"Rave not from pole to pole, but step in here, Where nought excels the shaving but—the beer."

2581. MR. SERGEANT BETTESWORTH.

The following lines on Sergeant Bettesworth, which Swift inserted in one of his poems, gave rise to a violent resentment on the part of the barrister:—

"So at the bar the booby Bettesworth,
Though half-a-crown o'erpays his sweat's worth,
Who knows in law nor text nor margin,
Calls Singleton his brother sergeant."

The poem was sent to Bettesworth at a time when he was surrounded with his friends in a convivial party. He read it aloud till he had finished the lines relative to himself. He then flung it down with great violence—trembled and turned pale—and after some pause, his rage for a while depriving him of utterance, he took out his penknife, and opening it vehemently, swore, "With this very penknife I will cut off his ears."

He then went to the dean's house, and, not finding him at home, followed him to the house of a friend, where being shown into a back room, he desired the doctor might be sent for; and on Swift entering the room, and asking what were his commands, "Sir," said he, "I am Sergeant Bettesworth."

"Of what regiment, pray, sir?" said Swift.

"O Mr. Dean, we know your powers of railery—you know me well enough; I am one of his majesty's sergeants at law, and I am come to demand if you are the author of this poem, [producing it,] and these villainous lines on me."

"Sir," said Swift, "when I was a young man, I had the honor of being intimate with some great legal characters, particularly Lord Somers, who, knowing my propensity to satire, advised me, when I lampooned a knave or fool, never to own it. Conformably to that advice, I tell you I am not the author."

2582. BEN JONSON AND THE VINTNER.

A vintner, to whom Ben Jonson was once in debt, invited him to dine at Falcon Tavern, and told him that, if he would give him an immediate answer to the following questions, he would forgive him his debt. The vintner asked him what God is best pleased with; what the devil is best pleased with; what the world is best pleased with; and what he was best pleased with. Ben, without the least hesitation, gave the following reply; which, as an impromptu, deserves no small share of praise:—

"God is best pleased when men forsake their sin;
The devil is best pleased when they persist therein;
The world's best pleased when thou dost sell good wine;
And you're best pleased when I do pay for mine."

2583. LORD BYRON.

When Lord Byron was cut by the great, on account of his quarrel with his wife, he stood leaning on a marble slab at the entrance of a room, while troops of duchesses and countesses poured out. One little pert red-haired girl stood a few paces behind the rest, and as she passed him, said, with a nod, "Ay, you should have married me, and this wouldn't have happened to you."

2584. ONE OF BYRON'S JOKES.

The "moody Childe," says Powell, had given to Murray, his publisher, as a birthday present, a Bible, magnificently bound, and which he enriched by a very flattering inscription. This was laid by the grateful publisher on his drawing-room table, and somewhat ostentatiously displayed to all comers.

One evening, as a large company were gathered around the table, one of the guests happened to open the Testament, and saw some writing on the margin. Calling to Murray, he said, "Why, Byron has written something here!" Narrower inspection proved that the profane wit had erased the word "robber," in the text, and substituted that of "publisher," so that the passage read thus: "Now, Barabbas was a publisher."

The legend goes on to state that the book disappeared that very night from the drawing-room table.

2585. THE BONE OF MY BONE.

A sprightly young belle, who was an admirer of poetry, would often tease her beau to write verses for her, as he had made some acquaintance with the Muses. One day, becoming quite importunate, she would take no denial. "Come, pray, do now write some poetry for me—won't you? I'll help you out. I'll furnish you with rhymes if you will make lines for them. Here now,— please,	moan,

tease,	bone,"

He at length good-humoredly complied, and filled up the measure as follows:—

"To a form that is faultless, a face which must—please,
Is added a restless desire just to—tease;
O, how my hard fate I should ever be—moan,
Could I but believe she'd be bone of my bone!"

2586. THE BITER BIT.

"Campbell," says Dr. Beattie, "went to Paisley races, got prodigiously interested in the first race, and betted on the success of one horse, to the amount of fifty pounds, with Professor Wilson. At the end of the race he thought he had lost the bet, and said to Wilson, "I owe you fifty pounds; but really, when I reflect that you are a professor of moral philosophy, and that betting is a sort of gambling only fit for blacklegs, I cannot bring my conscience to pay the bet."

"O," said Wilson, "I very much approve of your principles, and mean to act upon them. In point of fact, Yellow Cap, on whom you betted, has won the race; and, but for conscience, I ought to pay you the fifty pounds; but you will excuse me."

2587. RIVAL REMEMBRANCE.

Mr. Gifford to Mr. Hazlitt.

"What we read from your pen we remember no more."

Mr. Hazlitt to Mr. Gifford.

"What we read from your pen we remember before."

2588. FUN BY THE ETRICK SHEPHERD.

Some literary and scientific gentlemen one day dined with Mr. Hogg at his farm of Mont Benger, when it was mentioned by some one, as a strange thing, that Dr. Parr should have lately been married in a somewhat clandestine way, and that nobody knew who his wife was, or any thing about her. "Ah," said the shepherd, "I am afraid she must have been a little below Par."

2589. ANECDOTE OF BURNS.

Burns was standing one day upon the quay at Greenock, when a wealthy merchant, belonging to the town, had the misfortune to fall into the harbor. He was no swimmer; and his death would have been inevitable, had not a sailor, who happened to be passing at the time, immediately plunged in, and, at the risk of his own life, rescued him from his dangerous situation.

The Greenock merchant, upon recovering a little from his fright, put his hand into his pocket, and generously presented the sailor with a shilling! The crowd, who were by this time collected, loudly protested against the contemptible insignificance of the sum; but Burns, with a smile of ineffable scorn, entreated them to restrain their clamor; "for," said he, "the gentleman is of course the best judge of the value of his own life."

2590. CAMPBELL AND HIS BROTHER.

On one occasion, when the poet Campbell and his elder brother were in bed together, the poet was more than usually restless, and, in the ardor of inspiration, inflicted sundry kicks upon his less elevated brother, which the other received with his usual sang froid.

In the morning, however, he took the first opportunity of interrogating the poet as to the cause of his perplexed slumbers. "I was not asleep," he replied, "but was attempting a poem upon grandeur, and could not get the lines to please me at all; with one or two alterations, however, I think it will do now."

"Indeed!" said the elder brother dryly: "well, Tom, I don't know what share you claim in this effusion, but I am quite sure I had all the bold strokes of it."

2591. LAMARTINE.

It is said that as Lamartine was about entering the Hall of Conference one day, a person stepped up to him, with a menacing gesture, as if intending to attack him, and exclaimed, "Poet, thy lyre has sounded long enough!" Lamartine, without exhibiting the slightest emotion, calmly answered, "Wait a little longer, and you may perhaps hear the song of the swan!"

2592. ODE TO SLEEP.

A poet asked a gentleman what he thought of his last production, An Ode to Sleep. The latter replied. "You have done so much justice to the subject that it is impossible to read it without feeling its whole weight."

2593. RHYMING.

A punster one day observed that any thing might be turned into rhyme, or doggerel; upon which a friend, pointing to a board in the street, upon which were painted the words, "This house to be sold," exclaimed, "Come, then, turn that into rhyme!" upon which the other, with infinite promptitude, redeemed his pledge, by writing, with chalk, on the board, —

*This house to be

2594. PUTTENHAM'S ODDITIES.

Puttenham, in that very scarce book, the Art of Poesie, p. 75, gives several odd specimens of poems in the form of lozenges, rhomboids, pillars, &c., some of them from Oriental poems, communicated by a traveller. Puttenham is a very lively writer, and has contrived to form a defence for describing and making such trifling devices.

He has done more: he has erected two pillars himself to the honor of Queen Elizabeth; every pillar consists of a base of eight syllables, the shaft or middle of four, and the capital is equal with the base. The only difference between the two pillars is this: in the one "ye must read upwards," in the other the reverse. These pillars, notwithstanding this fortunate device and variation, may be fixed as two columns in the porch of the vast temple of literary folly.

2595. THE POET AND HIS PARODIST.

A lady of bas bleu celebrity (the term is getting odious, particularly to our savantes) had two friends, whom she equally admired — an elegant poet and his parodist.

She had contrived to prevent their meeting as long as her stratagems lasted, till at length she apologized to the serious bard for inviting him when his mock umbra was to be present. Astonished, she perceived that both men of genius felt a mutual esteem for each other's opposite talent: the ridiculed had perceived no malignity in the playfulness of the parody, and even seemed to consider it as a compliment, aware that parodists do not waste their talent on obscure productions; while the ridiculer himself was very sensible that he was the inferior poet. The lady critic had imagined that a parody must necessarily be malicious; and in some cases it is said those on whom the parody has been performed have been of the same opinion.

2596. GOSTLING'S PARODY.

Mr. Gostling, a clergyman of Canterbury, was, we are told, the writer of an admirable parody on the noted grammatical line,—

"Bifrons, atque Custos, Bos, Fur, Sus, atque Sacerdos."

It runs thus :—

*"Bifrons even when he preaches ;
Custos of what in his reach is ;
Bos among his neighbors' wives ;
Fur in gathering of his tithes.
Sus at every parish feast ;
On Sunday, Sacerdos, a priest."*

2597. POETICAL TRIADS.

Mr. Owen Pugh, the Welsh bard, being called upon for his opinion of the requisites of a poet, wrote on the spot the following parody on the Bardic Triads :—

1. The three primary requisites of poetical genius : an eye that can see nature ; a heart that can feel nature ; and a resolution that dares follow nature.
2. The three final intentions of poetry : increase of goodness, increase of understanding, and increase of delight.
3. The three properties of a just imagination : what may be, what ought to be, and what is seemly to be.
4. The three indispensabilities of poetical language : purity, copiousness, and ease.
5. Three things that ought to be well understood in poetry : the great, the little, and their correspondences.
6. Three things to be avoided in poetry : the mean, the obscure, and the extravagant.
7. Three things to be chiefly considered in poetical illustration : what shall be obviously seen, what shall be instantly admired, and what shall be eminently characteristic.
8. The three dignities of poetry : the true and wonderful united, the union of the beautiful and the wise, and the union of art and nature.
9. The three advantages of poetry : the praise of goodness, the memory of what is remarkable, and the invigoration of the affections.
10. The three purities of poetry : pure truth, pure language, and pure conception.
11. Three things that poetry should thoroughly be : thoroughly learned, thoroughly animated, thoroughly natural.

2598. RECIPROCAL COMPLIMENTS.

"John Leyden," says Walter Scott, "introduced me to Tom Campbell. They afterwards quarrelled. When I repeated Hohenlinden to Leyden, he said, 'Dash it, man, tell the fellow I hate him ; but, then he has written the finest verses that have been published these fifty years.' I did mine errand as faithfully as one of Homer's messengers, and had for answer, 'Tell Leyden that I detest him ; but I know the value of his critical approbation.'"

2599. BATHOS.

The art of "sinking in poetry" was never, perhaps, better illustrated than in the following epitaph, written by Howell, upon Charles I. :—

*"So fell the royal oak by a wild crew
Of mongrel shrubs, that underneath him grow ;
So fell the lion, by a pack of curs ;
So the rose withered 'twixt a knot of burs ;
So fell the eagle by a swarm of gnats ;
So the whale perished by a shoal of sprats !"*

2600. DI, DO, DUM.

Two punsters being in company together, one desired the other to make a pun upon the following words,—di, do, dum ; when, after a little consideration, he produced the following :—

*"When Dido found Æneas did not come,
She mourned in silence, and was Di-do dum," (dumb.)*

2601. THE COPY AND ORIGINAL.

A certain lord having a termagant wife, and, at the same time, a chaplain, who was a tolerable poet, his lordship desired him to write a copy of verses on a shrew. "I cannot imagine," said the parson, "why your lordship should want a copy, who has so good an original."

2602. QUEEN ELIZABETH AND THE MAYOR.

When Queen Elizabeth visited Falkenstone, the inhabitants employed their parish clerk to versify their addresses. The mayor being introduced, he, with great gravity, mounted a three-legged stool, and commenced his poetical declamation thus :—

"O mighty Queene, Welcome to Falkensteene !"

Elizabeth burst out in a loud roar of laughter, and, without giving him his worship time to recover himself, she replied,—

"You great fool Get off that stool."

2603. CAMPBELL, THE POET.

Campbell, in the midst of his severe studies, while aiming at academic honors, was guilty of a spree once, in his frolic hours, that led him into serious difficulty. It was as follows :—

A respectable apothecary in Glasgow had in the windows of his shop this notice : "Ears Pierced by A. Fife ;" meaning the boring of young ladies' ears for ear-rings. His next door neighbor was Mr. Drum, a spirit dealer, whose windows, adjoining Fife's, showed samples of whiskey, rum, and other inflammables of that sort. These two men, from jealousy, were at loggerheads with each other.

Campbell got a sign painted, in flaming capitals, stretching across the two houses, with this inscription from Othello, and put it up at dead of night : "The spirit-stirring Drum ; the ear-piercing Fife." A great sensation was produced next morning; a great crowd came. It made the Drum and Fife a laughing-stock to all the town; and none enjoyed the joke more than Campbell and his coadjutors. They were sentenced to a severe reprimand, after having narrowly escaped fine and imprisonment.

2604. BARTY.

Bartholomew Willard (called "Barty" for short) was a "queer customer," once very well known in the north part of Vermont, for his careless, vagabond habits, ready wit, and remarkable facility at extempore rhyming. Sitting one day in a village store, among a crowd of idlers who always gathered about him on his arrival, the merchant asked Barty "why he always wore that shocking bad hat." Barty replied that it was simply because he was unable to purchase a new one.

"Come," said the merchant, "make me a good rhyme on the old hat immediately, — without stopping to think, — and I'll give you the best castor in the store." Whereupon Barty threw his old tile on the floor, and began: —

"There lies my old hat,
And, pray, what of that?
'Tis as good as the rest of my raiment:
If I buy me a better,
You'll make me your debtor,
And send me to jail for the payment."

The new hat was adjudged, "by the unanimous vote of the house," to belong to Barty, who wore it off in great triumph, saying, "it was but a poor head that could not take care of itself."

2605. DEAN SWIFT.

The motto which was inserted under the arms of William Prince of Orange, on his accession to the English crown, was, "Non rapui, sed recepi." (I did not steal it, but I received it.)

This being shown to Dean Swift, he said, with a sarcastic smile, "The receiver is as bad as the thief."

2606. CANNING'S LOZENGES.

When Canning was challenged to find a rhyme for Julianna, he immediately wrote, —

"Walking in the shady grove
With my Julianna,
For lozenges I gave my love
Ip-e-cac-u-an-ha."

There might be now as much fact as there was then fiction in the verses. Ipecacuanha lozenges are now sold by the apothecaries.

2607. BISHOP HEBER.

The late lamented Lord Bishop of Calcutta, in his youthful days, was very fond of writing a jeu d'esprit. Some of his quizzical writings he sent to the Gentleman's Magazine, in which he occasionally corresponded with himself, keeping down to the dulness of his model, to the great amusement of the few who were in the secret.

One of his articles was a solemn inquiry, from Clericus Leicestrensis, into the remedy for the devastations of an insect which peculiarly attacked

spinach — the evil, the remedy, and the insect being all equally imaginary. Another was a sonnet on the death of Lieutenant Philip V——, who was killed at the storming of Fort Muzzaboo, on the St. Lawrence, (fort and war equally unknown.) The last line was, —

"And Marathon shall yield to Muzzaboo."

The jeu d'esprit from which the last line is taken deceived a very respectable old gentleman, for it happened, by an odd coincidence, that there had been missing, for some years, a certain Philip V——, whose uncle was so much pleased with the scene of his death, and with the glowing eulogium from a witness of his valor, that he sent five pounds to the editor of the Magazine for the author of the sonnet.

2608. PORSON'S SATIRE.

One of the most pointed and severe satires that, perhaps, was ever uttered, was made by Professor Porson, a short time before his death. Being in a mixed company, among which were many eminent literary characters, and particularly Mr. S——y, the poet, who had a very high opinion of his own talents, the conversation turned on some of his own productions, when, as usual, he began to extol their merits.

"I will tell you, sir," said Mr. Porson, "what I think of your poetical works: they will be read when Shakspeare's and Milton's are forgotten," (every eye was instantly turned upon the professor,) — but not till then!"

2609. RATHER SHARP.

Piron, the French author, having been taken up by the watchman of the night in the streets of Paris, was carried, on the following morning, before a lieutenant of police, who haughtily interrogated him concerning his business or profession.

"I am a poet, sir," said Piron.

"O, O! a poet, are you?" said the magistrate

"I have a brother who is a poet."

"Then we are even," said Piron, "for I have a brother who is a fool."

2610. DANTE.

The secret of Dante's struggle through life was in the reckless sarcasm of his answer to the Prince of Verona, who asked him how he could account for the fact, that, in the household of princes, the court fool was in greater favor than the philosopher. "Similarity of mind," said the fierce genius, "is all over the world the source of friendship."

2611. SHREWD REPLY.

James II., when Duke of York, made a visit to Milton, out of curiosity. In the course of their conversation, the duke said to the poet, that he thought his blindness was a judgment of Heaven on him, because he had written against Charles I., his (the duke's) father, when the immortal poet replied, "If your highness thinks that misfortunes are indexes of the wrath of Heaven, what must you think of your father's tragical end? I have only lost my eyes—he lost his head."

2612. DIDN'T DO ANY THING ELSE.

Prosy Coleridge, during one of his interminable table-talks, said to Lamb, "Charley, did you ever hear me preach?"

"I never heard you do any thing else," was the prompt and witty reply of Elia, which has become a favorite byword at the present day.

2613. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A CLOCK AND A WOMAN.

Fontenelle, being asked one day, by a lord waiting at Versailles, what difference there was between a clock and a woman, instantly replied, "A clock serves to point out the hours, and a woman to make us forget them."

2614. CHARLES LAMB.

The regular routine of clerkly business ill suited the literary tastes and the wayward though innocent habits of our essayist. Once, at the India House, one in authority said to him,—

"I have remarked, Mr. Lamb, that you come very late in the morning."

"Yes, sir," replied the wit, "but I go away early in the afternoon."

The oddness of the excuse silenced the reprover, who turned away with a smile.

2615. CHOICE POETRY.

A very indifferent poet, having read to a friend what he deemed the choice parts of a pretty long poem, inquired which were the passages he most approved of. "Those which you have not yet read," replied the other.

2616. THE THREE VERSES OF EURIPIDES.

Euripides once said that three of his verses had cost him the labor of three days. "I could have written a hundred in that time," said another poet of ordinary abilities. "I believe it," replied Euripides; "but they would have lived only three days."

2617. AN UNFURNISHED HOUSE.

When Mr. Thomas Sheridan, son of the late celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan, was candidate for the representation of a Cornish borough, he told his father, if he succeeded, he should place a label on his forehead with these words, "To let," and side with the party that made the best offer. "Right, Tom," said the father; "but don't forget to add the word unfurnished."

2618. THE MAGPIE.

Swift, in travelling, called at a hospitable house. The lady of the mansion, rejoicing to have so distinguished a guest, with great eagerness and flippancy asked him what he would have for dinner. "Will you have an apple pie, sir? Will you have a gooseberry pie, sir? Will you have a cherry pie, sir? Will you have a currant pie, sir? Will you have a plum pie, sir? Will you have a pigeon pie, sir?" "Any pie, madam, but a magpie."

2619. COLERIDGE.

Walking with Coleridge in the country, we saw washed linen hanging in a village churchyard. He said, "The inhabitants dry these clothes on the graves of their ancestors." After a pause he added, "The scene appears as if the ghosts had hung up their shrouds."

2620. BOILEAU.

Boileau was one day visited by a nobleman lounging, who reproached him with not returning his previous calls. "You and I," said the poet, "meet upon unequal terms. I lose my time when I pay you a visit, and you only get rid of your irksome hours."

Yet when a philosopher called upon him one day, and, finding him engaged in his study, apologized for the interruption, he was replied to, by the gifted poet, with, "Sir, one man of letters can never interrupt another."

2621. POETS TRAVEL SAFELY.

The celebrated Peter Pindar was, at one period of his life, in possession of a few hundreds in the funds, which his necessities, from time to time, compelled him to sell out. When Peter was receiving the last portion of his former savings, he expressed great anxiety lest he should be robbed of it, in his way through the city; "for," said he, "'tis the largest sum ever in my possession." "Poh!" replied his broker, a shrewd personage, in a broad brim and snuff-colored suit; "let me attach a piece of paper to your coat, with the word poet inscribed upon it, and I'll engage you will excite no suspicions."

2622. SWIFT AND THE BILL OF FARE.

When a gentleman, who was trying to persuade him to dine at his house, said, "I will send you my bill of fare," he replied, "Send me your bill of company."

2623. POPE AND ROYALTY.

Queen Caroline declared her intention of honoring Mr. Pope with a visit at Twickenham. His mother was then alive, and lest the visit should give her pain, on account of the danger his religious principles might incur by an intimacy with the court, his piety made him, with great duty and humility, beg that he might decline this honor.

Some years after, his mother being dead, the Prince of Wales condescended to do him the honor of a visit. When Mr. Pope met him at the waterside, he expressed his sense of the honor done him in very proper terms, joined with the most dutiful expressions of attachment; on which the prince said, "It is very well; but how shall we reconcile your love to a prince with your professed indisposition to kings, since princes will be kings in time?"

"Sir," replied Pope, "I consider royalty under that noble and authorized type of the lion; while he is young, and before his nails are grown, he may be approached and caressed with safety and pleasure."

2624. EPIGRAM BY POPE IN HIS LAST ILLNESS.

During Pope's last illness, a squabble happened in his chamber between his two physicians, Dr. Burton and Dr. Thompson, they mutually charging each other with hastening the death of the patient by improper prescriptions. Pope at length silenced them, saying, "Gentlemen, I only learn by your discourse that I am in a dangerous way; therefore all I now ask is, that the following epigram may be added after my death to the next edition of the Dunciad, by way of postscript:

Dunces, rejoice; forgive all censures past;
The greatest dunce has killed your foe at last."

§ 250. ORIGIN AND FACTS OF NOTED POEMS.

2625. THE RAPE OF THE LOCK.

HE stealing of Miss Belle Fermor's hair," says Pope, "was taken too seriously, and caused an estrangement between the two families, though they had lived so long in great friendship before. A common acquaintance, and well wisher to both, desired me to write a poem to make a jest of it, and laugh them together again. It was with this view that I wrote the Rape of the Lock, which was well received, and had its effect in the two families.

"Nobody but Sir George Brown was angry; but he was a good deal so, and for a long time. He could not bear that Sir Plume should talk nothing but nonsense. Copies of the poem got about, and it was likely to be printed; on which I published the first draught of it, without the machinery, in a miscellany of Tonson's. The machinery was added afterwards, to make it look a little more considerable, and the scheme of adding it was much liked and approved by several of my friends, and particularly by Dr. Garth, who, as he was one of the best-natured men in the world, was very fond of it."

"I have been assured," says Spence, "by a most intimate friend of Mr. Pope, that the peer in the Rape of the Lock was Lord Petre; the person who desired Mr. Pope to write it, old Mr. Curyl, of Sussex; and that what was said of Sir George Brown in it was the very picture of the man."

2626. ORIGIN OF THE MARSEILLAISE.

M. de Lamartine, in his Histoire des Girondins, published in Paris, gives the following account of the origin of the French national air, the Marseillaise.

"In the garrison of Strasburg was quartered a young artillery officer, named Rouget de Lisle, a native of Louis de Salmier, in the Jura. He had a great taste for music and poetry, and often entertained his comrades during their long and tedious hours in the garrison. Sought after for his musical and poetical talent, he was a frequent and familiar guest at the house of one Dietrich, an Alsatian patriot, mayor of Strasburg.

"The winter of 1792 was a period of great scarcity at Strasburg. The house of Dietrich was poor, his table was frugal, but a seat was always open to Rouget de Lisle.

"One day there was nothing but bread and some slices of smoked ham on the table. Dietrich, regarding the young officer, said to him, with sad serenity, 'Abundance fails at our boards; but what matters that if enthusiasm fails not at our civic feets, nor courage in the hearts of our soldiers? I have still a last bottle of wine in my cellar. Bring it,' said he to one of his daughters, 'and let us drink France and Liberty! Strasburg should have its patriotic solemnity. De Lisle must draw from these last drops one of those hymns which raise the soul of the people.'

"The wine was brought and drank, after which the officer departed. The night was cold. De Lisle was thoughtful. His heart was moved, his head heated. He returned staggering to his solitary room, and slowly sought inspiration, sometimes in the fervor of his citizen soul, and anon on the keys of his instrument, composing now the air before the words, and then the words before the air. He sung all and wrote nothing, and at last, exhausted, fell asleep with his head resting on his instrument, and awoke not till daybreak.

"The music of the night returned to his mind like the impression of a dream. He wrote it, and ran to Dietrich, whom he found in the garden digging winter lettuces. The wife and daughters of the old man were not up. Dietrich awoke them, and called in some friends, all as passionate as himself for music, and able to execute the composition of De Lisle. At the first stanza cheeks grew pale; at the second tears flowed; and at last the delirium of enthusiasm burst forth. The wife of Dietrich, his daughters, himself, and the young officer, threw themselves, crying, into each other's arms.

"The hymn of the country was found. Executed some days afterwards in Strasburg, the new song flew from city to city, and was played by all the popular orchestras. Marseilles adopted it to be sung at the commencement of the sittings of the clubs, and the Marseillaise spread it through France, singing it along the public roads. From this came the name of 'Marseillaise.'"

2627. CAMPBELL'S HOHENLINDEN.

The following is an extract from a letter written by Thomas Campbell to a relative in America, and affords us the first impressions of the battle of Hohenlinden.

"Never shall time efface from my memory the recollections of that hour of astonishment and suspended breath, when I stood with the good monks of St. Jacob, to overlook a charge of Klenau's cavalry upon the French under Grennier, encamped below us. We saw the fire given and returned, and heard distinctly the sound of the French pas de charge, collecting the lines to attack in close column. After three hours' awaiting the issue of a severe action, a park of artillery was opened just beneath the walls of the monastery, and several wagoners, who were stationed to convey the wounded in spring wagons, were killed in our sight. My love of novelty now gave way to personal fear; and I took a carriage, in company with an Austrian surgeon, back to Landshut."

"I remember," he adds, on his return to England, "how little I valued the art of painting, before I got into the heart of such impressive scenes; but in Germany I would have given any thing to have possessed an art capable of conveying ideas inaccessible to speech and writing. Some particular scenes were rather overcharged with that degree of the terrific which oversteps the sublime; and I own my flesh yet creeps at the recollection of spring wagons and hospitals; but the sight of Ingolstadt in ruins, or Hohenlinden covered with fire, seven miles in circumference, were spectacles never to be forgotten."

2628. THE OLD OAKEN BUCKET.

The New York Sunday Age relates the origin of this famous ballad, written, it seems, by Samuel B. Woodworth, when a journeyman printer in an office situate at the corner of Chatham and Chambers Streets, New York. Near by, in Frankfort Street, was a drinking shop, kept by a man named Mallory, where Woodworth and several particular friends used to resort. One afternoon the liquor was superexcellent, and Woodworth seemed inspired by it; for, after taking a draught, he set his glass upon the table, and, smacking his lips, declared that Mallory's eau de vie was superior to any thing he had ever tasted.

"No," said Mallory, "you are mistaken; there was one thing which, in both our estimations, far surpassed this, in the way of drinking."

"What was that," asked Woodworth, dubiously.

"The draught of pure, fresh, spring water, that we used to drink from the old oaken bucket that hung in the well, after our return from the labors of the field on a sultry day in summer."

The tear-drop glistened for a moment in Woodworth's eye. "True—true!" he replied, and shortly after quitted the place.

He immediately returned to the office, grasped a pen, and in half an hour the Old Oaken Bucket, one of the most delightful compositions in our language, was ready in manuscript to be embalmed in the memories of succeeding generations.

2629. DR. SYNTAX'S TOUR IN SEARCH OF THE PICTURESCUE.

The manner in which the late Mr. Coombe composed his popular poem, Dr. Syntax, is a curious fact in the history of the fine arts. Mr. Rowlandson, celebrated for his humorous designs, made a series of sketches, in his loose style, to burlesque a modern tourist in search of the picturesque.

This eccentric genius, like Gillray, never at loss for a subject, chose to make his hero a comical, thin-visaged country parson, and led him from place to place, into a variety of situations, whimsical to the last degree. There were perhaps eighty or a hundred of these. Mr. Ackermann had for many years been a collector of the humorous designs of this artist, and, among others, purchased these.

One evening, in looking over his portfolio, in company with Mr. Coombe, for a subject for the Poetical Magazine, he pounced upon the tourist. Coombe was amused with the sketches, and a few were selected as a theme for versifying. It was subsequently agreed that a continued tale should be formed from them, and Mr. Ackermann was to continue the selections. One, two, or three, were forwarded to Mr. Coombe, and when he had written from them, as many more were sent in exchange; thus, without further arrangement, or the author having the least knowledge of what would come next, the work proceeded, being published in detached parts, until the poem grew into a sufficient number of verses to form a volume.

The magazine was discontinued, and long after, at the instance of his neighbor, Mr. Taylor, proprietor of the Sun evening newspaper, Mr. Ackermann was induced to publish the Tour of Dr. Syntax in a separate volume; Mr. Taylor always insisting that it was a poem that would suit the public taste.

The best comment upon his judgment is, that few poems, perhaps, have experienced so extensive a sale. It may not be known to all our readers, perhaps, that the world owes to the lively pen of this Mr. Taylor, of the Sun, that fictitious tale in verse entitled Monsieur Tonson, which has been so successfully dramatized.

2630. HAIL, COLUMBIA.

In the year 1798, when patriotic feeling pervaded the country, and when there were several parties in the field, Mr. Fox, a young player, who was more admired for his vocal than histrionic powers, called one morning upon his friend Mr. Hopkinson, and after stating that the following evening had been appointed for his benefit, and expressing great fear for the result, as not a single box had been taken, begged his friend to do something in his behalf.

"If," said Fox, "you will write me some patriotic verses to the tune of the President's March, I feel sure of a full house. Several of the people about the theatre have attempted it, but they have come to the conclusion that it cannot be done; yet I think you may succeed."

Mr. Hopkinson retired to his study, and in a short time wrote the first verse and chorus, which were submitted to Mrs. Hopkinson, who sang them to a piano accompaniment, and proved the measure and music to be compatible and in keeping. In this way the second and other verses were written, and when Fox returned in the evening, he received with delight the song as it now stands. The following morning small handbills and placards announced that Mr. Fox would sing a new patriotic song, &c.

The theatre was crowded; the song was sung and received with rapture; it was repeated eight times, and again encored; and when sung the ninth time, the whole audience stood up and joined in the chorus. Night after night, Hail, Columbia, cheered the visitors of the theatre, and in a very few days it was the universal song of the boys in the streets, from one end of the city to another. Nor was the distinguished author of this truly national song—a song which met the approbation of both parties—forgotten. The street in which he resided was on one occasion crowded, and Hail, Columbia, broke on the stillness of midnight from five hundred patriotic voices.

2631. THOMAS CARLYLE.

The editor of the London Monthly Magazine relates an anecdote characteristic of Carlyle, and from which others may take a useful hint. "We recollect," says the editor, "walking with Mr. Thomas Carlyle down Regent Street, when he remarked, that we poets had all of us mistaken the argument that we should treat."

"The past," he said, "is too cool for this age of progress. Look at this throng of carriages, this multitude of men and horses, of women and children. Every one of these had a reason for going this way, rather than that. If we could penetrate their minds, and ascertain their motives, an epic poem would present itself, exhibiting the business of life as it is, with all its passions and interests, hopes and fears. A poem, whether in verse or prose, conceived in this spirit, and impartially written, would be the epic of the age." And in this spirit it was that he conceived the plan of his own French Revolution, a History.

2632. POPE'S ESSAY ON MAN.

"In a rough attack upon Warburton," says D'Israeli, "respecting Pope's privately printing fifteen hundred copies of the Patriot King of Bolingbroke, which I conceive to have been written by Mallet, I find a particular account of the manner in which the Essay on Man was written, over which Johnson seems to throw great doubts.

"The writer of this angry epistle, in addressing Warburton, says, 'If you were as intimate with Pope as you pretend, you must know the truth of a fact which several others, as well as I, who never had the honor of a personal acquaintance with Lord Bolingbroke or Mr. Pope, have heard. The fact was related to me by a certain senior fellow of one of our universities, who was very intimate with Mr. Pope.

"He started some objections one day, at Mr. Pope's house, to the doctrine contained in the ethic Epistles; upon which Mr. Pope told him that he would soon convince him of the truth of it, by laying the argument at large before him; for which purpose he gave him a large prose manuscript to peruse, telling him, at the same time, the author's name. From this perusal, whatever other conviction the doctor might receive, he collected at least this—that Mr. Pope had from his friend not only the doctrine, but even the finest and strongest ornaments of his ethics.

"Now, if this fact be true,—as I question not but you know it to be so,—I believe no man of candor will attribute such merit to Mr. Pope as you would insinuate, for acknowledging the wisdom and the friendship of the man who was his instructor in philosophy, nor, consequently, that this acknowledgment, and the dedication of his own system, put into a poetical dress by Mr. Pope, laid his lordship under the necessity of never resenting any injury done to him afterwards. Mr. Pope said no more than the literal truth in calling Lord Bolingbroke his guide, philosopher, and friend."

The existence of this very manuscript volume was authenticated by Lord Bathurst, in a conversation with Dr. Blair and others, where he said "he had read the manuscript in Lord Bolingbroke's handwriting, and was at a loss whether most to admire the elegance of Lord Bolingbroke's prose, or the beauty of Mr. Pope's verse." See the letter of Dr. Blair in Boswell's Life of Johnson.

2633. INDIAN LEGEND.

The lately published poem of C. F. Hoffman, Esq., entitled the Vigil of Faith, is founded on one of the most poetic legends of the Indians. The late number of Arcturus gives the following version of this fine tradition:—

Among the Adriondach Highlands, on an island in the Lake Inca-pah-chow, or Lindenmere, there dwelt a chieftain and his only daughter. The maid was not unvisited by love. Often would she, whether the night were fair or dark, cross to an opposite headland, to watch the camp light of her returning lover, whom the morrow's sun would bring again to her arms. There is rivalry in love, and treachery in Indian life. In those hours of absence, a rival tribesman suggested doubt and suspicion; another maiden, he said, shared the vows and the spoils of the huntsman.

She feared not, and believed not. The lover came, and the day of the bridal, and at eve the husband would bear her to his lodge, that they had prepared together in former days; when the foe appeared, and the life of the girl that detraction could not poison, nor fear wither, fell before his assassin knife. He slew the bride.

And now came the sad, slow hours of revenge. The bride had departed to the spirit land, and happy he who first leaves this earth to join her there. It was an Indian superstition, and death to both the lovers would have been a welcome gift. Neither feared destruction. Life was the curse they bore about with them as a charmed spell. The husband guarded the life of his enemy as if it were his dearest treasure; he made him his serf, according to the Indian law, which changed the penalty of death to degradation.

He hunted for him, he fed him, he watched over him, for the love of the dead maiden in the blessed isles of the Indian heaven, that she might walk and wander, and her steps never be crossed by the shade of her murderer. So solemnly was his existence bound to cherish his direst foe, and death and its dark bourn of punishment were mysteriously foreshadowed in life and on the earth.

A wilder or a more beautiful legend we never met with. Filled to overflowing must have been the heart of the old Indian, as every footstep of his life was directed by his spiritual bride in heaven—a strange love, that could turn hate into kindness, and make the happiest blessing the direst revenge.

2634. DUNGEON COMPOSITIONS.

It was behind the bars of a gloomy window in the Tower, where "every hour appeared to be a hundred winters," that Chaucer, recent from exile, and sore from persecution, was reminded of a work popular in those days, and which had been composed in a dungeon,—the Consolations of Philosophy, by Boethius—and which he himself had formerly translated. He composed his Testament of Love, substituting for the severity of an abstract being the more genial inspiration of love itself. But the fiction was a reality, and the griefs were deeper than the fancies.

In this chronicle of the heart the poet moans over "the delicious hours he was wont to enjoy," of his "richesse," and now of his destitution—the vain regret of his abused confidence—the treachery of all that "summer brood" who never approach the lost friend in "the winter hour" of an iron solitude. The poet energetically describes his condition: there he sat, "witless, thoughtful; and sightless, looking." This work the poet has composed in prose; but in the leisure of a prison the diction became more poetical in thoughts and in words than the language at that time had yet attained to, and for those who read the black letter, it still retains its impressive eloquence.

2635. ORIGIN OF JOAN OF ARC.

Mr. Southey, the poet laureate, gives the following origin of the publication of his poem of Joan of Arc:—

"Towards the close of the year 1794, the poem was announced to be published by subscription, in a quarto volume, at one pound one shilling. Soon afterwards, I became acquainted with my fellow-townsmen, Joseph Cottle, who had just commenced business as a printer and bookseller in the city of Bristol. One evening I read to him part of the poem, without any thought of making a proposal concerning it, or expectation of receiving one. He offered me fifty guineas for the copyright, and fifty copies for my subscribers, which was more than the list amounted to; and the offer was accepted as readily as it was proposed.

"It rarely happens that a young author meets with a bookseller as inexperienced and as ardent as himself; and it would be still more extraordinary if such mutual indiscretion did not bring with it cause for regret to both. But this transaction was the commencement of an intimacy which has continued, without the slightest displeasure, to this day.

"At that time few books were printed in the country; and it was seldom indeed that a quarto volume issued from a provincial press. A fount of new types was ordered for what was intended to be the handsomest book that Bristol had ever yet sent forth; and when the paper arrived, and the printer was ready to commence his operations, nothing had been done towards preparing the poem for the press, except that a few verbal alterations had been made. I was not, however, without misgivings; and when the first proof-sheet was brought me, the more glaring faults of the composition stared me in the face.

"But the sight of a well-printed page, which was to be set off with all the advantages that fine-wove paper and hot pressing could impart, put me in spirits, and I went to work with good will. About half the first book was left in its original state; and the rest of the poem was recast and recomposed while the printing went on.

"This occupied six months. I corrected the concluding sheet of the poem, left the preface in the publisher's hands, and departed for Lisbon, by way of Corunna and Madrid."

2636. GOD SAVE THE KING.

It is said that the English national hymn, so called, God save the King, is of French origin, both the words and the music. In the memoirs of the Marquise de Crequy, published in 1844, and containing her souvenirs from 1710 to 1800, the original words are given in French, as sung in French before Louis XIV., when he entered the Chapel of St. Cyr. The words are as follows:—

*"Grand Dieu, Sauvez le Roi!
Grand Dieu, Venez le Roi!
Vive le Roi!
Qui toujours Glorieux
Louis Victorieux
Voyez vos ennemis
Toujours soumis!
Grand Dieu, Sauvez le Roi!
Grand Dieu, Venez le Roi!
Vive le Roi!"*

The words are said to have been written by Madame de Brinon, and the music by the famous Sully. It is also said that Handel, during a visit to Paris, got possession of the music, and on his return dedicated it to King George I. It must be rather galling for a loyal Englishman, while bursting his lungs in roaring "God save the Queen," and knocking the hats over the eyes of the refractory individuals who refuse to join him in his folly, to remember that he is glorifying his "Mrs. Cobourg" in a French song to French music.

2637. COWPER'S JOHN GILPIN.

It happened one afternoon, in those years when Cowper's accomplished friend Lady Austen made a part of his little evening circle, that she observed him sinking into increased dejection. It was her custom, on these occasions, to try all the resources of her sprightly powers for his immediate relief. She told him the story of John Gilpin, (which had been treasured in her memory from her childhood,) to dissipate the gloom of the passing hour. Its effects on the fancy of Cowper had the air of enchantment.

He informed her, the next morning, that convulsions of laughter, brought on by his recollection of her story, had kept him waking during the greatest part of the night, and that he had turned it into a ballad. So arose the pleasant poem of John Gilpin.

2638. COWPER'S TASK.

Cowper, like many other men of eminence, was often indebted to others for the subjects on which he wrote. Lady Austen was very fond of blank verse, and urged her friend to try his powers in that species of composition. At length he promised to do so if she would furnish him with a subject. She replied, "O, you can never be in want of a subject: you can write upon any: write upon this sofa." The poet obeyed her command, and produced the Task.

This poem, which thus arose from the lively repartee of familiar conversation, presents a variety, including almost every subject and every style, without the violation of order and harmony, while it breathes a spirit of the purest and most exalted morality.

2639. THE SENSITIVE POET.

Tasso's contradictory critics perplexed him with the most intricate literary discussions, and probably occasioned a mental alienation. We find, in one of his letters, that he repents the composition of his great poem; for although his own taste approved of the marvellous, which still forms the nobler part of its creation, yet he confesses that his critics have decided that the history of his hero, Godfrey, required another species of conduct. "Hence," cries the unhappy bard, "doubts vex me; but for the past, and what is done, I know of no remedy;" and he longs to precipitate the publication, that "he may be delivered from misery and agony." He solemnly swears that "did not the circumstances of my situation compel me, I would not print it, even, perhaps, during my life, I so much doubt of its success."

Such was that painful state of fear and doubt experienced by the author of, the Jerusalem Delivered, when he gave it to the world—a state of suspense, among the children of imagination, of which none are more liable to participate in than the too sensitive artist.

2640. LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL.

On the merest trifle often hinges the fortune of a whole future life; and had it not been for the accidental suggestion of the beautiful, accomplished, and truly amiable Countess of Dalkeith, Scott would certainly never have written his first metrical romance, and possibly never even dreamed of rising to high eminence as an author. She had heard the legend of the dwarf-demon, (Gilpin Horner,) and wished to have some verses written about him, probably thinking this would be an easy task; and her slightest wish was a law. But the dwarf was no very poetical personage.

He had made his appearance unexpectedly, it is true, had behaved capriciously, like Number Nip, frightened both grown people and children, shown the notable inclination for mischief which is customary with devils, and at last vanished as unexpectedly as he came; but all this was quite as well told in prose as in the best rhymes that ever were penned. In order to meet Lady Dalkeith's wishes, therefore, he must be introduced as an infernal agent in some plot of importance, which was yet to be devised.

Thus arose the Lay of the Last Minstrel, though the original idea of Gilpin soon became subordinate, and was lost in the superstructure.

Of the Last Minstrel, he wrote, at Lady Dalkeith's request, some opening stanzas, which he read to his friends, who, being, of course, utterly unconscious of the effects to which such a commencement might lead, received them with great coldness. The rule holds good—"Never show to fools or children a work half done."

Although he at first destroyed his production, and seemed to abandon the idea, yet there is no doubt he conceived the plan for an entire poem; for, when some friendly critics declared that the lines had dwelt on their remembrance, and that they wished he would go on with it, the work proceeded at the rate of about a canto in a week. Such rapidity was the natural effect of his vivid conception of character and situation, which carried him on without effort; so that the work proved as entertaining to the author in composition as to his admirers in perusal.

In the beautiful and quiet seclusion of Ashiestiel, the Lay of the Last Minstrel was completed. It appeared in 1805. Rapidly it spread his reputation, and the most inspiring encomiums poured in from all quarters. The description of Melrose Abbey, and the ballad of Rossabelle, were imprinted on the memory of every one not utterly unsusceptible of the charms of romantic poetry; and it was scarcely possible to visit any house where a copy of the expensive quarto, with its "rivulet of verse flowing through a meadow of margin," was not to be found on the drawing-room table.

2641. SCOTS WHA HAE WI' WALLACE BLED.

Perhaps no lyric has been more universally admired than Burns's beautiful little poem commencing,

"Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled."

But it is not generally known that Burns, by the advice of some friends, was induced to suppress the first two stanzas, as they stood in the poet's manuscript. We very much regret that the poem was not printed entire, for we think the poet's talent far surpassed the critic's taste. It stood thus in the original:—

"At Bannockburn the English lay;
The Scots they werna far away,
But waited for the break o' day,
That glinted in the east.

"But the sun broke through the heath,
And lighted up that field of death;
When Bruce, wi' saul-inspiring breath,
His heralds thus addressed:—

"Scots, wha hae," &c.

2642. ORIGIN OF PARADISE REGAINED.

Thomas Ellwood, an intelligent and learned Quaker, who was honored by the intimate friendship of Milton used to read to him various authors in the learned languages, and thus contributed as well to his own improvement as to solace the dark hours of the poet when he had lost his sight.

"The curious ear of John Milton," said Ellwood, in his own life, "could discover, by the tone of my voice, when I did not clearly understand what I read, and open the difficult passages."

Milton lent Ellwood the manuscript of Paradise Lost to read. When he returned it, Milton asked him how he liked it. "I like it much," said the judicious Quaker: "thou hast written well, and said much of Paradise Lost;" but what hast thou to say of Paradise Found? Milton made no answer, but sat musing for some time.

When business afterwards drew Ellwood to London, he called on Milton, who showed him the poem of Paradise Regained; and in a pleasant tone said to his friend, "This is owing to you; for you put it into my head by the question you asked me at Charlfont, which before I had not thought of."

2643. THOMSON'S WINTER.

Many writers of popular name have been indebted to casual circumstances for their elevated distinction. When Thomson produced his Winter, the best of his Seasons, the poem lay like waste paper in the shop of the bookseller, and to the great mortification of the author. At last Mr. Mitchell, a gentleman of taste and rank, having read the piece with pleasure, took it in his pocket, read passages from it in all companies where he visited, and in a few days the whole impression being disposed of, the poet was enabled to complete his design.

2644. SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER.

An amusing adventure, which occurred in Goldsmith's last journey from home to Edgeworthstown school, is believed to have given birth to the chief incident in She Stoops to Conquer. Having set off on horseback, — there being then, and, indeed, now, no regular wheeled conveyance thither from Ballymahon, — he loitered on the road, amusing himself by viewing the neighboring gentlemen's seats. A friend had furnished him with a guinea, and the desire, perhaps, of spending it in (to a schoolboy) the most independent manner at an inn, tended to slacken his diligence on the road.

Night overtook him in the small town of Ardagh, about half way on his journey. Inquiring for the best house in the place, meaning the best inn, he chanced to address, as is said, a person named Cornelius Kelly, who boasted of having taught fencing to the Marquis of Granby, and was then domesticated in the house of Mr. Featherstone, a gentleman of fortune in the town. He was known as a notorious wag, and, willing to play off a trick upon one whom he, no doubt, discovered to be a swaggering schoolboy, directed him to the house of his patron.

Suspecting no deception, Oliver proceeded as directed; gave authoritative orders about the care of his horse; and, being thence conceived by the servants to be an expected guest, was ushered into the presence of their master, who immediately discovered the mistake. Being, however, a man of humor, and willing to enjoy an evening's amusement with a boy under the influence of so unusual a blunder, he encouraged it, particularly when, by the communicative disposition of the guest, it was found that he was the son of an old acquaintance, on his way to school.

Nothing occurred to undeceive the self-importance of the youth, fortified by the possession of a sum he did not often possess; wine was therefore ordered, in addition to a good supper, and the supposed landlord, his wife and daughters were invited to partake of it.

On retiring for the night, a hot cake was ordered for breakfast the following morning; nor was it until preparing to quit the house next day, that he discovered he had been entertained in a private family.

§ 251. POETICAL CURIOSITIES.

2645. THE FIRST POET LAUREATE.

The first mention of the king's poet, under the appellation of laureate, was John Kay, who was appointed poet laureate to Edward IV. It is extraordinary that he should have left no pieces of poetry to prove his pretensions in some degree to this office, with which he is said to have been invested by the king, at his return from Italy.

The only composition he has left to posterity is a prose English translation of a Latin history of the siege of Rhodes. In the dedication, addressed to King Edward, — or rather in the title, — he styles himself "hys humble poete laureate." Although this our laureate furnishes us with no materials as a poet, yet his office, which here occurs for the first time under this denomination, must not pass unnoticed in the annals of literature.

2646. THE POETICAL GARLAND.

The beautiful Julia d'Angennes was in the flower of her youth and fame, when the celebrated Gustavus, king of Sweden, was making war in Germany with the most splendid success. Julia expressed her warm admiration of this hero. She had his portrait placed on her toilet, and took pleasure in declaring that she would have no other lover than Gustavus. The Duke de Montausier was, however, her avowed and ardent admirer. A short time after the death of Gustavus, he sent her, as a new year's gift, the Poetical Garland, of which the following is a description: —

The most beautiful flowers were painted in miniature by an eminent artist, one Robert, on pieces of vellum, all of an equal size. Under every flower a sufficient space was left open for a madrigal on the subject of that flower there painted. The duke solicited the wits of the time to assist in the composition of these little poems, reserving a considerable number for the effusions of his own amorous muse. Under every flower he had his madrigal written by a penman, N. du Jarry, who was celebrated for beautiful writing. It is decorated by a frontispiece, which represents a splendid garland composed of these twenty-nine flowers; and on turning the page a Cupid is painted.

These were magnificently bound, and enclosed in a bag of rich Spanish leather. This gift, when Julia awoke on new year's day, she found lying on her toilet; it was one quite to her taste, and successful to the donor's hopes.

At the sale of the library of the Duke de la Valiere, in 1784, among its numerous literary curiosities, this garland appeared. It was actually sold for the extravagant sum of fourteen thousand five hundred and ten livres; though in 1770, at Gaignat's sale, it only cost seven hundred and eighty livres. It is described "a manuscript on vellum, composed of twenty-nine flowers painted by one Robert, under which are inserted madrigals by various authors."

2647. AN UNLETTERED POET.

Among the literary productions called forth by the death of the celebrated Whitefield, was an elegiac poem, written by an African girl, a slave, belonging to Mr. J. Wheatly, of Boston. Her name was Phillis, and she was only seventeen years of age, and had been but nine years in the country at the time of writing the poem. The following lines are from the poem :—

"He leaves this earth for heaven's unmeasured height;
And worlds unknown receive him from our sight.
There Whitefield wings with rapid course his way,
And sails to Zion through vast seas of day."

2648. THE PLOUGHMAN.

The following line, from Gray: "The ploughman homeward plods his weary way," has been found to admit of the eleven following transpositions, without destroying the rhyme or altering the sense :—

The weary ploughman plods his homeward way.
The weary ploughman homeward plods his way.
The ploughman, weary, plods his homeward way.
The ploughman, weary, homeward plods his way.
Weary the ploughman plods his homeward way.
Weary the ploughman homeward plods his way.
Homeward the ploughman plods his weary way.
Homeward the weary ploughman plods his way.
Homeward the ploughman, weary, plods his way.
The homeward ploughman weary plods his way.
The homeward ploughman plods his weary way.

§ 252. AFFECTING INCIDENTS.

2649. THOMSON'S AMANDA

James Thomson.

Every one will recollect the Amanda, whom Thomson introduces as the companion of his rural walks, in the following lines, in which the poet and the lover are equally happy :—

"And thou, Amanda, come, pride of my song,
Formed by the Graces, loveliness itself!
Come with those downcast eyes, sedate and sweet,
Those looks demure, that deeply pierce the soul,
Where, with the light of thoughtful reason mixed,
Sits lively Fancy, and the feeling Muse!"

This lady herself encouraged the addresses of Thomson; but the prejudices of her mother were not to be overcome. "What!" she would say, "shall my daughter marry a poet?"

She was at breakfast with her one morning, when a gentleman came in who was acquainted with their connections. On their inquiring the news of the day, he answered, "Mr. Thomson is dead." "What Thomson?" inquired Amanda. "The poet, madam," he replied. The presence of her mother no longer awed her. She fainted away.

Amanda, however, though the lover of a poet, does not appear to have been too romantic, and was for many years after the happy wife of a gallant admiral, who survived her.

2650. CAMOENS.

When the celebrated poet of Portugal found it prudent to banish himself from his native country, he sailed for India with a resolution never to return. As the ship left the Tagus, he exclaimed, in the words of the sepulchral monument on Scipio Africanus, "Ingrata patria, non possidebis ossa mea," (Ungrateful country, thou shalt not possess my bones.) He then little knew what evils in the East would awaken the remembrance of his native fields.

After various adventures, Camoens set sail in a ship, freighted by himself, from Macao for Goa, but was shipwrecked in the gulf near the mouth of the River Mecon, in Cochin China. All he had acquired was lost in the waves: his poems, which he held in one hand, while he saved himself with the other, were all he found himself possessed of when he stood friendless on the unknown shore.

But the natives gave him a most humane reception; and he has immortalized them in the prophetic song in the tenth Lusiad. Having named the Mecon, he thus proceeds :—

"Este recebera placido, e brando," &c.

"On his gentle, hospitable bosom shall he receive the song, wet from woful, unhappy shipwreck, escaped from destroying tempests, from ravenous dangers, the effect of the unjust sentence upon him, whose lyre shall be more renowned than enriched."

2651. GRAHAME AND HIS SABBATH.

There is a beautiful anecdote told of Grahame, the Scottish poet, in connection with his Sabbath. He had composed the poem, and sent it to the press unknown to his wife. When it was issued, he brought her a copy, and requested her to read it. As his name was not prefixed to the work, she did not dream that he had any thing to do with it. As she went on reading, the sensitive author walked up and down the room. At length she broke out in praise of the poem, and turning to him, said, "Ah, James, if you could but produce a poem like this!" Judge, then, of her delighted surprise when she found he was the author. The effect upon her, it is said, was almost overwhelming.

2652. THE INFIDEL RECLAIMED.

The following passage occurs in the Memoirs of Mrs. Hemans:

"It was about this time that a circumstance occurred, by which Mrs. Hemans was greatly affected and impressed. A stranger one day called at her house, and begged earnestly to see her. She was then just recovering from one of her frequent illnesses, and was obliged to decline the visits of all but her immediate friends. The applicant was, therefore, told that she was unable to receive him; but he persisted in entreating for a few minutes' audience with such urgent importunity, that at last the point was conceded.

"The moment he was admitted, the gentleman (for such his manner and appearance declared him to be) explained, in words and tones of the deepest feeling, that the object of his visit was to acknowledge a debt of obligation which he could not rest satisfied without avowing—that to her he owed, in the first instance, that faith and those hopes which were now more precious to him than life itself; for that it was by reading her poem of the Sceptic he had been first awakened from the miserable delusions of infidelity, and induced to 'search the Scriptures.' Having poured forth his thanks and benedictions in an uncontrollable gush of emotion, this strange but interesting visitant took his departure, leaving her overwhelmed with a mingled sense of joyful gratitude and wondering humility."

2653. POPE'S THREE NARROW ESCAPES.

Mr. Pope's life, that was so valuable to the world, was in danger several times, and the first so early as when he was a child in coats. A wild cow, that was driven by the place where he was at play, struck at him with her horns, tore off his hat, wounded him in the throat, beat him down, and trampled over him.

His second escape was when he was about two and twenty. He was travelling in a coach by night, and with a coachman that did not know the road so well as he should have done. They were to cross the Thames, and the coachman drove into the water; but, after they were a little way in, the horses stopping could not make them stir a foot on. Some passengers, that happened to come by just in the height of his endeavoring to force them to go on, called to the man, and told him that his horses had more sense than himself; that the Thames was not fordable there; that they were just on the brink of a hole twice as deep as the coach; and that, if they had proceeded a step farther, they must all have been lost. So he drew back, and got out of the river again; and they were very glad to lie at a little ale-house on the bank they had just quitted.

His third danger was in a coach, too, with six spirited horses. They took fright, ran away, and overturned the coach, with him only in it, into a ditch full of water. He was almost suffocated there, and broke the glass with his hand to let in the air; but, as the coach sunk deeper, the water gained very fast upon him, and he was taken out but just time enough to save him from being drowned.

2654. THOMSON AND QUIN.

Thomson, the poet, when he first came to London, was in very narrow circumstances, and was many times put to his shifts even for a dinner. Upon the publication of his Seasons, one of his creditors arrested him, thinking that a proper opportunity to get his money.

The report of this misfortune reached the ears of Quin, who had read the Seasons, but never seen their author; and he was told that Thomson was in a sponging-house in Holborn. Thither Quin went, and being admitted into his chamber, "Sir," said he, "you don't know me, but my name is Quin." Thomson said, that though he could not boast of the honor of a personal acquaintance, he was no stranger either to his name or his merit, and invited him to sit down. Quin then told him he was come to sup with him, and that he had already ordered the cook to provide supper, which he hoped he would excuse.

When supper was over, and the glass had gone briskly about, Mr. Quin told him it was "now time to enter upon business." Thomson declared he was ready to serve him as far as his capacity would reach, in any thing he should command, (thinking he was come about some affair relating to the drama.) "Sir," says Quin, "you mistake me. I am in your debt. I owe you a hundred pounds, and I am come to pay you."

Thomson, with a disconsolate air, replied, that, as he was a gentleman whom he had never offended, he wondered he should seek an opportunity to trifle with his misfortunes. "No," said Quin, raising his voice, "I say I owe you a hundred pounds, and there it is;" and, suiting the action to the word, immediately laid a bank note of that value before him.

Thomson, astonished, begged he would explain himself. "Why," says Quin, "I will tell you. Soon after I had read your Seasons, I took it into my head, that, as I had something to leave behind me when I died, I would make my will. Among the rest of my legatees, I set down the author of the Seasons for a hundred pounds; and, this day hearing that you were in this house, I thought I might as well have the pleasure of paying the money myself, as order my executors to pay it, when perhaps you might have less need of it; and this, Mr. Thomson, is my business."

2655. ARABIAN LOVE OF POETRY.

There is nothing so remarkable in the character of the Arabians as their love of poetry. It is nearly universal among them. A talent for making verses was reckoned by them a qualification equal to the greatest military capacity. The Abbé de Marigny, in his History of the Arabians, furnishes us with the following anecdotes of the caliph Moawiyah:—

"An Arabian robber, being condemned to have his hand cut off, was brought before Moawiyah, in order that the sentence might be confirmed. The criminal, being in the caliph's presence, and reflecting on his great love of poetry, made and repeated four very ingenious and beautiful verses on the spot, with which Moawiyah was so highly pleased, that he immediately pardoned the Arabian, and ordered him to be set at liberty."

"The great fondness which Moawiyah had for poetry also enabled a young Arabian to obtain a speedy redress for a severe injury committed against him by the governor of Cufah, in forcibly taking from him his beautiful and beloved wife. The wretched husband came to make his complaint to the caliph, and expressed his grievance in so pathetic an elegy, that Moawiyah, both interested and delighted with the energetic softness and lively fancy of the young poet, protracted the determination of other business, that he might render him immediate justice. He sent an express to the governor, and commanded him to resign the woman without delay. In the mean time, he kept the husband at court, and treated him with the greatest respect."

"The governor returned a very extraordinary answer, which showed the excess of his passion. He informed the messenger, that if the caliph would permit him to retain her only twelve months, he would consent to have his head cut off at the end of that time; but the caliph rigidly insisted on her being given up, and she was brought before him.

"So extraordinary an event excited the caliph's curiosity. He was desirous of seeing a woman whose beauty was so much talked of. When she appeared, he found that her perfections had not been exaggerated, and that her charms were capable of inspiring love in the heart of every one who saw her. But when she spoke, her elegant manner and refined expressions were such, that he declared, notwithstanding the many embassies he had received and the various conversations he had held with the greatest men of his country, he never before heard such a torrent of eloquence as flowed from the lips of the charming Arabian."

"After a long conversation, with which the caliph was enraptured, he assumed a very serious tone, and asked her for which she had the greatest love, for the governor or her husband. The fair Arabian remained some time silent. Moawiyah thought she did not wish to answer the question, and was getting angry, when she, with a modesty becoming her sex, answered him in verse, full of fire and spirit, in which she expressed the greatest love and attachment to her husband, and begged she might be restored to him."

"What a prodigy of wit and beauty!" exclaimed the caliph in amazement; "how highly would my kingdom be honored, if you would please to share my throne! but since you are resolved to return to your husband and country, I will not prevent you. Go then, and if you would enjoy your husband without fear of some fresh misfortune, keep within doors; and if you must go out, let a thick veil cover your matchless charms from the eyes of men."

"The caliph then dismissed the happy pair, with large presents; and the young poet and his wife publicly acknowledged the many favors they had received from him."

§ 253. TRAITS OF CHARACTER.

2656. MRS. HEMANS.

In the following passage from Miss Jewsbury's Three Histories, she avowedly describes Mrs. Hemans:—

"Egeria was totally different from any other woman I had ever seen, either in Italy or in England. She did not dazzle; she subdued me. Other women might be more commanding, more versatile, more acute, but I never saw any one so exquisitely feminine. . . . Her birth, her education, but, above all, the genius with which she was gifted, combined to inspire a passion for the ethereal, the tender, the imaginative, the heroic, in one word, the beautiful. It was in her faculty divine, and yet of daily life; it touched all things, but, like a sunbeam, touched them with a golden finger."

"Any thing abstract or scientific was unintelligible or distasteful to her. Her knowledge was extensive and various; but, true to the first principle of her nature, it was poetry that she sought in history, scenery, character, and religious belief—poetry that guided all her studies, governed all her thoughts, colored all her imaginative conversation. Her nature was at once simple and profound; there was no room in her mind for philosophy, nor in her heart for ambition. The one was filled by imagination, the other engrossed by tenderness."

"She had a passive temper, but decided tastes; any one might influence, but very few impressed her. Her strength and her weakness lay alike in her affections: these would sometimes make her weep, at others imbue her with courage; so that she was, alternately, 'a falcon-hearted dove,' and a 'reed broken with the wind.' Her voice was a sweet, sad melody, and her spirits reminded me of an old poet's description of the orange-tree, with its

'Golden lamps, hid in a night of green,' or of those Spanish gardens where the pomegranate blossoms beside the cypress. Her gladness was like a burst of sunlight; and if in her sadness she resembled night, it was night wearing her stars. I might describe and describe forever, but I should never succeed in portraying Egeria. She was a Muse, a Græce, a variable child, a dependent woman, the Italy of human beings."

2657. COWLEY AND HIS MISFORTUNES.

Cowley, in an ode, had commemorated the genius of Brutus, with all the enthusiasm of a votary of liberty. After the king's return, when Cowley solicited some reward for his sufferings and services in the royal cause, the chancellor is said to have turned on him with a severe countenance, saying, "Mr. Cowley, your pardon is your reward."

It seems that the ode was then considered to be of a dangerous tendency among half the nation; Brutus would be the model of enthusiasts, who were sullenly bending their necks under the yoke of royalty. Charles II. feared the attempt of desperate men; and he might have forgiven Rochester a loose pasquinade, but not Cowley a solemn invocation.

This fact, then, is said to have been the true cause of the dependency so prevalent in the latter poetry of "the melancholy Cowley." And hence the indiscretion of the Muse, in a single flight, condemned her to a painful, rather than a voluntary, solitude, and made the poet complain of "barren praise" and "neglected verse."

No wonder, therefore, that he thus expresses himself in the preface to his Cutter of Coleman Street:—

"We are, therefore, wonderfully wise men, and have a fine business of it; we, who spend our time in poetry. I do sometimes laugh, and am often angry with myself, when I think on it; and if I had a son inclined to the same folly by nature, I believe I should bind him from it by the strictest conjurations of a parental blessing. For what can be more ridiculous than to labor to give men delight, whilst they labor, on their part, most earnestly, to take offence?"

And thus he closes the preface, in all the solemn expression of injured feelings: "This I do affirm, that from all which I have written, I never received the least benefit or the least advantage, but, on the contrary, have felt sometimes the effects of malice and misfortune."

2658. ADDISON'S COMPANIONS.

Addison's chief companions, before he married Lady Warwick, in 1716, were Steele, Budgell, Philips, Carey, Davenant, and Colonel Brett. He used to breakfast with one or other of them, at his lodgings in St. James's Place; dine at taverns with them; then to Button's; and then to some tavern again for supper in the evening: and this was then the usual round of his life.

2659. PERCIVAL, THE POET.

Dr. Percival is one of the most eccentric men in the world, and one of the most learned. He lived a long time in a garret—literally a garret, after the manner of the old poets—at New Haven, and had very few companions, save his books, cabinets, and herbariums. He reads with fluency ten languages, and is so familiar with the Latin, Greek, French, Spanish, German, and Italian, that he can take a work never before seen by him, in any of those languages, and read it in English with as much correctness and ease as he would one of his own poems.

For several years, he was engaged in making a geological survey of Connecticut; and his report was laid before the legislature of that state, when a proposal to give the copyright to the author, after a certain number of copies should be printed for the use of the state, was discussed. On this occasion, one of the members said, that "in his examination of our geology, Dr. Percival had been upon one side at least of every square mile in the state, except where river or lake had interrupted his progress. He had walked over every hill, plain, and morass in Connecticut, with his basket on his arm and his bag on his back; stopping at the farm-houses at night, and resuming his examination at early light."

He was engaged in this work for five years, and his salary never exceeded three hundred dollars per annum. The legislature of course adopted the proposal of giving to him the copyright. He is one of the poorest, as well as one of the most meritorious, of our authors.

2660. NIGHT THOUGHTS.

Dr. Young was fond of coffee in an afternoon; till, finding it prejudicial to his nerves, he intimated his intention of abstaining from it. His grandson, who was then a little boy, inquired into the particular motive that led him to this resolution. "My reason is," answered the doctor, "because it keeps me awake at night. I can't sleep for it." "Then I beg you, sir, not to leave off your coffee; otherwise you will give us no more Night Thoughts."

2661. ALAMANNI AND CHARLES V.

It is related of an Italian poet, (Alamanni,) that having, in his younger days, bitterly satirized the house of Austria; he found himself awkwardly situated in more advanced life, when, being in exile, and employed by Francis I., the king sent him on an embassy to the court of Charles V. One of his sarcasms in particular had been very offensive. Alluding to the Austrian crest, the two-headed eagle, he had described the imperial house as a monstrous creature,—

Which bore two beaks, the better to devour,
 ("Che per più divorar, due becchi porta.")

Charles had treasured this passage in his mind; and when the ambassador, perhaps forgetting it altogether, or trusting to its being forgotten, had terminated a fine oration, full of compliments to the power which he had so angrily painted, the emperor, without making any other observation, calmly said,

"Which bore two beaks, the better to devour."

"Sir," said Alamanni, not hesitating or betraying any confusion, which shows that he was either prepared for the rebuke, or was a man of great presence of mind, "when I wrote that passage, I spoke as a poet, to whom it is permitted to use fictions; but now I speak as an ambassador, who is bound to utter truth. I spoke then as a young man, but I now speak as a man advanced in years. I spoke as one who was agitated by grief and passion at the wretched condition of my country; but now I am calm and free from passion."

Charles rose from his seat, and laying his hand on the shoulder of the ambassador, said, in the kindest manner, that the loss of his country ought not to grieve him, since he had found such a patron in Francis; and that to an honest man every place was his country.

2662. MOORE.

Thomas Moore.

"Moore's forehead," says Leigh Hunt, "was bony and full of character, with 'bumps' of wit, large and radiant enough to transport a phrenologist. In this particular he strongly resembled Sterne. His eyes were as dark and fine as you would wish to see under a set of vine-leaves; his mouth generous and good-humored, with dimples; and his manner as bright as his talk, full of the wish to please and be pleased. He sang and played with great taste on the piano-forte, as might be supposed from his musical compositions. His voice, which was a little hoarse in speaking, — at least I used to think so, — softened into a breath, like that of the flute, when singing.

"In speaking he was emphatic in rolling the letter

r, perhaps out of a despair of being able to get rid of the national peculiarity. The structure of his versification, when I knew him, was more artificial than it was afterwards; and in his serious compositions it suited him better. He had hardly faith enough to give way to his impulses in writing, except when they were festive and witty; and artificial thoughts demand a similar embodiment. Both patriotism and personal experience, however, occasionally inspired him with lyric pathos; and in his naturally musical perception of the right principles of versification, he contemplated the fine, easy playing, muscular style of Dryden, with a sort of perilous pleasure. I remember his quoting with delight a couplet of Dryden's which came with a peculiar grace out of his mouth: —

'Let honor and preferment go for gold;
But glorious beauty isn't to be sold.'

"Besides the pleasure I took in Moore's society as a man of wit, I had a great esteem for him as a man of candor and independence. His letters were full of all that was pleasant in him. As I was a critic at that time, and in the habit of giving my opinion of his works in the Examiner, he would write me his opinion of the opinion, with a mixture of good humor, admission, and deprecation, so truly delightful, and a sincerity of criticism on my own writings so extraordinary for so courteous a man, though with abundance of balm and eulogy, that never any subtlety of compliment could surpass it."

2663. NOBLE REPLY.

When Bernard Tasso remonstrated with his son, the immortal Torquato, on his indiscreet preference of philosophy to jurisprudence, and angrily demanded, "What has philosophy done for you?" Torquato nobly replied, "It has taught me to bear with meekness the reproofs of a father."

2664. PRIVATE HABITS OF MILTON.

He arose at four in the morning; had some one to read the Bible to him for about half an hour; contemplated till seven; read and wrote until dinner; walked, or swung, and played music three or four hours; entertained visitors until eight; took a light supper; smoked his pipe; drank a glass of water, and went to bed. He never drank strong liquors, and seldom drank any thing at all between his meals.

2665. SOURCE OF BUTLER'S WIT.

The Earl of Dorset, having a great desire to pass an evening with Butler, as a private gentleman, prevailed upon a common friend, Mr. Shepherd, to introduce him into his company at a tavern, to which they both resorted. While the first bottle was being drunk, Butler appeared very flat and heavy; at the second bottle extremely brisk and lively, abounding in wit and learning, and making himself a most agreeable companion; when the third bottle was finished, he again sank into such stupidity and dullness, that hardly any body could have believed him to be the author of Hudibras.

The next day, the Earl of Dorset was asked his opinion of him: he answered, "He is like a nine-pin, little at both ends, but great in the middle."

2666. GOLDSMITH'S HABITS.

In the house he usually wore his shirt collar open, in the manner represented in the portrait by Sir Joshua. Occasionally he read much at night when in bed; at other times, when not disposed to read, and yet unable to sleep, which was not an unusual occurrence, the candle was kept burning, his mode of extinguishing which, when out of immediate reach, was characteristic of his fits of indolence or carelessness: he flung his slipper at it, which in the morning was in consequence usually found near the overturned candlestick, daubed with grease.

2667. POETIC INSPIRATION.

We hear much about "poetic inspiration," and the "poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling;" but Sir Joshua Reynolds gives an anecdote of Goldsmith, while engaged upon his poem, calculated to cure our notions about the ardor of composition.

Calling upon the poet one day, he opened the door without ceremony, and found him in the double occupation of turning a couplet and teaching a pet dog to sit upon his haunches. At one time he would glance his eye at his desk, and at another shake his finger at the dog to make him retain his position. The last lines on the page were still wet; they form a part of the description of Italy:—

"By sports like these are all their cares beguiled;
The sports of children satisfy the child."

Goldsmith, with his usual good humor, joined in the laugh caused by his whimsical employment, and acknowledged that his boyish sport with the dog suggested the stanza.

2668. MALHERBE.

It has been said that it was not without great application and labor that Malherbe produced his poetical performances. This is seen in the following passage in Balzac's Letters to Conrart:—

"At last it is finished; I mean the discourse which I mentioned to you in my last letter, and which is one of the five that I promised you. It has fatigued, it has exhausted me; though you may tell me, this is still to be more easily satisfied than was that honest man, whom I so often quote to you. He blotted half a ream of paper in making and retrenching one single stanza."

Balzac also tells us that Malherbe "said the most genteel things in the world; but he did not say them with a good grace, and he was the worst reciter of his age. He spoiled his fine verses in reading them: besides that, one could scarcely hear him for the impediment in his speech and the lowness of his voice. He spit at least six times in reciting a stanza of four lines; and it was this habit which caused the Cavalier Marin to say of him, that he had never seen so moist a man or so dry a poet."

2669. ANALYSIS OF CAMPBELL.

"They who knew Mr. Campbell," says Leigh Hunt, "only as the author of Gertrude of Wyoming, and the Pleasures of Hope, would not have suspected him to be a merry companion, overflowing with humor and anecdote, and any thing but fastidious.

"The Scotch poets have always something in reserve. It is the only point in which the major part of them resemble their countrymen. He was one of the few men whom I could at any time have walked half a dozen miles through the snow to spend an evening with.

"No man felt more kindly towards his fellow-creatures, or took less credit for it. When he indulged in doubt and sarcasm, and spoke contemptuously of things in general, he did it, partly, no doubt, out of actual dissatisfaction, but more perhaps than he suspected out of a fear of being thought weak and sensitive; which is a blind that the best men very commonly practise.

"When I first saw this eminent person, he gave me the idea of a French Virgil. I found him as handsome as the Abbé Delille is said to have been ugly. But he seemed to me to embody a Frenchman's ideal notion of the Latin poet; something a little more cut and dry than I had looked for; compact and elegant, critical and acute, with a consciousness of authorship upon him; a taste over-anxious not to commit itself, and refining and diminishing nature as in a drawing-room mirror.

"This fancy was strengthened, in the course of conversation, by his expatiating on the greatness of Racine. I think he had a volume of the French poet in his hand.

"His skull was sharply cut and fine, with a full share, according to the phrenologists, both of the reflective and amative organs; and his poetry will bear them out. His face and person were rather on a small scale; his features regular; his eye lively and penetrating; and when he spoke, dimples played about his mouth; which, nevertheless, had something restrained and close in it. Some gentle Puritan seemed to have crossed the breed, and to have left a stamp on his face, such as we often see in the female Scotch face, rather than the male."

2670. MILTON'S INSPIRATION.

John Milton.

Milton's third wife survived this inimitable poet in a state of widowhood nearly fifty-five years, dying at Nanpt, which was in her native Cheshire, about the year 1729. She related that her husband, then completely blind, composed principally in the winter, and, on his waking in the morning, would make her write down sometimes twenty or thirty verses.

On being asked whether he did not frequently read Homer and Virgil, she replied, that "he stole from nobody, but that the Muse inspired him." To a lady who inquired who the Muse was, she answered, "It was God's grace and the Holy Spirit that visited him nightly."

2671. SAMUEL ROGERS.

A writer in the Boston Atlas of 1845 says, "Samuel Rogers is an exception to the almost general rule that authors are poor. And who has not, at some time or other, heard of the author of Pleasures of Memory? He is not gifted, as Byron was, with beauty of person; so far from it, he is the very opposite of 'good looking,' as it is termed; but he is rich—a very Cæsus. A London banker, he can draw checks alike on the Bank of England and on the treasury of the Muses; and, what is better, find each duly honored. He has an exquisite taste, and possesses abundantly the means of gratifying it. Art lays her tributes at his feet, and Genius is at his beck and call. For him Science labors, and at his bidding Music pours forth its melodious offerings. He possesses the magic talisman MONEY—which, like the slave of the lamp, in the Arabian tale, fulfils all his requirements, and surrounds him with all that heart can wish. Verily, if wealth, taste, and refinement can confer happiness on mortals, Samuel Rogers must be a satisfied man.

"About six years ago, while on a visit to some friends in London, I spent a day with Coleridge, who then resided with Mr. Gilman, at Highgate. While there, the poet received a note from Mr. Rogers, inviting him to breakfast, in St. James's Place, on the following morning. Coleridge, knowing that it would gratify me to accompany him, very kindly asked me to do so, saying that he could take the liberty of introducing a friend, and I agreed to go.

"On the following morning, for a wonder, Mr. Coleridge called for me at the time he had appointed, and we proceeded together in a hack carriage to St. James's Place. Mr. Rogers himself received us, and as none of the other invited guests had arrived, I had a favorable opportunity of observing the venerable poet.

"I had anticipated seeing what is termed a plain face, but I had not pictured to myself one so unpoetical as Rogers's. Byron's lines on it, ill-natured and uncalled for as they were, were at least pictorially true to nature. There was recently published in the Pictorial Times, or London Illustrated News, I forget which, a sketch of him, taken at the National Gallery, in the act of examining a painting.

"That likeness is correct in every respect. The sunken eye, shrivelled nose, toothless jaws, and retracted lips are to the life. But though time has been busy with the poet's mortal part, he has not interfered with the jewel it contains. That remains undimmed, and although it emits fewer rays than of yore, its capability of doing so is not destroyed.

"The poet is of middle stature, and unbowed by age. Indeed, in his motions he is, to use a common but expressive figure, 'as brisk as a boy.' Nothing on earth is more delightful, I think, than a cheerful, intelligent old man. And such is Samuel Rogers. He, indeed, possesses all 'the pleasures of memory,' and has had the rare good fortune to live and experience what he sang about years and years ago.

"His conversation was lively and piquant, but did not exhibit any of those sallies of wit which are so often attributed to him in the newspapers, under the head of 'Sam Rogers's last,' &c. To Coleridge's observations he was profoundly attentive; but the great conversationalist was not in a very talking humor, and I was rather glad of it, as it gave me a better opportunity of using my eyes than I should have had, had his words fallen on my charmed ear.

"Mr. Rogers received me very kindly, without an introduction; for Coleridge, with his usual absence of mind, or rather utter disregard of all the minor courtesies and usages of society, neglected to present me to Mr. Rogers, until the latter looked very hard at me, and I reminded Coleridge that he had a companion.

"What a magnificent room was that library of Rogers's! There were paintings from the hands of the best ancient and modern masters, in gorgeous frames; portfolios of the choicest and rarest prints; water color drawings, by every artist of celebrity of past and present times; rare specimens of virtu, which would have thrown the proprietor of Strawberry Hill into a very flutter of excitement; busts, some brown with age, and others in all the brilliant modern whiteness of Carrara marble; costly gems and princely intaglios; books curious in their old literal board covers, with ancient silver clasps and venerable letters; manuscripts so precious from time, and in consequence of the labor which had been bestowed on them by gray monks, in solemn old cells, ages since, that they were shrined in crystal cases.

"There was a large piece of amber, in which was a fly enclosed, perfect and un mutilated, leaving us to wonder how it got there, and achieved its transparent immortality. Sidney Smith, once taking it up, said, 'Perhaps it buzzed in Adam's ear.' And there were vases of exquisite form and workmanship—relics from Pompeii and from far away Ind; and all so tastefully disposed that no museum effect was produced, nor did any one object obtrude itself so as to detract from the apparent value to the impression produced by another.

"On a pedestal was a bust of Pope, modelled, at least so far as a part of the drapery was concerned, by the artist (Roubilliac, I believe) in the presence of Mr. Rogers. But there were two objects in the room which, more than any others, engrossed my attention: the one represented the enormous wealth of its possessor, and the other indicated his keen appreciation of the value of mind.

"These articles were simply two small pieces of paper, in gold frames. One of them was a Bank of England note for one million pounds sterling, and the other the original receipt of John Milton for five pounds, (the sum he received for the copy-right of Paradise Lost, from Simmonds, the bookseller.) The bank note was one of the only four which were ever struck from a plate, which was afterwards destroyed. The Rothschilds have one impression; the late Mr. Coutts had another; the Bank of England the third; and, as I have said, Mr. Rogers decorates his parlor with the remaining one.

"There it hangs, within any one's reach; a fortune for many, but valueless to all excepting its owner. No one would think of stealing it, for it would be only as so much waste paper. It never could be negotiated without detection, and, were it destroyed by fire, from its peculiar character, no loss would ensue to Mr. Rogers. At his word, however, it might be transformed into a golden shower. He, alone, is the magician who can render it all-powerful for good or evil."

§ 254. POETICAL RELICS AND ANTIQUITIES.

2672. THE PORTRAIT OF DANTE.

When Mr. R. H. Wilde, of Georgia, was in Tuscany in 184—, he occupied himself with researches respecting the private life of Tasso.

While occupied upon this work, he incidentally learnt from Signor Carlo Liverati, that there once and probably still existed in the Bargello, anciently both the prison and palace of the republic, an authentic portrait of Dante. It was believed to be in fresco, on a wall which afterwards, by some strange neglect or inadvertency, had been covered with whitewash.

Afterwards, in perusing the notes of the late learned Canonico Moreri on Filelfo's Life of Dante, Mr. Wilde found it stated that a portrait of the poet by Giotto was formerly to be seen in the Bargello; and prosecuting the subject with his usual energy and sagacity, he soon satisfied himself, by reference to Vasari, and to the still more ancient and decisive authority of Filippo Villari, who lived shortly after the poet, that Giotto, the friend and contemporary of Dante, did undoubtedly paint his likeness in the place indicated.

Mr. Wilde now revolved in his own mind the possibility that this precious relic might remain undestroyed under its coat of whitewash, and might yet be restored to the world. For a moment he felt an impulse to undertake the enterprise, but feared that, in a foreigner, from a new world, any part of which is unrepresented at the Tuscan court, it might appear like an intrusion.

He soon, however, found a zealous coadjutor, Giovanni Aubrey Bezzi, and through his aid a formal memorial was addressed to the grand duke.

Success attended the effort. Signor Marini, a skilful artist, who had succeeded in similar operations, was now employed to remove the whitewash by a process of his own, by which any fresco painting that might exist beneath would be protected from injury. He set to work patiently and cautiously. In a short time he met with evidence of the existence of the fresco. From under the coat of whitewash the head of an angel gradually made its appearance, and was pronounced to be by the pencil of Giotto.

The enterprise was now prosecuted with increased ardor. Several months were expended on the task, and three sides of the chapel wall were uncovered: they were all painted in fresco by Giotto, with the history of Magdalen, exhibiting her conversion, her penance, and her beatification. The figures, however, were all those of saints and angels; no historical portraits had yet been discovered, and doubts began to be entertained whether there were any.

At length, on the uncovering of the fourth wall, the undertaking was crowned with complete success. A number of historical figures were brought to light, and among them the undoubted likeness of Dante. He was represented in full length, in the garb of the time, with a book under his arm,—designed most probably to represent the Vita Nuova, for the Commedia was not yet composed,—and to all appearance from thirty to thirty-five years of age.

The face was in profile, and in excellent preservation, excepting that at some former period a nail unfortunately had been driven into the eye. The outline of the eyelid was perfect, so that the injury could easily be remedied. The countenance was extremely handsome, yet bore a strong resemblance to the portraits of the poet taken later in life.

It is not easy to appreciate the delight of Mr. Wilde and his coadjutors at this triumphant result of their researches; nor the sensation produced, not merely in Florence, but throughout Italy, by this discovery of a veritable portrait of Dante, in the prime of his days. It was a sensation something like what would be produced in England by the sudden discovery of a perfectly well authenticated likeness of Shakspeare, with a difference in intensity proportioned to the superior sensitiveness of the Italians.

2673. RELICS OF IZAAK WALTON.

Flatman's beautiful lines to Walton, (says Mr. Jesse,) commencing,—

"Happy old man, whose worth all mankind knows Except himself,"—

have always struck us as conveying a true picture of Walton's character, and of the estimation in which he was held after the appearance of his Angler.

The last male descendant of our "honest father," the Rev. Dr. Herbert Hawes, died in 1839. He very liberally bequeathed the beautiful painting of Walton, by Houseman to the National Gallery; and it is a curious fact, as showing the estimation in which anything connected with Walton is held in the present day, that the lord of the manor in which Dr. Hawes resided laid claim to this portrait as a heriot, though not successfully.

Izaak Walton.

Dr. Hawes also bequeathed the greater portion of his library to the dean and chapter of Salisbury; and his executor and friend presented the celebrated prayer book, which was Walton's, to Mr. Pickering, the publisher. The watch which belonged to Walton's connection, the excellent Bishop Ken, has been presented to his amiable biographer, the Rev. W. Lisle Bowles.

Walton died at the house of his son-in-law, Dr. Hawkins, at Winchester. He was buried in Winchester Cathedral, in the south aisle, called Prior Silkstead's Chapel. A large black marble slab is placed over his remains; and, to use the poetical language of Mr. Bowles, "the morning sunshine falls directly on it, reminding the contemplative man of the mornings when he was, for so many years, up and abroad with his angle, on the banks of the neighboring stream."

2674. CURIOUS TITLE.

The title which George Gascoigne, who had great merit in his day, has given to his collection, may be considered a specimen of the titles of his times. They were printed in 1576. He calls it A Hundred Sundrie Flowres bounde vp in one small Poesie: gathered partly by translation in the fyne and outlandish gardens of Euripides, Ovid, Petrarke, Ariosto and others; and partly by invention out of our own fruitfull orchardes in Englande; yielding sundrie sweet savours of tragicall, comicall, and morall discourses, both pleasaunt and profitable to the well-smelling noses of learned readers.

2675. THE FIRST POETIC EFFUSION ON AMERICAN SOIL.

The Bangor Whig, in 1850, gave the following statement, as derived from the archives of the ancient Historical Society in Boston:—

"The first poetic effusion ever produced on American soil originated in a circumstance which was handsomely explained by one of the full bloods of the Jibawa, or, as we call them, Chippewas. All those who have witnessed the performances of the Indians of the far west, recently in our city, must recollect the cradle, and the mode in which the Indians bring up their children.

"Soon after our forefathers landed at Plymouth, some of the young people went out into a field where Indian women were picking strawberries, and observed several cradles hung upon the boughs of trees, with the infants fastened into them—a novel and curious sight to any European. A gentle breeze sprang up, which waved the cradle to and fro. A young man, one of the party, peeled off a piece of birch bark, and upon the spot wrote the following lines, which have been repeated thousands of times, by thousands of American mothers, very few of whom ever knew or cared for its origin:—

'Lullaby, baby, upon the tree top;
When the wind blows the cradle will rock;
When the bough breaks the cradle will fall,
And down comes lullaby, baby, and all.'

2676. DUTCH POETRY.

The Carrier's Address of the Albany Dutchman contains the following highly poetic strain. It reminds us of the printer who, having the misfortune to pi his form, hastily gathered up the scattered types, and filling up the columns with the mysterious-looking compound, gravely informed his readers that it was the contents of the Dutch mail, which arrived too late for translation. We recommend the reading of the lines as an exercise for the jaws.

"Where be the Dutchmen of the olden time,
Who saw our ancient city in its prime?
The Bleekers, Brinckerhoffs, Van Hornes, and Dyckmans,
Van Hoots Van Rummals Vandermals and Dyckmans

the Vander epiques, Vander noods, and Croppers.
Van Benthuyssens, Van Sandtforde, and Van Deusens;
The Varra Vangers, Schermerhorne, Van Heusens;
The Vander Voorts, Van Rippers, and Dycks;
The Vanderheydens, Slingerlands, Ten Eycks;
The Knickerbockers, Lansings, and Van Burens,
Van Dams, Van Winkles, Suyvesants, Van Kewrens;
The Hoffmans, Rosbooms, Hogebooms, and Schroders,
Van Valkenburghs, and Stovenburghs, and Schneiders,
Van Schaacks, Van Vechten, Vischers, and Van Wises,
Van Tromps, Van Schoonhovens, and Vanderzees,
Van Zandts, Van Claroms, Schuylers, Van Schellynes,
Douws, Hooglands, Waldrons, Vanderburghs, and Fruyns,
De Witts, Hochstrasses, Bontecous, Van Glesons,
Van Gaasbecks, Grosbecks, Bensons, and Van Hiesons;
Where are they all, those men of sounding name,
Of pipe, knee-breeches and round bellied frame?"

2677. CURIOUS DISCOVERY.

A curious literary discovery, connected with Burns, has just been announced, says the Spectator. It is stated that there is manuscript evidence to show that much of the good poetry in the Scotch hymns and paraphrases owes its existence to the emendations of the Ayrshire bard. Hitherto the corrections on those compositions have been ascribed to Logan, a minister of South Leith, and author of Runnymede, a tragedy, and of the posthumous sermons which bear his name.

In collections of poetry he is named as the author of Ode to the Cuckoo; but even of this honor his memory is about to be deprived, for that ode, as well as other pieces of which he obtained the credit, is now said to have been written by Michael Bruce, well known as the author of the verses entitled Spring. It is curious, if true, that the people of Scotland should all this time have been singing Burns in their devotions, without a suspicion of the fact.

§ 255. INTERVIEWS WITH POETS.

2678. MRS. HEMANS AT HOME.

Rhyllon, the Residence of Mrs. Hemans in Wales.

A traveller who called on Mrs. Hemans, at Waver-tree, in 183-, gives us some pleasing items. "After some conversation in the parlor," he says, "Mrs. H. proposed a visit to her study.

"Come," said she, "I will show you my poetic mint; and she led the way to a room over the one in which we were sitting. It was a very small place, but neat almost to a fault. There were no author litterings. Every thing was in order. An open letter lay on the table. She pointed to it, and said, laughingly,—

"An application for my autograph, and the postage unpaid. You cannot imagine how I am annoyed with albums and such matters. A person who ought to have known better sent me an album lately, and begged a piece from me, if it were only long enough to fill up a page of sky-blue tinted paper, which he had selected for me to write upon."

"In incidentally referring to her compositions, she said, 'They often remain chiming in my mind for days, before I commit them to paper; and sometimes I quite forget many, which I compose as I lie awake in bed. Composition is less a labor with me than the act of writing down what has impressed me, excepting in the case of blank verse, which always involves something like labor. My thoughts have been so used to go in the harness of rhyme, that when they are suffered to run without it, they are often diffused, or I lose sight, in the ardor of composition, of the leading idea altogether.'

"Mrs. Hemans's voice was peculiarly musical, and I would have given any thing to have heard her recite some of her own poetry; but I did not dare to hazard such a request; and feeling that I had intruded quite long enough on her time, I intimated my intention of taking my departure, when she begged me to partake of some refreshment.

"I must not omit to mention, for the especial benefit of my fair readers, that Mrs. Hemans's dress was simple enough. She wore a white gown, (I am really not learned enough in such matters to say whether it was of cotton or muslin,) over which was thrown a black lace shawl; on her head was a cap of very open network, without flowers or ornament of any kind."

2679. VISIT TO BERANGER.

"After being eight or ten days in Paris," says a recent traveller, "I wrote a note to Beranger, stating that I had attempted the translation of part of his works into English, and would feel honored by having an interview accorded me when it might answer his convenience to grant it. The return of post brought me a polite reply, appointing the following Monday at ten o'clock for the meeting.

"At the appointed time I appeared before the residence of the poet. My summons at the door was answered by an elderly servant maid, who, on my desiring to see Beranger, told me to follow her up stairs, which I did; catching a glimpse, as I crossed the lobby, of a well-arranged flower garden behind the house. On reaching the top of the uppermost stair, she opened a door, and said, politely, 'Entrez, monsieur, s'il vous plait,' when I at once found myself in the presence of the French bard.

"He rose to receive me, on my entrance, with the politeness so natural to his nation, and at the same time with a degree of pleasant jocularly, well calculated to put a stranger at his ease, and begged me to be seated on the easy chair which he had just left.

"When I wished to take another seat, Beranger intercepted me, placed his hands on my shoulder, and pressed me back into his own, replying laughingly to the acknowledgment of the honor he had done me in granting me the interview, 'Ah, my dear sir, don't speak of it; there's little enough honor in being received by a poor fellow of an old bachelor like me; sit down, then, I beg of you.' This was, of course, said in French, in which language all our conversation was conducted, as he scarcely understands a word of English.

"He then drew his seat close in front of mine, with so good-natured a look, that I felt under no more constraint than if I had known him for years. Should this meet the eye of any one who has enjoyed the privilege of intercourse with Beranger, he will recognize the poet's unaffected kindness in this little scene. Beranger's studio presented to the eye as little of the 'pomp and circumstance' of literature, in which souls of inferior calibre are apt to please themselves, as may well be imagined. An attic room with a bow window, a bed with plain blue check curtains, at one end of the apartment, a small table having a mahogany desk on it at the other, a couple of chairs, at most half a dozen of volumes—voilà tout, (behold all.) The first song writer of France needed no artificial circumstance to give interest to his name or to his residence. As he himself says of his great emperor, in the Souvenirs du Peuple,—

'They will tell of all his glory round the hearth for many a day.'

"Beranger is a little man, I should say five feet five inches in height, about sixty-five years of age, of a firm make, and apparently robust and healthy. He has an intellectual forehead, regular and rather handsome features, and a clear black eye. The principal expression of his face is, I think, that of kindness and shrewdness; and I at once set him down as a man of large and noble heart, as became a poet."

2680. MONTGOMERY, THE POET.

Professor Durbin, in one of his interesting letters from England, writes, "The day I left Sheffield, at five o'clock, P. M., for Manchester, Dr. Newton, and Mr. Jones, his host, were so good as to afford several of us the great pleasure of spending an hour or two in the company of Mr. Montgomery, the poet. It was at the dinner table at Mr. Jones's.

"Conference business required that the company should sit down to dinner early, and it chanced to be before Mr. Montgomery arrived. As soon as he was seen through the window approaching the door, Mr. Jones rose and went out to meet him, and led him into the room. All rose, and stood while he passed round the table, shaking each one by the hand, and then took his seat with Mr. Newton, between him and myself.

"The conversation was interrupted but a moment; and the intelligence, vivacity, and piety of the poet instantly diffused a glow and elevation of thought and feeling which true consecrated genius only can inspire. The topics were various—grave, gay, amusing, sometimes witty, but always marked with great propriety, and often with deep piety.

"He is now quite advanced in years, and nervous, his health not being good; yet in company he is very cheerful. He is exceedingly easy and agreeable in manner, and his whole bearing very gentlemanly.

"No man in any community was ever more respected; and he enters into all the great benevolent movements in his vicinity, and generally presides, at least once a year, at one of the principal missionary meetings of the Wesleyans in Sheffield. He is a truly religious man; the son of a Moravian missionary, who died in the West Indies.

"Some time ago there was a proposition to re-establish the mission on the same island; and, out of respect to Mr. Montgomery, all classes contributed, and the funds were immediately raised. He has a small income from his works, and a small pension from the government; and thus passes his days in sweet retirement, coming forth only to countenance the cause of religion and benevolence, or to shine upon his friends. I was obliged to take my leave of him and the entire company around him ere the dinner party broke up."

2681. THE CORN-LAW RHYMER.

A literary gentleman, in 1838, met with the poet Montgomery, at Olney, for some time the residence of Cowper. They visited together the various localities of interest in the place, the favorite spots of Cowper, and the gentleman was highly delighted with his visit.

"On leaving," says he, "Montgomery kindly invited me to call on him, should I ever visit Sheffield, which I gladly promised to do.

"About two years afterwards, I was in that busy mart, and, remembering the poet's invitation, I determined to avail myself of it. I had no difficulty in finding my way to 'the Mount,' the name of his residence, and was fortunate enough to find him at home. We had a pleasant talk together, and, after dinner, he accompanied me to the literary institutions of the neighborhood, and it was quite delightful to observe with what marked attention and respect he was every where received.

"On our way back to his house, our conversation turned on the poems of the 'Corn-law Rhymer,' of which Mr. Montgomery spoke in very high terms, but deprecated his violence of language. 'Would you like to see Elliott?' he asked.

"Much," said I.

"Well, he lives some three miles from here, at Upperthorpe; but he is to speak to-night at a corn law meeting in Sheffield, and, if you like, after tea, we'll go and hear him, and I'll introduce you to him."

"At the time specified we set out. The place where the lecture was to be delivered was situated in one of the most densely inhabited portions of the smoky town of Sheffield. As we neared the hall, groups of dark-looking, unwashed artisans were seen proceeding in the same direction as ourselves, all of them engaged in deep and earnest conversation on the then one great subject—the corn laws. Strong men, as they hurried by, clinched their hands, and knitted their brows, and ground their teeth, as they muttered imprecations on those whom they considered their oppressors.

"Here we would encounter a crowd of dusky forms circling around a pale, anxious man, who was reading, by the light of a gas lamp, a speech reported in the Northern Star, or the last letter of Publicola, in the Weekly Despatch; and women, with meagre children in their arms,—children drugged to a deathlike sleep, by that curse of the manufacturing districts of England, laudanum, disguised as Godfrey's Cordial,—were raising their shrill, shrewish voices, and execrating the laws which ground them to the dust; and there were fierce denunciations from mere boys, and treasonable speeches from young men: old men, with half-paralyzed energies, moaned and groaned, and said they had never known such times; all seemed gaunt and fierce, and ripe for revolt. It was an audience of working men—of such as these—that Ebenezer Elliott was to address that evening.

"The lecturing hall was crammed with the working classes, and as the orator of the evening mounted the rostrum, a wild burst of applause rang from every part of the house. He bowed slightly, smiled sternly, and took a seat, while a hymn which he had composed for the occasion was roared forth by hundreds of brazen lungs.

"He was a man rather under than above what is termed the middle height. Like the class from which he sprang, and which he was about to address, he was dressed in working clothes—clothes plain even to coarseness. He had a high, broad, very intellectual forehead, with rough ridges on the temples, from the sides and summits of which thick, stubby hair was brushed up—streaks of gray mixed with the coarse black hair; his eyebrows were dark and thick, and shaded two large, deep-set, glaring eyes, which rolled every way, and seemed to survey the whole of that vast assembly at a glance. His nasal organ was as if it were grafted on his face; the mouth was thick-lipped, and the lines from the angles of the nostrils to the corners of the mouth were deeply indented—graven in. A very black beard, lately shaven, made his chin and neck appear as if it was covered with dots, and he had a thick, massive throat. His figure was indicative of great muscular strength, and his big, horny fists seemed more fitted to wield a sledge hammer than to flourish a pen. Looking at him, the most casual observer would be impressed with the idea that no common man was before him.

Ebenezer Elliott.

"He rose amidst great cheering, and for an hour and a half held that great audience in entire subjection, by one of the most powerful addresses I ever listened to. With a terrible distinctness he painted the situation of the working man; he showed what he might have been, and contrasted his possible and probable situation with what it then was. On the heads of those who opposed free trade the corn-law rhymers poured out all the vials of his wrath; but, vigorous and forcible as was his language, there was no coarseness; and frequently over the landscape, which he had painted with all the wild force of a Spagnoletti or a Caravaggio, he flung a gleam of sunshine which made the moral wilderness he had created to rejoice and blossom as the rose. And there were passages in his speech of such extreme pathos that strong men would bow down and weep like little children: to these would succeed such sledge-hammer denunciations, that his hearers sat with compressed lips, and glaring eyes, and resolute hearts. When he sat down, after an appeal to the justice of the law makers, the whole audience burst forth into one loud cheer, and those near the speaker gripped his hand in fierce delight. I never saw such a scene, nor could I have conceived it possible that one working man should so carry with him the passions and feelings of an audience consisting entirely of those of his own class.

"Montgomery introduced me to Elliott, and we all three walked to the house of the former together. How different from the man on the platform was the man in the parlor! No longer the fervid orator, he was now the simple, placid poet; and I never before or since heard from mortal lips such powerful and yet pleasant criticisms on our literary men as I did that night from the lips of Elliott. He spoke with great enthusiasm of Southey, whom he revered, despite his politics, and whom he called his 'great master in the art of poetry.' He had much reverence for Wordsworth; but I must not attempt to record the conversation. Suffice it to say, that after an hour's chat, our party of three broke up; one of them, at least, not a little gratified with the events of the evening."

2682. MISS SEDGWICK'S VISIT TO MISS MITFORD.

"I had written to Miss Mitford my intention of passing the evening with her; and, as we approached her residence, which is in a small village near Reading, I began to feel a little tremulous about meeting my 'unknown friend.' Captain Hall had made us all merry with anticipating the usual dénouement of a mere epistolary acquaintance.

"Our coachman, who, after our telling him we were Americans, had complimented us on our speaking English, and 'very good English too,' professed an acquaintance of some twenty years' standing with Miss Mitford, and assured us that she was one of the 'cleverest women in England,' and 'the doctor, her father, an 'earty old boy.' And when he reined his horses up to her door, and she appeared to receive us, he said, 'Now, you would not take that little body there for the great author, would you?' and certainly we should have taken her for nothing but a kindly gentlewoman, who had never gone beyond the narrow sphere of the most refined social life.

"My foolish misgivings—H. must answer for them—were forgotten in her cordial welcome. K. and I descended from our airy seat; and when Miss Mitford became aware who M. was, she said, 'What! the sister of —— pass my door? That must never be.' So M., nothing loath, joined us.

"Miss Mitford is truly a 'little body,' and dressed a little quaintly, and as unlike as possible to the faces we have seen of her in the magazines, which all have a broad humor, bordering on coarseness. She has a pale-gray, soul-lit eye, and hair as white as snow—a wintry sign that has come prematurely upon her, as like signs come upon us, while the year is yet fresh and undecayed. Her voice has a sweet, low tone, and her manner a naturalness, frankness, and affectionateness that we have been so long familiar with in their other modes of manifestation, that it would have been indeed a disappointment not to have found them.

"She led us directly through her house into her garden, a perfect bouquet of flowers. 'I must now show you my geraniums while it is light,' she said, 'for I love them next to my father.' And they were indeed treated like petted children, guarded by a very ingenious contrivance from the rough visitation of the elements. They are all, I believe, seedlings. She raises two crops in a year, and may well pride herself on the variety and beauty of her collection.

"Geraniums are her favorites; but she does not love others less because she loves these more. The garden is filled, matted with flowering shrubs and vines; the trees are wreathed with honeysuckles and roses; and the girls have brought away the most splendid specimens of heart's ease to press in their journals. O that I could give some of my countrywomen a vision of this little paradise of flowers, that they might learn how taste and industry, and an earnest love and study of the art of garden culture, might triumph over small space and small means!

"Miss Mitford's house is, with the exception of certainly not more than two or three, as small and humble as the smallest and humblest in our village of S—; and (such is the difference, in some respects, in the modes of expense in this country and ours) she keeps two men servants,—one a gardener,—two or three maid servants, and two horses.

"In this very humble home, which she illustrates as much by her unsparing filial devotion as by her genius, she receives on equal terms the best in the land. Her literary reputation might have gained for her this elevation; but she started on 'vantage ground, being allied by blood to the Duke of Bedford's family. We passed a delightful evening, parting with the hope of meeting again, and with a most comfortable feeling that the ideal was converted into the real. So much for our misgivings. Faith is a safer principle than some people hold it to be."

2083. LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

"I believe," says Miss Sedgwick, "of all my pleasures here, dear J. will most envy me that of seeing Joanna Baillie, and of seeing her repeatedly at her home—the best point of view for all best women. She lives on Hempstead Hill, a few miles from town, in a modest house, with Miss Agnes Baillie, her only sister, a kindly and agreeable person.

"Miss Baillie—I write this for J., for women always like to know how one another look and dress,—Miss Baillie has a well-preserved appearance: her face has nothing of the vexed or sorrowful expression that is often so deeply stamped by a long experience of life. It indicates a strong mind, great sensibility, and the benevolence that, I believe, always proceeds from it if the mental constitution be a sound one, as it eminently is in Miss Baillie's case.

"She has a pleasing figure, what we call lady-like, that is, delicate, erect, and graceful; not the large-boned, muscular frame of most English women. She wears her own gray hair,—a general fashion, by the way, here, which I wish we elderly ladies of America may have the courage and the taste to imitate; and she wears the prettiest of brown silk gowns and bonnets, fitting the beau ideal of an old lady—an ideal she might inspire, if it has no pre-existence.

"You would, of course, expect her to be free from pedantry and all modes of affectation; but I think you would be surprised to find yourself forgetting, in a domestic and confiding feeling, that you were talking with the woman whose name is best established among the female writers of her country; in short, forgetting every thing but that you were in the society of a most charming private gentlewoman. She might—would that all female writers could—take for her device a flower that closes itself against the noontide sun, and unfolds in the evening shadows."

2084. ANOTHER INTERVIEW WITH MRS. HEMANS.

The following account of a visit to Mrs. Hemans is given by a correspondent of the Boston Atlas of 1845:—

"It was about four in the afternoon, when the Waverree stage set me down at about a hundred yards from the place of my destination. The house in which the poetess resided was one of a row, or terrace, as it was called, situated on the high road, from which it was separated only by the footway and a little flower garden, surrounded by a whitethorn hedge. I noticed that, of all the houses on either side of it, hers was the only one adorned with flowers: the rest had either grass lawns or plain gravel surface; some of them even grew cabbages and French beans.

Felicia Hemans.

"My knock at the door was answered by a servant girl,—one of the pretty Lancashire witches,—by whom I was shown into a small parlor, where I remained, whilst my letter and card were taken to the lady of the house.

"It was a very small apartment, but every thing about it indicated that it was the home of genius and of taste. Over the mantel shelf hung a fine engraving of William Roscoe, author of the Lives of the De' Medici, with a presentation line in his own handwriting. The walls were decorated with prints and pictures, and on the mantel shelf were some models, in terra cotta, of Italian groups. On the tables lay casts, medallions, and a portfolio of choice prints and water-color engravings; but I was too much excited to pay much attention to such matters, and so I sat down, anxiously awaiting the entrance of the poetess.

"It was not long before the poetess entered the room. She held out her hand, and welcomed me in the kindest manner, and then sat down opposite me.

"I cannot well conceive of a more exquisitely beautiful creature than Mrs. Hemans was. None of the portraits or busts I have ever seen of her do her justice, nor is it possible for words to convey to the reader any idea of the matchless yet serene beauty of her expression. Her glossy waving hair was parted on her forehead, and terminated, on the sides, in rich and luxuriant auburn curls; there was a dove-like look in her eyes, and yet there was a chastened sadness in their expression. Her complexion was remarkably clear, and her high forehead looked as pure and spotless as Parian marble. A calm repose, not unmingled with melancholy, was the characteristic expression of the face; but when she smiled, all traces of sorrow were lost, and she seemed to be but "a little lower than the angels"—fitting shrine for so pure a mind. Let me not be deemed a flatterer or an enthusiast, in thus describing her, for I am only one of many who have been almost as much captivated by her personal beauty as charmed by the sweetness and holiness of her productions. If ever poesies were the reflex of the beauties, personal and mental, of their writers, they were indeed so in the case of Mrs. Hemans.

"We talked, of course, a great deal about poetry and poets, and she asked me if I had seen Wordsworth.

"On my replying that I had not, she said, 'You will be almost as much delighted with the man as with his works. He is delightful. I once saw him at St. Asaph's, and he spent half a day with me reciting his own poetry.'

"We talked of L. E. L. Mrs. Hemans said she had received several letters from her, containing pressing invitations to visit London. 'A place I never was in, and never wish to be,' she observed. 'My heart beats too loudly, even in this quiet place, and there I think it would burst. The great Babel was not made for such as I.'

§ 256. FLATTERING AND EULOGIZING THE GREAT.

2685. CHATTERTON'S WANT-OF INTEGRITY.

Whoever examines the conduct of Chatterton will find one striking defect of character, which was, through an excess of ingenuity, to impose on the credulity of others. This predominant quality elucidates his character, and is deserving of minute regard by all who wish to form a correct estimate of the Rowleian controversy. A few instances of it are here recapitulated.

The Rev. Mr. Catcott once noticed to Chatterton the inclined position of Temple Church, in the city of Bristol. A few days after the blue coat boy brought him an old poem, transcribed, as he declared, from Rowley, who had noticed the same peculiarity in his day, and had, moreover, written a few stanzas on the very subject.

A new bridge is just completed over the River Avon, at Bristol, when Chatterton sends to the painter a genuine description, in antiquated language, of the passing over the old bridge, for the first time, in the thirteenth century, on which occasion two songs are chanted by two saints, of whom nothing was known, and expressed in language precisely the same as Rowley's, though he lived two hundred years after this event. Mr. Burgham, the pewterer, is credulous, and, from some whimsical caprice in his nature, is attached to heraldic honors. Chatterton, who approaches every man on his blind side, presents him with his pedigree, consecutively traced from the time of William the Conqueror, and coolly allies him to some of the noblest houses in the kingdom.

Mr. Burgham, with little less than intuitive discernment, is one of the first persons who expresses a firm opinion of the authenticity and excellence of Rowley's Poems. Chatterton, pleased with this first blossom of success, and from which he presaged an abundant harvest, with an elated and grateful heart, presents him, together with other testimonials, with the Romaunte of the Cuyghte, a poem written by John de Burgham, one of his own illustrious ancestors, who was the great ornament of a period four hundred and fifty years antecedent; and the more effectually to exclude suspicion, he accompanies it with the same poem modernized by himself.

Chatterton wishes to obtain the good opinion of his relation, Mr. Stephens, leather breeches maker, of Salisbury; and, from some quality, which it is possible his keen observation had noticed in this Mr. Stephens, he deems it the most effectual way, to flatter his vanity, and accordingly tells him, with great gravity, that he traces his descent from Fitz-Stephen, son of Stephen Earl of Ammerle, who was son of Od, Earl of Bloys, and Lord of Holderness, who flourished about A. D. 1095.

The late Mr. George Catcott, to whom the public are so much indebted for the preservation of Rowley, is a very worthy and religious man, when Chatterton, who has implements for all work, and commodities for all customers, like a skilful engineer, adapts the style of his attack to the nature of the fortress, and presents him with the fragment of a sermon, on the divinity of the Holy Spirit, as "written by Thomas Rowley."

Mr. Barrett is zealous to establish the antiquity of Bristol. As a demonstrable evidence, Chatterton presents him with an escutcheon, on the authority of the same Thomas Rowley, borne by a Saxon, of the name of Ailward, who resided in Bristol, A. D. 718.

Mr. Barrett is also writing a comprehensive History of Bristol, and is solicitous to obtain every scrap of information relating to so important a subject. In the ear of Chatterton he expressed his anxiety, and suggested to him the propriety of his examining all Rowley's multifarious manuscripts with great care for an object of such weight.

Soon after this, the blue coat boy came breathless to Mr. Barrett, uttering, like one of old, "I have found it." He now presented the historian with two or three notices (in his own handwriting, copied, as he declared, faithfully from the originals) of some of the ancient Bristol churches; of course wholly above suspicion, for they were in the true old English style. These communications were regarded as of inestimable value, and the lucky finder promised to increase his vigilance in ransacking the whole mass of antique documents for fresh disclosures. It was not long before other important scraps were discovered, conveying just the kind of information which Mr. Barrett wanted, till, ultimately, Chatterton furnished him with many curious particulars concerning the castle, and every church and chapel in the city of Bristol; and these are some of the choicest materials of Mr. Barrett's otherwise valuable history.

2686. WALLER'S OBSEQUIOUSNESS.

When Cromwell died, Waller celebrated the event in one of his most vigorous and impressive poems. The image of the commonwealth, though reared by no common hands, soon fell to pieces under Richard Cromwell, and Waller was ready with a congratulatory address to Charles II. The royal offering was considered inferior to the panegyric on Cromwell, and the king himself, though he admitted the poet to terms of courtly intimacy, is said to have told him of the disparity. "Poetry, sire," replied the witty, self-possessed Waller, "succeeds better in fiction than in truth."

2687. POPE'S FLATTERY OF TITLED PERSONS.

As Alexander Pope complimented all persons of title, so he did Lord Bolingbroke in the highest style of adulation. He always spoke of this "guide, philosopher, and friend," as a being of a superior order, that had condescended, in pity to the moral wants of mankind, to visit this lower world. In particular, when a comet appeared and approached the earth, he told some of his acquaintance,—

"It was only sent to convey Lord Bolingbroke home again, just as a stage coach stops at a door to take up a passenger."

2688. THE TWO WINDS.

Heywood, a poet of the sixteenth century, being asked by Queen Mary what wind blew him to the court, he answered, "Two specially; the one to see your majesty." "We thank you for that," said the queen; "but, I pray you, what is the other?" "That your grace," said he, "might see me."

§ 257. DEFECTS, WEAKNESSES, &c.

2689. LA FONTAINE'S MENTAL ABSENCE.

La Fontaine's singularities were so well known that his mistakes and eccentricities were chartered in society, and excused even by Louis XIV. Having been introduced to the royal presence, to present one of his works, he searched, and searched in vain, for the votive volume, and then frankly told the king that he had forgotten it. "Let it be till another time, M. de la Fontaine," said the monarch with a graciousness and good humor which did him honor, and dismissed the poet with a purse of gold. This blunder did not quicken his attention even for a moment: he left his purse of gold behind him in the carriage.

Meeting, at a dinner party, a young man with whose conversation he seemed pleased, somebody asked his opinion of him. "He is a young man of sense and promise," said La Fontaine. "Why, it is your own son," said the questioner. "Ah! I am very glad of it," rejoined the father with the utmost indifference. He had forgotten that he ever had a son, who fortunately had been taken charge of and educated by others.

It was one of his singularities, that when any thing took his fancy, he could think of nothing else, for the time; and he introduced his favorite topic, or favorite author, in a manner at once unseasonable and comic. One day, whilst in company with the Abbé Boileau, his head full of Rabelais, whom he had just been reading, he abruptly asked the grave ecclesiastic which he thought had more wit, Rabelais or St. Austin. Some were shocked, others laughed; and the abbé, when recovered from his surprise, replied, "M. de la Fontaine, you have put on your stocking the wrong side out," which was really the fact.

Wishing to testify his respect for the celebrated Arnaud, he proposed dedicating to him one of the least scrupulous of his tales, in which a monk is made to cite Scripture in a manner far from edifying. Boileau and Racine had the utmost difficulty in making him comprehend that such an offering would be an outrage to the respected and rigid Jansenist.

The humor and fancy which abounded in his tales, and his reputation among the men of genius of his time, made him an object of curiosity. He was sought and shown in company as "a lion," if one may use that ephemeral term.

A farmer-general invited a large party "to meet the celebrated La Fontaine." They came prepared to hear him talk like Joconde, or tell such stories as the Matron of Ephesus. Poor La Fontaine ate, drank, never opened his mouth for any other purpose, and soon rose, to attend, he said, a meeting of the Academy. "The distance is short; you will be too early," said the host. "I'll take the longest way," replied La Fontaine.

Madame de la Sablière at one time discharged her whole establishment whilst La Fontaine was residing in her house. "What!" said somebody, "have you kept no one?" "None," replied the lady, "except mes trois bêtes—my dog, my cat, and La Fontaine." Such was her idea of his thoughtless and more than childish simplicity.

Furetière relates an anecdote, which, if true, is almost incredible. La Fontaine had attended the burial of one of his friends, and yet some time afterwards called to visit him. At first he was shocked at the information of his death; but, recovering from his surprise, he observed, "It is true enough, for now I well recollect that I went to his funeral."

After twenty years of unwearied kindness, he was deprived of the society and care of his benefactress, and soon after of the home which he had enjoyed in her house. La Fontaine was once more thrown helpless and homeless upon the world.

He would soon have been in almost perfect destitution, if he had not become indebted once more for a home and its comforts to the friendship of a woman. Madame de la Sablière offered him an asylum in her own. Whilst on her way to make the proposal, she met him in the street, and said, without preface or form, "La Fontaine, come and live in my house." "I was just coming to do so, madame," said the poet, with as much indifference as if his doing so was the simplest thing in the world; and this relation of kindness and confidence subsisted without change to his death.

2690. COLERIDGE'S ABSENCE OF MIND.

Mr. Coleridge had solicited permission of Mr. Southey to deliver his fourth lecture on the Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Roman Empire, as a subject to which he had devoted especial attention. The request was immediately granted, and at the end of the third lecture it was formally announced to the audience that the next lecture would be delivered by Mr. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, of Jesus College, Cambridge.

At the usual hour the room was thronged. The moment of commencement arrived. No lecturer appeared. Patience was preserved for a quarter of an hour or more; but still no lecturer. At length it was communicated to the impatient assemblage, that a circumstance exceedingly to be regretted would prevent Mr. Coleridge from giving his lecture that evening, as intended.

Some few present learnt the truth, but the major part of the company retired not very well pleased, and under the impression that Mr. Coleridge had either broken his leg, or that some severe family affliction had occurred.

Mr. Coleridge's rather habitual absence of mind, with the little importance he generally attached to engagements, renders it likely that at this very time he might have been found at T——, College Street, composedly smoking his pipe, and lost in profound musings on his divine Susquehanna.

An eminent medical man in Bristol, who greatly admired Mr. Coleridge's conversation and genius, on one occasion invited Mr. C. to dine with him on a given day. The invitation was accepted, and this gentleman, willing to gratify his friends with an introduction to Mr. Coleridge, invited a large assembly for the express purpose of meeting him, and made a splendid entertainment, anticipating the delight which would be universally felt from Mr. Coleridge's far-famed eloquence.

It unfortunately happened that Mr. Coleridge had forgotten all about it; and the gentleman, with his guests, after waiting till the hot became cold, under his mortification consoled himself by the resolve never again to subject himself to the like disaster. No explanation or apology from Mr. Coleridge's friends could soothe the choler of this disciple of Galen.

A dozen subscribers to his lectures fell off from this slip of his memory.

§691. WORDSWORTH, THE POET.

Wordsworth had no sense of smell. Once, and once only in his life, the dormant power awakened. It was by a bed of stocks in full bloom, at a house which he inhabited in Dorsetshire, and he said it was like a vision of paradise to him; but it lasted only a few moments, and the faculty continued torpid from that time.

§692. VOLTAIRE'S TEMPER.

M. de Villette, one day, had a large party at dinner. In sitting down to table, M. de Voltaire missed his drinking cup, which he had marked with his seal. "Where is my cup?" he said, with flashing eyes, to a simple footman behind his chair, whose special duty it was to wait upon him. The poor man, frightened out of his wits, stammered out a few words. "Enemy of your master," roared the old man in a fury, "find my goblet. I will have my goblet. I won't dine without it." Seeing that the goblet did not appear, he left the table in rage, went up to his room, and shut himself in.

Madame Denis, Madame and M. de Villette, one after the other, went to beg him to come down, but in vain. At length it was determined to depute the Marquis de Villeville, whom Voltaire was fond of, from his pleasant and amiable manners. He knocked softly at the door. "Who is there?" "Tis I—Villeville." "Ah," said Voltaire, opening the door, "it is you, my dear marquis. What do you want with me?" "I am come in the name of all your friends, in despair at your absence, to beseech you to come down." "They ask me to come down?" says Voltaire. "They conjure you." "But, my dear friend, I dare not." "Why so?" "They will laugh at me." "How can you think so? Have we not all our notions about things that belong to us? Does not every body fancy his own glass, his penknife, or his pen?" "Well, I see you wish to find an excuse for me. Let us rather own frankly that every body has his foibles. I blush for mine; but yet I remember having read somewhere that the sage Locke was passionate. Go down first; I shall follow you."

A few minutes afterwards he appeared, and sat down to table, mimicking the timid awkwardness of a naughty child that expects a scolding. Some persons present, who told the story, assured us that they never saw him so amiable.

§693. BLUNDERING TRANSLATORS.

What a pretty tale was slaughtered when Mr. Grenville Piggot pointed out, in his Manual of Scandinavian Mythology, the blundering translation of the passage, in an old Scandinavian poem, relating to the occupation of the best in the halls of Valhalla, the northern paradise. "Soon shall we drink out of the curved horns of the head," are the words found in the death-song of Regner Lodbrog; meaning by this violent figure to say, that they would imbibe their liquor out of cups formed from the crooked horns of animals.

The first translators, however, not seeing their way clearly, rendered the passage, "Soon shall we drink out of the skulls of our enemies;" and to this strange banquetting there are allusions without end to be met with in our literature. Peter Pindar, for example, once said that the booksellers, like the heroes of Valhalla, drank their wine out of the skulls of authors.

§694. AN UNPOETIC POET.

Dr. Glover was on a visit at Stowe, when he wrote his celebrated ballad of Admiral Hosier's Ghost, perhaps the most spirited of all his productions. The idea occurred to him during the night; he rose early, and went into the garden to compose.

In the heat of his composition, he walked into the tulip bed; unfortunately, he had a stick in his hand, and with a true poetical fervor, he hewed down the tulips in every direction. Lady Temple was particularly fond of tulips, and some of the company, who had seen the doctor slashing around him, and suspected how his mind was occupied, asked him, at breakfast, how he could think of thus wantonly destroying her ladyship's favorite flowers.

The poet, perfectly unconscious of the havoc he had made, pleaded not guilty. There were witnesses enough to convict him. He acknowledged that he had been composing in the garden, and made his peace by repeating the ballad.

§695. KOTZEBUE.

The best dramatic productions of this unfortunate author were written when he was in his twenty-sixth year; after which time he sunk, without any assignable cause, into a depression of spirits, which soon degenerated into a confirmed melancholy. All the happy circumstances which before seemed so attractive appeared now in the most gloomy colors; he withdrew at once from all society, and felt the utmost reluctance to any active exertion.

His passion for the stage alone preserved its empire over him, and it was during this period that he wrote the Stranger, and Lover's Vows. The former is, perhaps, the most characteristic of his plays. He wrote it during the height of his disorder.

"Never," says he, "either before or since, did I feel such a rapid flow of thoughts and images; and I firmly believe that there are some maladies, especially those by which the irritation of the nerves is increased, which stretch the powers of the mind beyond their usual reach; just, as report says, diseased muscles' shells produce pearls."

2696. NAE MOTIVE, MAN.

Every body is aware of the indolent character of Thomson, the author of the Seasons; of his being found once in a garden, eating fruit off a tree with his hands in his pockets, &c. A friend one day entered his room, and, finding him in bed, although the day was far spent, asked him in the name of wonder why he did not get up. "Man, I hae nae motive," replied the poet.

§ 258. APTNESS AND INGENUITY.

2697. HOOK'S TALENT AT EXTEMPORE VERSE.

Theodore: Hook

I remember, one day at Sydenham, Mr. Theodore Hook coming in unexpectedly to dinner, and amusing us very much with his talent at extempore verse. He was then a youth, tall, dark, and of a good person, with small eyes, and features more round than weak; a face that had character and humor, but no refinement. His extempore verses were really surprising.

It is easy enough to extemporize in Italian. One only wonders how, in a language in which every thing conspires to render verse-making easy, and it is difficult to avoid rhyming, this talent should be so much cried up. But in English it is another matter. I have known but one other person besides Hook who could extemporize in English; and he wanted the confidence to do it in public. Of course, I speak of rhyming. Extempore blank verse, with a little practice, would be found as easy in English, as rhyming is in Italian.

In Hook the faculty was very unequivocal. He could not have been aware of the character of all the visitors, still less of the subject of conversation when he came in, and he talked his full share till called upon. Yet he ran his jokes and his verses upon us all in the easiest manner, saying something characteristic of every body, or avoiding it with a pun; and he introduced so agreeably a piece of village scandal, upon which the party had been rallying Campbell, that the poet, though not unjealous of his dignity, was, perhaps, the most pleased of us all.

Theodore afterwards sat down to the piano-forte, and enlarging upon this subject, made an extempore parody of a modern opera, introducing sailors and their claptraps, rustics, &c., and making the poet and his supposed flame the hero and heroine.

He parodied music as well as words, giving us the most received cadences and flourishes, and calling to mind—not without some hazard to his filial duties—the commonplaces of the pastoral songs and duets of the last half century; so that if Mr. Dignum, the Damon of Vauxhall, had been present, he would have doubted whether to take it as an affront or a compliment.

Campbell certainly took the theme of the parody as a compliment; for having drunk a little more wine than usual that evening, and happening to wear a wig on account of having lost his hair by a fever, he suddenly took off the wig, and dashed it at the head of the performer, exclaiming, "You dog! I'll throw my laurels at you."

2698. BOGART.

Mr. Bogart was a native of the city of Albany, where, at the early age of twenty-one years, he died, in 1826. He was engaged in the study of the law at the time of his decease, and, as we have learned from an eminent member of the bar in that city, gave the highest promise of professional reputation, when his studies were interrupted by the illness which terminated in his death. He wrote with singular rapidity, and would frequently astonish his companions by an improvisation equal to the elaborate performances of some poets of distinguished reputation.

It was good-naturedly hinted on one occasion that his impromptus were prepared beforehand, and he was asked if he would submit to the application of a test of his poetical abilities. He promptly acceded, and a most difficult one was immediately proposed.

Among his intimate friends were Colonel John B. Van Schaick and Charles Fenno Hoffman, both of whom were present. Said Van Schaick, taking up a copy of Byron, "The name of Lydia Kane" (a lady distinguished for her beauty and cleverness, who died a year or two since, but who was then just blushing into womanhood) "has in it the same number of letters as a stanza of Childe Harold has lines: write them down in a column." They were so written by Bogart, Hoffman, and himself. "Now," he continued, "I will open the poem at random; and for the ends of the lines in Miss Lydia's acrostic shall be used the words ending those of the verse on which my finger may rest." The stanza thus selected was this:—

"And must they fall? the young, the proud, the brave,
To swell one bloated chief's unwholesome reign?
No step between submission and a grave?
'The rise of rapine and the fall of Spain'
And doth the power that man adores ordain
Their doom, nor heed the suppliant's appeal?
Is all that desperate valor acts in vain?
And counsel sage, and patriotic zeal,
The veteran's skill, youth's fire, and manhood's heart of steel?"

The following stanza was composed by Bogart within the succeeding ten minutes—the period fixed in a wager—finished before his companions had reached a fourth line, and read to them as we print it:—

"Lovely and loved, o'er the unconquered Your charms resistless, matchless girl, shall Dear as the mother holds her infant's In Love's own region, warm, romantic And should your fate to court's your steps Kings would in vain to regal pomp And lordly bishops kneel to you in Nor valor's fire, law's power, nor churchman's zeal Endure 'gainst love's (time's up!) untarnished steel."	brave reign! grave Spain! ordain, appeal, vain, zeal

2600. ROBERT TREAT PAINE.

Robert Treat Paine, once reckoned among the first poets of America, wrote with remarkable facility. It is related of him by his biographers, that he had finished Adams and Liberty, and exhibited it to some gentlemen at the house of a friend. His host pronounced it imperfect, as the name of Washington was omitted, and declared that he should not approach the sideboard, on which bottles of wine had just been placed, until he had written an additional stanza. The poet mused a moment, called for a pen, and wrote the following lines, which are perhaps the best in the song:—

"Should the tempest of war overshadow our land,
Its bolts could ne'er rend Freedom's temple asunder;
For unmoved at its portals would Washington stand,
And repulse with his breast the assaults of the thunder;
His sword from the sleep
Of its scabbard would leap,
And conduct, with its point, every flash of the deep!
For ne'er shall the sons," &c.

He had agreed to write the Opening Address, on the rebuilding of the Boston Theatre, in 1798. Hodgkinson, the manager, called on him in the evening, before it was to be delivered, and upbraided him for his negligence; the first line of it being yet unwritten.

"Pray, do not be angry," said Paine, who was drinking with some literary friends: "sit down and take a glass of wine." "No, sir," replied the manager; "when you begin to write, I will begin to drink." Paine took his pen at a side table, and in two or three hours finished the address, which is one of the best he ever wrote.

2700. HOGG'S ORATORY.

"My excellent friend," says a spirited writer, "now known as the Ettrick Shepherd, was, fifteen or twenty years ago, a member of the Forum, then a popular debating society.

"He had taken it into his head that he was an orator, and, in order to give greater effect to his speech, he had planted himself in a conspicuous and commanding situation in the gallery. The church (in Carrubber's close) was crowded to excess. The president had proposed, and I had opened the question: it was, as I well remember, upon the comparative happiness of the married and single state.

"Hogg was then unmarried, and a staunch antagonist. I had espoused the side of matrimony, and found that the cause I advocated was not unpopular. Hogg rose in reply. For a space, his appearance, though somewhat Doric and uncouth, was rather imposing, and he dwelt amongst 'squalling weans and scolding Kates,' with all the address of the gudeman of Auchtermuchty. I began, in fact, to fear that the audience was disposed to go along with him, when, all at once, he paused, and, after some instants of breathless suspense, pulled from his pockets the contents of his seemingly extempore address.

"A gentleman, who occupied a situation in the body of the church, having observed the pause, with seeing the occasion of it, and imagining that the speaker had stopped, as a mill pauses, for want of an encouraging moving force, exclaimed, in a tone and manner ludicrously resembling those of an orator, 'Go on, honest man!'

"Hogg coolly snuffed the candle which was attached to the adjoining pillar, and opening his papers slowly and deliberately, said, with the utmost composure, 'What's a' the hurry?' When I see the world a-gog, and a-drive, and a-push, and a-struggle, in every direction, into which perverted genius has sent it a wool-gathering, I am ever and anon disposed to exclaim, with my old friend Hogg, 'What's a' the hurry?'"

2701. LEGISLATIVE POETRY.

The poetical genius both of the Senate and the House of New Jersey has been severely taxed, says a Newark paper, by a prayerful rhyming effusion, from the ladies of Cape May, which was first presented to the Senate—a most unsusceptible body, according to the proceedings below—several days since. They sent it to the house, probably for the benefit of the many gallant bachelors and widowers there congregated, who received it with more favor, though, with characteristic coquetry, their promises at so late a day in the session afford little prospect of their hopes being realized.

The following message was presented to the house on the 5th of March, by Mr. Gray, the secretary. The judiciary committee, by Mr. Whitehead, their chairman, it will be seen, has perpetrated a poetical report:—

SENATE CHAMBER, March 4.

Mr. Speaker: I am directed to inform the House of Assembly that the Senate has received a petition from the ladies of the county of Cape May, in which—

"As humble petitioners they earnestly pray
Your honorable body, without delay,
To pass a new law wherein power is shown
For wives to hold landed estates of their own;" — and that the address of said petitioners indicates that the same was intended for the House of Assembly, and not the Senate.

The judiciary committee, therefore, to whom said petition was referred, has reported —

"This petition appears to have got quite astray,
And the committee advise that it be sent away
To the speaker of the house to whom it is directed,
To be there to the forms of legislation subjected."

And said report having been read, considered, and agreed to by the Senate, the secretary was directed to present said petition to the honorable speaker of Assembly, whose distinguished courtesy and gallantry to the sex will doubtless secure for it the most profound consideration.

The subject was referred to a special committee of the house, and the same day, Mr. Brown, the chairman, presented the following report:

Committee appointed to weigh and consider
The message concerning the wife and the widder, Received from the Senate by prim Mr. Gray,
Permission allowed them, respectfully say,
After solemn reflection, they all recommend That the House of Assembly their pity extend
To seafarers past all their feeling of beauty,
And making excuses to shrink from their duty.
But the wants of the ladies, however aggrieved,
Made known to the house, shall be promptly relieved.
'Tis true that the senate is feeble and old;
But the boys of the house are as gallant as bold,
And will tender their aid, at the earliest day,
To the ladies who live on the shores of Cape May.'

Abney House, where Watts lived and died.

2703. DR. WATTS'S RETORT.

Dr. Watts was remarkable for vivacity in conversation, and ready wit, though he never showed a fondness for displaying it. Being one day in a coffee-room, with some friends, he overheard a gentleman say, "What! is that the great Dr. Watts?" when, turning suddenly round, and in good humor, he repeated a stanza from his lyric poems, which produced a silent admiration:—

"Were I so tall to reach the pole,
Or meet the ocean with my span;
I must be measured by my soul;
The mind's the standard of the man."

Dr. Watts was short in stature, being only about five feet in height.

2704. MILTON, ON THE MIRACLE.

When Milton was going to St. Paul's school, in London, at one of the public examinations, the subject for poetical composition happened to be our Savior's first miracle, the turning of water into wine at the marriage feast. Folios were written and handed in on the subject. When it came to Milton's turn to hand in his poem, from which not much was expected, he merely wrote on a slate one line—

"The conscious waters saw his God and blushed."

The judges looked at each other in astonishment; the laconic beauty of the line and simple sublimity of the idea were so striking. After bestowing encomiums upon the more elaborate productions, according to their merits, they awarded the prize to the future bard of Paradise Lost.

2705. AN INTRACTABLE WORD.

Conversation one day turning upon some intractable word in the English language, that could not be made to rhyme, the challenge was thrown out, and it was almost universally admitted that "month" had no counterpart; when one of the party took up the gauntlet, and instantly repeated,—

"Among our numerous English rhymes,
They say there's none to 'month';
I tried, and failed a hundred times,
But succeeded the hundred and 'onth.'"

"And why not 'onth'?" he exclaimed, on hearing the general laugh; "why not onth, as well as fourth, fifth, tenth? why not say the hundred and onth time as well as the hundred and first?"

2706. HAPPY RETORT OF LAMB.

A retired cheesemonger, who hated any allusion to the business that had enriched him, once remarked to Charles Lamb, in the course of a discussion on the poor law, "You must bear in mind, sir, that I have got rid of all that stuff which you poets call the 'milk of human kindness.'" Lamb looked at him steadily, and gave his acquiescence in these words: "Yes, sir, I am aware of it; you turned it all into cheese several years ago."

2707. JOHNSON'S VERSE-MAKING IN CONVERSATION.

When Dr. Percy first published his collection of Ancient English Ballads, perhaps he was too lavish in commendation of their beautiful simplicity and poetic nature. This provoked Dr. Johnson to observe one evening, at Miss Reynolds's tea table, that he could rhyme as well and as elegantly in common narrative and conversation. "For instance," says he,—

As with my hat upon my head,
I walked along the Strand,
I there did meet another man,
With his hat in his hand.

Or, to render such poetry subservient to my own immediate use,—

I therefore pray thee, Renny dear,
That thou wilt give to me,
With cream and sugar softened well,
Another dish of tea.

Nor fear that I, my gentle maid,
Shall long detain the cup,
When once unto the bottom I
Have drank the liquor up.

Yet hear, alas! this mournful truth,
Nor hear it with a frown:
Thou canst not make the tea as fast
As I can gulp it down.

§ 259. VICIOUS HABITS.

2708. EMANCIPATION FROM SLAVERY TO OPIUM.

One of the most melancholy facts in the history of Coleridge is his indulgence in the use of opium. It had been continued for a long time, and had begun to weaken and becloud his vigorous and brilliant intellect before his friend Cottle became aware that he used it.

In 1814, Cottle wrote to him a very faithful letter, full of dissuaves against the habit; and in Coleridge's reply occur the following affecting paragraphs:—

"For ten years the anguish of my spirit has been indescribable, the sense of my danger staring, but the consciousness of my guilt worse—far worse than all. I have prayed, with drops of agony on my brow; trembling, not only before the justice of my Maker, but even before the mercy of my Redeemer. 'I gave thee so many talents; what hast thou done with them?'

"Secondly, overwhelmed as I am with a sense of my direful infirmity, I have never attempted to disguise or conceal the cause. On the contrary, not only to friends have I stated the whole case with tears, and the very bitterness of shame, but in two instances I have warned young men, mere acquaintances, who had spoken of taking laudanum, of the direful consequences, by an awful exposition of its tremendous effects on myself.

"Thirdly, though before God I cannot lift up my eyelids, and only do not despair of his mercy, because to despair would be adding crime to crime, yet to my fellow-men I may say, that I was seduced into the accursed habit ignorantly. I had been almost bed-ridden for many months, with swellings in my knees. In a medical journal, I unhappily met with an account of a cure performed in a similar case, or what appeared to me so, by rubbing in laudanum, at the same time taking a given dose internally. It acted like a charm—like a miracle! I recovered the use of my limbs, of my appetite, of my spirits, and this continued for near a fortnight. At length the unusual stimulus subsided, the complaint returned, the supposed remedy was resorted to; but I cannot go through the dreary history.

"Suffice it to say, that effects were produced which acted on me by terror and cowardice, of pain and sudden death, not—so help me God—by any temptation of pleasure, or expectation or desire of exciting pleasurable sensations. On the very contrary, Mrs. Morgan and her sister will bear witness so far as to say that the longer I abstained, the higher my spirits, the keener my enjoyments, till the moment, the direful moment arrived, when my pulse began to fluctuate, my heart to palpitate, and such falling down, as it were, of my whole frame, such intolerable restlessness, and incipient bewilderment, that in the last of my several attempts to abandon the dire poison, I exclaimed in agony, which I now repeat in seriousness and solemnity. 'I am too poor to hazard this.' Had I but a few hundred pounds,—but two hundred pounds,—half to send Mrs. Coleridge, and half to place myself in a private mad-house, where I could procure nothing but what a physician thought proper, and where a medical attendant could be constantly with me for two or three months, (in less than that time life or death would be determined,) then there might be hope. Now there is none! You bid me rouse myself: go bid a man, paralytic in both arms, to rub them briskly together, and that will cure him. 'Alas!' he would reply, 'that I cannot move my arms is my complaint and my misery!'

Writing to another friend, a short time after, he says, "Conceive a poor miserable wretch, who for many years has been attempting to beat off pain by a constant recurrence to the vice that reproduces it. Conceive a spirit in hell, employed in tracing out for others the road to that heaven from which his crimes exclude him. In short, conceive whatever is most wretched, helpless, and hopeless, and you will form as tolerable a notion of my state as it is possible for a good man to have. I used to think the text in St. James, that 'he who offends in one point offends in all,' very harsh; but I now feel the awful, the tremendous truth of it. In the one crime of opium, what crime have I not made myself guilty of! Ingratitude to my Maker, and to my benefactors injustice, and unnatural cruelty to my poor children, self-contempt for my repeated promise, breach, nay, too often, actual falsehood."

It is interesting to know that Coleridge afterwards broke away from this dreadful habit, and that his life was lengthened out some twenty years longer.

2709. EXTRA STIMULANTS.

A London work says, "Polidori, the author of the Vampyre, was a prey to nightmare: he died with a laudanum bottle in his bed. And Coleridge might have thus left a sad and pointed moral, blazoning his wretched suicide to that world which unconsciously has pored with a thrill of admiration over those fruits of his delinquency—the romantic and unearthly stories of Christabel, and the Ancient Mariner. There was a vast deal of laudanum, in more senses than one, in much of Coleridge's conversations, which those admired most who understood the least. Southey admits that he was always saying startling things to amuse himself and astonish others.

2710. INTEMPERANCE OF POETS.

The biographies of some of the most distinguished literary characters, of this and of other countries, present lamentable examples of the direful effects of alcoholic liquors on the intellect.

Lord Byron forms a prominent example. Prior, according to his biographer, was not free from the charge of intemperance. Dr. King states that Pope hastened his end by drinking spirits. Pope remarks that Parnell "was a great follower of drams, and strangely open and scandalous in his debaucheries;" all are agreed that he became a sot, and finished his existence. Dryden, in his youthful days, was conspicuous for sobriety; but for the last ten years of his life, observes Dennis, he was much acquainted with Addison, and drank with him even more than he ever used to do, probably so far as to hasten his end.

The immortal Shakspeare also fell a victim to the same direful habit. Shakspeare, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry meeting, and, it seems drank too hard, for Shakspeare died of a fever there contracted.

2711. COWLEY AT CHERTSEY.

The poet Cowley died at the Porch House, Chertsey, on the 21st of July, 1667. There is a curious letter preserved of his condition when he removed here from Barn Elms. It is addressed to Dr. Sprat, dated Chertsey, 21st May, 1665, and is as follows:—

"The first night that I came hither I caught so great a cold, with a defluxion of rheum, as made me keep my chamber ten days. Besides, I had such a bruise on my ribs with a fall that I am yet unable to move, or turn myself in bed. This is my personal fortune here to begin with; and then, I can get no money from my tenants, and have my meadows eaten up every night by cattle put in by my neighbors. What this signifies, or may come to in time, God knows; if it be ominous, it can end in nothing but hanging. I do hope to recover my hurt so far within five or six days (though it be uncertain yet whether I shall ever recover it) as to walk about again; and then, methinks, you and I and the dean might be very merry upon St. Ann's Hill. You might very conveniently come hither by way of Hampton Town, lying there one night. I write this in pain, and can say no more. Verbum sapienti."

It is stated, by Sprat, that the last illness of Cowley was owing to his having taken cold through staying too long among his laborers in the meadows; but in Spence's Anecdotes we are informed, on the authority of Pope, that "his death was occasioned by a mere accident, whilst his great friend, Dean Sprat, was with him on a visit at Chertsey.

They had been together to see a neighbor of Cowley's, who, according to the fashion of those times, made them too welcome. They did not set out for their walk home till it was too late; and had drank so deep that they lay out in the fields all night. This gave Cowley the fever that carried him off. The parish still talk of the drunken dean."

The Porch House at Chertsey, or Cowley's House, as it is now called, (the porch having been removed) appears to have been built in the latter part of the reign of James I. The interior has some panelled and carved oak; and Cowley's study is a small closet-like room, with a pleasant prospect towards St. Ann's Hill.

2712. BADINA.

"In the office of the Weekly Messenger," says Leigh Hunt, "I saw one day a person who looked the epitome of squalid authorship. He was wretchedly dressed, and dirty; and the rain as he took his hat off, came away from it as from a spout.

"This was a man of the name of Badina, who had been poet at the opera, and was then editor of the Messenger. He was afterwards sent out of the country under the alien act, and became reader of the English papers to Bonaparte. His intimacy with some of the first families in the country, among whom he had been a teacher, is supposed to have been of use to the French government. He wrote a good idiomatic English style, and was a man of abilities.

"I had never before seen a poor author, such as are described in books; and the spectacle of the reality startled me. Like most authors, however, who are at once very poor and very clever, his poverty was his own fault. When he received any money, he disappeared, and was understood to spend it in ale-houses."

2713. WILLIAM J. SNELLING.

The loathsome drunkard is always a picture of pity and disgust. The young inebriate, stepping from an eminence of sobriety and virtue down to the depths of the sin of intoxication, is a picture too sorrowful to look upon with other than feelings of sincere pain and regret. But the man of letters, whose earliest and best days have been passed in the acquisition of knowledge,—whose education has fitted him to become a moral as well as a scientific teacher,—whose genius and talents are above that of the great mass of men around him, and the character of whose exalted mind shortened the distance and brought nearer the resemblance between man and his Creator;—such a man a drunkard, is a sight altogether too horrible for contemplation.

Most of our readers must have been acquainted with William J. Snelling, of Boston, a man whose mind was like a good and beautiful ship, driven about at the mercy of the winds and the waves, without sails or compass. He was a lawyer and a writer, and in his latter profession distinguished himself as a keen, powerful, but vindictive satirist: his wit, too, was as pointed and brilliant as his sarcasm, and his observation of men and things was quick and vigorous.

His Tales of the North-west, which first brought him into notice some ten years since,—in short, all his prose articles as well as his poetry,—have always found a ready publication, and numerous and admiring readers. All have given him a high intellectual character, and a literary reputation which will long survive him.

Such were some of his virtues, but his prominent follies and vices were more visible and no less numerous.

From his ill success in life, his poverty, and his disappointments, he flew to the last and worst expedient of drowning sorrow, by drinking deep from the bowl of the drunkard. Remorse then did its work, and William J. Snelling, the man of genius and education, was found, first a drunkard in the watch-house, then a voluntary petitioner at the Police Court, begging that he might “be placed out of the public view for six months.” The prison was now his home, and the prisoner free from temptation.

“So the dark in soul expire,
Or live, like scorpion, girt by fire;
So writhes the mind remorse hath driven,
Unfit for earth, undoomed for heaven;
Darkness above, despair beneath,
Around it flame, within it death.”

2714. THE UNRECLAIMED.

John C. Mossie, the talented improvisator, at the Police Court of New York, made application, some time since, to be committed to Bridewell, where he might dash from him the cup of temptation. Such was his sacrifice; and we behold him a voluntary exile to the prison of the criminal to save himself from the demon of intoxication. Mossie was a man as capable of refinement as he was prone to self-degradation. That he was a man of talents, no one will doubt; and in evidence of the fact, we give a chaste production of his pen, which was but the work of some eight or ten minutes. The Unreclaimed seems to be a picture of his own life, written by himself.

OUR BRETHERN.

“Hast thou a brother unreclaimed,
A sister yet in sin,
Who, though they listen to the truth,
Feel not the power within?
O, pray for them! pray day and night,
That they may yet discern aright.

“Thou answerest, ‘All my father’s house
Are servants of the Lord;
They bless the Father for his Son,
And reverence the Word.’
Are all thy father’s house, O youth,
Humble adorers of the truth?

“Nay, nay, I tell thee they are not.
‘O, yes they are.’ What, all?
Whom dost thou, then, thy brethren term,
And whom thy Father call?
God is the Sire of all men named;
Say, are thy brethren all reclaimed?”

2715. DERMODY.

This eccentric youth was the eldest son of Nicholas Dermody, a schoolmaster at Ennis, in Ireland, where he was born in 1775. In his early years he contracted a fatal and degrading attachment to drinking, in all its excess.

A romantic desire of seeing the world led him, about the end of his tenth year, to leave his paternal home; which he did clandestinely, with only two shillings, a change of linen, and a volume of Tom Jones, in his pocket; and the money he gave away the same day in charity. By the assistance of a benevolent carrier, he accomplished the journey, of above one hundred and forty miles, to Dublin, where he roamed about the streets two or three days without a lodging, depending entirely for supplies on the sale of his second shirt.

The keeper of a book stall, who was astonished at observing such a child poring over one of his old Greek volumes, economically engaged him as classical preceptor to his son; from which situation, in the course of a few weeks, he passed into the shop of a bookseller of rather more respectability. After ten weeks, Dermody felt little regret at being again left to his own discretion; and, “without a settled home, he again roved about the streets by day, and begged the meanest shelter during the night.”

He was next taken into the house of a humane scene painter belonging to the Dublin theatre; and in this situation he went on messages, warmed his humble patron’s size-pots at the theatre, told merry tales, and wrote, verses on the walls with chalk.

While he was thus employed in the painting-room as superintendent of the glue, oil, and color pots, Mr. Cherry, the dramatist, with great rapture, brought one morning into the greenroom a poem, written, as he said, by a most surprising boy then in the house. The description which he gave of the boy, together with the merit of the composition, raised among the performers the greatest curiosity to see him; and, led on by Cherry, they rushed from the greenroom to the place where the painter and his wonderful attendant were at work.

If their astonishment had been excited at hearing the poem read, it was increased tenfold at the sight of the author. Infantine in appearance, and clad in the very garb of wretchedness, with a meagre, half-starved, but intelligent countenance; a coat much too large for him, and his shoulders and arms seen naked through it; without waistcoat, shirt, or stockings; with a pair of breeches made for a full-grown person, soiled and ragged, reaching to his ankles; his uncovered toes thrust through a pair of old slippers without heels, almost of the magnitude of Kamschatka snow-shoes; his hair clotted with glue, and his face, and almost naked body, smeared and disfigured with paint of different colors, black, blue, red, green, and yellow; thus in amazement stood before them, with a small pot of size in one hand, and a hair brush in the other, the elegant translator of Horace, Virgil, and Anacreon.

By the kindness of Messrs. Cherry and Raymond, few have experienced so liberal and exalted a patronage as Dermody; and none ever made so unwise a use of it. When good fortune prevailed, he set no bounds to what he called his happy frolics.

He had dined one day with Mr. Raymond, who, perceiving his shoes and stockings to be in a very bad condition, sent and purchased a pair of each, which Dermody put into his pocket with the intention of wearing them the following morning. The next evening, however, he made his appearance without either shoes, stockings, hat, neckcloth, or waistcoat; and in a state of intoxication not to be endured. He had pledged the shoes and stockings, got drunk with the money, and in a fray in the streets had lost his other necessities.

He entered the house in this state, told his tale, throw on the floor the duplicate of the articles he had pledged, demanded other apparel, was refused, swore a few oaths, threatened to destroy a sideboard of glass, alarmed the whole family, was turned out of doors, and during the remainder of the night took shelter in a shed fitted up for some cattle in one of the fields leading from Westminster to Chelsea.

After suffering, on different occasions, the results entirely of his imprudence, distress scarcely inferior to any thing that is told of Otway, of Chatterton, or of Boyle, he died of the mere effect of drinking, in a wretched hovel, at Sydenham, in Kent, on the 15th of July, 1802, in his twenty-eighth year. He lies interred in the churchyard of Lewisham, with a monument erected over him, on which is inscribed a poetical epitaph taken from his own works.

2716. PARNELL'S FALL.

When Parnell, the author of the Hermit, had been introduced by Swift to Lord Treasurer Oxford, and had been established in his favor by the assistance of Pope, he soon began to entertain ambitious views. The walk he chose to shine in was popular preaching; he had talents for it, and began to be distinguished in the mob places of Southwark and London, when the queen's sudden death destroyed all his prospects, and at a juncture when famed preaching was the readiest road to preferment. This fatal stroke broke his spirits; he took to drinking, and soon finished his course.

§ 260. FACETIOUS AND HUMOROUS.

2717. WHITTIER WITH ONE BOOT.

Whittier gave early indications of poetic powers. Several of his juvenile poems, having found their way into the newspapers and magazines of the day, attracted the attention of some literary gentlemen, who appreciated the merit of the productions, and resolved to make their author a visit, to offer their assistance in introducing the "Quaker poet" to literary notoriety.

Accordingly, they took a conveyance that soon set them down in the picturesque town of Weare, New Hampshire, the residence of the young poet. With some difficulty they found the dwelling of Whittier, and were ushered into the best room of the house by the mother, to whom they made known their desire to see her son.

All this time young Whittier was working away at the certainly very unpoetical business of cleaning out the pigsty. He plied his shovel with right good will, totally unconscious of the honor that awaited him. Judge of his astonishment when Lizzy, his sister, came running from the house, and informed him "that it was full of very great people, who were waiting to see him."

"What shall I do?" cried the poet, in agony. "Run, Lizzy, and get my boots, while I wash me in the brook."

The boots were brought, but the bare, wet feet of Whittier refused to enter. At length, after a deal of tugging, one was drawn on; but O, horrors! the other would not go on, neither would the first come off!

"A pretty looking spectacle I shall present for their inspection," murmured Whittier, as, with one boot in his hand and the other on his foot, he entered the house. But, in a short time, the flattering words of his visitors made him quite forget the awkwardness of his attire.

2718. WHITTIER'S APOSTROPHE TO CLAY.

The editor of the New York Despatch, in a review of Whittier's poems, says,—

"In looking through the volume, we fail to find several of Whittier's early poems—an 'Apostrophe to Clay,' in particular. Our readers will remember it:—

'Not fallen! As well the tall
And pillared Alleghany fall.'

"That poem has given Whittier a world of trouble. In 1844, during the presidential contest, it was reproduced, and run the rounds of the whig press. Whittier protested against its publication, issued a card, beseeching the editors to let 'Not Fallen' fall; that the verses no longer expressed his sentiments; that he had changed his mind; that—that, in fact, and to be candid, Mr. Clay had fallen in the poet's estimation. Poor Whittier! did he think to light a fire on a dry prairie, and then extinguish the flames?

"The poem literally ran like wildfire, and Whittier, in chasing it, got clean out of breath. But this was not the worst of it. The admirers of Thomas H. Benton clapped his name over it, and compelled Whittier to maintain that Benton was as firm, strong, and upright as

'————— the tall
And pillared Alleghany.'

"And to make matters more provoking, a country editor, of the democratic side, immediately after the defeat of Silas Wright, clapped that smart statesman's name to the 'Not Fallen;' and forthwith every democratic paper in the state forced Whittier to assure the world that Mr. Wright was right side up. The history of this little poem is a curiosity in American literature."

2719. DR. BYLES.

Dr. Byles, of Boston, was a favorite in every social or convivial circle, and no one was more fond of his society than the colonial governor, Belcher, on the death of whose wife he wrote an elegy, ending with,—

"Meantime my name to thine allied shall stand, Still our warm friendship mutual flames extend;
The muse shall so survive from age to age,
And Belcher's name protect his Byles's page."

The doctor had declined an invitation to visit, with the governor, the province of Maine, and Belcher resorted to a stratagem to secure his company. Having persuaded him to drink tea with him on board the Scarborough ship of war, one Sunday afternoon, as they were seated at the table the anchor was weighed, the sails set, and before the punning parson had called for his last cup, the ship was too far at sea for him to think of returning to the shore. As every thing necessary for his comfort had been thoughtfully provided, he was easily reconciled to the voyage. While making preparations for religious services, the next Sunday, it was discovered that there was no hymn book on board; and he wrote the following lines, which were sung instead of a selection from Sternhold and Hopkins:—

"Great God, thy works our wonder raise;
To thee our swelling notes belong;
While skies, and winds, and rocks, and seas,
Around shall echo to our song.

"Thy power produced this mighty frame;
Aloud to thee the tempests roar,
Or softer breezes tune thy name
Gently along the shelly shore.

"Round thee the scaly nation roves;
Thy opening hands their joys bestow,
Through all the blushing coral groves,
Those silent, gay retreats below.

"See the broad sun forsake the skies,
Glow on the waves and downward glide—
Anon, heaven opens all its eyes,
And starbeams tremble o'er the tide.

"Each various scene, or day or night,
Lord, points to thee our nourished soul;
Thy glories fix our whole delight;
So the touched needle courts the pole."

Joseph Green, a merchant at Boston, who had been a classmate of Byles at Cambridge, was little less celebrated than the doctor for humor; and some of his poetical compositions were as popular, ninety years ago, as in our own time have been those of "Croaker & Co.," which they resemble in spirit and playful ease of versification. The abduction of the Hollis Street minister was the cause of not a little merriment in Boston; and Green, between whom and Byles there was some rivalry, as the leader of opposing social factions, soon after wrote a burlesque account of it:—

"In David's Psalms an oversight
Byles found one morning at his tea:
Alas! that he should never write
A proper psalm to sing at tea.

"Thus ruminating on his seat,
Ambitious thoughts at length prevailed;
The bard determined to complete
The part wherein the prophet failed.

"He sat a while, and stroked his muse,
Then, taking up his tuneful pen,
Wrote a few stanzas for the use
Of his seafaring bretheren.

"The task performed, the bard content,
Well chosen was each flowing word!
On a short voyage himself he went,
To hear it read and sung on board."

2720. TIT FOR TAT.

Campbell, the poet, and Turner, the artist, were dining together, with a large party, a few years ago. The poet was called upon for a toast, and, by way of a joke upon the great professor of the sister art, gave, "The Painters and Glaziers." After the laughter had subsided, the artist was of course summoned to propose a toast also. He rose, and, with admirable tact and ready wit, discharged the debt of his craft to the author of "The Pleasures of Hope," by giving the "Paper-stainers."

2721. THE APPARITION.

Santeuil was crossing the court of the College of Cardinal Le Morne, when he met a scholar who was walking up and down, composing his theme, which he held in his hand. Santeuil, guessing what he was employed about, pulled the paper out of his hand with a tremendous expression of countenance, translated it instantly into elegant Latin, and returned it to him, saying, "If your regent asks you who composed this theme, tell him it was the devil."

He then hurried off, making his cloak fly about him, and raising a cloud of dust all about. The terrified student retreated instantly into college, and repeated to the regent the history of the apparition of the devil. The Jesuit, who saw that the theme was composed in the most elegant Latin, and that the student told the story with perfect sincerity and good faith, was puzzled what to think of the matter.

Soon after this, Santeuil was present at a public discussion, which took place in the hall of the Jesuits. The scholar recognized his old acquaintance, and immediately called out, in an agony of fear, "The devil! the devil!" Santeuil, perceiving that he was detected, related the story, to the infinite amusement of the audience, who found this explanation much more interesting than the former subject of discussion.

2722. SCOTT AND MOORE.

"Having found, in a volume sent to me by some anonymous correspondent," says Moore, "a more circumstantial account of the scene of the evening which Sir Walter and myself spent at the Edinburgh Theatre, I shall here avail myself of its graphic, and, with one exception, accurate details. After adverting to the sensation produced by the appearance of the late Duchess of St. Alban's in one of the boxes, the writer thus proceeds:—

"There was a general huzza and stare for a few seconds; the audience then turned their backs to the lady, and their attention to the stage, to wait till the first pieces should be over ere they intended starting again. Just as it terminated, another party quietly glided into a box near that filled by the duchess. One pleasing female was with three male comers. In a minute the cry ran round, "Eh, yon's Sir Walter, wi' Lockhart an' his wife; and wha's the wee bit bodie wi' the pawkie een? Wow, but it's Tam Moore just. Scott, Scott! Moore, Moore!"—with shouts, cheers, bravoes, and applause.

"But Scott would not rise to appropriate these tributes. One could see that he urged Moore to do so; and he, though modestly reluctant, at last yielded, and bowed, hand on heart, with much animation. The cry for Scott was then redoubled. He gathered himself up, and, with a benevolent bend, acknowledged this deserved welcome. The orchestra played alternately Scotch and Irish melodies."

"Among the choicest of my recollections of that flying visit to Edinburgh are the few days I passed with Lord Jeffrey at his agreeable retreat—Craig Crook. I had then recently written the words and music of a glee contained in this volume, "Ship Ahoy!" which there won its first honors. So often, indeed, was I called upon to repeat it, that the upland echoes of Craig Crook ought long to have its burden by heart."

2723. WORDSWORTH AT ALLFOXDEN.

Wordsworth

The Lyrical Ballads were mostly written at Allfoxden, near the Bristol Channel, in one of the deepest solitudes in England, amid woods, glens, streams, and hills. Here Wordsworth had retired with his sister; and Coleridge was only five miles distant, at Stowey.

Cottle relates some amusing anecdotes of the ignorance of the country people in regard to them, and to poets and lovers of the picturesque generally. Southey, Coleridge and his wife, Lamb, and the two Wedgewoods visited Wordsworth in his retirement, and the whole company used to wander about the woods, and by the sea, to the great wonder of all the honest people they met. "As they were often out at night, it was supposed they led a dissolute life; and it is said that there are respectable people in Bristol who believe now that Mrs. Coleridge and Miss Wordsworth were disreputable women, from a remembrance of the scandalous tattle circulating then.

Cottle asserts that Wordsworth was driven from the place by the suspicions which his habits provoked, being refused a continuance of his lease of the Allfoxden house by the ignoramus who had the letting of it, on the ground that he was a criminal in the disguise of an idler.

One of the villagers said "that he had seen him wander about at night, and look rather strangely at the moon; and then he roamed over the hills like a partridge." Another testified, "he had heard him mutter, as he walked, in some outlandish brogue that nobody could understand." This last, we suppose, is the rustic version of the poet's own statement, —

"He murmurs near the running brooks,
A music sweeter than their own."

Others, however, took a different view of his habits, as little flattering to his morals as the other view to his sense. One wiseacre remarked confidently, "I know what he is. We have all met him tramping away towards the sea. Would any man in his senses take all that trouble to look at a parcel of water? I think he carries on a snug business in the smuggling line, and, in these journeys, is on the lookout for some wet cargo."

Tintern Abbey, the Residence of Wordsworth.

Another, carrying out this bright idea, added, "I know he has got a private still in his cellar; for I once passed his house at a little better than a hundred yards' distance, and I could smell the spirits as plain as an ashen fagot at Christmas." But the charge which probably had the most weight in those times was the last. "I know," said one, "that he is surely a desperate French Jacobin; for he is so silent and dark that no one ever heard him say one word about politics."

While the ludicrous tattle to which we have referred was sounding all around him, he was meditating Peter Bell and the Lyrical Ballads, in the depths of the Allfoxden woods, and consecrating the rustics who were scandalizing him. The great Poet of the Poor, who has made the peasant a grander object of contemplation than the peer, and who saw through vulgar externals and humble occupations to the inmost soul of the man, had sufficient provocations to be the satirist of those he idealized.

2724. WORTH MAKES THE MAN.

Robert Burns, on his way to Leith, one morning, met a country farmer; he shook him earnestly by the hand, and stopped to converse a while. A young Edinburgh blood took the poet to task for this defect of taste. "Why, you fantastic gomeril," said Burns, "it was not the great-coat, the scone bonnet, and the saundaer boot hose I spoke to, but the man that was in them; and the man, sir, for true worth, would weigh down you and me, and ten more such, any day."

2725. LAMB-LIKE RESIGNATION.

Charles Lamb, when reminded by his sister of the days when they were poor, and capable of enjoying a very little treat with the keenest relish, so different from the days when they were rich, stately, and dull, said,—

"Well, Bridget, since we are in easy circumstances, we must just endeavor to put up with it."

2726. YOUNG GOLDSMITH'S REPARTEE.

A number of young people had assembled Goldsmith's uncle's to dance. One of the company, named Cummings, played on the violin. In the course of the evening, Oliver undertook a hornpipe. His short and clumsy figure, and his face pitted and discolored with the small-pox, rendered him a ludicrous figure in the eyes of the musician, who made merry at his expense, calling him his little Æsop. Goldsmith was nettled by the jest, and, stopping short in the hornpipe, exclaimed,—

"Our herald hath proclaimed this saying:
See Æsop dancing, and his monkey playing."

The repartee was thought wonderful for a boy of seven years old, and Oliver became forthwith the wit and bright genius of the family.

2727. RARE COMPLIMENT.

One of the prettiest and wittiest compliments ever passed is contained in the lines by Sheridan, addressed to Miss Payne:—

"'Tis true I am ill; but I cannot complain,
For he never knew pleasure who never knew Payne."

2728. GOLDSMITH.

Few authors were more remarkable for a careless indifference to worldly concerns than Goldsmith. One leading feature in the character of this admirable writer, was to be liberal to his poor countrymen in distress. One man, who was artful, never failed to apply to him as soon as he published any new work, and was likely to be in cash. This person succeeded twice, but sometimes found that all the copy money was gone before the doctor's works saw the light.

Goldsmith, tired of his applications, told him to write himself, at the same time ordering him to draw up a description of China, interspersed with political reflections—a work which a bookseller had applied to Goldsmith for, at a price which he despised, but had not rejected.

The idle carelessness of his temper may be collected from this, that he never gave himself the trouble to read the manuscript, but sent to the press an account which made the Emperor of China a Mahometan, and placed India between China and Japan. Two sheets were cancelled at Goldsmith's expense, who afterwards kicked his newly-created author down stairs.

2729. BROWNING'S SORDELLO AND JERROLD.

When Robert Browning's poem of Sordello appeared, it astonished his friends and amazed the public. Douglas Jerrold's first perusal of the poem furnishes an amusing anecdote.

This distinguished contributor to Punch was recruiting himself at Brighton after a long illness. In the progress of his convalescence, a parcel arrived from London, which contained, among other things, this new volume of Sordello. The medical attendant had forbidden Mr. Jerrold the luxury of reading; but, owing to the absence of his conjugal "life-guards" he indulged in the illicit enjoyment.

A few lines put Jerrold in a state of alarm. Sentence after sentence brought no consecutive thought to his brain. At last the idea crossed his mind that in his illness his mental faculties had been wrecked. The perspiration rolled from his forehead, and smiting his head, he sat down on his sofa, crying, "O God. I am an idiot!" When his wife and her sister came, they were amused by his pushing the volume into their hands, and demanding what they thought of it. He watched them intently while they read: at last his wife said, "I don't understand what the man means; it is gibberish." The delighted humorist sank in his seat again: "Thank God I am not an idiot."

Mr. Browning, to whom we told this, has often laughed over it, and then endeavored to show that Sordello was the clearest and most simple poem in the English language. We know only one person who pretends to understand Sordello, and this is the poet's wife.

2730. CAMPBELL.

When complimented upon his poetical fame, Campbell generally met the speaker with some ludicrous deduction; some mortifying drawback from the ready-money reputation for which his friends ave him credit.

"Calling at an office," says he, "in Holborn, for some information I was in want of, the mistress of the house, a sensible, well-informed woman, invited me to take a seat in the parlor; 'her husband would be at home instantly, but if I was in a hurry, she would try to give me the information required.' Well, I was in a hurry, as usual, thanked her much, received the information, and was just wishing her good morning, when she hesitatingly asked if I would kindly put my name to a charity subscription list. 'By all means,' and putting on my glasses, wrote 'T. Campbell,' and returned it with the air of a man who had done something handsome.

"Bless me," said she, in a whisper, looking at the name, 'this must be the great Mr. Campbell! Excuse me, sir, but may I just be so bold as to ask if you be the celebrated gentleman of that name?'

"Why, really, ma'am, no,' ('yes,' said my vanity;) my name is, just as you see, T. Campbell,' making her at the same time, a handsome bow. 'Mr. Campbell,' she said, advancing a step, 'very proud and happy to be honored with this unexpected call. My husband has only gone to 'Change, and will be so happy to thank you for the great pleasure we have had in reading your very interesting work: pray take a chair.' 'This is a most sensible woman,' thought 'and I dare say her husband is a man of great taste and penetration.'

"Madam," said I, 'I am much flattered by so fair a compliment; laying the emphasis on fair. 'I will wait with much pleasure; but, in the mean time, I think I forgot to pay my subscription.' She tendered me the book, and I put down just double what intended. When had I ever so fair an excuse for liberality? 'Indeed,' resumed the lady, 'I consider this a most gratifying incident. But here comes my husband. John, dear, this is the celebrated Mr. Campbell.' 'Indeed!' I repeated my bow, and in two or three minutes we were as intimate as any three people could be.

"Mr. Campbell," said the worthy husband, "I feel greatly honored by this visit, accidental though it be." "Why, I am often walking this way," said I, "and will drop in now and then, just to say, How d'ye do." "Delighted, Mr. Campbell, delighted! your work is such a favorite with my wife there; only last night we sat up till one o'clock reading it." "Very kind, indeed, very. Have you the new edition?" "No, Mr. Campbell, ours is the first." "What!" thinks I to myself, forty years ago!—This is gratifying;—quite an heirloom in the family.

"O, Mr. Campbell!" said the lady, "what dangers—what—what—you must have suffered! Do you think you will ever make Christians of them horrid cannibals?" "No doubt of that, my dear," said the husband, triumphantly; "only look what Mr. Campbell has done already." I now felt a strange ringing in my ears; but recollecting my Letters from Algiers, I said, "O, yes, there is some hope of them Arabs yet." "We shall certainly go to hear you next Sunday, and I am sure your sermon will raise a handsome collection."

"By this time I had taken my hat, and walked hastily to the door. 'Mr. Campbell, are you ill?' inquired my two admirers. 'No, not quite, only thinking of them horrid cannibals!' 'Ah, no wonder; I wish I had said nothing about them.' 'I wish so too; but, my good lady, I am not the celebrated Mr. Campbell.' 'What, not the great missionary?' 'No.' And so saying, I returned to my chambers, minus a guinea, and a head shorter than when I left."

2731. RECEPTION OF THE FAIR QUEEN.

Edmund Spenser.

When Spenser had finished his famous poem of the Fairy Queen, he carried it to the Earl of Southampton, the great patron of the poets of that day. The manuscripts being sent up to the earl, he read a few pages, and then ordered the servant to give the writer twenty pounds. Reading on, he cried in rapture, "Carry that man another twenty pounds." Proceeding farther, he exclaimed, "Give that man twenty pounds more." But at length he lost all patience, and said, "Go, turn that fellow out of the house, for if I read farther, I shall most certainly be ruined."

Kilcolman Castle, where the Fairy Queen was written.

2732. A GOOD HIT.

Bautru, in presenting a poet to M. D'Hemery, addressed him, "Sir, I present to you a person who will give you immortality; but you must give him something to live upon in the mean time."

2733. NEW ANECDOTE OF BURNS.

Being in church one Sunday, and having some difficulty in procuring a seat, a young lady, who perceived him, kindly made way for him in her pew. The text was upon the terrors of the gospel, as denounced against sinners, to prove which the preacher referred to several passages of Scripture, to all of which the lady seemed very attentive, but somewhat agitated. Burns, on perceiving this, wrote with a pencil on the blank leaf of her Bible, the following lines:—

"Fair maid, you need not take the hint,
Nor idle texts pursue;
'Twas only sinners that he meant,
Not angels such as you."

2734. A WITTY REPLY.

Goldsmith became a member of a debating club, called the Robin Hood, which used to meet near Temple Bar, and in which Burke, while yet a Temple student, had first tried his powers. Goldsmith spoke here occasionally, and is recorded in the Robin Hood archives as "a candid disputant, with a clear head and an honest heart, though coming but seldom to the society." His relish was for clubs of a more social, jovial nature, and he was never fond of argument.

An amusing anecdote is told of his first introduction to the club, by Samuel Derrick, an Irish acquaintance of some humor. On entering, Goldsmith was struck with the self-important appearance of the chairman ensconced in a large gilt chair. "This," said he, "must be the lord chancellor at least." "No, no," replied Derrick, "he's only master of the rolls." The chairman was a baker.

2735. OMNIBUS JOKE.

It is told of Charles Lamb, that one afternoon, returning from a dinner party, having taken a seat in a crowded omnibus, a stout gentleman subsequently looked in, and politely asked, "All full inside?" "I don't know how it may be with the other passengers," answered Lamb, "but that last piece of oyster pie did the business for me."

2736. ANECDOTE OF POLLOK.

Mr. Robert Pollok, a Scottish poet, while a student of theology, once delivered a trial discourse before the Secession Divinity Hall, Glasgow, the subject of which was Sin. His manner of treating it, in the opinion of his fellow-students, was rather turgid; and at those passages which they considered to be particularly outrageous, they did not scruple to give audible symptoms of the amusement they derived from Mr. Pollok's highflown phrases. At last one flight was so extravagant that the professor himself was fairly obliged to give way—and smiled.

At this moment the young preacher was just upon the point of a climax expressing the dreadful evils which sin had brought into the world, and he closed it with the following remark: "And had it not been for sin, the smile of folly had ne'er been seen upon the brows of wisdom."

This anecdote is related upon the authority of a person who was present; but it may be remarked that, perhaps, if Mr. Pollok's discourse had been listened to with that decorum which the gravity of the occasion demanded, it might not, to an unprejudiced auditor, have seemed deserving of the unfavorable reception it met with. But when the speaker became sensible that his compeers were making merry at his expense, it must have produced in his manner a degree of confusion, or perhaps of vehemence, by which language and ideas, in themselves not inappropriate, might be rendered ridiculous. It is also to be kept in view that Pollok was not popular among his fellow-students; so that they may be supposed to have been on the watch for an opportunity to testify their dislike of him.

2737. MARGARET OF SCOTLAND.

The anecdote of Margaret of Scotland (wife of the Dauphin of France) and Alain, the poet, is, perhaps, generally known. Who is not charmed with that fine expression of her poetical sensibility?

The person of Alain was repulsive, but his poetry had attracted her affections. Passing through one of the halls of the palace, she saw him sleeping on a bench: she approached and kissed him. Some of her attendants could not conceal their astonishment that she should press with her lips those of a man so frightfully ugly. The amiable princess answered, smiling, "I did not kiss the man, but the mouth which has uttered so many fine things."

2738. LORD BYRON AND "MY GRAND-MOTHER'S REVIEW."

At the close of the first canto of Don Juan, its noble author, by way of propitiating the reader for the morality of his poem, says,—

"The public approbation I expect,
And beg they'll take my word about the moral,
Which I with their amusement will connect,
As children cutting teeth receive a coral;
Meantime they'll doubtless please to recollect
My epical pretensions to the laurel.
For fear some prudish reader should grow skittish, I've bribed my Grandmother's Review—the British.

"I sent it in a letter to the editor,
Who thanked me duly by return of post;
I'm for a handsome article his creditor;
Yet if my gentle Muse he please to roast,
And break a promise after having made it her,
Denying the receipt of what it cost,
And smear his page with gall instead of honey,
All I can say is, that he had the money."

Canto I. st. ccix. ccx.

Now, "the British" was a certain staid and grave high-church review, the editor of which received the poet's imputation of bribery as a serious accusation; and, accordingly, in his next number after the publication of Don Juan, there appeared a postscript, in which the receipt of any bribe was stoutly denied, and the idea of such connivance altogether repudiated; the editor adding that he should continue to exercise his own judgment as to the merits of Lord Byron, as he had hitherto done in every instance.

However, the affair was too ludicrous to be at once altogether dropped; and so long as the prudish publication was in existence, it enjoyed the sobriquet of "My Grandmother's Review."

There is another hoax connected with this poem. One day an old gentleman gravely inquired of a print seller for a portrait of "Admiral Noah," to illustrate Don Juan!

2739. STRAW BONNETS.

In 1817, when straw bonnets first became general, it was common to trim them with artificial wheat or barley, in ears; on which custom the following lines were written:—

"Who now of threatening famine dare complain,
When every female forehead teems with grain?
See how the wheat sheaves nod amid the plumes;
Our barns are now transferred to drawing-rooms.
And husbands who indulge in active lives,
To fill their granaries, may thresh their wives."

§ 261. ADVENTURES OF POETS.

3740. GOLDSMITH'S WANDERINGS.

Goldsmith, after graduating from college, was urged by his friends to fit himself for the clerical office. Though to this office he had a settled repugnance, yet they overruled it. The two years of probation were spent in a rather lounging and indolent manner, and he made little or no preparation for the sacred office. He presented himself for ordination, and was rejected.

His next step was to enter as a tutor in a gentleman's family; but falling into an altercation, the gentleman paid him off, and he left. On being paid off, he found himself in possession of an unheard-of amount of money. His wandering propensity and his desire to see the world were instantly in the ascendency. Without communicating his plans or intentions to his friends, he procured a good horse, and, with thirty pounds in his pocket, made his second sally forth into the world.

The worthy niece and housekeeper of the hero of La Mancha could not have been more surprised and dismayed at one of the Don's clandestine expeditions, than were the mother and friends of Goldsmith, when they heard of his mysterious departure.

Weeks elapsed, and nothing was seen or heard of him. It was feared that he had left the country on one of his wandering freaks, and his poor mother was reduced almost to despair, when one day he arrived at her door, almost as forlorn in plight as the prodigal son. Of his thirty pounds not a shilling was left; and, instead of the goodly steed on which he had issued forth on his errantry, he was mounted on a sorry little pony, which he had nicknamed Fiddleback.

As soon as his mother was well assured of his safety, she rated him soundly for his inconsiderate conduct. His brothers and sisters, who were tenderly attached to him, interfered, and succeeded in mollifying her ire; and whatever lurking anger the good dame might have, was no doubt effectually vanquished by the following whimsical narrative, which he drew up at his brother's house, and despatched to her:—

"My dear Mother: If you will sit down and calmly listen to what I say, you shall be fully resolved in every one of those many questions you have asked me. I went to Cork, and converted my horse, which you prize so much higher than Fiddleback, into cash, took my passage in a ship bound for America, and, at the same time, paid the captain for my freight and all the other expenses of my voyage. But it so happened that the wind did not answer for three weeks; and you know, mother, that I could not command the elements. My misfortune was, that, when the wind served, I happened to be with a party in the country, and my friend the captain never inquired after me, but set sail with as much indifference as if I had been on board. The remainder of my time I employed in the city and its environs, viewing every thing curious; and you know no one can starve while he has money in his pocket.

"Reduced, however, to my last two guineas, I began to think of my dear mother, and friends whom I had left behind me, and so bought that generous beast Fiddleback, and bade adieu to Cork, with only five shillings in my pocket. This, to be sure, was but a scanty allowance, for man and horse, towards a journey of above a hundred miles; but I did not despair, for I knew I must find friends on the road.

"I recollected particularly an old and faithful acquaintance I made at college, who had often and earnestly pressed me to spend a summer with him, and he lived but eight miles from Cork. This circumstance of vicinity he would expatiate on to me with peculiar emphasis. 'We shall,' says he, 'enjoy the delights of both city and country, and you shall command my stable and my purse.'

"However, upon the way I met a poor woman, all in tears, who told me her husband had been arrested for a debt he was not able to pay, and that his eight children must now starve, bereaved as they were of his industry, which had been their only support. I thought myself at home, being not far from my good friend's house, and therefore parted with a moiety of all my store; and pray, mother, ought I not to have given her the other half crown? for what she got would be of little use to her.

"However, I soon arrived at the mansion of my affectionate friend, guarded by the vigilance of a huge mastiff, who flew at me, and would have torn me to pieces but for the assistance of a woman, whose countenance was not less grim than that of the dog; yet she with great humanity relieved me from the jaws of this Cerberus, and was prevailed on to carry up my name to her master.

"Without suffering me to wait long, my old friend, who was then recovering from a severe fit of sickness, came down in his night-cap, night-gown and slippers, and embraced me with the most cordial welcome, showed me in, and, after giving me a history of his indisposition, assured me that he considered himself peculiarly fortunate in having under his roof the man he most loved on earth, and whose stay with him must, above all things, contribute to perfect his recovery. I now repented sorely I had not given the poor woman the other half crown, as I thought all my bills of humanity would be punctually answered by this worthy man. I revealed to him my whole soul; I opened to him all my distresses; and freely owned that I had but one half crown in my pocket; but that now, like a ship after weathering out the storm, I considered myself secure, in a safe and hospitable harbor.

"He made no answer, but walked about the room, rubbing his hands as one in deep study. This I imputed to the sympathetic feelings of a tender heart, which increased my esteem for him; and, as that increased, I gave the most favorable interpretation to his silence. I construed it into delicacy of sentiment, as if he dreaded to wound my pride by expressing his commiseration in words, leaving his generous conduct to speak for itself.

"It now approached six o'clock in the evening; and, as I had eaten no breakfast, and as my spirits were raised, my appetite for dinner grew uncommonly keen. At length the old woman came into the room with two plates, one spoon, and a dirty cloth, which she laid upon the table. This appearance, without increasing my spirits, did not diminish my appetite. My protectress soon returned with a small bowl of sago, a small porringer of sour milk, a loaf of stale brown bread, and the heel of an old cheese, all over crawling with mites.

"My friend apologized that his illness obliged him to live on slops, and that better fare was not in the house; observing, at the same time, that a milk diet was certainly the most healthful; and at eight o'clock he again recommended a regular life, declaring that for his part he would lie down with the lamb and rise with the lark. My hunger at this time was so exceedingly sharp that I wished for another slice of the loaf, but was obliged to go to bed without even that refreshment.

"This lenten entertainment I had received made me resolve to depart as soon as possible. Accordingly, next morning, when I spoke of going, he did not oppose my resolution; he rather commended my design, adding some very sage counsel upon the occasion. 'To be sure,' said he, 'the longer you stay away from your mother, the more you will grieve her and your other friends; and possibly they are already afflicted at hearing of this foolish expedition you have made.'

"Notwithstanding all this, and without any hope of softening such a sordid heart, I again renewed the tale of my distress, and asking 'how he thought I could travel above a hundred miles upon one half crown.' I begged to borrow a single guinea, which I assured him should be repaid with thanks. 'And you know, sir,' said I, 'it is no more than I have done for you.' To which he firmly answered, 'Why, look you, Mr. Goldsmith; that is neither here nor there. I have paid you all you ever lent me, and this sickness of mine has left me bare of cash. But I have bethought myself of a conveyance for you; sell your horse, and I will furnish you a much better one to ride.'

"I readily grasped at his proposal, and begged to see the nag; on which he led me to his bed-chamber, and from under the bed he pulled out a stout oak stick. 'Here he is,' said he; 'take this in your hand, and it will carry you to your mother's with more safety than such a horse as you ride.'

"I was in doubt, when I got it into my hand, whether I should not, in the first place, apply it to his pate; but a rap at the street door made the wretch fly to it, and when I returned to the parlor, he introduced me, as if nothing of the kind had happened, to the gentleman who entered, as Mr. Goldsmith, his most ingenious and worthy friend, of whom he had so often heard him speak with rapture. I could scarcely compose myself, and must have betrayed indignation in my appearance to the stranger, who was a counsellor at law in the neighborhood, a man of engaging aspect and polite address.

"After spending an hour, he asked my friend and me to dine with him at his house. This I declined at first, as I wished to have no further communication with my hospitable friend; but at the solicitation of both I at last consented, determined as I was by two motives—one, that I was prejudiced in favor of the looks and manner of the counsellor; and the other, that I stood in need of a comfortable dinner. And there, indeed, I found every thing that I could wish—abundance without profusion, and elegance without affectation.

"In the evening, when my old friend, who had eaten very plentifully at his neighbor's table, but talked again of lying down with the lamb, made a motion to me for retiring, our generous host requested I should take a bed with him; upon which I plainly told my old friend that he might go home and take care of the horse he had given me, but that I should never reënter his doors. He went away with a laugh, leaving me to add this to the other little things the counsellor already knew of his plausible neighbor.

"And now, my dear mother, I found sufficient to reconcile me to all my follies; for here I spent three whole days. The counsellor had two sweet girls for his daughters, who played enchantingly on the harpichord; and yet it was but a melancholy pleasure I felt, the first time I heard them; for that being the first time also that either of them had touched the instrument since their mother's death, I saw the tears in silence trickle down their father's cheeks. I every day endeavored to go away, but every day was pressed and obliged to stay. On my going, the counsellor offered me his purse, with a horse and servant to convey me home; but the latter I declined, and only took a guinea, to bear my necessary expenses on the road.

"OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

"To MRS. ANNE GOLDSMITH, Ballymahon."

Such is the story given by the poet errant of this his second Sally in quest of adventures.

2741. COLERIDGE AS A SOLDIER.

"Mr. Coleridge," says Cottle, "told us of one of his Cambridge eccentricities, which highly amused us. He said that he had paid his addresses to a Mary Evans, who rejecting his offer, he took it so much in dudgeon, that he withdrew from the university to London, when, in a reckless state of mind, he enlisted in the 15th regiment of Elliot's Light Dragoons. No objection having been taken to his height or age, he was asked his name. He had previously determined to give one that was thoroughly Kamschatkian, but having noticed that morning, over a door in Lincoln's Inn Fields, or the Temple, the name of 'Cumberbatch,' (not Cumberback,) he thought this word sufficiently outlandish, and replied 'Silas Tomken Cumberbatch;'* and such was the entry in the regimental book.

"Here, in his new capacity, laborious duties devolved on Mr. C. He endeavored to think on Cæsar, and Epaminondas, and Leonidas, with other ancient heroes, and composed himself to his fate; remembering, in every series, there must be a commencement. But still he found confronting him no imaginary inconveniences. Perhaps he who had most cause for dissatisfaction was the drill sergeant, who thought his professional character endangered; for, after using his utmost efforts to bring his raw recruit into something like training, he expressed the most serious fears, from his unconquerable awkwardness, that he should never be able to make a soldier of him.

"Mr. C., it seemed, could not even rub down his own horse, which, however, it should be known, was rather a restive one, who, like Cowper's hare, 'would bite if it could,' and, in addition, kick not a little. We could not suppose that these predispositions in the martial steed were all aggravated by the unskilful jockeyship to which he was subjected; but the sensitive quadruped did rebel a little in the stable, and wince a little in the field.

"Perhaps the poor animal was something in the state of the horse that carried Mr. Wordsworth's

* These three initials would be the proper S. T. C. affixed to his garments.

Idiot Boy, who, in his sage contemplations, 'wondered what he had got upon his back.'

"This rubbing down of his horse was a constant source of annoyance to Mr. C., who thought the most rational way was—to let the horse rub himself down, shaking himself clean, and so to shine in all his native beauty; but on this subject there were two opinions, and his that was to decide carried most weight. If it had not been for the foolish and fastidious taste of the ultra precise sergeant, this whole mass of trouble might be avoided; but seeing the thing must be done, or punishment, he set about the herculean task with the firmness of a Wallenstein. But lo! the paroxysm was brief, in the necessity that called it forth.

"Mr. C. overcame this immense difficulty by bribing a young man of the regiment to perform the achievement for him; and that on very easy terms; namely, by writing him some love stanzas, to send his sweetheart.

"Mr. Coleridge, in the midst of all his deficiencies, it appeared, was liked by the men, although he was the butt of the whole company; being esteemed by them as next of kin to a natural, though of a peculiar kind—a talking natural. This fancy of theirs was stoutly resisted by the love-sick swain; but the regimental logic prevailed; for, whatever they could do with masterly dexterity, he could not do at all; ergo, must he not be a natural?

"There was no man in the regiment who met with so many falls from his horse as Silas Tomken Cumberbatch. He often calculated with so little precision his due equilibrium, that, in mounting on one side,—perhaps the wrong stirrup,—the probability was, especially if his horse moved a little, that he lost his balance, and if he did roll back on this side, came down ponderously on the other. Then the laugh spread amongst the men—'Silas is off again.' Mr. C. had often heard of campaigns, but he never before had so correct an idea of hard service.

"Some mitigation was now in store for Mr. C., arising out of a whimsical circumstance. He had been placed, as a sentinel, at the door of a ball-room, or some public place of resort, when two of his officers, passing in, stopped for a moment near Mr. C., talking about Euripides, two lines from whom one of them repeated.

"At the sound of Greek, the sentinel instinctively turned his ear, when he said, with all deference, touching his lofty cap, 'I hope your honor will excuse me, but the lines you have repeated are not quite accurately cited. These are the lines,' when he gave them in their more correct form. 'Besides,' said Mr. C., 'instead of being in Euripides, the lines will be found in the second antistrophe of the Œdipus of Sophocles.' 'Why, man, who are you?' said the officer; 'old Faustus ground young again?' 'I am your honor's humble sentinel,' said Mr. C., again touching his cap.

"The officers hastened into the room, and inquired of one and another about that 'odd fish' at the door, when one of the mess—it is believed the surgeon—told them that he had his eye upon him, but he could neither tell where he came from, nor any thing about his family of the Cumberbatches; 'but,' continued he, 'instead of his being an "odd fish," I suspect he must be a "stray bird" from the Oxford or Cambridge aviary.' They learned also the laughable fact, that he was bruised all over by frequent falls from his horse. 'Ah!' said one of the officers, 'we have had, at different times, two or three of these "university birds" in our regiment.'

"This suspicion was confirmed by one of the officers, Mr. Nathaniel Ogle, who observed that he had noticed a line of Latin chalked under one of the men's saddles, and was told, on inquiring whose saddle it was, that it was 'Cumberbatch's.'

"The officers now kindly took pity on the 'poor scholar,' and had Mr. C. removed to the medical department, where he was appointed assistant in the regimental hospital. This change was a vast improvement in Mr. C.'s condition; and happy was the day, also, on which it took place, for the sake of the sick patients; for Silas Tomken Cumberbatch's amusing stories, they said, did them more good than all the doctor's physic.

"If he began talking to one or two of his comrades,—for they were all on a perfect equality, except those who went through their exercises the best, and stretched their necks a little above the 'awkward squad,' in which ignoble class Mr. C. was placed as preëminent member, almost by acclamation,—if he began to speak, notwithstanding, to one or two, others drew near, increasing momentarily, till by and by the sick beds were deserted, and Mr. C. formed the centre of a large circle.

"In one of these interesting conversations, when Mr. C. was sitting at the foot of the bed, surrounded by his gaping comrades, who were always solicitous of and never wearied with his stories, the door suddenly burst open, and in came two or three gentlemen, (his friends,) looking some time, in vain, amid the uniform dresses, for their man. At length they pitched on Mr. C., and, taking him by the arm, led him, in silence, out of the room—a picture, indeed, for a Wilkie. As the supposed deserter passed the threshold, one of the astonished auditors uttered, with a sigh, 'Poor Silas! I wish they may let him off with a cool five hundred!' Mr. C.'s ransom was soon joyfully adjusted by his friends, and now the wide world once more lay before him."

2742. A NARROW ESCAPE.

"Baltimore is memorable to me," says Willis Gaylord Clark, "for it was in that city of monuments that I had well nigh lost my life. That spice of the adventurous which has accompanied me from my earliest days led me to ascend the long ladder, said to have been some seventy feet high, placed on the outside of the great dome of the cathedral, then undergoing repairs. The upward distance lent an enchantment to my eye which was irresistible. I fancied that the view from the 'topmost round' of those tapering ladders, tied together with ropes, would be magnificent.

"I was not disappointed. The bay melted afar into the iris-blue of air—that golden edging, which hangs over forest tops and waters in summer, whose tremulousness makes the eye ache with gazing, and fills the heart with happy and ethereal feelings. Landward, the country spread brightly around, seamed with brown roads, and fading afar into apparent ridges and swells of cedar green.

"It was a calm and cheerful day, and every object in unison one with another. The air was rarefied and sweet; the last odor of the latest flowers of summer seemed floating by in the sunshine, and I fancied that the voices of summer birds, taking their farewells for distant climes, were mingling with them. The shipping in the harbor sent every pennon to the gale; the flagstaffs waved their signals; and, what with the fresh breeze and the beauty of the morning, it really seemed a gala day.

"After having fed my eyes with the beauty of the scene from the extreme height of the ladder, the voices of the workmen in the cupola, or on the balustrade above, making a pleasant hum in my ear, I prepared to descend. But the moment I looked towards the earth, a dizziness came upon me which almost led me to instantaneous self-abandonment. My brain reeled, my eyes grew dim, a sleepy sensation crept over me; the whole cathedral seemed to recede from my gaze, and for a moment I seemed as if sailing in the air. I had not descended more than a dozen rounds, when my tottering steps and trembling hands really seemed to refuse their office. My sickness increased, and a languor crept over my perceptions, like the effect of an anodyne. I felt myself absolutely becoming indifferent to my peril, though I knew it well. I was, in truth, as if in a dream; and I can safely aver that I felt myself losing all consciousness, when I heard one of the laborers above say, — and the words came to my ear as if from the supernatural lips of a spirit, — ‘My God! that young gentleman is going to fall!’

“This sentence went like fire to my brain, and rolled like a flood of lava over every nerve. It restored me instantly to a full perception of my course. I grasped the rounds of the ladder with the firmness which a drowning man exhibits when clutching, in the bubbling groan of his last agony, at the slenderest spar. Every footfall shook the ladder from end to end; and when I touched the ground, I felt precisely as if rescued from the grave.”

3743. ARIOSTO AND THE BANDITTI.

Barretti relates the following incident: —

“Ariosto,” says he, “took up his residence in a fortified castle, from which it was imprudent to venture without guards, as the whole neighborhood was filled with outlaws, smugglers, and banditti, who, after committing the most enormous excesses all around, retired for security against justice amidst the rocks and cliffs.

“Ariosto, one morning, happened to take a walk without the castle in his night-gown, and in a fit of thought so far forgot himself, that, step by step, he found himself far from his habitation, and suddenly surrounded by a troop of these desperadoes, who certainly would have maltreated and murdered him, had not his face been known by one of the gang, who, informing his comrades that this was Signor Ariosto, the chief of the banditti addressed him with great gallantry, and told him that since he was the author of the Orlando Furioso, he might be sure none of the company would injure him, but, on the contrary, would see him safe back to the castle.

“They were as good as their word. They conducted him safely back, entertaining him all the way with the various excellences they had admired in his poem, and bestowing upon it the most rapturous praises — a rare proof of the irresistible power of poetry, and a noble comment on the tale of Orpheus and Amphion.”

3744. TASSO.

As the Italian poet Tasso, whose misfortunes were as great as his genius, was on one of his journeys between Rome and Naples, he fell into the hands of banditti, who immediately proceeded to plunder him and his fellow-travellers. But no sooner did the captain of the band, the celebrated Marco Sciarra, of Abruzzi, hear the poet pronounce his name, than, with tokens of admiration and respect, he set him at liberty; nor would he even permit his followers to plunder Tasso's companions.

Thus a prince of royal or imperial birth confined the poet in a mad-house for more than seven years; the great and wealthy left him to a precarious life, which was often a life of absolute want; the servile men of letters of the day loaded him with abusive and most unjust criticism; but a mountain robber, by the roadside, controlled in his favor the very instinct of his gang, and kissed the hand of the author of the Gerusalemme.

§ 262. DEATH AND DEATH BED COMPOSITIONS.

3745. REMOVAL OF BYRON'S REMAINS.

“In the month of July, 1824, the body of Lord Byron was brought from Missolonghi to England, and, on being landed from the Florida, was removed to the house of Sir Edward Knatchbull, who then resided in Great George Street, Westminster. At the house of Sir Edward it lay in state for two days, and was visited by hundreds of persons, who paid their last tributes to the genius of the mighty slumberer by gazing on his coffin lid.

“After the lying in state had terminated, it was found necessary to remove the body, for the purpose of placing it in a better constructed leaden coffin than that which had been prepared in Greece. A friend of mine happened to know the undertaker, and kindly offered to procure me admission to the chamber where the removal of the body was to be effected — an offer which, I need not say, I gladly accepted.

“Accordingly, on the afternoon of the eleventh of July, I proceeded to Sir Edward Knatchbull's, and found three or four gentlemen, attracted thither, like myself, to witness the solemn fate of the poet, for the last time, ere it should be shut up in the darkness of death. Mr. Rogers, the author of the Pleasures of Memory, Mr., now Sir John Cam Hobhouse, and John Hanson, Esq., (the two latter Lord Byron's executors,) and one or two others, whose names I did not learn, were present.

“The body lay in the large drawing-room, on the first story, which was hung with black cloth and lighted with wax candles. Soon after my arrival, the work of opening the coffin commenced. This was soon effected, and when the last covering was removed, we beheld the face of the illustrious dead, —

‘All cold and serene.’

“Were I to live a thousand years, I should never, never forget that moment. For years I had been intimate with the mind of Byron. His wondrous works had thrown a charm around my daily paths, and with all the enthusiasm of youth I had almost adored his genius. With his features, through the medium of paintings, I had been familiar from my boyhood; and now, far more beautiful, even in death, than my most vivid fancy had ever pictured, there they lay in marble repose.

Lord Byron's Tomb.

"The body was not attired in that most awful of habiliments—a shroud. It was wrapped in a blue cloth cloak, and the throat and head were exposed. The former was beautifully moulded. The head of the poet was covered with short, crisp, curling locks, slightly streaked with gray hairs, especially over the temples, which were ample and free from hair, as we see in the portraits. The face had nothing of the appearance of death about it; it was neither sunken nor discolored in the least, but of a dead, marble whiteness. The expression was that of stern repose.

"How classically beautiful was the curved upper lip and the chin! I fancied the nose appeared as if it was not in harmony with the other features; but it might possibly have been a little disfigured by the process of embalming. The forehead was high and broad; indeed, the whole head was extremely large; it must have been so to contain a brain of such capacity.

"But what struck me most was the exceeding beauty of the profile, as I observed it when the head was lifted, in the operation of removing the corpse. It was perfect in its way, and seemed like a production of Phidias. Indeed, it far more resembled an exquisite piece of sculpture than the face of the dead—so still, so sharply defined, and so marble-like in its repose. I caught the view of it but for a moment; yet it was long enough to have it stamped upon my memory as which poor Keats tells us is 'a joy forever.'

"Among the persons engaged in the performance of the offices of removal, I noticed one—a tall, thin man, who spoke little, and seemed absorbed in grief. He would scarcely allow any one to touch the corpse, and, with his own hands, he composed the head in its new resting-place. The words, 'My dear lord,' were frequently uttered by him, whilst performing his melancholy duties.

"It was Fletcher, Byron's faithful valet. This man afterwards told me the particulars of the noble poet's death, and gave me a lock of his hair. Fletcher did not long survive his beloved master."

2746. THE LAST DAYS OF BYRON.

"I passed the winter of Byron's death in Greece," says a traveller, "and in the latter part of February went to Missolonghi to see him. He was then suffering from the effect of his fit of epilepsy, which occurred the middle of February. The first time I called at his residence I was not permitted to see him; but in a few days I received a polite note from him, at the hand of his negro servant, who was a native of America, and whom Byron was kind to and proud of to the last.

"I found the poet in a weak and rather irritable state, but he treated me with the utmost kindness. He said that at the time I first called upon him, all strangers and most of his friends were excluded from his room. 'But,' said he, 'had I known an American was at the door, you should not have been denied. I love your country, sir; it is the land of liberty; the only portion of God's green earth not desecrated by tyranny.'

"In our conversation I alluded to the sympathy at that time felt in America for struggling Greece. All he said at that time in reply was, 'Poor Greece—poor Greece! once the richest land on earth; God knows I have tried to help thee.'

"You will remember that but a little while before this, Marco Bozzaris had fallen. When I mentioned his name, Byron said, 'Marco Bozzaris! He was as brave as an ancient Spartan. Perhaps he had the blood of Leonidas in his veins; I presume he had.. But of this I am certain, he had as good blood as ever wet this soil.'

"At his request, his servant then brought him a rosewood box, from which he took a letter written to himself by that gallant chief. It was a warm-hearted welcome of Byron to Greece. 'There,' said the author of Childe Harold, as he handed the precious relic to me, 'I would not part with that but to see the triumph of Greece. That glorious hero, but a few moments before he led his Sulist band forth to his last battle, wrote this letter to me in his tent.' As he spoke these words a heroic smile lit up his pale countenance, and I am sure I never saw such an expression on the face of mortal man as at that moment flashed from Byron's.

"Soon he fell back upon his couch, and wiping the cold sweat from his lofty forehead, once more exclaimed, 'Poor Greece! God bless thee and Ada! I only ask of Heaven two things; and Heaven ought to grant them—that Greece may become free; and Ada cherish my memory when I am dead.'

"In a few days after I left him, I received another note from him, requesting me to call and bring with me Irving's Sketch Book. I took it in my hand, and went once more to the illustrious author's residence. He rose from his couch when I entered, and pressing my hand warmly, said, 'Have you brought the Sketch Book?' I handed it to him, when, seizing it with enthusiasm, he turned to the 'Broken Heart.' 'That,' said he, 'is one of the finest things ever written on earth, and I want to hear an American read it. But stay, do you know Irving?' I replied that I had never seen him. 'God bless him!' exclaimed Byron; 'he is a genius; and he has something better than genius—a heart. I wish I could see him, but I fear I never shall. Well, read—the Broken Heart—yes, the Broken Heart. What a word!'

"In closing the first paragraph, I said, 'Shall I confess it? I believe in broken hearts.'—'Yes,' exclaimed Byron, 'and so do I, and so does every body but philosophers and fools.' I waited whenever he interrupted me until he requested me to go on; for although the text is beautiful, yet I cared more for the commentary as it came fresh from Byron's heart. While I was reading one of the most touching portions of that mournful piece, I observed that Byron wept. He turned his eyes upon me, and said, 'You see me weep, sir. Irving himself never wrote that story without weeping; nor can I hear it without tears. I have not wept much in this world, for trouble never brings tears to my eyes; but I always have tears for the Broken Heart.'

"When I read the last line of Moore's verses at the close of the piece, Byron said, 'What a being that Tom Moore is, and Irving, and Emmet and his beautiful love! What beings all! Sir, how many such men as Washington Irving are there in America? God don't send many such spirits into this world. I want to go to America for five reasons. I want to see Irving; I want to see your stupendous scenery; I want to see Washington's grave; I want to see the classic form of living freedom, and I want to get your government to recognize Greece as an independent nation. Poor Greece!'

"Those were the last days of Byron; and I shall consider myself happy that I was permitted so often to be with him. I have day by day watched the workings of his lofty imagination while he lay upon his couch or sat by his window, and deep troubled thought lit up with an unearthly glow his beautiful features, or clouded them in gloom. It was a painful spectacle to see Byron's form wasting away by disease; and I never gazed upon him after we first met without feeling as I think I should feel to see a powerful stream undermining in its progress the foundations of some classic temple. It was inexpressibly painful; but yet there was something very sublime in the struggle of his proud spirit with the advancing king of terrors. His full, bright eye, which sometimes burnt so restlessly, revealed a spirit free, tameless and unconquerable as the proud ocean. . . . 'In a few hours,' said the faithful Fletcher, as he related these facts to me, 'my master called me to his bedside, and said, 'I begin to think I am going to die pretty soon, Fletcher, and I shall give you several directions, which I hope you will be particular to execute, if you love me.' " Fletcher did love his master, and told him that he would do every thing faithfully, and expressed the hope that he should not be called to part with him. 'Yes, you will,' said Byron; 'it's nearly all over now; I must tell you without losing a moment. I see my time has come to die.'

"Fletcher went to get a portfolio to write down his master's words. Byron called him back, exclaiming, 'O my God! don't waste time by writing, for I have no time to waste. Now hear me—you will be provided for. O my poor dear child! My dear Ada! My God! could I but have seen her! Give her my blessing, and my dear sister Augusta and her children; and you will go to Lady Byron and say—tell her every thing—you are friends with her.' And tears rolled down his emaciated face.

"His voice here failed him, so that only now and then a word was audible. For some time he muttered something very seriously, and finally, raising his voice, said, 'Now, Fletcher, if you do not execute every order I have given you, I will torment you hereafter, if possible.'

"Poor Fletcher wept over his dying master, and told him he could not understand a word of what he had last been saying. 'O my God!' said Byron, 'then all is lost, for it is now too late. Can it be possible you have not understood me?' Fletcher replied, 'No, but do tell me again more clearly, my lord.' 'How can I?' said Byron: 'it is too late, and all is over.' Fletcher replied, 'Not our will, but God's, be done.' 'Yes,' said he, 'not mine be done; but I will try once more.' He made several efforts to speak, but through the indistinct mutterings of the dying man, only a few broken accents could be distinguished, and they were about his wife and child.

"After many ineffectual and painful efforts to make known his wishes, at the request of his friend, Mr. Parry, to compose himself, he shed tears, and apparently sunk into slumber, with an expression of grief and disappointment on his countenance. This was the commencement of the lethargy of death.

"I believe the last words the great poet ever spoke on earth were, 'I must sleep now.' How full of meaning those words were! Yes, he had laid himself down to his last sleep. For twenty-four hours not a hand nor foot was seen to stir; although that heart which had been the home of such wild feeling still continued to beat on. Yet it was evident to all around his bedside that the angel of death had spread his dark wings over Byron's pillow.

"On the evening of the 19th of April he opened his fine eye for the last time, and closed it peacefully, without any appearance of pain. 'O my God,' exclaimed the kind Fletcher, 'I fear my master is gone.' The doctors then felt his pulse, and said, 'You are right—he is gone.'

"It is impossible to describe the sensation produced at Missolonghi by the death of Lord Byron. All Greece, too, was bathed in tears. Every public demonstration of respect and sorrow was paid to his memory, by firing minute guns, closing all public offices and shops, and suspending the usual Easter festivities, and by a general mourning, and funeral prayers in all the churches. His body was embalmed by physicians, and preparations were made for taking it to England.

"A few days after his death, his honored remains were borne to the church where the body of Marco Bozzaris was buried. The coffin was a rude chest of wood; a black mantle was his only pall; and over it were placed a helmet, a sword, and a crown of laurel.

"Here the bier rested two days, and around it gathered a thousand noble hearts who had loved the generous poet. I stood by that coffin for a long time; and more tears were shed over it than I ever saw fall upon the dust of a great man. But the simple-hearted, grateful people, who crowded the church, loved him, not as the author of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, but as the distinguished benefactor of Greece. A detachment of his own brigade guarded his body. There was something indescribably more affecting and sublime in this spectacle than in the gorgeous display which usually attends the funeral obsequies of the great.

"I remained in the church till the shadows of night had fallen around that solemn place, and there could be seen the rude forms of the descendants of Plataea relieved against the walls, their armor gleaming in the uncertain light of the wax candles burning before the altar, and in the centre of the church a group of emancipated Greeks bending over that illustrious dust. It was all in keeping with the poet's own wayward soul."

2747. DEATH OF CAMPBELL, THE POET.

A writer in the North British Review gives a touching description of the closing scene of Campbell's earthly career. A contemporary well remarks that to utter the sentiment contained in the concluding sentences below furnishes the best commentary upon the purity of the life he had spent:—

"On the 16th he was able to converse more freely; but his strength had become more reduced, and being assisted to change his posture, he fell back insensible. Conversation was carried on in the room in whispers; and Campbell uttered a few sentences, so unconnected, that his friends were doubtful whether he was conscious or not of what was going on in his presence, and had recourse to an artifice to learn.

"One of them spoke of the poem of Hohenlinden, and pretending to forget the author's name, said he had heard it was by Mr. Robinson. Campbell saw the trick, was amused, and said playfully, but in a calm and distinct tone, 'No; it was one Tom Campbell.'

"The poet had, as far as a poet can, become for years indifferent to posthumous fame. In 1838, five years before this time, he had been speaking to some friends in Edinburgh on the subject. 'When I think of the existence which shall commence when the stone is laid over my head, how can literary fame appear to me, to any one, but as nothing? I believe, when I am gone, justice will be done to me in this way—that I was a pure writer. It is an inexpressible comfort, at my time of life, to be able to look back and feel that I have not written one line against religion or virtue.'

2748. SINGULAR DEATH OF A RUSSIAN POET.

Mr. Alexander Demainowitch Ilitchewski, creditably known by his poems, died when hardly thirty-five years old. His death is attributed to the vivacity of his imagination. Young, sufficiently rich, possessing all the gifts of pleasing, he avoided the world, and sought solitude. While yet a child, he had created for himself an imaginary being—a woman adorned by beauty and talent; he sought her in vain in this world, and his passion, instead of diminishing, increased in proportion as he perceived the impossibility of finding the object of his love. It was his love which made him a poet, and poetry, in its turn, raised the aspirations of the young man.

His parents, after having employed all means, all persuasions, to restore him to actual life, sent him to the capital. There he wrote down his dreams, and no occupation, no amusement, could distract him from them.

At last, he believed he had found her he adored. If a beautiful woman was shown him, he said, "Mine is still more beautiful." If the happiness of any of his acquaintance was spoken of, he replied, "Mine is still greater." Still, in spite of the great happiness which, according to his account, he enjoyed, he visibly declined.

On the 17th of October, he paid visits to all his acquaintances, and appeared extremely pleasant and gay. This extraordinary change gave his parents and friends the most lively joy, mixed, at the same time, with great astonishment.

The next day, early, some friends of M. Ilitchewski came to his house, and were told by the servant that his master was asleep. But one of them, without noticing his reply, entered the chamber of the young poet, and his surprise may be imagined at finding him inanimate upon his bed.

No indications suggested that he had committed suicide; his countenance was calm, and a smile rested on his lips; a natural and mild death had taken him from the earth. On a table was a paper on which he had written, "I have found, at last, the object of my love."

2749. WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK.

The twin brother of Willis Gaylord Clark thus alludes to some touching incidents connected with the close of the life of that gifted poet:—

"One of the Philadelphia journals, in announcing the demise of the dear departed, observes, 'Mr. Clark was a scholar, a poet, and a gentleman. "None knew him but to love him." His health had for a long time been failing. The death of his accomplished and lovely wife, a few years ago, upon whom he doted with a passionate and rapturous fondness, had shaken his constitution, and eaten his strength. None but intimate friends knew the influence of that sad affliction upon his physical frame. To the last, his heart yearned over the dust of that lovely woman. In his death chamber, her portrait stood always before him on his table, and his loving eyes turned to it even in extremest pain, as though it were his living and only friend.'

"This is literally true. Beyond question, moreover, the seeds of the disease which finally removed him from the world were 'sown in sorrow' for the death of the cherished companion of his bosom. His letters, his gradually declining health, his daily life, his published writings, all evince this. The rose on the cheek and the canker at the heart do not flourish at the same time. The manuscript of the Dirge in Autumn came to us literally sprinkled with spreading tear-drops; and the familiar correspondence of the writer is replete with kindred emotion.

"To the last moment of his life, he kept a collection of 'his Anne's' letters under his pillow, which he as regularly read every morning as his Bible and prayer book. Her portrait, draped in black, crossed the angle of the apartment, above his table, where it might gaze ever upon him with its 'large, bright, spiritual eyes.' Never shall we forget his apostrophe to that beautiful picture, when his 'flesh and his heart failed him,' and he knew that he must soon go hence, to be here no more. 'Sleep on, my love,' said he, in the beautiful and touching words of the Bishop of Chichester's 'Exequy on the Death of a Beloved Wife,' and in a voice scarcely audible through his frequent sobs.

'Sleep on, my love, in thy cold bed,
Never to be disquieted;
My last 'good night!' Thou wilt not wake,
Till I thy fate shall overtake;
Till age, or grief, or sickness, must Marry my body to that dust
It so much loves; and fill the room
My heart keeps empty in thy tomb.
Say for me there; I will not fail
To meet thee in that hollow vale;
And think not much of my delay,
I am already on the way;
And follow thee with all the speed
Desire can make, or sorrow breed.
Each minute is a short degree,
And every hour a step towards thee;

At night, when I betake to rest,
Next morn I rise nearer my west
Of life, almost by eight hours' sail,
Than when Sleep breathed his drowsy gale.'

"To the last, his heart was full-fraught with all tender reminiscences and associations. In the first stages of his illness, when as yet it was scarcely known to affect his general routine of life, he thus replies to a remonstrance from the writer against the growing infrequency of his familiar letters:—

"In these spring days, I—, all my old feelings come freshly up, and assure me that I am unchanged. I shall be the same always; so do you be. 'Twin'd both at a birth,' the only pledges of our parents' union, we should be all the world to each other.

'We are but two—a little band:
Be faithful till we die;
Shoulder to shoulder let us stand,
Till side by side we lie!'

"As he gradually grew weaker and weaker, the 'childhood of the soul' seemed to be renewed, the intellectual light to burn brighter and brighter, and the chastened fancy to become more vivid and refined.

"Willis was for some months aware that he had not long to live. 'I shall die,' said he, a few weeks since, 'in the leafy month of June—beautiful season!' And, turning his head to gaze upon the trees in the adjoining cemetery-grove, whose heavy foliage was swaying in the summer wind, he murmured to himself the touching lines of Bryant:—

'I know, I know I shall not see
The season's glorious show;
Nor will its brightness shine for me,
Nor its wild music flow;
But if around my place of sleep
The friends I love shall come to weep,
They may not haste to go.
Soft airs, and song, and light, and bloom,
Will keep them lingering by my tomb:
These to their softened hearts will bear
The thought of what has been,
And speak of one who cannot share
The gladness of the scene.'

"How forcibly were the recollections of this scene borne in upon the mind, as the long procession, following the friend for whom they mourned, entered the gates of St. Peter's on that brightest morning of the month of his heart! the officiating divine chanting eloquently the while the touching and beautiful service for the dead. Upon the soft velvet greensward, and the white marble vault slabs, shimmered down through venerable trees the warm sunlight, flecking all the expanse below; but where was he to whose eye every phase of nature was a delight; whose 'silent voice, speaking in forms and colors,' was ever in his ear; the divinity whom he worshipped with fervent, poetical devotion, looking ever through nature up to nature's God?"

2750. THE CUBAN POET.

In the month of July, 1844, twenty persons were executed together at Havana, in Cuba, for having been concerned in a conspiracy for giving liberty to the black population—the slaves of the Spanish inhabitants.

One of these, and the leader of the revolt, was Gabriel de la Concepcion Valdes, more commonly known by the name of Placido, the Cuban poet. Little is known of this negro beyond a few particulars contained in one or two brief newspaper notices, which appeared shortly after his execution, announcing the fact in this country.

The Heraldo, a Madrid newspaper, in giving an account of the execution, speaks of him as "the celebrated poet Placido;" and says, "This man was born with great natural genius, and was beloved and appreciated by the most respectable young men of Havana, who united to purchase his release from slavery." The Poems by a Cuban Slave, edited by Dr. Madden, some years ago, are believed to have been the compositions of this gifted negro.

Placido appears to have burnt with a desire to do something for his race; and hence he employed his talents not only in poetry, but also in schemes for altering the political condition of Cuba. The Spanish papers, as might be expected, accuse him of wild and ambitious projects, and of desiring to excite an insurrection in Cuba similar to the memorable negro insurrection in St. Domingo, fifty years ago.

Be that as it may, Placido was at the head of a conspiracy formed in Cuba in the beginning of 1844. The conspiracy failed, and Placido, with a number of his companions, was seized by the Spanish authorities. The following is the account given of his execution, in a letter from Havana, dated July 16, 1844, which appeared in the Morning Herald newspaper:—

"What dreadful scenes have we not witnessed here these last few months! what arrests and frightful developments! what condemnations and horrid deaths! But the bloody drama seems approaching its close; the curtain has just fallen on the execution of the chief conspirator, Placido, who met his fate with a heroic calmness that produced a universal impression of regret.

"Nothing was positively known of the decision of the council respecting him, till it was rumored a few days since that he would proceed, along with others, to the 'chapel' for the condemned. On the appointed day, a great crowd was assembled, and Placido was seen walking along, with singular composure, under circumstances so gloomy, smoking a cigar, and saluting, with graceful ease, his numerous acquaintances.

"Are you aware what the punishment of the 'chapel' means? It is worse a thousand times than the death of which it is the precursor. The unfortunate criminals are conducted into a chapel hung with black and dimly lighted. Priests are there to chant, in a sepulchral voice, the service of the dead; and the coffins of the trembling victims are arrayed in cruel relief before their eyes. Here they are kept for twenty-four hours, and are then led out to execution. Can any thing be more awful? And what a disgusting aggravation of the horror of the coming death!

"Placido emerged from the chapel cool and undismayed, whilst the others were nearly or entirely overcome with the agonies they had already undergone. The chief conspirator held a crucifix in his hand, and recited in a loud voice a beautiful prayer in verse, which thrilled upon the hearts of the attentive masses which lined the road he passed. It was written in prison on the night before his execution. On arriving at the fatal spot, he sat down on a bench, with his back turned, as ordered, to the military, and rapid preparations were made for his death. And now the dread hour had arrived. At the last he rose and said, 'Adios, mundo; no hay piedad para mi. Soldados, fuego!' (Adieu, O world; here is no pity for me. Soldiers, fire.) Five balls entered his body. Amid the murmurs of the horror-struck spectators, he got up, and turned his head upon the shrinking soldiers, his face wearing an expression of superhuman courage. 'Will no one have pity on me?' he said. 'Here,'—pointing to his heart,—'fire here.' At that instant two balls pierced his breast, and he fell dead whilst his words still echoed in our ears. Thus has perished the great leader of the attempted revolt."

2751. DEATH AND FUNERAL OF SHELLEY.

It is well known that Shelley was wrecked and drowned in a storm, with his friend, Captain Williams, on their way from Leghorn to Lerici.

"The remains of Shelley and Mr. Williams," says Leigh Hunt, "were burnt, after the good ancient fashion, and gathered into coffers. Those of Mr. Williams were subsequently taken to England. Shelley's were interred at Rome, in the Protestant burial-ground, the place which he had so touchingly described in recording its reception of Keats."

"The ceremony of the burning was alike beautiful and distressing. Trelawney, who had been the chief person concerned in ascertaining the fate of his friends, completed his kindness by taking the most active part on this last mournful occasion. He and his friend Captain Shenley, were first upon the ground, attended by proper assistants. Lord Byron and myself arrived shortly afterwards. His lordship got out of his carriage, but wandered away from the spectacle, and did not see it. I remained inside the carriage, now looking on, now drawing back, with feelings that were not to be witnessed."

"None of the mourners, however, refused themselves the little comfort of supposing that lovers of books and antiquity, like Shelley and his companion, —Shelley in particular, with his Greek enthusiasm, — would not have been sorry to foresee this part of their fate. The mortal part of him, too, was saved from corruption — not the least extraordinary part of his history."

"Among the materials for burning were many of the more graceful and more classical articles, such as could readily be procured — frankincense, wine, &c. To these was added Keats's volume found in his vest pocket."

"The beauty of the flame arising from the funeral pile was extraordinary. The weather was beautifully fine. The Mediterranean, now soft and lucid, kissed the shore as if to make peace with it. The yellow sand and blue sky were intensely contrasted with one another; marble mountains touched the air with coolness; and the flame of the fire bore away towards heaven in vigorous amplitude, waving and quivering with a brightness of inconceivable beauty. It seemed as though it contained the glassy essence of vitality. You might have expected a seraphic countenance to look out of it, turning once more, before it departed, to thank the friends that had done their duty."

"Shelley, when he died, was in his thirtieth year. His figure was tall and slight, and his constitution consumptive. He was subject to violent spasmodic pains, which would sometimes force him to lie on the ground till they were over; but he had always a kind word to give to those about him, when his pangs allowed him to speak. In this organization, as well as in some other respects, he resembled the German poet Schiller. Though well turned, his shoulders were bent a little, owing to premature thought and trouble. The same causes had touched his hair with gray; and though his habits of temperance and exercise gave him a remarkable degree of strength, it is not supposed he could have lived many years."

§ 263. MISCELLANEOUS.

2752. CHRISTOPHER PITT, THE POET.

Benson, who wrote a pamphlet to expose Dryden's translation of Virgil, was fond of the alliteration for which Pitt was remarkable. Pitt thought it an excellence far less considerable than Benson did. "But," said he, "since you like it so well, this couplet upon Cardinal Wolsey will not displease you:—

"Begot by butchers, but by bishops bred,
How high his honor holds his haughty head!"

2753. VEXATIONS OF OFFICE.

Sir Robert Walpole, at the close of his administration, was sitting one evening with some intimate friends, to whom he was complaining of the vanities and vexations of office, adding, from the second epistle of the second book of Horace,— "Luxuri satia, edicti, atque bibiasti; Tempus abire tibi est."

"Pray, Sir Robert," says one of his friends, "is that good Latin?" "Why, I think so: what objections have you to it?" "Why," says the other, dryly, "I did not know but that the word might be bride-isti in your Horace."

2754. MAJOR ANDRE A POET AND PROPHET.

This accomplished gentleman and gallant warrior, who forfeited his life to the unforgiving laws of war, published in New York, but a short time previous to his death, a poem called the Cow Chase, which terminates with the following sadly prophetic lines:—

"And now I've closed my epic strain,
I tremble, as I show it,
Lest this same warrior-drover Wayne
Should ever catch the poet."

He was apprehended as a spy on the very day that the last canto made its appearance in New York.

2755. ORIGIN OF RHYMING.

One may find the origin of bouts-rimés, or "Rhyming Ends," in Goujet's Bib. fr. xvi., p. 181. One Dulot, a foolish poet, when sonnets were in demand, had a singular custom of preparing the rhymes of these poems, to be filled up at his leisure. Having been robbed of his papers, he was regretting most the loss of three hundred sonnets. His friends were astonished that he had written so many which they had never heard. "They were blank sonnets," he replied ; and explained the mystery by describing his bouts-rimés. The idea appeared ridiculously amusing ; and it soon became fashionable to collect the most difficult rhymes, and fill up the lines.

2756. BUCHANAN.

The famous poet Buchanan, in his travels, was taken hold of by some of the pope's inquisitors, his free writings having raised suspicions about his religion ; but he, to acquit himself, wrote to his holiness this distich :—

"Laus tua, non tua fraus, virtus non copia rerum Scandere te fecit hoc decus eximium."

For this encomium he was set at liberty ; and being gone out of the pope's jurisdiction, he sent to his holiness, and desired that, according to his own true meaning, the selfsame verses should be read backward. The reading was thus :—

"Eximium decus hoc fecit te scandere rrrum, Copia non virtus, fraus tua, non tua laus."

2757. LORD BYRON'S APOLOGY.

No one knew how to apologize for an affront with better grace, or with more delicacy, than Lord Byron. In the first edition of the first canto of Childe Harold, the poet adverted in a note to two political tracts—one by Major Pasley, and the other by Gould Francis Leckie, Esq., and concluded his remarks by attributing "ignorance on the one hand, and prejudice on the other." Mr. Leckie, who felt offended at the severity, and, as he thought, injustice of the observations, wrote to Lord Byron, complaining of the affront. His lordship did not reply immediately to the letter, but in about three weeks he called upon Mr. Leckie, and begged him to accept an elegantly bound copy of a new edition of the poem, in which the offensive passage was omitted.

2758. THE MODERN ENGLISH POETESSES.

A charming article appeared about six years ago in the Quarterly Review, entitled Modern English Poetesses. It was written, we believe, by the late Henry Nelson Coleridge, and is full of cautious but kindly criticism. The conclusion is worth quotation :—

"Meleager bound up his poems in a wreath. If we did the same, what flowers would suit our tuneful life ?

"1. Mrs. Norton would be the Rose ; or, if she like it, Love lies a-bleeding.

"2. Miss Barrett must be Greek Valerian, or Lad-der to Heaven ; or, if she pleases, Wild Angelica.

"3. Maria del Occidente is a Passion Flower confessed.

"4. Irene was Grass of Parnassus, or sometimes a Roman Nettle.

"5. Lady Emmeline is a Magnolia Grandiflora, and a Crocus too.

"6. Mrs. Southey is a Meadow Sage, or Small Teasel.

"7. The classical nymph of Exeter is a Blue Belle.

"8. V. is a Violet, with her leaves heart-shaped.

"9. And the authoress of 'Phantasmion' is Heart's Ease."

The complimentary nature of the criticism drew a world of trouble upon John Murray, the well-known publisher of the Quarterly. He was inundated with verse. Each of the nine, in less than a week, offered him a volume—some on easy terms, some at an advanced price. He received letters, he received calls, and, worse still, volumes of manuscript verse.

But the friendly character of the criticism was not confined in its influence to the nine reviewed ; parcels of verse, from all parts of the country, were sent to receive an imprimatur at Albemarle Street. Some were tied with white tape, some were sewed with violet ribbon, and a few, in a younger hand, with Berlin wool.

"I wished," Mr. Murray has been heard to relate, "ten thousand times over, that the article had never been written. I had a great deal of trouble with the ladies who never appeared before ; and, while I declined to publish for the nine, succeeded in flattering their vanity, by assuring them that they had already done enough for fame, having written as much or more than Collins, Gray, or Goldsmith, whose reputations rested on a foundation too secure to be disturbed."

2759. DESTRUCTION OF LITERARY WORKS.

When Abdoolah, who, in the third century of the Mahometan era, governed Khorasan, was presented at Nishapoor with a manuscript, which was shown as a literary curiosity, he asked the title of it, and was told it was the tale of Wamick and Oozra, composed by the great poet Noshirwan. Abdoolah observed that those of his country and faith had nothing to do with any other book than the Koran, and that the composition of an idolater must be detestable. Not only he declined accepting it, but ordered it to be burnt in his presence ; and further issued a proclamation commanding all Persian manuscripts, which should be found within the circle of his government, to be burnt. Much of the most ancient poetry of the Persians perished by this fanatical edict.

2760. POPULARITY OF POETS.

When Lord Byron was presented with an American edition of Childe Harold, he exclaimed, "This, now, is something like immortality."

We are reminded of his remark by meeting in the Mexican correspondence of the Boston Atlas with this statement : "At Puebla I found in a convent a volume of Lalla Rookh, and another of the Lady of the Lake. On the battle-field of Contreras I picked up a volume of Burns's poems."

2761. BRYANT'S THANATOPSIS.

Bryant wrote Thanatopsis in his nineteenth year. It was offered for publication in the North American Review, then edited by Dana, the poet, who, discovering its great merit, thought it could not have been written by an American. The interest it excited produced a sort of epoch in the circle where it became known.

"Dana," says Griswold, "was informed that the author of it was a member of the Massachusetts Senate, then in session ; and he walked immediately from Cambridge to the state house in Boston, to obtain a view of the remarkable man. A plain, middle-aged gentleman, with a business-like aspect, was pointed out to him : a single glance was sufficient ; the legislator could not be the author of Thanatopsis ; and he returned without seeking an introduction. The introduction of the real author to the public, however, soon followed ; and need we doubt the effect which was produced upon the youth's exhibiting such a merit ?

2762. POOR COLLINS.

"At Chichester," says Mr. D'Israeli, "tradition has preserved some striking and affecting occurrences of the last days of the unhappy Collins. He would haunt the aisles and cloisters of the cathedral, roving nights and days together, loving their

"Dim, religious light ;"

Tomb of Collins.

and when the choristers chanted their anthem, the listening and bewildered poet, carried out of himself by the solemn strains and his own too susceptible imagination, moaned and shrieked, and awoke a sadness and terror most affecting in so solemn a place, their friend, their kinsman, and their poet was before them, an awful image of human misery and ruined genius.

2763. A MAN OF BOOKS.

Lewis Sacks was born at Nuremburg, in 1494. He was taught the trade of a shoemaker, and received merely an education in reading and writing. But being instructed in music, he had acquired, at the age of fourteen, the art of writing poetry ; and continued to make "verses and shoes, plays and pumps, boots and books, till the seventy-seventh year of his age."

At this time, he took an inventory of his stock in trade, and found, according to his own narrative, that his works filled thirty folio volumes, all written with his own hand. They consisted of forty-two hundred mastership songs ; two hundred and eight comedies, tragedies, and farces, some of which extended to seven acts ; seventeen hundred fables, tales, and miscellaneous poems ; and seventy-three devotional, military, and love songs, — making a sum total of six thousand and forty-eight pieces.

2764. BARON HALLER.

Poets change their opinions of their own productions wonderfully at different periods of life. Baron Haller was in his youth warmly attached to poetic composition. His house was on fire, and to rescue his poems, he rushed through the flames. He was so fortunate as to escape with his beloved manuscripts in his hands. Ten years afterwards, he condemned to the flames those very poems which he had ventured his life to preserve.

2765. AGE OF POETS.

Are poets destined to a long life ? It is rarely the case that they live to the common age of man, although instances are on record where they have lived to fourscore years and upwards. If manual exercise is united with close study, a man may lengthen his days to a good old age. It is the disregard of what produces ill health and endangers life that cuts down so many talented men in the flower of their days.

Ariosto died at the age of 59.

Burns died at the age of 38 ; Byron at the age of 36 ; Brainard at the age of 32 ; Butler at the age of 68.

Cowley died at the age of 49 ; Collins at the age of 55 ; Cowper at the age of 69 ; Camoens at the age of 55.

Dryden died at the age of 70 ; Dante at the age of 50.

Fessenden died at the age of 66.

Goldsmith died at the age of 41 ; Gray at the age of 57.

Hogg died at the age of 63 ; Hemans at the age of 45.

Logan died at the age of 40.

Milton died at the age of 67 ; Metastasio at the age of 34 ; Mellen at the age of 44 ; Moore at the age of 89.

Rockwell died at the age of 24.

Shenstone died at the age of 50 ; Spenser at the age of 46 ; Scott at the age of 61.

Thomson died at the age of 48.

Tasso died at the age of 52.

White died at the age of 21 ; Watts at the age of 75 ; Wordsworth at the age of about 60.

Young died at the age of 84.

2766. RALEIGH.

Walter Raleigh was one of the most remarkable men of the sixteenth century — less a poet, indeed, than a prose writer, and less a scholar than a man of court gallantry and a warrior. He was known both in the old world and the new.

His busy life was at length closed by a violent death, though probably an unjust one. The manner of his death will hardly find a parallel in history. He was beheaded October 29, 1618.

On the scaffold, after addressing the people in justification of his character and conduct, he took up the axe, and observed to the sheriff, "This is a sharp medicine, but a sound cure for all diseases."

Having tried how the block fitted his head, he told the executioner that he would give the signal by lifting his hand, and then added, "Fear not, but strike home."

Sir Walter Raleigh.

He then laid himself down, and was requested by the executioner to alter the position of his head. "So the heart be right," was his reply, "it is no matter which way the head lies." On the signal being given, the executioner failed to act with promptitude, which caused Raleigh to exclaim, "Why dost thou not strike? Strike, man!" By two strokes, which he received without shrinking, the head of this intrepid man was severed from his body.

2707. GERTRUDE OF WYOMING.

Some fourteen or fifteen years after the publication of Gertrude, Campbell found himself engaged in a correspondence with the son of Brandt, the Indian chief, who was represented by the poet as the leader of a savage party, whose ferocity gave to war more than its own horrors. Campbell had abused him, almost in the language of an American newspaper:—

"The mammoth comes, the foe, the monster Brandt,
With all his howling, desolating band."

It was rather a serious moment when a gentleman with an English name called on Campbell, demanding, on the part of the son of Brandt, some explanation of this language, as applied to his father. A long letter from Campbell is printed in Stone's Life of Brandt, addressed to the Mohawk chief, Aghsawatz, commonly called John Brandt, Esq., of the Grand River, Upper Canada, in which he states the various authorities which had misled him into the belief of the truth of the incidents on which his notion of Brandt's character was founded, and which, it seems, misrepresented it altogether.

It was, no doubt, a strange scene, and the poet could with some trash say, and with some pride, too, that when he wrote his poem, it was unlikely that he should ever have contemplated the case of the son or daughter of an Indian chief being affected by its contents. He promises in future editions to correct the involuntary error, and he does so by saying, in a note, that the Brandt of the poem is a pure and declared character of fiction.

This does not satisfy Mr. Stone's sense of justice, who would have the tomahawk applied to the offending rhyme, and who thinks any thing less than this is a repetition of the offence.

2708. POETIC MISERIES.

Pope Urban VIII. erected a hospital for the benefit of decayed authors, and called it the Retreat of the Incurables, intimating that it was equally impossible to reclaim the patients from poverty or poetry.

Homer is the first poet and beggar of note among the ancients. He was blind, sung his ballads about the streets, and his mouth was oftener filled with verses than with bread.

Plautus, the comic poet, was better off; for he had two trades: he was a poet for his diversion, and helped to turn a mill in order to gain a living.

Terence was a slave, and Boethius died in a jail.

Among the Italians, Paulo Burghese, almost as good a poet as Tasso, knew fourteen different trades, and yet died because he could get no employment in any of them.

Tasso was often obliged to borrow a crown from a friend to pay for a month's subsistence. He has left us a pretty sonnet to his cat, in which he begs the light of her eyes to write by, being too poor to buy a candle.

Bentivoglio, whose comedies will last with the Italian language, dissipated a large fortune in acts of benevolence, fell into poverty in his old age, and was refused admittance into a hospital, which, in his better days, he had himself paid for building.

In Spain, the great Cervantes died of hunger, and Camoens, equally celebrated in Portugal, ended his days in a hospital.

In France, Vaugelas was surnamed the Owl, from having been obliged to keep within all day, and only venturing out by night, through fear of his creditors. In his last will, he bequeathed every thing towards the discharge of his debts, and desired his body to be sold to that end.

Cassander was one of the greatest geniuses of his time, but barely able to procure his livelihood.

Bacon, "the wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind," lived a life of poverty and distress. Sir Walter Raleigh died on the scaffold. Spenser, the charming Spenser, died forsaken and in want.

The death of Collins came through neglect, first causing mental derangement. Milton sold his copy-right of Paradise Lost for fifteen pounds, at three payments, and finished his life in obscurity.

Dryden lived in poverty and distress, and towards the close of his life, was compelled to sell his talent piecemeal to support existence. "Little cause have I," said he, "to bless my stars for being born an Englishman."

It is quite enough for one century that it neglected a Cowley, and saw Butler starved to death. Otway died prematurely, and through hunger. Lee died in the streets; and Steele lived a life of perfect warfare with bailiffs.

Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield was sold for a trifle to save him from the gripe of the law. Fielding lies in the burying-ground of the English factory at Lisbon, without a stone to mark the spot. Savage died in prison at Bristol, where he was confined for a debt of eight pounds, leaving his corpse to the jailer, who defrayed the expense of his interment. Chatterton, the child of genius and misfortune, destroyed himself by taking poison.

§ 264. PRECOCITY OF MIND.

2769. ZERAH COLBURN.

HE eccentric Zerah Colburn was the sixth child of a somewhat indigent family in Caledonia county, Vermont. He was born in 1804. He and two of his brothers inherited from their father a superfluous finger, growing from the outside of each hand.

During the first years of Zerah's life, he gave no evidence of unusual talents; indeed, he was unusually awkward and backward. Owing to this circumstance, to parental indigence, and to the fact that he was at a great distance from school, he only received, during this long period, about six weeks of school instruction.

When he was within one month of six years of age, while his father was employed at joiner's work, and Zerah was playing on the floor, he suddenly began to say to himself, 5 times 7 are 35, 6 times 8 are 48, &c. His father's attention being arrested by hearing this, so unexpectedly, and at so early an age, he left his work, and began to examine him on the multiplication table. At first, he supposed he might have learnt it from other boys, but he soon found it was not so.

He now proceeded to interrogate him beyond the multiplication table. The first question of this kind was, what was the product of 97, multiplied by 13. He replied instantly, 1261. Other questions followed, still more difficult. The father was astonished.

The fact was so remarkable, that by means of the papers, it soon spread through the United States and Europe. The public curiosity being now highly excited, together with the ambition, vanity, and perhaps cupidity of his friends, he soon began to travel abroad with his father.

He was in Boston in the fall of 1810, when he was little over six years of age. The following questions were put to him:—

1. In 2000 years how many seconds? His answer was, 730,000 days, 17,520,000 hours, 1,051,200,000 minutes, 63,072,000,000 seconds.

2. Allowing a clock strikes 156 times in one day, how many times will it strike in 2000 years?

Answer. 113,880,000 times.

3. What is the product of 12,225, multiplied by 1223?

Answer. 14,951,175.

4. Suppose I have a cornfield, on which are 7 acres, having 17 rows to each acre, 64 hills to each row, 8 ears on a hill, and 150 kernels on an ear: how many kernels in the cornfield?

Answer. 9,139,200.

Before he was eight years of age, he was taken to Europe. In London, Paris, and elsewhere, he attracted much attention. The Earl of Bristol, and some other eminent gentlemen, gave him encouragement. He was finally placed, for a season, in one of the government schools of France. He remained in Europe several years. But it was at length found out, both by him and his father, (who accompanied him,) that the expense of a residence in Europe was too great for the receipts, and young Colburn was induced to try the stage, where he was well received. But even this was not permanent.

His fortune was various, both in the old world and the new. At eighteen years of age, we find him teaching school for his support. At twenty-one or twenty-two, he became a preacher, in Vermont, of the Wesleyan Methodist connection. Here, and every where else, except in numbers, he was only a common man.

It was a long time before he could be persuaded to explain how he procured his results, and when urged to the task, he would sometimes even weep. We have no room for details in such a work as this.

2770. TRUMAN HENRY SAFFORD.

To the state of Vermont was reserved the honor—if honor it can be called—of producing two of the greatest prodigies in mathematics, which our country has ever seen—Zerah Colburn and Truman Henry Safford. Of the former, we have given a brief account already; of the latter we will say a few words—all for which we have room.

This young prodigy was born at Royalton, Vermont, early in the year 1836, and, consequently, is now fifteen years of age. His present home is Cambridge, Massachusetts, near Mount Auburn Cemetery, where the writer of this article has just seen and conversed with him.

His father is a hardy farmer, but possesses superior intelligence, and his mother, formerly a judicious teacher, is said to have been as good a scholar as the Green Mountains ever produced. We are not, therefore, to wonder at superior intellectual power in their progeny; but with every allowance for a good inheritance, we should hardly be prepared for what we now behold.

Young Safford had a highly delicate mental organization to begin with. He was very frail during his infancy—so frail that none but a superior mother could have reared him. On entering his second year, his health underwent a change for the better.

The avidity of his infant intellect was insatiable. He learnt the names and external character of objects with astonishing rapidity, and forgot nothing. When but twenty months old, he learnt the alphabet, in the space of a month, from blocks. At the beginning of his third year, he learnt to reckon time upon the clock, and to enumerate from Webster's Spelling Book. At three years of age, he commenced going to school.

He did not like school, and, above all, school methods and restrictions. He had a way of his own. Every branch of study he preferred to master alone. His progress was astonishingly rapid.

Adams's New Arithmetic, for example, he went through with, thoroughly, in four days!

In his sixth year, he told his father, one day, that if he would tell him how many rods it was round a certain field, he would tell him how many barley-corns it would take to surround it. The father told him the number of rods was 1040. In a few minutes, the boy gave from his head the proper answer, viz., 617,760 barleycorns.

The maximum of Zerah Colburn's faculty of calculation was to give the product of four places of figures by five. Young Safford could equal this in his ninth year. This year, he suffered from a severe fit of sickness; but his mental powers were not impaired by it in the end.

At nine and a half years old, he prepared an almanac. The next year, he calculated four more — for Vermont, Boston, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. Some portions of the miscellaneous parts of these were the products of another hand; but the usual calendar calculations were prepared solely by Safford. In his tenth year, he even constructed a rule unknown before for calculating eclipses.

His greatest feat — perhaps the greatest of the kind ever performed — consisted in multiplying correctly in one minute, in his head, 365,365,365,365,365 by 365,365,365,365,365. He was then ten years old. It nearly overcame him.

We are not aware that there has been, as yet, any falling off in the case of this young prodigy. Judging from similar cases which have come before the world, and reasoning a priori on the subject, such a result might have been expected. May we not hope that the present case is an exception to the general rule?

The details of examinations made by Professor Peirce, and the late President Everett, of Harvard College, to show his giant powers in mathematics, would be exceedingly interesting. They may, however, be found elsewhere, especially in the Ladies' Repository for April, 1849, from the pen of Rev. A. Stevens, editor of Zion's Herald.

What is most needed, however, in the case of young Safford, at present, is bodily cultivation and discipline. His precocity will otherwise shorten his days. Would that a mind and heart as pure as his seem to be were often joined to a higher degree of physical hardihood, and greater capability of endurance!

2771. PRINCE HENRY'S WIT AND BRILLIANCY.

Prince Henry, the son of James I., whose premature death was lamented by the people, as well as by poets and historians, unquestionably would have proved an heroic and military character. Had he ascended the throne, the whole face of history might have been changed.

The prince early attracted the attention and excited the hopes of those who were about his person. A manuscript narrative has been preserved, which was written by one who tells us that he was "an attendant upon the prince's person ever after he was under the age of three years, and always diligently observed his disposition, behavior, and speeches." The latest anecdotes could not have occurred beyond the thirteenth or fourteenth year.

The first time he went to the town of Stirling, to meet the king, observing, without the gate of the town, a stack of corn, it fancifully struck him with the shape of the top he used to play with; and the child exclaimed, "That's a good top." "Why do you not play with it, then?" he answered. "Set you it up for me, and I will play with it."

This is just the fancy we might expect in a lively child, with a shrewdness above its years. In all things, freedom of action, from his own native impulse, he preferred to the settled rules of his teachers; and when his physician told him that he rode too fast, he replied, "Must I ride by rules of physic?" When he was eating a cold capon, in cold weather, the physician told him that that was not suitable meat for the weather. "You may see, doctor," said Henry, "that my cook is no astronomer."

Born in Scotland, and heir to the crown of England at a time when the mutual jealousies of the two nations were running so high, the boy often had occasion to express the unity of affection which was really in his heart. Being questioned by a nobleman, whether, after his father, he had rather be a king of England or Scotland, he asked which of them was best. Being answered that it was England, "Then," said the Scottish born prince, "would I have both." And once in reading this verse in Virgil,—

"Tros Tyriusve mihi nullo discrimine agetur," the boy said he would make use of that verse for himself, with a slight alteration, thus:—

"Anglus Scotusve mihi nullo discrimine agetur."

He was careful to keep alive the same feeling for another part of the British dominions, and the young prince appears to have been regarded with great affection by the Welsh; for when once the prince asked a gentleman at what mark he should shoot, the courtier pointed with levity at a Welshman who was present. "Will you see, then," said the princely boy, "how I will shoot at Welshmen?" Turning his back from him, the prince shot his arrow in the air.

When a Welshman, who had taken a large carouse, in the fulness of his heart and his head, said, in the presence of the king, that the prince should have forty thousand Welshmen to wait upon him against any king in Christendom, the king, not a little jealous, hastily inquired, "To do what?" The little prince turned away the momentary alarm by his facetiousness. "To cut off the heads of forty thousand leeks."

One of his servants having cut the prince's finger, and sucked out the blood with his mouth, that it might heal the more easily, the young prince, who expressed no displeasure at the accident, said to him pleasantly, "If—which God forbid!—my father, myself, and the rest of his kindred should fail, you might claim the crown, for you have now in you the blood royal."

Our little prince once resolved on a hearty game of play, and for this purpose only admitted his young gentlemen, and excluded the men: it happened that an old servant, not aware of the injunction, entered the apartment, on which the prince told him he might play too; and when the prince was asked why he admitted this old man rather than the other men, he rejoined, "Because he had a right to be of their number, for senex bis puer."

It was then the mode, when the king or the prince travelled, to sleep with their suite at the house of the nobility; and the loyalty and zeal of the host were usually displayed in the reception given to the royal guests. It happened that in one of these excursions the prince's servants complained that they had been obliged to go to bed supperless, through the pinching parsimony of the house, which the little prince at the time of hearing seemed to take no great notice of.

The next morning, the lady of the house coming to pay her respects to him, she found him turning over a volume that had many pictures in it; one of which was a painting of a company sitting at a banquet: this he showed her. "I invite you, madam, to a feast." "To what feast?" she asked. "To this feast," said the boy. "What, would your highness give me but a painted feast?" Fixing his eye on her, he said, "No better, madam, is found in this house." There was a delicacy and greatness of spirit in this ingenious reprimand, far excelling the wit of a child.

2772. THOMAS WILLIAMS MALKIN.

Thomas Williams Malkin was two years old before he began to talk; but he was familiar with the alphabet almost half a year sooner. Before he could articulate, when a letter was named, he immediately pointed to it with his finger.

From this time, when he was two years old, and the acquisition of speech seemed to put him in possession of all the instruments necessary to the attainment of knowledge, he immediately began to read, spell, and write with a rapidity which could scarcely be credited by those who were witnesses of its reality.

Before he was three years old, he had taught himself to make letters, first in imitation of printed books, and afterwards of handwriting, and that without any instruction, for he was left to chalk out his own pursuits of this nature.

On his birthday, when he attained the age of three years, he wrote a letter to his mother with a pencil, and a few months afterwards, he addressed others to some of his relatives.

At the age of four, he had learnt the Greek alphabet, and had advanced so far in Latin as to write an exercise every day with a considerable degree of accuracy. Before he had reached his fifth year, he not only read English with perfect fluency, "but," says his father, "he understood it with critical precision."

He had acquired a happy art in copying maps with neatness and accuracy—an amusement to which he was very partial. He had also made copies from some of Raphael's heads, so much in unison with the style and sentiment of the originals, as to induce connoisseurs to predict, that if he were to pursue the arts as a profession, he would one day rank among the most distinguished of their votaries.

When he was in his seventh year, he wrote fables, and made one or two respectable attempts at poetical composition; but the most singular instance of a fertile imagination, united with the power of making all he met with in books or conversation his own, yet remains to be told.

This was the idea of a visionary country, called Allestone, which was so strongly impressed on his own mind as to enable him to convey an intelligible and lively transcript of its description. Of this delightful territory he considered himself as king. He had formed the plan of writing its history, and had executed detached parts of it.

Neither did his ingenuity stop here; for he drew a map of the country, giving names of his own invention to the principal mountains, rivers, cities, seaports, villages, and trading towns. This map, in whatever light it is viewed, is a very remarkable production. Considerable part of the history he wrote in a number of letters and tales, in which he displayed a most fertile imagination.

This was one of the last efforts of his genius, for this youthful prodigy of learning died before he attained the seventeenth year of his age.

2773. PASCAL OUTDONE.

The French newspapers, of August, 1760, gave an account of a boy, only five years of age, whose precocity of talent exceeded even that of Pascal himself. He was introduced to the assembly of the Academy of Montpellier, where a great number of questions were put to him on the Latin language, on sacred and profane history, ancient and modern, on mythology, geography, chronology, and even philosophy, and the elements of the mathematics; all which he answered with so much accuracy, that the Academy gave him a most honorable certificate.

2774. LILLY, DESCARTES, PLATO, AND OTHERS.

Lilly, the astronomer, was born and brought up among rustic society; but he turned his childish mind from sheep and oxen, from ploughs and harrows, to the moon and stars.

Descartes was termed "the philosopher" when he was a child.

Plato was eloquent in infancy. Poetry has been able to boast of some of her worthiest sons, that they were cradled in the lap of the Muses. This was the case with Cowley, Milton, Lope de Vega, Pope, Watts, and many others. Pope says of himself,—

"While still a child, nor yet a fool to fame,
I lisped in numbers, for the numbers came."

2775. NANTEUIL, HANDEL, AND FERGUSON.

We find Nanteuil, when a boy, his parents being averse to their son's practising drawing, hiding himself in a tree to pursue the delightful exercise of his pencil.

Handel was intended for a doctor of the civil laws, but no parental discouragement could deprive him of his enthusiasm for the musical science; for, ever touching harpsichords, and having secretly conveyed a musical instrument to a retired apartment, he sat there through the night awakening his harmonious spirit.

Ferguson, the child of a peasant, acquired the art of reading without any one suspecting it, by listening to his father teaching his brother. He made a wooden watch, without the slightest knowledge of mechanism, and while a shepherd, like an ancient Chaldean, studied the phenomena of the heavens; and he made a celestial globe, as he had made a wooden watch. Can we hesitate to believe that in such minds there was not a resistless and mysterious propensity growing up with the temperaments of these artists?

Ferguson was a shepherd lad on a plain, placed entirely out of the chance of imitation, or of the influence of casual excitement, or any other of those sources of genius so frequently assigned for its production.

2776. KING EDWARD VI.

Though considerable talents and attainments have not always been associated with eminent stations, a goodly number of the great are to be found in the list of those who have been richly endowed by their Creator, and have diligently improved his gifts. The young King Edward VI. stands among the most prominent of these examples.

This amiable prince was born in 1537, at Hampton Court. His mother was Jane Seymour, the third wife of Henry VIII. At the early age of six years, he was committed to the care of Sir Anthony Cook, and other learned preceptors, who were intent on his improvement in spiritual knowledge, as well as in science and learning. The manner in which these gentlemen performed their duties, and in which the prince improved, may be ascertained from an account written by William Thomas, a learned man, who was afterwards clerk of the council. He says,—

"If ye knew the towardness of that young prince, your hearts would melt to hear him named, and your stomach abhor the malice of them that would him ill. The beautifullest creature that liveth under the sun, the wittiest, the most amiable, and the gentlest thing of all the world. Such a capacity in learning the things taught him by his schoolmaster, that it is a wonder to hearsay. And, finally, he hath such a grace of posture, and gesture in gravity, when he comes into a presence, that it should seem he were already a father, and yet passes he not the age of ten years. A thing, undoubtedly, much rather to be seen than believed."

In his ninth year he wrote letters in Latin and French; and in the British Museum are themes and orations in Latin, which he then composed. Curio, the Italian reformer, told his tutors, "that by their united prayers, counsels, and industry, they had formed a king of the highest, even divine hopes."

His ardent attachment and reverence to the Holy Scriptures are well known; and Fox tells us that "he was not wanting in diligence to receive whatever his instructors would teach him. So that, in the midst of all his play and recreation, he would always keep the hours appointed to study, using the same with much attention, till time called him again from his book to pastime."

"In this, his study and keeping of his hours, he so profited, that Cranmer, beholding his towardness, his readiness in both tongues, in translating from Greek to Latin, from Latin to Greek again, in declaiming with his schoolfellows, without help of his teachers, and that extempore, wept for joy, declaring to Dr. Cox, his schoolmaster, that he would never have thought it to have been in the prince, except he had seen it himself."

He became acquainted with seven languages, and well understood logic and theology.

2777. MICHAEL VERIN.

Michael Verin was born at Florence, in 1468. His father, whose name was Hugolino, was a man of a cultivated mind and of literary pursuits. He took peculiar pleasure in the instruction of his little son, assiduously promoting the development of his talents, and imbuing his mind with the love of virtue and knowledge. He taught him the elements of the Latin, Greek, and Italian languages; but was prevented from continuing his education by affairs which required the whole of his time and attention.

He therefore placed Michael in a seminary at Rome, where he made such rapid proficiency, that he had completed his grammatical studies at ten years old; and at that age he very well understood the Greek and Latin, Italian and Spanish: he had also a good knowledge of profane and sacred history, and had successfully applied himself to poetry.

What facilitated the acquisition of so much knowledge, was the method and regularity which he uniformly observed in his studies. He devoted stated hours to stated pursuits, employed every moment to the best advantage, and "never put off till to-morrow what should be done to-day."

Verin read with delight the works of the philosophers, orators, and poets of antiquity, and treasured in his mind the excellences and beauties they contain. He had a decided talent for poetry, and very ingeniously reduced into Latin distichs what he had selected as the most judicious maxims and reflections of Homer, Virgil, Plato, Horace, Sallust, Ovid, and Cicero, chiefly on political and moral subjects.

After having finished this performance, he had it printed, under the title of Moral Distichs, and presented it to the public. The young poet was then only in his thirteenth year. This work was received with great applause by all the literati of the time, and some of the learned supplied it with explanatory notes, to render it more easy to the apprehension of youth.

This amiable and prepossessing youth died in his fifteenth year.

2778. LEWIS CANDIAC.

Lord Lewis Candiac, a premature genius, was born at Candiac, in the diocese of Nismes, in France, in 1719. In the cradle he distinguished his letters; at thirteen months he knew them perfectly; at three years old he read Latin, either printed or in manuscript; at four he translated from that tongue; at six he read Greek and Hebrew, was master of the principles of arithmetic, history, and geography, heraldry, and the science of medals, and had read the best authors on almost every branch of literature. He died of a complication of disorders, in Paris, 1726.

2779. HUGO GROTIUS.

Hugo Grotius was born at Delft, April 10, 1583, and had the best master to direct his education. He was distinguished from his earliest years by great brilliancy of his parts, and his application was equally remarkable. At eight years of age he composed Latin elegiac verses, and at fourteen he maintained public theses in mathematics, law, and philosophy, with general applause. His reputation by this time was established, and he was mentioned by the principal scholars of the age as a prodigy of learning, and as destined to make a conspicuous figure in the republic of letters. His memory was said to be so retentive, that he remembered every thing he had ever read.

In 1598, he accompanied Barnevelt, ambassador extraordinary of the Dutch states, in a journey to France, where he was introduced to Henry IV., who was so pleased with his learning, that he presented him with his picture and a gold chain. While in France he took the degree of doctor of laws. The following year he commenced practice as an advocate, and pleaded his first cause at Delft. In the same year, though then only seventeen, he was chosen historiographer to the United Provinces, in preference to several learned men who were candidates for that office.

2780. EARLY PROFICIENCY AS A LINGUIST.

The Abbé de Rance, afterwards a celebrated monk of La Trappe, made such a rapid proficiency in Greek, that at the age of twelve he translated Anacreon, and published it with learned notes. He was very little older when he was appointed to a considerable benefice. Some persons at court murmuring at the advancement of so young an abbé, Caussin, the Jesuit, was directed by the king to examine him.

When the little abbé came to court, Caussin had Homer lying before him, and desired De Rance to read a passage which casually presented itself. The boy read it immediately in French; the Jesuit could not credit such an extraordinary facility, but thought he had looked at the Latin version, printed in the same page; and, covering the Latin with his gloves, was surprised to hear the lad explain the Greek as before. The Jesuit, astonished, exclaimed, "Il abes lynceus oculos."—"You have lynx eyes, my son, for you can see through a pair of gloves."

2781. THE AUSTRIAN PRODIGY.

Wilhelm Otto von Prawn, the son of a captain of cavalry in the Austrian service, was born at Tyrnau, in Hungary, on the 1st of June, 1811. When but an infant, he showed a singular desire for instruction; and in his second year he had acquired such a readiness in the knowledge of his letters, in reading, and in deciphering prints of subjects from general and natural history, that on the 1st of November, 1813, when but two years and five months old, he was deemed qualified to enter the second form of the principal national school of Tyrnau.

Having attended the school about ten months. on the 26th of August, 1814, he was examined with the rest of the pupils, and bore away the highest prize from seventy of his juvenile competitors, in reading and writing German, in Hungarian orthography, his catechism, and drawing.

On the examination of the 17th of March, 1815, this child, who had then attained the age of three years and three quarters, was again pronounced the greatest proficient among the one hundred and twenty-four pupils of his form, in reading the German, Hungarian, and Latin languages, in arithmetic, and his catechism.

This infant prodigy excited still greater attention, from the extraordinary and more rapid progress he made in music. From his second year he studied the violin with so much success, that after the examination of the 17th of March, he astonished those who were assembled to hear him; namely, the magistracy, all the teachers of the principal national schools, and a number of amateurs of music, by taking the leading part in a duet and trio of Pleyel's.

This he repeated on the 13th of April following, at a party given by Prince Schwartzzenburgh, at Tyrnau, before a numerous circle of nobility. Nor was the progress he made in acquiring foreign languages, fencing, and drawing, inferior to his other advancements.

During the summer of 1815, this boy gave a public concert at Vienna, where the astonishment and admiration of all present were unbounded. The proceeds of it he bestowed on the invalid fund.

2782. EARLY LIFE OF ROBERT HALL.

Sir Robert Hall, when a boy about six years of age, was sent to a boarding-school, where he spent the week, coming home Saturday and returning Monday. When he went away on Monday morning, he would take with him two or three books from his father's library, to read at the intervals between school hours. The books he selected were not those of mere amusement, but such as required deep and serious thought. Before he was nine years old, he had read over and over again, with the deepest interest, Edwards on the Affections, Edwards on the Will, and Butler's Analogy.

2783. GEORGE MORLAND.

George Morland was the son of a painter and picture dealer. Almost as soon as he escaped from the cradle, he took to the pencil and crayon, and showed that he inherited art the natural way. The indications of early talent in others are nothing compared to him. At four, five, and six years of age, he made drawings worthy of ranking him among the common race of students: the praise bestowed on these by the Society of Artists, to whom they were exhibited, and the money which collectors were willing to pay for the works of this new wonder, induced his father to urge him onward in his studies; and his progress was rapid.

But it is a dangerous thing to overtask either the mind or the body at these years, and there is great reason to believe that young Morland suffered both of these evils. His father stimulated him by praise and by indulgences at the table, and, to insure his continuance at his allotted tasks, shut him up in a garret, and excluded him from free air, which strengthens the body, and from education, that free air which nourishes the mind.

His stated work for the time was making drawings from pictures and from plaster casts, which his father carried out and sold; but as he increased in skill, he chose his subjects from popular songs and ballads, such as "Young Roger came Tapping at Dolly's Window," "My Name it is Jack Hall," "I am a Bold Shoemaker; from Belfast Town I came," and other productions of the mendicant muse.

The copies of pictures and casts were commonly sold for three half crowns each; the original sketches—some of them a little free in posture, and not over delicately handled—were framed and disposed of for any sum from two to five guineas, according to the cleverness of the piece, or the generosity of the purchaser. Though far inferior to the productions of his manhood, they were much admired; engravers found it profitable to copy them, and before he was sixteen years old, his name had flown far and wide.

2784. THE ADMIRABLE CRICHTON.

This gentleman was a native of Scotland, who, in the course of a short life, acquired an uncommon degree of celebrity, and on account of his extraordinary endowments, both of mind and body, obtained the appellation of "the admirable Crichton," by which title he has continued to be distinguished to the present day.

The time of his birth is said to have been in 1560. He is said to have received his grammatical education at Perth, and to have studied philosophy at the University of St. Andrew's. His tutor at that university was Mr. John Rutherford, a professor, at that time, famous for his learning, and who distinguished himself by writing four books on Aristotle's logic, and a commentary on his poetics.

According to Aldus Manutius, who called Crichton first cousin to the king, he was also instructed, with his majesty, by Buchanan, Hepburn, and Robertson, as well as by Rutherford; and he had scarcely arrived at the twentieth year of his age, when he had gone through the whole circle of the sciences, and could speak and write to perfection in ten different languages. Nor had he neglected the ornamental branches of education; for he had likewise improved himself, to the highest degree, in riding, dancing, and singing, and was a skilful performer on all sorts of instruments.

Possessing these numerous accomplishments, Crichton went abroad upon his travels, and is said to have first visited Paris. Of his transactions at that place, the following account is given: He caused six placards to be fixed on all the gates of the schools, halls, and colleges of the university, and on all the pillars and posts before the houses belonging to the most renowned literary characters in that city, inviting all those who were well versed in any art or science to dispute with him in the college of Navarre, that day six weeks, by nine o'clock in the morning, when he would attend them, and be ready to answer to whatever should be proposed to him in any art or science, and in any of these twelve languages, Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Greek, Latin, Spanish, French, Italian, English, Dutch, Flemish, and Sclavonian; and this either in verse or prose, at the discretion of the disputant.

During the whole intermediate time, instead of closely applying to his studies, as might have been expected, he attended to nothing but hunting, hawking, tilting, vaulting, riding, tossing the pike, handling the musket, and other military feats; or else he employed himself in domestic games, such as balls, concerts of music, vocal and instrumental, cards, dice, tennis, and the like diversions of youth.

This conduct so provoked the students of the university, that beneath the placard which was fixed on the Navarre gate, they wrote the following words: "If you would meet with this monster of perfection, the readiest way to find him is to inquire for him at the tavern, or the houses of ill fame."

Nevertheless, when the day appointed arrived, Crichton appeared in the college of Navarre, and acquitted himself beyond expression in the disputation, which lasted from nine o'clock in the morning till six at night. At length the president, after extolling him highly for the many rare and excellent endowments which God and nature had bestowed upon him, rose from his chair, and, accompanied by four of the most eminent professors of the university, gave him a diamond ring, and a purse full of gold, as a testimony of their respect and admiration. The whole ended with the repeated acclamations and huzzas of the spectators, and henceforward our young disputant was called the "admirable Crichton."

We find him, about two years after this display of his talents, at Rome, where he affixed a placard in all the conspicuous places of the city, in the following terms: "We James Crichton, of Scotland, will answer extempore any question that may be proposed." In a city which abounded in wit, this bold challenge could not escape the ridicule of a pasquinade. It is said, however, that being nowise discouraged, he appeared at the time and place appointed, and that, in the presence of the pope, many cardinals, bishops, doctors of divinity, and professors in all the sciences, he exhibited such wonderful proofs of his universal knowledge, that he excited no less surprise than he had done at Paris.

Boccalini, however, who was then at Rome, gives a somewhat different account of the matter. According to that writer, the pasquinade made such an impression upon him, that he left a place where he had been so grossly affronted as to be put upon a level with jugglers and mountebanks.

From Rome Crichton proceeded to Venice, where he contracted an intimate friendship with Aldus Manutius, Laurentius Massa, Speron Speronius, Johannes Donatus, and various other learned persons, to whom he presented several poems in commendation of the city and university. At length he was introduced to the doge and senate, in whose presence he made a speech, which was accompanied with such beauty of eloquence, and such grace of person and manner, that he received the thanks of that illustrious body, and nothing but this prodigy of nature was talked of through the whole city.

He likewise held disputations on the subjects of theology, philosophy, and mathematics, before the most eminent professors and large multitudes of people. His reputation was so great, that the desire of seeing and hearing him brought together a vast concourse of persons from different quarters to Venice. It may be collected from Manutius, that the time in which Crichton gave these demonstrations of his abilities was in the year 1580.

From Padua, Crichton set out for Mantua, where there happened to be at that time a gladiator who had foiled, in his travels, the most skilful fencers in Europe, and had lately killed three who had entered the lists with him in that city. The Duke of Mantua was much grieved at having granted this man his protection, as he found it to be attended with such fatal consequences.

Crichton, being informed of his concern, offered his services to drive the murderer, not only from Mantua, but from Italy, and to fight him for fifteen hundred pistoles. Though the duke was unwilling to expose such an accomplished person to so great a hazard, yet, relying on the report he had heard of his martial feats, he agreed to the proposal, and the time and place being appointed, the whole court attended to behold the performance.

At the beginning of the combat, Crichton stood only on his defence; while the Italian made his attack with such engeriness and fury, that he began to be fatigued. Crichton now seized the opportunity of attacking his antagonist in return, which he did with so much dexterity and vigor, that he ran him through the body in three different places, so that he immediately died of his wounds.

On this occasion the acclamations of the spectators were loud and extraordinary; and it was acknowledged by all of them that they had never seen art, grace, or nature, second the precepts of art in so striking a manner as on that day. To crown the glory of the action, Crichton bestowed the prize of his victory on the widows of the three persons who had lost their lives in fighting with his antagonist.

It is asserted that in consequence of this and his other wonderful performances, the Duke of Mantua made choice of him as preceptor to his son, Vincenzio de Gonzaga, who is represented as being of a riotous temper and a dissolute life.

One night, during the carnival, as he was walking through the streets of Mantua, and playing upon his guitar, he was attacked by half a dozen people in masks. The assailants found that they had no ordinary person to deal with, for they were not able to maintain their ground against him. Having at length disarmed the leader of the company, the latter pulled off his mask, and begged his life, telling him he was the prince, his pupil.

Crichton immediately fell upon his knees, and expressed his concern for his mistake; alleging that what he had done was only in his own defence, and that if Gonzaga had any design upon his life, he might always be master of it. Then taking his sword by the point, he presented it to the prince, who was so irritated at being foiled with all his attendants, that he instantly ran Crichton through the heart, in his twenty-third year.

2755. THE SISTERS DAVIDSON.

Among the more remarkable instances which are on record of mental precocity is the case of the two sisters, Lucretia M. and Margaret Davidson, daughters of Dr. Oliver Davidson, of Plattsburg, New York.

These young females were as beautiful in form and feature as they were brilliant in intellect. Lucretia was uncommonly symmetrical, though the prevailing expression of her face was melancholy. Her poetical writings, besides many which she burnt, amounted to two hundred and seventy-eight pieces.

A writer in the London Quarterly Review, supposed to be Dr. Southey, the poet laureate, said of her, "In our own language, except in the cases of Chatterton and Kirke White, we can call to mind no instance of so early, so ardent, and so fatal a pursuit of intellectual advancement." When she was only four years old, a number of her little books were found, filled with rude drawings, and accompanied by a number of verses in explanation of them, written in the characters of the printed alphabet. Her parents were poor, and she was compelled to almost constant employment at domestic services; yet every moment of leisure was devoted to reading.

It was thought a very great favor, when a gentleman, who knew of her literary taste, placed her at a female seminary; but his kindness proved the occasion of her destruction. Her constitution, already feeble, soon yielded to disease, under which she gradually sank, at the early age of seventeen years.

Margaret Davidson, who nearly resembled her sister in habits, taste, and character, was also eminently precocious in her intellect, and died early.

2756. DON LOPE DE VEGA.

It is usual for precocious persons to perish prematurely. Such, however, was not the case with Lope de Vega, the Spanish dramatic poet. He lived to full threescore and ten; and yet he was one of the most remarkable instances of mental precocity which we have on record.

While a mere child he displayed a lively taste for poetry. Like Watts, he made verses before he knew how to write them; and, if we are to place full reliance on his own statements, he had composed several theatrical pieces when scarcely twelve years of age.

From this period, during his whole life of about seventy-three years, he continued without interruption to produce poems and plays. We have seen elsewhere that, according to the estimate of some, he had printed what would have been equal to one thousand volumes of four hundred and twenty-six pages each, admitting each page to contain fifty lines; and that he claimed to have written still more that never saw the light; and that he wrote in all one hundred and thirty-three thousand sheets, or, on an average, five sheets a day his whole life. If he is supposed to have commenced writing at thirteen years of age, and to have written every day for seventy years, he must, on this supposition, have written about two thousand lines daily. But his works were less valuable to the world than those of many authors who were less voluminous, and they are now chiefly forgotten.

2757. JOHN PHILIP BARATIERE.

John Philip Baratiere was a most extraordinary instance of the early and rapid exertion of mental faculties. This surprising child was the son of Francis Baratiere, minister of the French church at Schwoback, near Nuremberg, where he was born, January 10, 1721. The French was his mother tongue, with some words of High Dutch; and, by means of his father's occasionally talking Latin to him, it became as familiar to him as the rest; so that, without knowing the rules of grammar, he, at four years of age, talked French to his mother, Latin to his father, and High Dutch to the servant and neighboring children, without mixing or confounding the respective languages.

About the middle of his fifth year, he acquired Greek in like manner; so that in fifteen months he perfectly understood all the Greek books in the Old and New Testament, which he translated into Latin.

When five years and eight months old, he entered upon Hebrew; and, in three years more, was so expert in the Hebrew text, that, from a Bible without points, he could give the sense of the original in Latin or French, or translate, extempore, the Latin or French versions into Hebrew.

He composed a dictionary of rare and difficult Hebrew words; and, about his tenth year, amused himself for twelve months with the rabbinical writers. With these he intermixed a knowledge of the Chaldaic, Syriac, and Arabic; and acquired a taste for divinity and ecclesiastical antiquity, by studying the Greek fathers of the first four ages of the church.

In the midst of these occupations, a pair of globes coming into his possession, he could, in eight or ten days, resolve all the problems on them; and, in January, 1735, he devised his project for the discovery of the longitude, which he communicated to the Royal Society of London, and the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin.

In June, 1731, he was matriculated in the University of Altorf; and, at the close of 1732, he was presented by his father at the meeting of the reformed churches of the Circle of Franconia, who, astonished at his wonderful talents, admitted him to assist in the deliberations of the synod; and to preserve the memory of so singular an event, it was registered in their acts.

In 1634, the Margrave of Brandenburg Anspach granted this young scholar a pension of fifty florins; and his father receiving a call to the French church at Stettin, in Pomerania, young Baratiere was, on the journey, admitted master of arts. At Berlin he was honored with several conversations with the King of Prussia, and was received into the Royal Academy.

The king, to mortify our ingenious youth, coldly asked him if he knew the law. The learned boy was constrained to confess that he knew nothing of law. "Go," was the king's reply, "go and study it before you give yourself out as a scholar." Poor Baratiere renounced for this his other studies, for the time being, and became an excellent lawyer at the end of fifteen months; but the effort is considered by some to have been the occasion of his untimely decease.

Towards the close of his life he acquired a considerable taste for medals, inscriptions, and antiquities, metaphysical inquiries, and experimental philosophy. He wrote several essays and dissertations; made astronomical remarks and laborious calculations; took great pains towards a history of the heresies of the anti-Trinitarians, and of the thirty years' war in Germany.

His last publication, which appeared in 1740, was on the succession of the bishops of Rome. The final work he engaged in, and for which he had gathered large materials, was, Inquiries concerning the Egyptian Antiquities.

But the substance of this blazing meteor was now almost exhausted. He was always weak and sickly, and died October 5, 1740, aged nineteen years eight months and sixteen days.

Baratiere published eleven different pieces, and left twenty-six manuscripts, on various subjects, the contents of which may be seen in his life, written by M. Formey, professor of philosophy at Berlin.

2788. DELRIUS.

Among the various instances of literary precocity, perhaps that of the learned Delrius is the most extraordinary. At the early age of nineteen, he published a work illustrative of Seneca, quoting one hundred thousand different authors.

2789. SIR WALTER SCOTT.

"I last night supped at Mr. Walter Scott's. He has the most extraordinary genius for a boy I ever knew. He was reading a poem to his mother when I went in. I made him read on: it was the description of a shipwreck. His passion rose with the storm. He lifted his eyes and hands. 'There's the mast gone,' says he; 'crash it goes; they will all perish!'

"After his agitation, he turns to me. 'That is too melancholy,' says he; 'I had better read you something more amusing.' I preferred a little chat, and asked his opinion of Milton, and other books he was reading, which he gave me wonderfully. One of his observations was, 'How strange it is that Adam, just new come into the world, should know every thing! That must be the poet's fancy,' says he. But when he was told he was created perfect by God, he instantly yielded.

"When taken to bed last night, he told his aunt he liked that lady. 'What lady?' 'Why, Mrs. Cockburn; for I think she is a virtuoso, like myself.' 'Dear Walter,' says aunt Jenny, 'what is a virtuoso?' 'Don't ye know? Why, it's one who wishes and will know every thing.'

"Now, sir, you will think this a very silly story. Pray, what age do you suppose this boy to be? Name it now, before I tell you. 'Why, twelve or fourteen.' No such thing; he is not quite six years old."

2790. MUSICAL PRODIGY.

Carl Anton Florian Eckert, the son of a sergeant in the second regiment of Fencible Guards, was born on the 7th of December, 1820.

While in the cradle, the predilection of this child for music was striking, and passages in a minor key affected him so much as to make tears come in his eyes. When about a year and a quarter old, he listened to his father playing the air Seene Mika with one hand, on an old harpsichord; he played it with both hands, employing his knuckles in aid of his short and feeble fingers. He continued afterwards to play by ear.

He retained in his memory whatever he heard and could tell at once whether an instrument was too high or too low for concert pitch. At the age of four and a half years, his ear was sufficiently delicate to enable him to name any note or chord which might be struck without his seeing it; and he transposed into any key he pleased, executing, with the greatest facility, pieces of fancy extempore.

2791. CAN SHE SPIN?

A young girl was presented to James I. as an English prodigy, because she was deeply learned. The person who introduced her boasted of her proficiency in ancient languages. "I can assure your majesty," said he, "that she can both speak and write Latin, Greek, and Hebrew." "These are rare attainments for a damsel," said James; "but, pray tell me, can she spin?"

§ 265. PRESS, LIBERTY AND RESTRAINT OF.

2792. STYLE OF AN AUTHOR.

ORD Bacon relates of Queen Elizabeth, that once, when she could not be persuaded that a book containing treasonable matter was really written by the person whose name it bore, she said, with great indignation, that "she would have him racked to produce his author." Bacon replied, "Nay, madam; he is a doctor; never rack his person; rack his style; let him have pen, ink, and paper, and help of books, and be enjoined to continue his story, and I will undertake, by collecting his styles, to judge whether he were the author."

This is only one instance among many of Bacon's great good sense, as well as practical liberality.

2793. LEIGH HUNT DEFEATED IN ATTEMPTING TO INTRODUCE ENGLISH LITERATURE INTO ITALY.

"I thought," says Leigh Hunt, "when abroad, I would try if I could bring over some literature of modern English growth into Italy. I proposed to a Florentine bookseller to set up a quarterly compilation from the English magazines. Our periodical publications are rarely seen in Italy, though our countrymen are numerous. In the year 1825, two hundred English families were said to be resident in Florence. In Rome, visitors, though not families, were more numerous; and the publication, for little cost, might have been sent all over the peninsula. The plan was to select none but the very best articles, and follow them with an original one commenting upon their beauties, so as to make readers in Italy well acquainted with our living authors. But the Tuscan authorities were frightened.

"You must submit the publication," said my bookseller, 'to a censorship.'

"Be it so."

"But you must let them see every sheet before it goes to press, in order that there may be no religion or politics."

"Very well: to please the reverend censors, we will have no religion. Politics also are out of the question."

"Ay, but politics may creep in."

"They shall not."

"Ah, but they may creep in, say the authorities, without your being aware; and then what is to be done?"

"Why, if neither the editor nor the censors are aware, I do not see how any very vivid impression need be apprehended with regard to the public."

"That has a very plausible sound; but how if the censors do not understand English?"

"There, indeed, they confound us. All I can say is, that the English understand the censors, and I see we must drop our intended work."

"This was the substance of a discourse which I had with the bookseller, in answer to the communications which he brought me from his government. The prospectus had been drawn out; the bookseller had rubbed his hands at it, thinking of the money which the best writers in England were preparing for him; but he was forced to give up the project. 'Ah,' said he to me in his broken English, as he sat in winter time with cold feet, and an irritable face, pretending to keep himself warm by tantalizing the tips of his fingers over a little basin of charcoal, — 'ah, you are verree happie in England. You can get so much money as you please.'"

2794. FREEDOM OF THE PRESS IN DIFFERENT COUNTRIES.

A letter appeared in an English newspaper, giving a ludicrous account of one of the heads of the Bourbon family; upon which, not only the Spanish ambassador, but all the ambassadors belonging to that family, joined in a memorial, which was delivered to Lord Weymouth, insisting upon condign punishment being inflicted upon the printer, and even threatening England as a nation, if such satisfaction was refused.

To this the secretary of state answered like a man of sense and spirit, that he was surprised the ambassadors could be so ignorant of the constitution of that country, as not to know that it was out of the power of government to punish a printer in the way their excellencies desired; that he was sorry for the affront offered to their sovereign; that the English newspapers took liberties with their own king, and a foreign prince had no great cause to be angry, if he was sometimes treated with the same freedom, since the laws of the land were equally the shelter of the offenders in both cases.

As to the threats, he smiled at them; but added, that if what the printers had done could be construed into a libel, the attorney-general should be spoken to, a prosecution commenced, and such damages adjudged as a jury of Englishmen thought equitable.

Prince Masserano, the Spanish ambassador, was greatly enraged at this answer of Lord Weymouth's, and exclaimed, "What, not punish the rascal who has called the king of Spain a fool?" "No," said Lord Weymouth, "I cannot; for these very printers have said the same of our king, who is a sensible man; and when brought to trial by our course of law, they were acquitted."

2795. JOURNALS IN LOUIS PHILIPPE'S REIGN.

During the eighteen years of Louis Philippe's reign, fifty-seven journals were obliged to discontinue publication. Their writers and contributors were sentenced, in the aggregate, to an imprisonment of three thousand one hundred and forty-one years.

2796. ANNE OF AUSTRIA.

In a history of the press at Caille, an anecdote occurs from which it may be seen that Anne of Austria loved literature, and sustained its freedom and dignity. Antoine Berthier, librarian of Paris, having formed a design to add to the Life of Cardinal Richelieu two volumes of letters and memoirs, addressed himself to the regent, to whom he intimated, that without a powerful protection, he dared not hazard the publication, as many persons who were received at court were blamed in its pages. Her reply was truly noble: "Proceed without fear; and make so many blush for vice, that, for the future, virtue only may find repose in France."

2797. SUSPICIONS OF TREASON.

Paradise Lost, when ready for the press, was nearly being suppressed through the ignorance or malice of the licenser, who saw or fancied treason in the following noble simile:—

"As when the sun, new risen,
Looks through the horizontal, misty air,
Shorn of his beams; or from behind the moon,
In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
On half the nations, and with fear of change
Perplexes monarchs."

2798. AMERICAN BONAPARTEISM.

A Mr. Janeway, of Loudon county, Virginia, has been presented by the grand jury for writing articles against slavery for the National Era, a paper printed at Washington city, out of the jurisdiction of Virginia. It is as if President Bonaparte were to imprison Julius Le Chevalier for his letters from Paris, published in the New York Tribune.

2799. RESTRAINTS ON THE PRESS.

By the scandalous act of Parliament of the 13th and 14th of King Charles II., chap. 33, for regulating the press, it was enacted that no private person, or persons, shall print, or cause to be printed, any book or pamphlet whatsoever, unless the same be first lawfully licensed, and authorized to be printed, by certain persons appointed by the act to license the same.

Law books were to be licensed by the lord chancellor, or by one of the chief justices, or by the chief baron.

Books of history, or books concerning state affairs, were to be licensed by one of the principal secretaries of state.

Books concerning heraldry were to be licensed by the earl marshal.

And all other books, that is to say, all novels, romances, and fairy tales, and all books about philosophy, mathematics, physic, divinity, or love, were to be licensed by the lord archbishop of Canterbury, or by the lord bishop of London for the time being; the framers of this curious act of Parliament, no doubt, supposing that those right reverend prelates were, of all the men in the kingdom, the most conversant with all those subjects.

That act commenced in June, 1662, and passed only for two years. It was continued by an act of the 16th of Charles II., and by another act of the 17th year of the same disgraceful reign; and in a few months afterwards it expired.

2800. POWER OF THE PRESS.

One of the most remarkable instances of sagacity of which we have any record is Wolsey's remark on the press. Speaking in the name of the Romish clergy, this haughty prelate said, "We must destroy the press, or the press will destroy us." How truly foreseen, and how entirely verified!

2801. NEWS-CLOTH.

A printer at Greenock, Scotland, having been fined for printing news on unstamped sheets of paper, now prints upon cloth, which is not specified in the act, and calls his journal the Greenock News-cloth, in allusion to that material.

2802. MILTON.

The literary fate of Milton was remarkable: his genius was castrated alike by the monarchical and the republican governments. The royal licenser expunged several passages from Milton's history, in which Milton had painted the superstition, the pride, and the cunning of the Saxon monks, which the sagacious licenser applied to Charles II. and the bishops. But Milton had before suffered as merciless a mutilation from his old friends the republicans, who suppressed a bold picture, taken from life, which he had introduced into his History of the Long Parliament and Assembly of Divines. Milton gave the unlicensed passages to the Earl of Anglesea, a literary nobleman, the editor of White-lock's Memorials; and the castrated passage, which could not be licensed in 1670, was received with peculiar interest when separately published in 1681.

PRINTING AND PRINTERS.

§ 266. HISTORICAL ITEMS.

2803. THE ART OF PRINTING.

HEN, where, and by whom printing was invented are equally unknown; and it may, perhaps, be matter of surprise to many that the art of printing, which throws so much light upon almost every other subject, should throw little upon its own origin. The most we know is, that it was discovered either in Germany or Holland, about 1440—only about four hundred years ago; that the first types were made of wood, not metal; and that some of the earliest printed works were passed off as manuscripts.

The two principal cities which lay claim to the invention are Haerlem and Mentz; and either from one or the other, or perhaps from both, it was conveyed to the different cities and countries of Europe.

The introduction of printing into England is undoubtedly to be ascribed to William Caxton, a modest, worthy, and industrious man, who went to Germany entirely to learn the art; and, having practised it himself at Cologne, in 1471, brought it to England two years afterwards. He was not only a printer, but an author; and the book which he translated, called the Game at Chess, and which appeared in 1474, is considered as the first production of the English press.

The seal engravers were, however, the first printers; and the art of printing with blocks was merely an extension of the art, from impressions on wax to impressions on paper or vellum.

Though a variety of opinions exist as to the individual by whom the art of printing was first discovered, yet all authorities concur in admitting Peter Schœffer to be the person who invented cast metal types; having learned the art of cutting the letters from the Guttembergs: he is also supposed to have been the first who engraved on copper plates.

The following testimony has been preserved in the family, by Jo. Fred. Faustus, of Ascheffenburg:—

“Peter Schœffer, of Gernsheim, perceiving his master Faust’s design, and being himself desirous ardently to improve the art, found out—by the good providence of God—the method of cutting (incidendi) the characters in a matrix, that the letters might easily be singly cast, instead of being cut. He privately cut matrices for the whole alphabet. Faust was so pleased with the contrivance, that he promised Peter to give him his only daughter, Christina, in marriage—a promise which he soon after performed.”

2804. THE FIRST PRINTED BOOK, OR THE DEVIL AND DR. FAUSTUS.

The first printed book on record is the Book of Psalms, by one Faust, of Mentz, and his son-in-law, Schœffer. It appeared in 1457, less than four hundred years ago. Several works were printed many years before, by Guttemberg; but as the inventors wished to keep the secret to themselves, they sold their first printed works as manuscripts.

This gave rise to an adventure that brought calamity on Faust. Having, in 1450, begun an edition of the Bible, and finished it in 1460, he carried several printed copies of it to Paris, and offered them for sale as manuscripts. This made him at once an object of suspicion.

It was in those days when Satan was thought to be ready at every man’s elbow, to offer his services if called upon, and as the French could not conceive how so many books should perfectly agree in every letter and point, they ascribed it to infernal agency, and poor Faust had the misfortune to be thrown into prison.

Here it was, that, in order to prove he had no aid from the devil, as well as to gain his liberty, he was obliged to reveal the secret, and show to the proper officers how the work was done.

Perhaps it was upon this adventure that somebody built up the story of the league of the devil and Dr. Faustus, as well as wrote those ludicrous dialogues, which, in some of the puppet-shows, Faust, under the name of Dr. Faustus, is made to hold with the devil.

2805. INTRODUCTION OF PRINTING INTO ENGLAND.

In the earliest days of the art of printing, we have narratives of printers who were romantically spirited away from the parent presses. One of the most extraordinary is the history of printing, set up at Oxford, ten years before the art was practised in Europe, except at Haerlem and Mentz, and which is as follows:—

Henry VI., by advice of the Archbishop of Canterbury, despatched a confidential agent in disguise, under the guidance of Caxton, in his trading journeys to Flanders. The Haerlemites were so jealous of idling strangers who had come on the same insidious design, that foreigners had frequently been imprisoned.

The royal agent did not venture to enter the city; but by heavy bribes, and a secret intercourse with the workmen, one dark night he smuggled a printer aboard a vessel, and carried him away. That printer, whose name was Frederic Corsellis, on landing in England, was attended by a guard to Oxford. There he was constantly watched, till he had revealed the mysterious craft.

The evidence of this unheard-of history hinged on a record at Lambeth Palace, authenticating the whole narrative, and on a monument of Corsellis’s art, which any one might inspect at the Bodleian, being a book bearing a date six years prior to any printing by Caxton. The record at Lambeth, however, was never found, and never heard of, and the date of the book might have been accidentally or designedly falsified. An X dropped in the date of the impression would account for the singularity of a book printed before our Caxton had acquired the art. The tale of Corsellis long excited a sharp controversy at Oxford. The possibility of the existence of this person at Oxford, and even of the book he printed, appears by a lively investigation of Dr. Cotton; and we have been assured of a circumstance, which, if true, would render the story of Corsellis probable: it is, that a family of this name may still be found in Oxfordshire.

2806. THE RIGHT OF PRINTING BIBLES.

Printing of English Bibles, even before the dethronement of Charles I., was an article of open trade in England. Every one printed at the lowest price, and as fast as their presses would allow. Even those who were dignified as "his majesty's printers" were among these manufacturers; for we have an account of a scandalous omission by them of the important negative in the seventh commandment. The printers were summoned before the Court of High Commission, and this not served to bind them in a fine of three thousand pounds. A prior circumstance, indeed, had occurred, which induced the government to be more vigilant on the biblical press.

The learned Usher, one day, hastening to preach at Paul's Cross, entered the shop of one of the stationers, — as booksellers were then called, — and inquiring for a Bible of the London edition, when he came to look for his text, to his astonishment and his horror, he discovered that the verse was omitted in the Bible! This gave the first occasion of complaint to the king of the insufferable negligence and incapacity of the London press; and, says the manuscript writer of this anecdote, first bred that great contest which followed, between the University of Cambridge and the London stationers, about the right of printing Bibles.

2807. FIRST ENGLISH PRINTING PRESS.

The first printing press in England was set up in the almonry of Westminster, where Caxton, probably encouraged by the learned Thomas Milling, then abbot, produced the moral treatise entitled the Game and Playe of the Chesse, the first book printed in that country. The ancient printing house contains nothing of the interior appearance peculiar to its original arrangement, having been for a long time let in tenements, and divided according to the convenience of the generation of lodgers that have inhabited it.

2808. PAPER MADE EIGHTEEN HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

The Chinese affirm that eighteen centuries ago, they had discovered the secret and means of manufacturing paper. Before that invention they used to inscribe written characters on thin strips of bamboo, or sheets of metal, using a style, or pen of iron, for the purpose of marking the characters; and this, they assert, had been the practice of their nation from the most remote ages. In the first century of the Christian era, during the Han dynasty, a mandarin, who was attached to the emperor's court, and whose name was Sai-lun, discovered the art of paper making.

Tradition affirms that this mandarin took the bark of trees, pieces of old silk, and hempen cloth, and boiled them down until they came to the consistence of glue, or paste; he then spread the mass in thin layers upon the earth, and the sun's rays dried up the moisture, leaving a thin, compact substance: thus the paper was made. Shortly afterwards, the means were discovered by which a smooth surface was given to paper.

2809. THE BIBLE.

Great Britain did not allow the printing of the English Bible in this country whilst we were colonies. The first Bible in the English language, printed in America, was published in 1782.

As the printing of the Scriptures was prohibited during the early history of New England, the pulpit Bibles, in most of the Congregational and other churches here, were Oxford editions, in which was included the Book of Common Prayer, the Psalter, and the Articles of Faith of the English church.

2810. INTRODUCTION OF PRINTING INTO THE UNITED STATES.

The Rev. Jesse Glover, a worthy and wealthy dissenting clergyman of England, may be considered as the father of the American press. This benefactor of the infant colony of Massachusetts was early engaged in pursuing such measures as he judged would be for its interest and prosperity.

Among other things, he was desirous of establishing a press for the accommodation of the business of the church and state. To raise a sum sufficient to purchase printing materials, he contributed liberally himself, and solicited aid from others, in England and Holland. In 1638, Mr. Glover, having obtained the means, procured a good printing apparatus, and engaged a printer to accompany it to New England.

Mr. Glover, with his family, embarked in the same vessel: he, however, died on the passage, and his widow and children, after their arrival, settled at Cambridge. Stephen Daye, (the printer engaged by Mr. Glover,) by the direction of the magistrates and elders, having erected the press and prepared the other parts of the apparatus, began business in the first month of 1639. The first thing issued from the press was the Freeman's Oath; in the second, an Almanac; and the third, the Psalms in metre.

Samuel Green, the successor of Daye in the printing business, was in Cambridge eight years before the arrival of Daye from England. Green probably obtained a knowledge of the art from Daye, as he was not known as a printer until about the year 1649. Mr. Green died at Cambridge, in 1702, aged eighty-seven years. He was esteemed for his virtues, and was the father of nineteen children. For a long period, many of his descendants of his name have been engaged in the printing business.

2811. EARLY PRINTING.

Several years before the revolution, a type foundry was commenced at Germantown, but employed chiefly for the presses of its owner, Christopher Sower, who printed the Bible and other works in the German language.

In 1769, Abel Buel, of Killingworth, in Connecticut, began the casting of types, on a small scale; but the first, who regularly pursued this business in the United States, was John Baine, of Edinburgh, who settled in Philadelphia soon after the termination of the war.

2812. JEALOUSY OF BOOKSELLERS AND PRINTERS.

Day, the printer, in Elizabeth's time, envied by the rest of his fraternity, who did what they could to hinder the sale of his books, had books upon his hands, in the year 1572, to the value of two thousand or three thousand pounds — a great sum in those days. But living under Aldersgate, an obscure corner of the city, he wanted a good vent for them. His friends, who were among the learned, procured aid from the dean and chapter of St. Paul's Churchyard, so that he had a neat, handsome shop framed. It was little and low, and flat roofed, and leaded like a terrace, railed and posted, fit for men to stand upon in any triumph or show, but could not in any wise either hurt or debase the same. This cost him forty or fifty pounds.

But his brethren, the booksellers, envied him, and by their interest got the mayor and aldermen to forbid him setting it up. Archbishop Parker interfered, and obtained the queen's permission on his behalf, and he at length succeeded.

2813. STATIONERS' COMPANY.

The Stationers' Company existed as a fraternity long previous to the invention of printing. Some of its members, indeed, have acquired immortality into the world. Wynkyn de Worde, and Pynson, and "learned John Day" were all of the Stationers' Company.

2814. FRANKLIN IN THE PRINTING OFFICE.

Franklin was in conversation sprightly, in manners bland. Destitute of pride, he considered all honest men on an equality. During the time he was in Great Britain, in the dignified station of ambassador, he went into his old printing office, and entering the press room, proceeded to a particular press, where two men were at work. "Come, my friends," says he, "we will drink together: it is now forty years, since I worked, like you, at this press, as a journeyman printer." A gallon of porter was sent for, and he then drank, "Success to printing."

2815. PRINTERS, PUSH ON.

About a dozen years ago, the brothers Chambers, of Edinburgh, Scotland, were compositors in a printing office; now they are the proprietors of one of the largest establishments of the kind in the world. Their warehouses are so extensive, that the bindery alone will accommodate some two hundred and fifty persons. The buildings are eleven stories in height, being situated on the side of a hill. Each floor is appropriated to a particular branch of the business — the composition room, the press room, the stereotyping department, the bindery, publishing, and the editorial rooms.

The circulation of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal is ninety thousand weekly; thirteen thousand of their Cyclopædia of English Literature, and of their Educational series, some fifty thousand. The total quantity of printed sheets issued of their several publications, was estimated at about seven millions annually.

The history of the Messrs. Harper, of New York, — the only fact which will at all compare with the foregoing — we have noticed in another part of the volume.

§ 267. CURIOSITIES.

2816. THE BIBLE THE FIRST BOOK PRINTED.

The earliest book, properly so called, is now generally believed to be a Latin Bible, commonly called the Mazarin Bible, a copy having been found about the middle of the last century, in Cardinal Mazarin's library at Paris. It is remarkable that its existence was unknown before; for it can hardly be called a book of very great scarcity, nearly twenty copies being in different libraries, half of them in those of private persons in England.

No date appears in this Bible, and some have referred its publication to 1452, or even to 1450, which few perhaps at present maintain; while others have thought the year 1455 rather more probable. In a copy belonging to the royal library at Paris, an entry is made importing that it was completed in binding and illuminated at Mentz, on the feast of the Assumption, (August 15,) 1456.

But Triethemius, in criticising on the above, seems to intimate that no book had been printed in 1452; and considering the lapse of time that would naturally be employed in such an undertaking, during the infancy of art, and that we have no other printed book of the least importance to fill up the interval till 1457, and also that the binding and illuminating the above-mentioned copy is likely to have followed the publication at no great length of time, we may not err in placing its appearance in the year 1456, which will secure its hitherto unimpeached priority in the record of bibliography.

It is a very striking circumstance, that the high-minded inventors of this great art tried, at the very onset, so bold a flight as the printing of an entire Bible, and executed it with astonishing success. It was Minerva leaping on earth in her divine strength and radiant armor, ready, at the moment of her nativity, to subdue and destroy her enemies. The Mazarin Bible is printed, some copies on vellum, some on paper, of choice quality, with strong, black, and tolerably handsome characters, but with some want of uniformity, which has led, unreasonably, to doubt whether they were cast in a matrix.

We may see, in imagination, this venerable and splendid volume leading up the crowded myriads of its followers, and imploring, as it were, a blessing on the new art, by dedicating its first fruits to the service of Heaven.

2817. TECHNICAL OBITUARY.

An English paper thus chronicles the death of a printer, named George Woodcock: "He was the * of his profession, the type of honesty, the ! of all, and although the ☞ of death has put a . to his existence, every § of his life was without a |.

2818. ATTEMPT TO PRINT A PERFECT BOOK.

"Whether such a miracle as an immaculate edition of a classical author does exist," says one, "I have never learnt; but an attempt has been made to obtain this glorious singularity, and was as nearly realized as is perhaps possible—the magnificent edition of Os Lusíadas of Camoens by Don Joze Souza, in 1817. This amateur spared no prodigality of cost and labor, and flattered himself that, by the assistance of Didot, not a single typographical error should be found in that splendid volume.

"But an error was afterwards discovered in some of the copies, occasioned by one of the letters in the word Lusitano having got misplaced during the working of one of the sheets. It must be confessed that this was an accident or misfortune, rather than an erratum!"

2819. ANOTHER.

Some hundred years ago, a number of the professors of the Edinburgh University attempted to publish a work which should be a perfect specimen of typographical accuracy. Every precaution was taken to secure the desired result. Six experienced proof-readers were employed, who devoted hours to the reading of each page; and after it was thought to be perfect, it was pasted up in the hall of the university, with a notification that a reward of fifty pounds would be paid to any person who could discover an error. Each page was suffered to remain two weeks in the place where it had been pasted, before the work was printed, and the professors thought that they had attained the object for which they had been striving.

When the work was issued, it was discovered that several errors had been committed, one of which was in the first line of the first page.

2820. ANOTHER DR. FAUSTUS.

The whole library of one of the Scilly Isles consisted, about a century ago, of the Bible and the History of Dr. Faustus. The island was populous; and, the western peasants being generally able to read, the conjurer's story had been handed from house to house, until, from perpetual thumbing, little of his enchantments or his catastrophe was left legible. On this alarming conjuncture, a meeting was called of the principal inhabitants, and a proposal was made, and unanimously approved, that, as soon as the season permitted any intercourse with Cornwall, a supply of books should be sent for.

A debate now began, in order to ascertain what those books should be, and the result was, that an order should be transmitted to an eminent bookseller at Penzance, for him to send them another Dr. Faustus!

2821. ENCOURAGEMENT TO PRINTERS IN OLD TIMES.

The council of New York passed the following resolve on the 23d of March, 1692, old style:—

"It is resolved in council, that if a printer will come and settle in the city of New York, for the printing of our acts of assembly and public papers, he shall be allowed the sum of forty pounds, current money of New York, per annum, for his salary, and have the benefit of his printing, besides what serves to the public."

§ 268. AMUSING AND LAUGHABLE.

2822. BURNS IN A PRINTING OFFICE.

The following anecdote is extracted from Burns's Life and Works, edited by Robert Chambers, and now publishing at Edinburgh:—

"Meanwhile the preparation of the new edition was going rapidly on in the printing office of William Smellie—a man who, like Creech, mingled literary labors with those attending one of the trades of literature.

"There was a vast fund of knowledge, shrewdness, and talent under the rude exterior of Smellie. In his office, at the foot of Anchor Close, he had done typographic duty for Gilbert Stuart, Robert Ferguson, Dr. Robertson, Hugo Arnot, Adam Smith, and many others of the recent and living literati of Scotland, all of whom had been his personal friends.

"His son, Alexander, who lately died at an advanced age, perfectly remembered the visits of the Ayrshire Ploughman to the composing room, along which he would walk about three or four times, cracking a whip which he carried, to the no small surprise of the men. He paid no attention to his own copy under their hands, but looked at any other which he saw lying on the cases.

"One day he asked a man how many languages he was acquainted with. 'Indeed, sir,' replied the man, 'I've enough ado wi' my ain.' Burns remarked that behind there was one of his companions setting up a Gaelic Bible, and another composing from a Hebrew Grammar. 'These two,' said the compositor, 'are the greatest dolts in the house.' Burns seemed amused by the remark, and said he would take a note of it.

"Mr. Alexander Smellie also communicated the following anecdote: There was a particular stool in the office, which Burns uniformly occupied while correcting his proof-sheets: as he would not sit on any other, it always bore the name of Burns's stool.

It is still (1844) in the office, and in the same situation where it was when Burns sat on it.

"At this time Sir John Dalrymple was printing, in Mr. Smellie's office, an Essay on the Properties of Coal Tar. One day it happened that Sir John occupied the stool, when Burns came into the correcting room, looking for his favorite seat. It was known that what Burns wanted was his stool; but before saying any thing to Sir John on the subject, Burns was requested to walk into the composing room.

"The opportunity was taken in his absence to request of Sir John to indulge the bard with his favorite seat, but without mentioning his name. Sir John said, 'I will not give up my seat to you impudent, staring fellow.' Upon which it was replied, 'Do you not know that that staring fellow, as you call him, is Burns, the poet?' Sir John instantly left the stool, exclaiming, 'Good gracious! Give him all the seats in your house!' Burns was then called in, took possession of his stool, and commenced the reading of his proofs."

2823. CHEAP PRINTING.

While Colonel Alden Spooner printed a paper at Sag Harbor, he was much encouraged by a liberal merchant, who advertised his wares in two long columns, specifying every item of wet or dry goods, shovels, stationery, and mouse traps. While this was working magically among the villagers, a rival merchant called in one day, and asked, with a nonchalant air, the charge of inserting a couple of lines. He was told fifty cents, and paid the money. He thereupon paraded directly under the long advertisement,

I TOO.

JOHN THOMPSON.

The joke took mightily, and more particularly as John Thompson had borrowed his idea from a little squaw, who used to sell her baskets at the Harbor. She had a rival in a larger squaw with a loud voice, who would cry her baskets with every necessary adjunct of descriptive eloquence. The feeble squaw, keeping close at her heels, would squeak out, "I too!"

2824. THE PRINTER'S SANCTUM.

We were much amused at the hour of going to press, last week, on hearing the questions and answers which passed between our foreman and the compositors. Few offices can boast of a more respectable set of men than those connected with this establishment; we, therefore, would not be guilty of offending them. The questions and answers are laughable in their way, and in some instances show how easily a compositor can pervert the literal meaning, and thus occasionally (very rare) make us say nonsense!

Foreman. "William, did you do O'Connell and the Traversers?"

"No; I did the Kingston Corporation."

Foreman. "Who was it, then, that did O'Connell and the Traversers?"

"I did," said John.

"Then finish them," said the foreman.

Foreman. "What are you setting on, James?"

"The houses which were burnt down at Brooklyn," said James.

Foreman. "Alfred, what are you setting on?"

"The Exchange," says Alfred.

Foreman. "Whose marriage is this?"

"Mine," says Edgar.

"Then complete it," says the foreman.

Foreman. "Whose birth is this?"

"Mine," says Gen.

"It is too long: you must shorten it by a line."

Foreman. "Is this your death, Mac?"

"What name is it?" asks Mac.

Foreman. "So and so."

"Yes, that is mine," says Mac.

"You have made too much of it, then: cut it short," said the foreman.

Foreman. "Whose breach of promise of marriage is this?"

"Mine," says Andrew.

"Then make it all right," says the foreman.

Foreman. "Oswin, what are you setting on?"

"The Bridge of Sighs," says Oswin.

"How much will it make?"

"Nearly three thousand," says Oswin.

Foreman. "Who did this from the York Herald?"

"What is it? a murder?" said Charlton.

"Yes, it is."

"Then I did it," says Charlton.

"Why don't you complete it? What is the use of beginning a thing without finishing it?"

"Sir," says Charlton, "I can easily do that."

Foreman. "Whose 'pi' is this?"

"Mine," says Christopher.

"Why don't you put it away, then?"

"So I will as soon as I have had my dinner."

Foreman. "What are you setting upon, Jephtha?"

"The old woman with the broken leg," says Jephtha.

"Are you most done?"

"Not quite."

"Make haste, then," says the foreman.

Foreman. "Alfred Smith, are you setting on that love affair?"

"No, I am completing a marriage."

Foreman. "Harry, what are you doing?"

"O, I am doing up Chambers."

"I see in the proof of the article headed 'Woman,' it reads, 'I curse her.' Ask the editor if that is correct."

"No, sir, he says it should be, 'I love her.'"

A few other questions are asked, when all at once a rush is made to revise the proofs. The editor is solicited to cut down this article, and that article, to get them into the columns, so as to save the post. At last, they go to press, and our subscribers are presented with a copy, got up, as it were, in a few hours. Do you not wonder, reader, under all these circumstances, that the daily papers are published with so few mistakes?

2825. PRINTING AND PHYSIC.

A printer, whose industry was not the most prominent virtue he possessed, left "case," and became a physician. When he was asked the reason of this conduct, his reply was, "In printing, all the faults are exposed to the eye; but in physic, they are buried with the patient."

2826. A SINGLE LETTER.

A western newspaper heads an advertisement, "Infernal Remedy." This may be quite true, but we imagine that "internal remedy" was intended. Mistakes, even of single letters, are sad things.

2827. INCREASE OF PRINTERS.

When Dr. Franklin's mother-in-law first discovered that the young man had a hankering for her daughter, the good old lady said she did not know so well about giving her daughter to a printer; there were already two printing offices in the United States, and she was not certain the country would support them. It was plain young Franklin would depend for the support of his family on the profits of the third, and this was rather a doubtful chance.

If such an objection was urged to a would-be son-in-law when there were but two printing offices in the United States, how can a printer get a wife now, when the census of 1840 shows the number to be one thousand five hundred and fifty-seven?

2828. ERRORS.

A publisher of a periodical at the south offers one hundred dollars for the best tail for his paper. A man at the east offers for sale a large quantity of funpowder, and several boxes of pigs. A person in New York advertises a louse to let, and possession given immediately. At an inquest held on the body of a glutton, who died in devouring a part of a goose, the verdict suffocation was printed, with more truth than was intended, stuffed.

2829. MISTAKE OF THE PRESS.

An important house in New York had occasion to advertise for sale a quantity of brass hoppers, such as are used in coffee mills. But instead of brass hoppers, the newspaper read grasshoppers. In a short time the merchant's counting-room was thronged with inquirers respecting the new article of merchandise.

"Good morning, Mr. Invoice; how do you sell grasshoppers?" said a fat merchant. "What are they worth a hogshead?"

The importer was astonished; but before he had time to reply, in came a druggist, who, being bent on speculation, determined to purchase a whole lot, provided he could get them low. Taking the importer aside for fear of being overheard by the merchant, he asked him how he sold grasshoppers; if they were prime quality; and whether they were to be used in medicine. The importer was about opening his mouth to reply in an angry manner to what he began to suspect was a conspiracy to torment him, when a doctor entered, smelling at his cane and looking wondrous wise.

"Mr. Invoice," said he; "ahem! will you be good enough to show me a specimen of your grasshoppers?"

"Grasshoppers! grasshoppers!" exclaimed the importer, as soon as he had a chance to speak; "what, gentlemen, do you mean by grasshoppers?"

"Mean!" said the merchant. "why, I perceive you have advertised the article for sale."

"Certainly," said the druggist, "and when a man advertises an article, it is natural for him to expect inquiries relating to the price and quality of the thing."

"Nothing in the world more natural," said the doctor. "As for myself, I have at present a number of cases on hand, in which I thought the article might be serviceable. But since you are so — ahem! so uncivil — why, I must look out elsewhere, and my patients —"

"You and your patience be hanged!" interrupted the importer; "mine is fairly worn out, and if you don't explain yourselves, gentlemen, I'll lay this poker over your heads."

To save their heads, the advertisement was now referred to, when the importer found out the cause of his vexations, by reading the following: "Just landed, and for sale by Invoice & Co., ten hogsheads prime grasshoppers."

2830. FREAKS OF TYPOGRAPHY.

The editor of the Evangelical Observer, in reference to an individual, took occasion to write that he was rectus in ecclesia, that is, in good standing in the church. The type-setter, to whom this was a dead language, in the editor's absence, converted it into rectus in culina, which, although pretty good Latin, alters, in some degree, the sense, as it accorded to the reverend gentleman spoken of only a good standing in the kitchen.

§ 269. SERIOUS MISTAKES.

2831. DEATH OF AN AUTHOR.

The Baron de Grimm, in his Memoirs, mentions the extraordinary circumstance of an irritable French author having died in a fit of anger, in consequence of a favorite work, which he had himself revised with great care, having been printed off with upwards of three hundred typographical errors, half of which had been made by the corrector of the press.

2832. LIES OF THE SAINTS.

The Rev. Dr. Todd, having presented some relics from an acquaintance, to be deposited in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy, made some allusion to the "Lives of the Saints." His remarks, when published, alluded, through a typographical blunder, to the "Lies of the Saints," which so enraged the owner of the relics, that he wrote to Dr. Todd, demanding his relics back again.

2833. THE ADULTEROUS BIBLE.

In the reign of Charles I. the Company of Stationers, to whom the printing of the Bible was granted by a patent, made a very remarkable blunder in their first edition; for, instead of, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," they printed off a great number of copies with this reading: "Thou shalt commit adultery." Archbishop Laud, as soon as the error was discovered, caused the company to be prosecuted in the Star Chamber where a very considerable fine was levied upon them for their negligence.

2834. THE VINEGAR BIBLE.

We have an edition of the Bible known by the name of the Vinegar Bible, from the erratum in the title to the twentieth chapter of St. Luke, in which "Parable of the Vineyard" is printed "Parable of the Vinegar." It was printed in 1717, at the Clarendon press.

2835. TECHNICAL REMARK.

A printer, observing two bailiffs pursuing an ingenious but distressed author, remarked that it was "a new edition of the Pursuits of Literature, unbound, but hot pressed."

2836. GROSS BLUNDERS.

The London correspondent of a morning paper stated, some time since, that Lord John Russell was married for the second time to Lady Elliot.

It was announced, in an advertisement that appeared in one of the religious papers, that the Rev. Mr. B. would deliver an address on the nature and extent of heathenism in the A. H. Church.

2837. IMPORTANT OMISSION.

In an old English print, the following ridiculous blunder was caused in the whole edition, by the omission of the letter c at the beginning of a word in the third line, which was printed as follows:—

"When the last trumpet soundeth,
We shall not all die;
But we shall be hanged
In the twinkling of an eye."

2838. ALTERATION PUNISHED WITH DEATH.

A printer's widow in Germany, while a new edition of the Bible was printing at her house, one night took an opportunity of going into the office, to alter that sentence of subjection to her husband, pronounced upon Eve in Genesis iii. 16. She took out the two first letters of the word Herr, and substituted Na in their place; thus altering the sentence from "and he shall be thy Lord," (Herr.) to "and he shall be thy Fool," (Narr.) It is said her life paid for this intentional erratum, and that some secreted copies of this edition have been bought up at enormous prices.

2839. THE VALUE OF A WIFE.

A typographical error of an amusing nature had nearly occurred, in a work of the Rev. Dr. —, of England, one of the most distinguished living writers of the day, whose works are equally well known on both sides of the Atlantic. The doctor had a proof-sheet sent him from the printer's, in which a passage from Job ii. 4 was printed as follows: "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath, will he give for his wife." The doctor returned it, with the last word corrected, "life." This correction, however, escaped the compositor's notice, and soon back came the revise, with same expression—"all that a man hath will he give for his wife."

This time, the doctor, partly for the sake of a joke, and partly to attract the attention of the compositor, sent back the proof with this expressive sentence written on the margin, opposite the word "wife:" "This depends upon circumstances."

2840. SOWING TARES AND SAWING TREES.

The Rev. Dr. Bethune relates an amusing instance of a phonographic blunder. Reading one morning a report of one of his discourses of the day before, he found the remark, "And the adversary came among them and sowed tares," printed, "And the adversary came among them and sawed trees." The mistake arose from the clipped words, "sd. trs."

2841. MISTAKES IN BIBLE PRINTING.

Field printed, in 1653, what was called the Pearl Bible; alluding, I suppose, to that diminutive type in printing; for it could not derive its name from its worth. It is a twenty-fours; but to contract the mighty book into this dwarfishness, all the original Hebrew texts prefixed to the Psalms, explaining the occasion and the subject of their composition, is wholly expunged. This Pearl Bible, which may be inspected among the great collection of our English Bibles at the British Museum, is set off by many notable errata, of which these are noticed:—

Romans vi. 13.—Neither yield ye your members as instruments of righteousness unto sin—for un-

First Corinthians vi. 9.—Know ye not the unrighteous shall inherit the kingdom of God?—for shall not inherit.

This erratum served as the foundation of a dangerous doctrine; for many libertines urged the text from this corrupt Bible, against the reproofs of a divine.

This Field was a great forger; and it is said that he received a present of fifteen hundred pounds, from the Independents, to corrupt a text in Acts vi. 3, to sanction the right of the people to appoint their own pastors. The corruption was the easiest possible; it was only to put a ye instead of a we—so that the right in Field's Bible emanated from the people, not from the apostles.

In other Bibles by Hills and Field we may find such abundant errata, reducing the text to nonsense or to blasphemy, making the Scriptures contemptible to the multitude, who came to pray, and not to scorn.

It is affirmed that one Bible swarmed with six thousand faults! Sterne, a solid scholar, was the first, who summed up the three thousand and six hundred faults that were in the printed Bibles of London.

§ 270. ERRORS AND ERRATA.

2842. TYPOGRAPHICAL WIT.

One meeting an acquaintance, who was a printer by profession, inquired of him if it was true Mr. ——— had put a period to his existence. "No, no," replied the typographer, "he had only put a colon: for he is now in a fair way of recovery."

2843. THOSE CARELESS PRINTERS.

By a ridiculous error of the press, the Eclectic Review was advertised the other day as the Epileptic Review, and, on inquiry being made for it at a bookseller's shop, the bibliopole replied, —

"He knew of no periodical called the Epileptic Review, though there might be such a publication coming out by fits and starts."

2844. BLUNDERS OF PROOF-READERS.

"Persons," says the New York Sun, "who are not familiar with the practical operations of a printing establishment, are frequently surprised, and perhaps indignant, at little mistakes that occur in the 'making up,' as it is called, of the 'form.' Sometimes the proof-reader fails to mark an error, it may be only of a letter, and the strangest and funniest result is beheld next day—puzzling, perhaps, twenty thousand readers.

"We have seen some amusing specimens of these blunders in our day; an announcement of medicine, for instance, 'whose effects were exclusively infernal;' or of the 'overturning of the lawyer's pig;' or of a lover who presented his mistress with 'a large bunch of beautifully tinted noses.' But the best joke of the kind, perhaps, is that of the dancing master's card of respect, where, as in the former cases, only one letter was changed, making him offer 'his most respectful shanks to all who had honored him with their patronage."

2845. TYPOGRAPHICAL MISTAKE.

A new apprentice to the printing business, who had been cook's scullion on board a ship, in putting a certificate of the efficacy of Evans's Pills in type, caused it to read, instead of "remove the flying pains from the chest," &c., "frying pans," &c.

2846. A SMALL MISTAKE.

The Savannah Republican publishes the following errata: "In our cholera article of yesterday evening, for 'No,' read 'Yes;' and for 'Yes,' read 'No.'"

A London paper once published its equal, as follows: "For 'her grace, the Duke of Bedford,' read 'his grace, the Duchess of Bedford.'"

2847. WELL DONE, TYPES.

A late Albany paper has the following advertisement of a book for sale: —

"The Memoirs of Sally Prime, Minister to Henry the Great, translated from the French;" which we presume meaneth, "The Memoirs of Sully, Prime Minister to Henry the Great," &c.

2848. SIXTUS V.'S EDITION OF THE VULGATE.

One of the most egregious of all literary blunders is that of the edition of the Vulgate, by Sixtus V. His holiness carefully superintended every sheet as it passed through the press; and, to the amazement of the world, the work remained without a rival — it swarmed with errata! A multitude of scraps were printed to paste over the erroneous passages, in order to give the true text. The book makes a whimsical appearance with these patches; and the heretics exulted in this demonstration of papal infallibility: the copies were called in, and violent attempts made to suppress it; a few still remain for the raptures of the biblical collectors. At a late sale, the Bible of Sixtus V. brought above sixty guineas — not too much for a mere book of blunders. The world was highly amused at the bull of the editorial pope prefixed to the first volume, which excommunicates all printers who, in reprinting the work, should make any alteration in the text.

2849. MACHINATIONS OF SATAN.

In the year 1561 was printed a work entitled the Anatomy of the Mass. It is a thin octavo of one hundred and seventy-two pages, and it is accompanied by a list of errata of fifteen pages. The editor, a pious monk, informs us that a very serious reason induced him to undertake the task; for it is, says he, to forestall the artifices of Satan.

He supposes that the devil, to ruin the fruits of this work, employed two very malicious frauds: the first, before it was printed, by drenching the manuscripts in a kennel, and having reduced it to a most pitiable state, rendered several parts illegible; the second, in obliging the printers to commit such numerous blunders, never yet equalled in so small a work. To combat this double machination of Satan, he was obliged carefully to reperuse the work, and to form this singular list of the blunders of printers under the influence of the devil. All this he relates in an advertisement prefixed to the errata.

2850. ENGLISH BIBLES.

The number of typographical inaccuracies which abound in the Bibles printed by the king's printers is remarkable. Dr. Lee states, "I do not know any book in which it is so difficult to find a very correct edition as the English Bible." What is in England called the Standard Bible is that printed at Oxford, in 1769, which was superintended by Dr. Blayney; yet it has been ascertained that there are at least one hundred and sixteen errors in it.

These errors were discovered in printing an edition in London, in 1806, which has been considered as very correct; yet Dr. Lee says that that edition contains a greater number of mistakes. The Rev.

T. Curtis corroborates Dr. Lee's testimony. He states his general impression to be, that the text of the common English Bible is incorrect, and he gives a great variety of instances.

Dr. A. Clarke, in his preface to the Bible, states that he has corrected many thousand errors in the Italics, which, in general, are said to be in a very incorrect state. Between the Oxford edition of 1830 and the Cambridge edition, there are eight hundred variations in the Psalms alone.

The Rev. T. H. Horne, in his Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, makes the following observation: "Booksellers' edition, 1806. In the course of printing, by Woodfall, this edition from the Cambridge copy, a great number of very gross errors were discovered in the latter, and the errors of the common Oxford edition were not so few as twelve hundred."

Mr. Offer, a retired bookseller, and who made a collection of upwards of four hundred Bibles of different editions, states that he was not aware of any edition he had examined which was without errors; but Pasham's Bible, in 1776, and another printed at Edinburgh, in 1811, were the most-accurate and the most beautiful he had found.

Now, it will be observed, that the former was printed by a private individual, the monopoly being evaded by putting at the bottom of the pages very short notes, which were cut off in the binding.

The same witness afterwards remarks, that "there never was an elegant edition of the Bible printed at the king's printers'; the elegant editions have been those of Baskerville, Macklin, Heptinstall, Ritchie, and Bowyer, and the whole of those were printed with colorable notes." He also states, that the effect of the patents has been to limit the circulation of the Scriptures; and that, if the patents were intended to protect the purity of the text, and improve the printing, they have certainly been productive of a very different result.

§ 271. PRONUNCIATION.

2851. COLERIDGE AND THE JEW.

I HAVE had a good deal to do with Jews, in the course of my life, although I never borrowed any money of them. The other day I was what you call floored by a Jew. He passed me several times, crying for old clothes in the most nasal and extraordinary tone I ever heard. At last, I was so provoked, that I said to him, "Pray, why can't you say 'old clothes,' in a plain way, as I do now?" The Jew stopped, and looking very gravely at me, said, in a clear, and even fine accent, "Sir, I can say 'old clothes' as well as you can; but if you had to say so ten times a minute, for an hour together, you would say 'ogh clo,' as I do now;" and so he marched off. I was so confounded with the justice of this retort, that I followed and gave him a shilling, the only one I had.

Similar corruptions in pronunciation, especially among the trading community, originate in a similar manner. Of this perversion examples might be given almost without end. The origin of many of our words and phrases is quite curious, but we cannot now enlarge.

2852. OBEYING ORDERS.

A good story is told of an American general in the last war, who was more ready in the use of his sword than he was of his pen, and who still lives, the pride of the army and country. While stationed on the lake frontier, two of his soldiers, brothers, of the name of Kennedy, had deserted. He issued an order to a subaltern to detail a file of men, and with them proceed to a place named on the line, and take the two "Canadas."

The order was peremptory, and not to be trifled with. The officer said he would try, and set about executing it; but he remarked, with an oath, he thought he could take no more than one province without a reinforcement.

2853. THREE CHEERS.

One Sunday, recently, during high mass, at twelve, in the village of Glentarriff, Ireland, three ladies of the Protestant faith were obliged to take shelter from one of those heavy summer showers which so frequently occur in the south of Ireland. The officiating priest, knowing who they were, and wishing to appear respectful to them, stooped down to his attendant, who was on his knees, and whispered to him, "Three chairs for the Protestant ladies." The clerk, who was rather an ignorant man, stood up, and shouted out to the congregation, "Three cheers for the Protestant ladies!" which the congregation immediately took up, and gave three hearty cheers, while the clergyman actually stood dumbfounded.

2854. IN AND ING.

General P., who was an early acquaintance of ours, and who was proverbial for misplacing ing, was a very polite and friendly man. "Good morning, general," said we, as we were passing the garden where he was pulling weeds one morning in May, before the sun was up. "Good mornin," replied the general: "I have been workin in the gardin a little this mornin, and I declare it made my fingers so cold, I had to put my mittings on."

2855. OUGH.

Honorable Horace Mann, in a lecture on spelling, uses the following language: "Ough is pronounced differently in each of the following words : bough, cough, hough, though, thought, through, thorough, tough ; and surely this is tough enough. From this combination was formed the celebrated couplet, —

 " Though the tough cough and hiccough plough me through, O'er life's dark lough, I still my way pursue."

2856. SITTING CORRECTED.

Soon after Lord Kenyon was appointed master of the rolls, he was listening very attentively to a young clerk, who was reading to him, before a number of gentlemen of the long robe, the conveyances of an estate, and on coming to the word enough pronounced it enow. His honor immediately interrupted him : " Hold ! hold ! you must stand corrected : enough is, according to the vernacular custom, pronounced enuff, and so must all other English words, which terminate in ough, as, for example, tough, rough, cough, &c." The clerk bowed, blushed, and went on for some time, when, coming to the word plough, he, with a loud voice, and a penetrating look at his honor, called it pluff ! The great lawyer stroked his chin, and, with a smile, candidly said, " Young man, I sit corrected."

§ 272. PUNCTUATION.

2857. PUNCTUATION USED BY THE FIRST PRINTERS.

The dash, or perpendicular line, thus, |, was the only punctuation the first printers used. It was, however, discovered that " the craft of poynting well used makes the sentence very light." The more elegant comma supplanted the long, uncouth | ; the colon was a refinement, " showing that there is more to come." But the semicolon was a Latin delicacy which the obtuse English typographer resisted. So late as 1580 and 1590, treatises on orthography do not recognize any such innovator ; the Bible of 1592, though printed with appropriate accuracy, is without a semicolon ; but in 1633 its full rights are established by Charles Butler's English Grammar. In this chronology of the four points of punctuation it is evident that Shakspeare could never have used the semicolon ; a circumstance which the profound George Chalmers mourns over, opining that semicolons would often have saved the poet from his commentators.

2858. A NOVEL AMUSEMENT.

The editor of a newspaper thus introduces some verses : " The poem published this week was composed by an esteemed friend who has lain in his grave many years for his own amusement."

2859. WANT OF A POINT: A NICE QUESTION.

An ingenious expedient was resorted to, to save a prisoner, charged with robbery in the criminal court at Dublin. The principal thing that appeared in evidence against him was a confession alleged to have been made by him at the police office, and taken down in writing by a peace officer. The document purporting to contain this self-criminating acknowledgment was produced by the officer, and the following passage was read from it : —

" Mangan said he never robbed but twice said it was Crawford."

This, it will be observed, has no mark of the writer's having a notion of punctuation, but the meaning he attached to it was, that, —

" Mangan said he never robbed but twice.

Said it was Crawford."

Mr. O'Gorman, the counsel for the prisoner, begged to look at the paper. He perused it, and rather astonished the peace officer by asserting that so far from proving the man's guilt, it clearly established his innocence. " This," said the learned gentleman, " is the clear and obvious reading of the sentence : —

" Mangan said he never robbed.

But twice said it was Crawford."

This interpretation had its effect on the jury, and the man was acquitted.

2860. KNOCKING OUT AN I.

Mr. Curran, the late celebrated Irish advocate, was walking one day with a friend, who was extremely punctilious in his conversation. Hearing a person near him say curocity, for curiosity, he exclaimed, " How that man murders the English language ! " " Not so bad," replied Curran, " he has only knocked an i out ! "

2861. ENDEAVORING TO PLEASE ALL.

When Lord Timothy Dexter, of Newburyport, wrote his famous book entitled, A Pikel for the Knowing Ones, there happened to be many heresies, schisms, and false doctrines abroad in the land, regarding punctuation, and as many diverse systems appeared, for the location of commas, semicolons, periods, dashes, etc., as there were works published. To obviate this difficulty, and to give every one an opportunity of suiting himself, his lordship left out all marks of punctuation from the body of his work, and at the ending of the book, had printed four or five pages of nothing but stops and pauses, with which he said the reader could pepper his dish as he chose.

2862. ONE MOTTO FOR LIBERALITY AND COVETOUSNESS.

In the priory of Ramessa there dwelt a very liberal prior, who caused these verses to be written over his door : —

" Be open evermore, O thou my door,
 To none be shut — to honest or to poor."

After his death there succeeded another prior, as covetous as his predecessor had been liberal, who kept the same verses there still, changing nothing therein but one point, which made them run thus . —

" Be open evermore, O thou my door,
 To none — be shut to honest or to poor."

2563. LAYING CLAIM TO NOBILITY.

William and his followers landed at Torbay, November 5, 1688. John Duke, (of Otterton,) a man of wealth and influence in Sidmouth, joined the hero on his arrival. Being presented to the king, who asked for his name, he replied with a timid hesitation, "John, Duke of Otterton." The prince expressed his surprise, and taking a list of nobility from his pocket, which he had been led to suppose was correct, looked over it, and then declared that no such duke was to be found there. The gentleman, however, soon rectified the mistake, by repeating his name with an accelerated pronunciation — John Duke, of Otterton. The mistake being thus corrected, William smiled at it, and embraced John Duke with joy.

2564. DESIRING PRAYERS.

The lady of a mariner about to sail on a distant voyage sent a note to the clergyman of the parish, expressing the following meaning : —

"A husband going to sea, his wife desires the prayers of the congregation."

Unfortunately, the good matron was not skilled in punctuation, nor had the minister quick vision. He read the note as it was written : —

"A husband going to see his wife, desires the prayers of the congregation."

§ 273. READING, &c.

2565. ALFRED THE GREAT LEARNING TO READ.

ALFRED the Great ascended the throne in 872. Born when his country was involved in the most profound darkness and deplorable condition, and when learning was considered rather as a reproach than an honor to a prince, he was not taught to know one letter from another till he was above twelve years of age, when a book was put into his hand, by accident more than by previous design. Judith, his step-mother, was sitting one day, surrounded by her family, with a book of Saxon poetry in her hands. With a happy judgment, she proposed it as a gift to him who would first learn to read it. The elder princes thought the reward inadequate to the task, and retired from the field of emulation. But the mind of Alfred, captivated by the prospect of information, and pleased with the neatness of the writing and the beauty of the illuminations, inquired if she actually intended to give it to the person who would soonest learn to read it. His mother repeating the promise, with a smile of joy at the question, he took the book, found out an instructor, and learned to read it, recited it to her, and received it for his reward. It is said that he imbibed such a passion for reading that he never stirred abroad without a book in his bosom. He founded and endowed schools, (among others Oxford,) and brought teachers of learning from all parts of the world, purchased books, ordered the Bible to be translated into the Anglo-Saxon, undertaking the version of the Psalms himself, but did not live to complete it; and, in short, encouraged education and learning equally by precept and example.

2566. NEW VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

A country schoolmaster, who found it rather difficult to make his pupils observe the difference in reading between a comma and full point, adopted a plan of his own, which he flattered himself would make them proficient in the art of punctuation; thus, in reading, when they came to a comma, they were to say "tick," and read on to a colon or semicolon, "tick, tick," and when a full point, "tick, tick, tick."

Now, it so happened that the worthy dominie received notice that the parish minister was to pay a visit of examination to his school, and as he was desirous that his pupils should show to the best advantage, he gave them an extra drill the day before the examination. "Now," said he, addressing his pupils, "when you read before the minister, to-morrow, you leave out the 'ticks,' though you must think them as you go along, for the sake of elocution." So far so good.

Next day came, and with it the minister, ushered into the school-room by the dominie, who, with smiles and bows, hoped that the training of the scholars would meet his approval. Now, it so happened that the first boy called up by the minister had been absent the preceding day, and, in the hurry, the master had forgotten to give him his instructions how to act. The minister asked the boy to read a chapter in the Old Testament, which he pointed out. The boy complied, and in his best accent began to read : "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 'tick,' Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, 'tick, tick,' and thus shalt thou say unto them, 'tick, tick, tick.'"

This unfortunate sally, in his own style, acted like a shower bath on the poor dominie, whilst the minister and his friends almost died of laughter.

2567. A SENSIBLE PROPOSAL.

A local preacher, who once said he "didn't like church parsons because they was book larnt," was conducting a religious service, and, on opening the Bible, unfortunately stumbled upon a chapter almost full of hard proper names. He began to read as if he was a perfect master of pronunciation. Presently he came to a hard, long name. He paused; he attacked it; he got into the middle of it, he went back and tried it again; at last he trampled right over it, and then coolly said, "Let us turn, dear brothers and sisters, to an easier chapter."

2866. FREDERIC THE GREAT AND HIS LIBRARIES.

The principal amusement of Frederic's leisure hours, at all periods of his life, was his library. The plan for his reading in general, which he adopted in his youth, and to which he constantly adhered, was this: He divided all books that he chose to read into two classes—those for study, and those for amusement. The second class, by far the more numerous of the two, comprehended all the works which he wished to know something of, and which he merely skimmed, or read once through. The first consisted of those which he meant to study, to read over again, or to consult as long as he lived; these he took up continually, one after another, in the order which he had ranged them, unless upon occasions when he only wanted to verify, to quote, or to imitate some passage. He had five libraries absolutely alike, and composed of the same books—at Potsdam, at old Sans Souci, at Berlin, at Charlottenburg, and at Breslau. When he removed from one of these residences to another, he had only to note how far he had got in a book, and, on his arrival, he could proceed as though he were on the same spot. Hence he always bought five copies of every book that he wished to have. To the five libraries above mentioned were afterwards added another in the new palace of Sans Souci, and a travelling library for the review time. The books belonging to all these libraries were uniformly bound in red morocco, with gilt leaves. Each book had its particular place, and on the cover was a letter, denoting the library to which it belonged.

2869. A SPEAKER'S MISTAKE.

Some years ago, a bill was reported in the New York House of Assembly, entitled "An Act for the Preservation of the Heath Hen and other Game." The speaker of the house, who was probably not much of a sportsman, gravely read it, "An Act for the Preservation of the HEATHEN and other Game"—a blunder of which he was unconscious, until an honest member from the north, who had suffered considerably by the depredations of the frontier Indians, moved an amendment by adding the words "except Indians."

2870. HUMOROUS MISTAKE.

A clergyman, on reading the twenty-seventh verse of the eighteenth chapter of the First Kings, placed the emphasis on the words denoted by italics, rendering the verse an absurdity: "And he spake to his sons, saying, Saddle me the ass, and they saddled him."

2871. CHIP'S TALKING.

The Rev. J. Williams, in his Narrative of Missionary Enterprise, gives the following interesting anecdote:—

"In the erection of this chapel, (at Rarotonga,) a striking instance occurred of the feelings of an untaught people, when observing, for the first time, the effects of written communications. As I had come to work one morning without my square, I took up a chip, and, with a piece of charcoal, wrote upon it a request that Mrs. Williams would send me that article. I called a chief, who was superintending his portion of the work, and said to him,— "Friend, take this, go to our house, and give it to Mrs. Williams."

"He was a singular-looking man, remarkably quick in his movements, and had been a great warrior; but in one of the numerous battles he had fought, he had lost an eye, and, giving me an inexpressible look with the other, he said,—
"Take that! She will call me a fool, and scold me, if I carry a chip to her."

"No," I replied, 'she will not; take it, and go immediately, for I am in haste.'
Perceiving me to be in earnest, he took it and asked,

"What must I say?"

"I replied,—

"You have nothing to say; the chip will say all I wish."

"With a look of astonishment and contempt, he held up the piece of wood, and said,—
"How can this speak? Has it a mouth?"

"I desired him to take it immediately, and not spend so much time in talking about it. On arriving at the house, he gave it to Mrs. Williams, who read it, threw it away, and went to the tool chest, whither the chief, resolving to see the result of this mysterious proceeding, followed her closely. On receiving the square from her, he said,—

"Stay, daughter: how do you know that this is what Mr. Williams wants?"

"Why," she replied, 'did you not give me a chip just now?'

"Yes," said the astonished warrior, 'but I did not hear it say any thing.'

"If you did not, I did," was the reply, 'for it made known to me what he wanted; and all you have to do is to return as fast as possible.'

"With this, the chief leaped out of the house, and catching up the mysterious piece of wood, he ran through the settlement with the chip in one hand and the square in the other, holding them up as high as his arm would reach, and shouting as he went,—

"See the wisdom of these English people: they can make chips talk! they can make chips talk!"

"On giving me the square, he wished to know how it was possible thus to converse with persons at a distance. I gave him all the information in my power; but it was a circumstance involved in so much mystery, that he actually tied a string to the chip, hung it around his neck, and wore it for some time. During several following days, we frequently saw him surrounded by a crowd, who were listening with intense interest while he narrated the wonders which the chip had performed."

2872. MADAME DE STAEL.

It is recorded of Madame de Stael Holstein, that before she was fifteen years of age she had devoured six hundred novels in three months; so that she must have read more than six a day, upon an average.

2873. FORGETFULNESS.

"Being some time since," says a gentleman, "in the company of a clever farmer, a bachelor of forty, he, in the course of conversation, said to me, 'Well, it always seems strange to me how they used to forget one another so in Old Testament times: Abraham forgot Isaac, Isaac forgot Jacob, Jacob forgot —.'"

2874. RELAXATION, PLEASURE, AND CONSOLATION FROM BOOKS.

The secretaries of the Manchester Athenæum bazaar committee addressed to Thomas Hood a request that he would allow his name to be placed on the list of patrons of the approaching bazaar. To this request the secretaries received the following characteristic reply:—

"ST. JOHN'S WOOD, 18 July, 1843.
(From my bed,) 17 Elm-tree Road.

"Gentlemen: If my humble name can be of the least use for your purpose, it is heartily at your service, with my best wishes for the prosperity of the Manchester Athenæum, and my warmest approval of the objects of that institution.

"I have elsewhere recorded my own deep obligations to literature,—that a natural turn for reading and intellectual pursuits probably preserved me from the moral shipwreck, so apt to befall those who are deprived in early life of the paternal pilotage. At the very least, my books kept me aloof from the ring, the dog-pit, the tavern, and the saloon, with their degrading orgies. For the closest associate of Pope and Addison—the mind accustomed to the noble, though silent, discourse of Shakspeare and Milton—will hardly seek, or put up with, low company and slang. The reading animal will not be content with the British wallowings that satisfy the unlearned pigs of the world.

"Later experience enables me to depose to the comfort and blessing that literature can prove in seasons of sickness and sorrow—how powerfully intellectual pursuits can help in keeping the head from crazing, and the heart from breaking,—nay, not to be too grave, how generous mental food can even atone for a meagre diet—rich fare on the paper for short commons on the cloth.

"Poisoned by the malaria of the Dutch marshes, my stomach, for many months, resolutely set itself against fish, flesh, or fowl; my appetite had no more edge than the German knife placed before me. But, luckily, the mental palate and digestion were still sensible and vigorous; and whilst I passed untasted every dish at the Rhenish table d'hôte, I could yet enjoy my Peregrine Pickle, and the feast after the manner of the ancients. There was no yearning towards calf's head à la tortue, or sheep's heart; but I could still relish Head à la Brunnen, and the Heart of Mid-Lothian.

"Still more recently, it was my misfortune, with a tolerable appetite, to be condemned to lenten fare, like Sancho Panza, by my physician—to a diet, in fact, lower than any prescribed by the poor-law commissioners; all animal food, from a bullock to a rabbit, being strictly interdicted; as well as all fluids stronger than that which lays dust, washes pinafores, and waters polyanthus. But 'the feast of reason and the flow of soul' were still mine. Denied beef, I had Bulwer and Cowper,—forbidden mutton, there was Lamb,—and in lieu of pork, the great Bacon or Hogg.

"Then, as to beverage, it was hard, doubtless, for a Christian to set his face like a Turk against the juice of the grape. But, eschewing wine, I had still my Butler; and in the absence of liquor, all the choice spirits from Tom Browne to Tom Moore.

"Thus, though confined, physically, to the drink that drowns kittens, I quaffed mentally, not merely the best of our own home-made, but the rich, racy, sparkling growths of France and Italy, of Germany and Spain—the champagne of Molière, and the Monte Pulciano of Boeccaccio, the hock of Schiller, and the sherry of Cervantes. Depressed bodily by the fluid that damps every thing, I got intellectually elevated with Milton, a little merry with Swift, or rather jolly with Rabelais, whose Pantagruel, by the way, is quite equal to the best gruel with rum in it.

"So far can literature palliate or compensate for gastronomical privations. But there are other evils, great and small, in this world, which try the stomach less than the head, the heart, and the temper—bowls that will not roll right—well-laid schemes that will 'gang alee'—and ill winds that blow with the pertinacity of the monsoon. Of these, Providence has allotted me a full share; but still, paradoxical as it may sound, my burden has been greatly lightened by a load of books. The manner of this will be best understood from a feline illustration. Every body has heard of the two Kilkenny cats, who devoured each other; but it is not so generally known that they left behind them an orphan kitten, which, true to the breed, began to eat itself up, till it was diverted from the operation by a mouse. Now, the human mind, under vexation, is like that kitten, for it is apt to prey upon itself, unless drawn off by a new object; and none better for the purpose than a book; for example, one of Defoe's; for who, in reading his thrilling History of the Great Plague, would not be reconciled to a few little ones?

"Many, many a dreary, weary hour have I got over—many a gloomy misgiving postponed—many a mental or bodily annoyance forgotten, by help of the tragedies and comedies of our dramatists and novelists! Many a trouble has been soothed by the still small voice of the moral philosopher—many a dragon-like care charmed to sleep by the sweet song of the poet; for all which I cry incessantly, not aloud, but in my heart,—Thanks and honor to the glorious masters of the pen, and the great inventors of the press!

"Such has been my own experience of the blessing and comfort of literature and intellectual pursuits; and of the same mind, doubtless, was Sir Humphry Davy, who went for 'consolations in Travel,' not to the inn or the posting house, but to his library and his books. I am, gentlemen, yours, very truly, THOS. HOOD."

2875. IMPRESSIVE MANNER OF RACINE.

When Racine read aloud, he diffused his own enthusiasm. Once, with Boileau and Nicole, amid a literary circle, they talked of Sophocles, whom Racine greatly admired, but from whom he had never dared to borrow a tragic subject. Taking up a Greek Sophocles, and translating the Œdipus, the French poet became so deeply imbued with the Greek tragedian, that his auditors caught all the emotions of terror and pity. "I have seen," says one of those auditors, "our best pieces represented by our best actors. but never any thing approached the agitation that then came over us; and to this distant day I have never lost the recollection of Racine, with the volume in his hand, full of emotion, and we all breathlessly pressing around him."

2876. JAMES I.

James I. of Scotland.

When James I. went into the Bodleian, he broke out into that noble speech, "If I were not a king, I would be a university man; et si unquam mihi in fatis sit, ut captivus ducar, si mihi daretur opto, hoc cuperem carcere concludi his catenis illigari, cum hisce captivis concatenatis ætatem agere." 2877. A MOTHER'S ADVICE.

Sir William Jones, when a mere child, was very inquisitive. His mother was a woman of great intelligence, and he would apply to her for the information which he desired; but her constant reply was, "Read and you will know." This gave him a passion for books, which was one of the principal means of making him what he was.

2878. READING EUCLID HIMSELF.

There are some books which require peculiar attention in reading, in order to understand them. A spruce macaroni was boasting, one day, that he had the most happy genius in the world. "Every thing," said he, "is easy to me. People call Euclid's Elements a hard book; but I read it yesterday from beginning to end in a piece of the afternoon between dinner and supper." "Read all Euclid," answered a gentleman present, "in one afternoon? How was that possible?" "Upon my honor I did, and never read smoother reading in my life." "Did you master all the demonstrations and solve all the problems as you went?" "Demonstrations and problems! I suppose you mean the a's, and b's, and c's, and 1's, and 2's, and the pictures of scratches and scrawls. No, no; I skipped all them. I only read Euclid himself; and all Euclid I did read, and in one piece of the afternoon, too." Alas! how many such readers there are! Such are likely to get as much knowledge of the subject they read as this young man did of geometry.

2879. METHODICAL THINKING.

Edward Gibbon.

Gibbon, the celebrated author of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, has furnished a new idea in the art of reading. "We ought," says he, "not to attend to the order of our book, so much as of our thoughts. The perusal of a particular work gives birth, perhaps, to ideas unconnected with the subject it treats; I pursue these ideas and quit my proposed plan of reading." Thus in the midst of Homer he read Longinus; a chapter of Longinus led to an epistle of Pliny; and having finished Longinus, he followed the train of his ideas of the sublime and beautiful in the inquiry of Burke, and concluded with comparing the ancient with the modern Longinus. Of all our popular writers, the most experienced reader was Gibbon, and he offers important advice to an author engaged on a particular subject: "I suspended my perusal of any new book on the subject till I had reviewed all that I knew, or believed, or had thought on it, that I might be qualified to discern how much the authors added to my original stock."

2880. KNOWING AND JUDGING.

Pope says that from fourteen to twenty, he read only for amusement; from twenty to twenty-seven, for improvement and instruction; that in the first part of this time he desired only to know, and in the second he endeavored to judge.

2881. SECEDERS CONDEMNED.

Dr. Waugh could enjoy an innocent joke with as much zest as any one; and few men could tell a humorous story with better effect. A reverend friend of his has told me that he has often heard him relate a short anecdote, though at the expense of the body to whom he belonged. The anecdote was this: A worthy, but blunt old man, living in the part of Scotland from which Dr. Waugh came, had been so sand-blind from his youth, as to be unable to read without the help of glasses of a great magnifying power, and even then not without difficulty and pain. Being, however, a lover of the Scriptures, he made one of his sons, a little boy about thirteen years of age, read a portion of them every night. The old man, I should here remark, was a most rigid Seceder. He could scarcely be brought to admit that piety could exist among any other body of Christians. One evening, before going to bed, the son was reading the usual chapter, and he happened to light on that one in Timothy in which it is said that the time will come when "wicked men and evil seducers shall wax worse and worse." The boy, by mistake, — and we all know such mistakes will happen, — read "Seceders" for the word "seducers." "Eh! fats that ye say, laddie!" exclaimed the worthy old man, in his own hasty manner. "Just read that verse again." The boy read the verse a second time, and again fell into the same error. "Just lat me see the buik," said the honest but blunt Seceder; and as he spoke he hastily stretched out his hand, and snatched the Bible from the hands of his son. His glasses were forthwith produced, and got some half dozen extra rubs with his handkerchief before he adjusted them on his nose. He looked at the verse, and seeing but very imperfectly, commenced spelling the word. "S-e-se—se." He then, owing to his deficient vision, mistook the three intervening letters, "duc," but read the remaining three, "ers," quite correctly. Finding that the two first, and the three last letters of the word answered for the term "Seceders," the poor man thought that was actually the word. His confusion, on thus fancying that the denomination to which he belonged was expressly condemned in one of the epistles of St. Paul was inexpressible. He uttered, or rather half uttered, a significant "humph," and followed it up with the remark, closing the book, as he spoke, "Johnny, lad, tha'll do for the nicht."

"Heinsius was mewed up in the library of Leyden all the year long, and that which, to my thinking, should have bred a loathing, caused in him a greater liking. "I no sooner," saith he, "come into the library, but I bolt the door to me, excluding Lust, Ambition, Avarice, and all such vices, whose nurse is Idleness, the mother of Ignorance and Melancholy. In the very lap of eternity, amongst so many divine souls, I take my seat with so lofty a spirit, and sweet content, that I pity all our great ones and rich men, that know not this happiness." Such is the incense of a votary who scatters it on the altar less for the ceremony than from the devotion.

§ 274. REPORTING AND REPORTERS.

2883. WILBERFORCE AND MORGAN O'SULLIVAN.

A certain popular debate, which was about English laborers, being one evening unusually dull, Jack Finnarty, who had but a short time before been imported from Tipperary, said to the only other reporter in the gallery at the time, that he felt very drowsy, and that he would be after taking a little bit of a nap, if he would tell him when he awoke any thing which might take place. The other agreed, and Jack, in a moment, was fast locked in the arms of Morpheus. An hour elapsed, and after half a dozen yawns, Jack opened his eyes. "Has any thing happened?" was his first question to his friend.

"To be sure there has," said the other, whose name was Morgan O'Sullivan.

"Has there, by the powers!" exclaimed Jack, pricking up his ears in the plenitude of his anxiety to learn what it was.

"Yes, Jack, and very important, too."

"By —, then, and why don't you be after telling it me at once? What was it about?"

"About the virtue of the Irish potato, Jack."

"Was it the Irish potato, you said, Morgan?"

"The Irish potato, and a most eloquent speech it was."

"Thunder and lightning, then, and why don't you tell it me?"

"I'll read it from my note book, Jack, and you'll take it down as I go on," said Morgan.

"Och, it's myself, sure, that's ready at any time to write what any mumber says about our pratics. Are you ready to begin?"

"Quite ready," answered Morgan.

"Now, then," said Jack, with an energy which strangely contrasted with the previous languor of his manner, — "now then, Morgan, my boy."

Morgan, affecting to read from his note book, commenced thus: "The honorable mumber said, that if —"

"Och, be aisy a little bit," interrupted Jack; "who was the honorable mumber?"

Morgan, hesitating for a moment — "Was it his name you asked? Sure it was Mr. Wilberforce."

"Mr. Wilberforce! Och, very well then."

Morgan resumed. "Mr. Wilberforce said, that it always appeared to him beyond all question that the great cause why the Irish laborers were, as a body, so much stronger, and capable of enduring so much greater fatigue than the English, was the surpassing virtues of their potato. And he —"

"Morgan, my dear fellow," shouted Jack at the mention of the Irish potato, his countenance lighting up with ecstasy as he spoke, — "Morgan, my dear fellow, this is so important that we must give it in the first person."

"Do you think so?" said Morgan.

"Throth, and I do," answered Jack.

"Very well," said the other.

Morgan then resumed: "And I have no doubt," continued Mr. Wilberforce, "that had it been my lot to be born and reared in —"

"Did the mumber say reared?" interrupted Jack exultingly, evidently associating the word with the growth of potatoes in his "own blessed country."

"He said 'reared,'" observed the other, who then resumed: "Had it been my lot to be born and reared in Ireland, where my food would have principally consisted of the potato,—that most nutritious and salubrious root,—instead of being the poor, infirm, shrivelled, and stunted creature you, sir, and honorable gentlemen, now behold me, I would have been a tall, stout, athletic man, and able to carry an enormous weight."

Here Jack Finnarty observed, looking his friend eagerly in the face, "Faith, Morgan, and that's what I call thrue eloquence! Go on."

"I hold that root to be invaluable; and the man who first cultivated it in Ireland I regard as a benefactor of the first magnitude to his species. And my decided opinion is, that never, till we grow potatoes in England, in sufficient quantities to feed all our laborers, will those laborers be so abled-bodied a class as the Irish. (Hear, hear! from both sides of the house.)"

"Well, by St. Patrick, but that bates every thing," observed Jack, on finishing his notes. "That's rare philosophy. And the other mumber cried, 'Hear, hear!' did they?"

"The other members cried, 'Hear, hear!' answered Morgan.

In a quarter of an hour afterwards the house rose. Morgan went away direct to the office of the paper for which he was employed; while Jack, in perfect ecstasies at the eulogium which had been pronounced on the virtue of the potatoes of "ould Ireland," ran in breathless haste to a public house, where the reporters who should have been on duty for the other morning papers were assembled. He read over his notes to them, which they copied verbatim; and not being at the time in the best possible condition for judging of the probability of Mr. Wilberforce delivering such a speech, they repaired to their respective offices, and actually gave a copy of it into the hands of the printer. Next morning it appeared in all the papers, except the one with which Morgan O'Sullivan was connected. The sensation and surprise it created in town exceeded every thing. Had it only appeared in one or two of the papers, persons of ordinary intelligence must at once have concluded that there was some mistake about the matter. But its appearing in all the journals except one forced, as it were, people to the conclusion that it must have been actually spoken. The inference was plain. Every body, while regretting that the necessity should exist, saw that no other course was left but to put Mr. Wilberforce at once into a strait jacket, and provide him with a keeper. In the evening, the house met as usual, and Mr. Wilberforce, on the speaker taking the chair, rose and begged the indulgence of the house for one moment to a matter which concerned it, as well as himself, personally. "Every honorable member," he observed, "has doubtless read the speech which I am represented as having made on the previous night. With the permission of the house, I will read it." (Here the honorable member read the speech amidst deafening roars of laughter.) "I can assure honorable members that no one could have read this speech with more surprise than I myself did this morning, when I found the paper on my breakfast table. For myself, personally, I care but little about it, though, if I were capable of uttering such nonsense as is here put into my mouth, it is high time that, instead of being a member of this house, I were an inmate of some lunatic asylum. It is for the dignity of this house that I feel concerned; for if honorable members were capable of listening to such nonsense, supposing me capable of giving expression to it, it were much more appropriate to call this a theatre for the performance of farces, than a place for the legislative deliberations of the representatives of the nation."

It was proposed by some members to call the printers of the different papers in which the speech appeared to the bar of the house, for a breach of privilege; but the matter was eventually allowed to drop.

THE HUMOROUS REPORTER MORGAN O'SULLIVAN.

P—F— used to tell the following story of Morgan O'Sullivan: Morgan was big-boned, loud-voiced, and had as much wit and fun as an Irish porter could carry—often more than he could carry himself, or knew what to do with. He took his wine frequently at Bellamy's, and then went up into the gallery and reported like a gentleman and a man of genius. The members hardly knew their own speeches again; but they admired his free and bold manner of dressing them up. None of them ever went to the printing office of the Morning Chronicle, to complain that the tall Irishman had given a lame, sneaking version of their sentiments. They pocketed the affront of their metamorphosis, and fathered speeches they had never made. His way was the hyperbole; a strong spice of Orientalism, with a dash of the bogtrotter. His manner seemed to please, and he presumed upon it. One evening, as he sat at his post in the gallery, waiting the issue of things, and a hint to hang his own tropes and figures upon, a dead silence happened to prevail in the house. It was when Mr. Addington was speaker. The bold leader of the press-gang was never bent upon serious business much, and at this time he was particularly full of meat and wine.

Delighted, therefore, with the pause, but thinking that something might as well be going forward, he called out lustily, "A song from Mr. Speaker." Imagine Addington's long, prim, upright figure, his consternation, and utter want of preparation for, or of a clew to repel, such an interruption of the rules and orders of Parliament. The house was in a roar. Pitt, it is said, could hardly keep his seat for laughing. When the bustle and the confusion were abated, the sergeant at arms went into the gallery to take the audacious culprit into custody, and indignantly desired to know who it was; but nobody would tell. Mark sat like a tower on the hindmost bench of the gallery, imperturbable in his own gravity, and safe in the faith of the brotherhood of reporters, who alone were in the secret. At length, as the mace-bearer was making fruitless inquiries, and getting impatient, Supple pointed to a fat Quaker, who sat in the middle of the crowd, and nodded assent that he was the man. The Quaker was, to his great surprise, taken into immediate custody; but after a short altercation and some further explanation, he was released, and the hero of our story put in his place for an hour or two, but left off on an assurance of his contrition, and of showing less wit and more discretion in future.

2885. REPORTERS SUBJECTED TO INCONVENIENCES.

Formerly, in the House of Commons, the reporters for the newspapers had no facilities for entrance into the gallery, beyond those enjoyed by the public generally; and on days when an interesting debate was expected, they were frequently obliged to take their place on the stairs early in the forenoon, and, after standing there for many hours, to depend for their chance of getting in upon a struggle with their competitors in the crowd, when the door was opened. Some thirty or forty years ago, there was a dark closet at the end of the gallery, in which the more experienced of the reporters used to hide themselves during a division, so as to be ready for the first rush when strangers were readmitted. In this closet Mr. Woodfall, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Lane (formerly editor of the British Press) were once saugly ensconced. The period of exclusion was long, and they beguiled it by political discussion. At last one of the party roared out, to the dismay of the speaker, and the horror of the sergeant at arms, "I say the Morning Post is in the pay of the French Directory!" The culprits were brought to the bar of the house, and a strict watch was in futuro kept on the closet of refuge. At length the late speaker, Mr. Abbott, at a time when some repairs or alterations were made in the house, caused a small room to be set apart for the use of the reporters, and a door to be struck out at the back of the gallery, whereby they might at all times obtain admittance to the back seat, which, although the most distant from the body of the house, was the best for hearing.

2886. THE FIRST PARLIAMENTARY REPORTS.

The first attempt at a monthly publication of the parliamentary debates was made in the Gentleman's Magazine, for August, 1735; and the practice was continued in succeeding numbers. The reports were of the most timid and cautious description, the names of the speakers being given only by the first and last letters, and, in many cases, no speaker's name is mentioned; all that appears is a summary of the argument and discussion. They got bolder by degrees, and at last published the names at full length. This audacity, coupled with the fact that some of the members appeared in a light not very satisfactory to themselves, either from their own defects, or the incorrect version of their oratory, caused the attention of the Commons to be drawn to the subject. It was brought under notice April 13, 1738, by the speaker, who was followed by Yonge, Windham, and Sir Thomas Winnington. The last concluded a very angry speech with these words: "Why, sir, you will have the speeches of this house every day printed, even during your session; and we shall be looked upon as the most contemptible assembly on the face of the earth." The result was a thundering resolution, unanimously agreed to, declaring it "a high indignity to, and a notorious breach of, the privileges of the house to publish the debates, either while Parliament is sitting or during the recess," and threatening to proceed against offenders "with the utmost severity." Accounts of parliamentary business were now obtained with greater risk, and various contrivances were employed to disguise a version of them. The Gentleman's Magazine published them under the title of the Debates of the Senate of Lilliput, and the London Magazine under that of a Journal of the Proceedings and Debates in the Political Club; giving Roman names to the speakers, while each publication printed an explanatory key at the end of the year. The two gentlemen principally occupied in this mystification were William Gurthrie and Thomas Gordon, both Scotchmen. About this time, Dr. Johnson arrived in London, and was immediately engaged, by the editor of the Gentleman's Magazine, (Cave), in the composition of the parliamentary debates. Gurthrie, who had a good memory, brought home as much as he could recollect from the house, mending his draught by whatever other assistance he could command; after which, the matter thus collected underwent the finishing touches of Johnson. At times, according to Boswell, Johnson had no other aid than the names of the speakers, and the side they took, being left to his own resources for the argument and language. A speech — the celebrated speech, commencing, "The atrocious crime of being a young man," which he put into the mouth of Pitt, when that distinguished orator replied to the taunts of Walpole — Johnson afterwards declared, in the company of Francis, Wedderburn, Foote, and Murphy, that he "wrote in a garret in Exeter Street." His reports, however, are considered, by the editor of Hansard's Parliamentary History, the most authentic extant, faithfully embodying the argument, if not the style, of the speakers. It was once observed to him, that he dealt out reason and eloquence with an equal hand to both parties. "That is not quite true," said Johnson; "I saved appearances pretty well; but I took care that the whig dogs should not have the best of it." The reports increased immensely the sale of the magazines; they enabled Cave to set up an equipage, on the door panel of which, instead of a crest, he had painted a representation of his office at St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell, where Johnson sometimes ate his dinner, concealed behind a screen, not having suitable clothes to appear before the more modish visitors of his employer; some of them, perhaps, members of the house, who dropped in to see or correct the maiden proofs of their oratory in the senate.

§ 275. REVIEWS AND REVIEWERS.

2887. KENRICK'S REVIEW OF GOLDSMITH.

Towards the end of March, 1759, the treatise on which Goldsmith had laid so much stress — on which he at one time had calculated to defray the expenses of his outfit to India — was published by the Dodseys, and entitled An Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe.

As it was the most important production that had yet come from Goldsmith's pen, he was anxious to have the credit of it; yet it appeared without his name on the title page. The authorship, however, was well known throughout the world of letters, and the author had now grown into sufficient literary importance to become an object of hostility to the underlings of the press. One of the most virulent attacks upon him was in a criticism on this treatise, and appeared in the Monthly Review, to which he himself had been recently a contributor. It slandered him as a man, while it decried him as an author, and accused him, by innuendo, of "laboring under the infamy of having, by the vilest and meanest actions, forfeited all pretensions to honor and honesty," and of practising "those acts which bring the sharper to the cart's tail or the pillory."

It will be remembered that the Review was owned by Griffiths, the bookseller, with whom Goldsmith had recently had a misunderstanding. The criticism, therefore, was no doubt dictated by the lingerings of resentment; and the imputations upon Goldsmith's character for honor and honesty, and the vile and mean actions hinted at, could only allude to an unfortunate pawing of some clothes. All this, too, was after Griffiths had received the affecting letter from Goldsmith, drawing a picture of his poverty and perplexities, and after the latter had made him a literary compensation. Griffiths, in fact, was sensible of the falsehood and extravagance of the attack, and tried to exonerate himself by declaring that the criticism was written by a person in his employ; but we see no difference in atrocity between him who wields the knife and him who hires the cutthroat. It may be well, however, in passing, to bestow our mite of notoriety upon the miscreant who launched the slander. He deserves it for a long course of dastardly and venomous attacks, not merely upon Goldsmith, but upon most of the successful authors of the day. His name was Kenrick. He was originally a mechanic, but, possessing some degree of talent and industry, applied himself to literature as a profession. This he pursued for many years, and tried his hand in every department of prose and poetry: he wrote plays and satires, philosophical tracts, critical dissertations, and works on philology; nothing from his pen ever rose to first-rate excellence, or gained him a popular name, though he received from some university the degree of doctor of laws. Dr. Johnson characterized his literary career in one short sentence. "Sir, he is one of the many who have made themselves public without making themselves known."

Soured by his own want of success, jealous of the success of others, his natural irritability of temper increased by habits of intemperance, he at length abandoned himself to the practice of reviewing, and became one of the Ishmaelites of the press. In this his malignant bitterness soon gave him a notoriety which his talents had never been able to attain. We shall dismiss the subject with the following sketch of him, by the hand of one of his contemporaries:—

"Dreaming of genius which he never had;
Half wit, half fool, half critic, and half mad;
Seizing, like Shirley, on the poet's lyre,
With all his rage, but not one spark of fire;
Eager for slaughter, and resolved to tear
From other's brows that wreath he must not wear,—
Next Kenrick came, all furious, and replete
With brandy, malice, pertness, and conceit;
Unskilled in classic lore, through envy blind
To all that's beautiful, learned, or refined;
For faults alone beheld the savage prowess,
With reason's offal glut his ravens' soul;
Pleased with his prey, its inmost blood he drinks,
And mumbles, paws, and turns it, till it stinks."

2888. CONFIDENCE IN REVIEWERS.

Miss Lucy Porter once told Dr. Johnson that she should like to purchase some new publications, and asked him if she might trust to the reviewers. "Infallibly, my dear Lucy," he replied, "provided you buy what they abuse, and never any thing they praise."

2889. GOLDSMITH A CONTRIBUTOR TO THE MONTHLY REVIEW.

The Monthly Review, of which a bookseller by the name of Griffiths was proprietor, was an advocate for whig principles, and had been in prosperous existence for nearly eight years. Of late, however, periodicals had multiplied exceedingly, and a formidable rival had started up in the Critical Review, published by Archibald Hamilton, a bookseller, and aided by the powerful and popular pen of Dr. Smollett. Griffiths was obliged to recruit his forces. While so doing he met Goldsmith, and was struck with remarks on men and books which fell from him in the course of conversation. He took occasion to sound him privately as to his inclination and capacity as a reviewer, and was furnished by him with specimens of his literary and critical talents. They proved satisfactory. The consequence was, that Goldsmith once more changed his mode of life, and in April, 1757, became a contributor to the Monthly Review, at a small fixed salary, with board and lodging; and accordingly took up his abode with Mr. Griffiths, at the sign of the Dunciad, Paternoster Row. As usual, we trace this phase of his fortunes in his semi-fictional writings, his sudden transmutation of the pedagogue into the author being humorously set forth in the case of George Primrose, in the Vicar of Wakefield. "Come," says George's adviser, "I see you are a lad of spirit and some learning; what do you think of commencing author, like me? You have read in books, no doubt, of men of genius starving at the trade; at present I'll show you forty very dull fellows about town that live by it in opulence—all honest, jog-trot men, who go on smoothly and dully, and write history and politics, and are praised; men, sir, who, had they been bred cobblers, would all their lives only have mended shoes, but never made them." "Finding," says George, "that there was no great degree of gentility affixed to the character of an usher, I resolved to accept his proposal; and, having the highest respect for literature, hailed the antiqua mater of Grub Street with reverence. I thought it my glory to pursue a track which Dryden and Otway trod before me." Alas, Dryden struggled with indigence all his days; and Otway, it is said, fell a victim to famine in his thirty-fifth year, being strangled by a roll of bread, which he devoured with the voracity of a starving man.

In Goldsmith's experience the track soon proved a thorny one. Griffiths was a hard business man, of shrewd, worldly good sense, but little refinement or cultivation. He meddled, or rather muddled, with literature, too, in a business way, altering and modifying occasionally the writings of his contributors; and in this he was aided by his wife, who, according to Smollett, was "an antiquated female critic, and a dabbler in the Review." Such was the literary vassalage to which Goldsmith had unwarily subjected himself. A diurnal drudgery was imposed on him, irksome to his indolent habits, and attended by circumstances humiliating to his pride. He had to write daily from nine o'clock until two, and often throughout the day; whether in the vein or not, and on subjects dictated by his task-master, however foreign to his taste; in a word, he was treated as a mere literary hack. But this was not the worst; it was the critical supervision of Griffiths and his wife which grieved him; the "illiterate, bookselling Griffiths," as Smollett called them, "who presumed to revise, alter, and amend the articles contributed to their Review. Thank Heaven," crowed Smollett, "the Critical Review is not written under the restraint of a bookseller and his wife. Its principal writers are independent of each other, unconnected with booksellers, and unawed by old women."

This literary vassalage, however, did not last long. The bookseller became more and more exacting. He accused his hack writer of idleness, of abandoning his writing desk and literary workshop at an early hour of the day, and of assuming a tone and manner above his situation. Goldsmith, in return, charged him with impertinence, his wife with meanness and parsimony in her household treatment of him, and both of literary meddling and meddling. The engagement was broken off at the end of five months, by mutual consent. Better broken than kept, no doubt; but better still if never made.

2891. VOLTAIRE'S SATIRE AND PUNISHMENT.

Voltaire wrote a very severe satire upon the King of Prussia, which so nettled him that he could never forget it. Upon hearing that the bard was at Leipsic, he told Count de —, one of his aides-de-camp, that he could confer a singular obligation on him; the aide-de-camp, who said he only lived to obey his majesty, was told the object was properly to requite Voltaire for the obligation he had conferred in that satire. The hint was sufficient; the count flew to execute his sovereign's pleasure; he repaired to Leipsic, and, waiting one morning upon Voltaire, complimented him upon his extraordinary merit, and inquired if he was not the author of that particular poem; to which the bard very innocently replied, "Yes." "Then, sir," said the count, "it is a scandal to the judgment of the present age that you have not been recompensed for it. I have a commission, sir, to reward you liberally for this production; and I have too great a sense of its value, and too much generosity, to deprive you of any part of your due." Having said this, he fell to work and caned him soundly, while the unfortunate bard in vain pleaded for mercy. The obligation being thus requited, the count drew up a receipt in the following terms, which he insisted on Voltaire's signing, on pain of further corporal punishment:—

"Received of his Prussian majesty, by the hands of the Count de —, one hundred bastinadoes, very judiciously applied, for having written a satire on his said majesty, in full of all demands. Witness my hand. VOLTAIRE."

2892. WISDOM IN SILENCE.

Satire is a powerful weapon; but when turned against us unjustly, we cannot give our adversary a more severe rebuke than by remaining silent. Some one said to Tasso, who was opposing to raillery silence, "You must be a fool not to speak in your defence."

2890. EDGAR A. POE AND THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

Edgar A. Poe, whose genius even those who most dislike his wild extravagances and psychological transcendentalisms will at once acknowledge, thus vents his bitterest sarcasm upon the North American Review:—

"I cannot say that I ever fairly comprehended the force of the term 'insult,' until I was given to understand, one day, by a member of the North American Review clique, that this journal was 'not only willing, but anxious, to render me that justice which had been already rendered me by the Revue Française, and the Revue des Deux Mondes,' but was 'restrained from so doing' by my 'invincible spirit of antagonism.' I wish the North American Review to express no opinion of me whatever—for I have none of it. In the mean time, as I see no motto on its title page, let me recommend it one from Sterne's Letter from France. Here it is: 'As we rode along the valley, we saw a herd of asses on the top of one of the mountains—how they viewed and reviewed us!'"

"You are mistaken," was the reply; "he is the fool who does not know when to hold his tongue."

2893. BOURBON AND BOLUS; OR, LEGISLATING DOWN PHYSIC.

Satirists, if they escape the scourge of the law, have sometimes reason to dread the cane of the satirized. Whether any caning was feared or endured in the following case, we are not informed. Who shall say that the cane was not at least deserved? No medical man, surely, nor any of our medicine mongers!

An injudicious adherent of Mr. Perceval, the colleague of Canning, having mentioned drugs among the articles to be intercepted by the English ships, in order to make the French more disposed for peace, the opportunity which it offered to Sidney Smith for displaying his powers of ridicule was too tempting to be lost, and he has thus "shown up" the affair, in the Letters of Peter Plymley.

"What a sublime thought," exclaims Peter, "that no purge can now be taken between the Weser and the Garonne; that the bustling pestle is still, the canorous mortar mute, and the bowels of mankind locked up for fourteen degrees of latitude! When, I should be curious to know, were all the powers of crudity and flatulence fully explained to his majesty's ministers? At what period was this great plan of conquest and constipation fully developed? In whose mind was the idea of destroying the pride and the plasters of France first engendered? Without castor oil they might, for some months, to be sure, have carried on a lingering war; but can they do without bark? Will the people live under a government where antimominal powders cannot be procured? Will they bear the loss of mercury? 'There's the rub.' Depend upon it, the absence of materia medica will soon bring them to their senses, and the cry of Bourbon and Bolus burst forth from the Baltic to the Mediterranean."

SCULPTURE AND SCULPTORS.

§ 277. HISTORICAL AND BIOGRAPHICAL WORKS OF ANCIENT SCULPTORS.

2894. THE CLAY MODEL.

LINX relates a pleasing anecdote of the invention of sculpture. Dributades, the fair daughter of a celebrated potter of Siccyon, contrived a private meeting with her lover, at the eve of a long separation. A repetition of vows of constancy, and a stay prolonged to a very late hour, overpowered at length the faculties of the youth, and he fell fast asleep. The nymph, whose imagination was more alert, observing that, by the light of a lamp, her admirer's profile was strongly marked on the wall, eagerly snatched up a piece of charcoal, and, inspired by love, traced the outline with such success, that her father, when he chanced to see the sketch, determined to preserve, if possible, the effect. With this view he formed a kind of clay model from it, which first essay of the kind had the honor to be preserved in the public repository of Corinth, even to the fatal day of its destruction by that enemy to the arts, Mummius Archaicus.

2895. DEATH OF TORRIGIANO.

Torrignano, the Florentine, after enriching the cities of Andalusia with several pieces of sculpture not unworthy the disciple and rival of Michael Angelo, was condemned to death by the Inquisition, and expired in the prison of Seville, under the horrors of an approaching execution, in the year 1522. This eminent sculptor had undertaken to carve a Madonna and Child of the natural size, for a Spanish grandee; it was to be made after the model of one which he had already executed, and promise was given him of a reward proportioned to the merit of the work. His employer was one of the first grandees in Spain, and Torrignano, who conceived highly of his generosity, and well knew what his own talents could perform, was determined to outdo his former production. The ingenious artist with much pains and application completed it, and presented to his employer a matchless piece of sculpture, the utmost effort of his art. The grandee surveyed the striking performance with great delight and reverence; he applauded Torrignano to the skies; and, impatient to possess himself of the enchanting idol, forthwith sent to demand the delivery of it. At the same time, to display his generosity, he loaded two lackeys with the money: the bulk indeed was promising, but when Torrignano examined the bags, and found the specie within nothing more, nor better, than a parcel of brass maravedi, amounting only to the amount of thirty ducats, vexation at this sudden disappointment of his hopes, and just resentment for what he considered as an insult to his merit, so fired him, that, snatching up his mallet in rage, and not regarding the perfection or (what to him was of more fatal consequence) the sacred character of the image he had made, he broke it suddenly in pieces, and dismissed the lackeys, with their load of farthings, to tell the tale. They executed their errand too well. The grandee, filled with shame, vexation, and revenge, and assuming horror for the sacrilegious nature of the act, presented himself before the Court of Inquisition, and impeached the unhappy artist at that terrible tribunal. It was in vain that poor Torrignano urged the right of an author over works of his own creation. Reason pleaded on his side, but superstition sat in judgment. The decree was death with torture; but the holy office lost its victim. Torrignano expired under the horrors, not under the hands, of the executioner.

2896. SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF POWERS.

Hiram Powers, the subject of the following memoir, who may be justly styled the Angelo of the present age, was born in the state of Vermont, in the year 1805. His father, a plain New England farmer, was a man of great integrity and worth, who endeavored, on all occasions, to infuse into the minds of his children an early regard for the virtuous and good.

Having reached the place of their destination in the vicinity of Cincinnati, his father commenced operations in farming. For a while, the bright dreams of the future, in which Hiram had indulged his fancy, seemingly, were about to be realized; but shortly after their arrival, these were all blasted by the untimely death of his father.

Immediately upon this event, he went to Cincinnati, where, after considerable difficulty, he obtained a situation in a reading-room in the capacity of waiter. While here, during his leisure moments, he indulged his fondness for drawing, which had early exhibited itself. But, unfortunately, his devotions to the art were of too sanguine a character for the comfort of the visitors; the unpleasant smell of his colors was complained of, and likewise their too frequent combination with the papers, magazines, &c., belonging to the room; and to this cause we may safely attribute the change of color sometimes noticed in the garments of the visitors themselves. These charges, together with his obstinacy in pursuing his favorite amusement, were deemed sufficient for the young martyr's removal.

We subsequently find him in a produce store, in which he remained only a short time, being thrown out of employment by the failure of his master.

Soon after this, he engaged himself as an apprentice to a clock maker, to whom he proved a valuable assistant, by his expertness in collecting debts for the establishment, as well as his ingenuity as a workman.

It was during this apprenticeship that his attention was first called to sculpture. An itinerant artist, passing through Cincinnati at this time, attracted his notice; he visited his studio, and readily became acquainted with the art of modelling, the process of which so pleased and fascinated him, that he at once determined to relinquish his present occupation and become a sculptor. The sight of some antique statues had warmed into life an innate germ that would give to the world a man whose life would form a new era in the art of statuary. Thus a pebble at its source may shape the direction of a mighty river. He speaks of the moments occupied in revolving in his mind his future course as the happiest of his life; in these he indulged his earliest aspirations for distinction — sensations to him of the utmost novelty and delight.

His course being now determined upon, he obtained the necessary materials for modelling, rented the garret of his former workshop as a studio, and commenced operations. His first essay was a copy of the head of the Venus de' Medici, to the execution of which he now bent himself with great assiduity, and labored with that untiring devotion to the art which has ever since characterized and remained with him. Even in his first attempts at sculpture Powers was eminently successful.

His next most important work was his famous Cannibal, which so successfully gulled the good people of Cincinnati. The plot of this most amusing ruse was as follows: He placed upon a stuffed figure of a man a plaster head, which was made to look as grim and ferocious as possible by means of paint, false hair, &c. To heighten the effect, and to render the counterfeit complete, a weapon of death, easily imagined to have been the identical one used by the monster in his attack upon his fellow-man, was placed in his hands. A showy handbill was posted about, announcing it to be a bona fide cannibal, captured in the Caribbean Islands, and brought to this country at a great expense, which it was trusted a generous public would in part defray. It was visited by crowds, and all expressed great delight at having had the opportunity of seeing a real cannibal. In justice, however, to Powers, we should say, that he was no further concerned in this deception than employed to make the figure.

Soon after this, he was employed by the proprietors of the Western Museum in fitting up the infernal regions — an exhibition which attracted much attention, and gained him great applause.

His restless and imaginative genius prompted him to visit Washington, where he obtained, by request, model busts of some of the most distinguished men then in that city; among whom were Jackson, Webster, Adams, Calhoun, Colonel Preston, Johnson, and several others, who not only sat for him, but also rendered him much valuable assistance. The bust of Webster was modelled at his own residence, where the artist was treated with great familiarity and hospitality during the time requisite for his work. Through his influence, Powers received several valuable commissions, which contributed greatly to further his still cherished design of visiting Italy. It was, however, through the immediate kindness and generosity of Colonel Preston, of South Carolina, that he was enabled to put this plan into execution.

Having completed, in wax or clay, models of these distinguished individuals, he proceeded to Rome, where, shortly after, we find him engaged in transferring their features to marble.

Here his workmanship attracted universal attention and admiration: we see his studio thronged with the most eminent artists of the age, astonished at this prodigy of genius, who, by one stroke of his magic chisel, hurled down to the level of mediocrity those who had imagined themselves arrived at the acme of perfection.

Having fulfilled the commissions which he obtained in America, he commenced his first ideal work in his justly celebrated Eve: upon this he was engaged three years, but in the interim of which he completed several minor pieces. One day, while employed upon this work, he was visited in his studio by the great Thorwaldsen, whom Powers styles the "patriarch of sculptors," who expressed the greatest delight, and even astonishment, at the accurate proportion and exquisite beauty of the various specimens of his art around the room. When Eve was exhibited to him, its author, with his wonted diffidence of his own powers, thought it due to himself to say that "this was his first attempt at the ideal."

Thorwaldsen, with characteristic frankness, replied, —

"You may say it is your first, but any other man might be proud to call it his last."

Powers's next ideal work was his Greek Slave, which has attracted so much attention in Europe, and in this country excited so much curiosity. This is beyond doubt his chef d'œuvre in the ideal, and has contributed in no small degree to win him that celebrity which he so justly merits. It represents a female of exquisite beauty, who is supposed to have been taken prisoner by the Turks, in the time of the Greek revolution, and is publicly exposed for sale. Its graceful attitude, its great beauty, its truthfulness to nature, all combine to render it one of the most admired works of art now extant.

§ 278. TRAITS, HABITS, &c.

2897. ARDENT ENTHUSIASM.

The enthusiasm of ardent and of forcible minds appears madness to those that are dull and phlegmatic. The pleasure it inspires is the greatest and the most independent remuneration that men of genius receive for their efforts and exertions. Donatello, the great Florentine sculptor, had been long working at his statue of Judith; and, on giving the last stroke of the chisel to it, he was heard to exclaim, "Speak now! I am sure you can!"

2898. NOLLEKEN'S FAMILIARITY WITH MEN OF RANK.

This celebrated sculptor could never be made to comprehend the abstract idea of the distinctions of rank, or even of persons. He would go up to the Duke of York, or the Prince of Wales, (in spite of warning,) take them familiarly by the button, like common acquaintances, ask them how their father did, and express pleasure at hearing he was well, saying, "When he is gone we shall never get such another." He once, when the old king was sitting to him for his bust, fairly stuck a pair of compasses into his nose, to measure the distance from the upper lip to the forehead, as if he had been measuring a block of marble. His late majesty laughed heartily at this, and was amused to find that there was a person in the world ignorant of the vast interval which separated him from every other man.

2999. DISINTERESTEDNESS OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

Michael Angelo, for his noble design of the Church of St. Peter, at Rome, received only twenty-five Roman crowns, and it was finished in a fortnight. Santo Gallo had been many years employed in his wretched models, and received four thousand crowns for them. This being reported to Angelo, far from being mortified or envious, he said, "I work for immortality, and require no other recompense."

2900. ROUBILLIAC.

Roubilliac had frequent recourse to living nature to help him out with his conceptions. From a chairman he is said to have copied the legs, and from a waterman the arms, of the Hercules in Warren's monument. We know not where he found the original of the figure of Navigation, in the same work. It is finely imagined, and far more exquisitely handled. If he happened to be in company with a lady whose hands were beautiful, or whose ears were small and finely shaped, he would gaze wistfully at her, and has been known to startle sensitive spinsters with apprehensions of matrimony, seizing them suddenly by the wrist, and crying, rapturously, "Madam, I must have your hand—madam, I shall have your ear." The ear of Handel, he said, was so fine in music, that it could only be represented in marble by one small and elegant; and the model for this musical ear belonged to Miss Rich, the daughter of one of his friends.

2901. FLAXMAN'S DOMESTIC LIFE.

In the year 1782, Flaxman quitted the parental roof, hired a small house and studio in Wardour Street, collected a stock of choice models, set his sketches in good order, and took unto himself a wife, Ann Denman, one whom he had long loved, and who well deserved his affection. She was amiable and accomplished; had a taste for art and literature, was skilful in French and Italian, and, like her husband, had acquired some knowledge of the Greek. But what was better than all, she was an enthusiastic admirer of his genius: she cheered and encouraged him in his moments of despondency—regulated modestly and prudently his domestic economy—arranged his drawings—managed now and then his correspondence, and acted in all particulars so that it seemed as if the church, in performing a marriage, had accomplished a miracle, and blended them really into one flesh and one blood. That tranquillity of mind, so essential to those who live by thought, was of his household, and the sculptor, happy in the company of one who had taste and enthusiasm, soon renewed with double zeal the studies which courtship and matrimony had for a time interrupted. He had never doubted that in the company of her whom he loved he should be able to work with an intenser spirit; but of another opinion was Sir Joshua Reynolds. "So, Flaxman," said the president, one day, as he chanced to meet him, "I am told you are married; if so, sir, I tell you you are ruined for an artist." Flaxman went home, sat down beside his wife, took her hand, and said with a smile, "I am ruined for an artist." "John," said she, "how has this happened, and who has done it?" "It happened," said he, "in the church, and Ann Denman has done it. I met Sir Joshua Reynolds just now, and he said marriage had ruined me in my profession."

How completely mistaken the declaration of Sir Joshua was proved to be by the subsequent and world-wide reputation of the great sculptor, it is almost unnecessary to say.

In the society of his wife, Flaxman enjoyed the purest domestic happiness; and a contemporary describes her as a most cheerful, intelligent woman, a collector, too, of drawings and sketches, and an especial admirer of Stothard, of whose designs and prints she had amassed more than a thousand. Her husband paid her the double respect due to affection and talent, and when any difficulty in composition occurred, he would say, with a smile, "Ask Mrs. Flaxman; she is my dictionary."

2902. THORWALDSEN AND THE POOR GERMAN.

Thorwaldsen, travelling to Stuttgart, overtook on the road a poor German, heavily laden with a knapsack: on seeing the carriage pass, the man called to the coachman to stop, and entreated to be taken up; but the driver, giving an insolent reply, would have continued his way, when the sculptor himself ordered the coachman to stop, saying he would make room for him inside; he accordingly released the tired pedestrian to come in and take a seat.

They soon entered into familiar conversation, in the course of which the stranger said he was a painter, and, hearing that the great Thorwaldsen was shortly expected at Stuttgart, he had started from — on foot, resolving to see an artist whose works had made such noise in Europe. "And pray, sir," said he, "as you say you have just left Rome, have you seen, or do you know, Thorwaldsen personally?" "Yes," replied the sculptor, "I have the good fortune to be very intimate with him, and promise, on our arrival at Stuttgart, to present you to him."

At this assurance the German's joy knew no bounds; he grasped him by the hand, and a silent tear bespoke his gratitude. The benevolent old man felt sensibly moved at the unsophisticated zeal of the young artist, and unable to sustain his incognito any longer, "My dear good friend," he exclaimed, "I will not keep you longer in suspense. I am Thorwaldsen."

§ 279. PATRONAGE AND REMUNERATION.

2903. CHANTREY AND NOLLEKENS.

When Chantrey sent his bust of Horne Tooke to the exhibition, he was young and unfriended; but the great merit of the work did not escape the eye of Nollekens. He lifted it from the floor, set it before him, moved his head to and fro, and, having satisfied himself of its excellence, turned round to those who were arranging the works for the exhibition, and said, "There's a fine—a very fine work—let the man who made it be known—remove one of my busts and put this one in its place, for well it deserves it." Often afterwards, when desired to model a bust, he said, in his most persuasive way, "Go to Chantrey; he's the man for a bust—he'll make a good bust of you—I always recommend him."

2904. BERNINI.

Bernini, the sculptor, was distinguished for his extraordinary precocity. A head still preserved in the Church of St. Prasside, at Rome, was executed by him at the early age of ten years. His generosity to his brother artists was not less remarkable than his genius. When Louis XIV. invited him to France, he was received with public honors during his progress; and, on his entrance into Paris, the papal nuncio went out to conduct him to a royal palace. During his stay of eight months, he received eight louis d'ors per day, and at his departure a further present of fifty thousand crowns; yet, though expressly sent for to assist in building the Louvre, when Louis showed him Penault's designs, he had the liberality to remark, that France needed no foreign aid when she possessed so much genius in herself. The well-known picture of Vandyck, containing three portraits of Charles I., was painted in order that Bernini might make a bust from it in marble, for which the sculptor received six thousand crowns.

2905. A REAL PATRON OF ART.

One of the most remarkable statues, at the late exhibition at Paris, was a Penelope, which had gained for its sculptor a gold medal worth four thousand francs. The fortunate possessor of this modern chef-d'œuvre is M. de Luynes. We are told that the bargain was made as follows:—

"Monsieur," said the Duke de Luynes to the artist, "for how much will you sell your statue?"

"I cannot give it for less than eight thousand francs."

"Then, monsieur, you will not sell it to me."

"It has cost me much labor."

"Undoubtedly, monsieur! And as I wish to pay you its value, I shall not purchase it for eight thousand francs."

"But, M. le Duc, I do not understand you."

"It is my last word—I shall not purchase it at eight thousand francs."

"You give it up then?"

"By no means. If you will only let me name the price, the bargain is concluded."

"Well, what say you?"

"I offer you twelve thousand francs for it—if that suits you."

The Penelope was purchased. This more than princely manner of appreciating and encouraging art needs no comment.

2906. HONORS AWARDED TO THORWALDSEN.

When the great Thorwaldsen, the friend and companion of Allston, went home to Copenhagen to die, after his myriad creations of grandeur and beauty, he was received with the thunder of cannon along the coast, and processions and gala festas bespoke the general enthusiasm. He was greeted back to his country with the honors decreed to a Roman victor, and became a companion of his sovereign. When he died, the king conducted his funeral. He followed him to the grave uncovered, as chief mourner, attended by all his court, and, with his own hands, he helped lay the great sculptor in his tomb. There were public demonstrations of grief; and in the court and throughout the city there were signs of mourning, which silently told the stranger that some great public calamity had taken place.

§ 280. WONDERS OF THE ART.

2907. MINIATURE MECHANISM.

Among the curiosities to be seen at the Marine Hall, in Salem, Massachusetts, are the two following remarkable specimens of the fine arts:—

1. A hollow cherry stone, containing about two hundred tea-spoons of finished workmanship.

2. At one corner of the room is a hollow sphere, about the size of an orange, opening in two equal divisions. It is formed of a light brown substance, having a slight resemblance to plaster of Paris. At first view, the inside of each of these half spheres has a ragged, spongy appearance; but on examining more closely, you will find the whole concave surface is carved into very diminutive human, angelic, and demoniac figures. These are so exceedingly small, that the heads of the largest are not so large as the heads of the smallest pins; and yet the nose, mouth, and every part of the features appear in full relief. One of these concave half spheres is said to have been designed by the monks, who made it to represent the heaven of heavens, with its glorified inhabitants, and its Almighty Ruler sitting in glory in the midst. The other is said to represent the infernal regions, with Lucifer presiding, who is ever and anon plunging his subjects into a dismal bottomless pit near the centre.

2908. EGYPTIAN OBELISKS.

The entrance of Luxor was distinguished by two beautiful obelisks, more than eighty feet high, and twenty feet square at the base. A modern traveller thus describes them: "Before the grand entrance of this vast edifice two lofty obelisks stand proudly pointing to the sky, fair as the daring sculptor left them. The sacred figures and hieroglyphic characters are beautifully cut into the hard granite, and have the sharp finish of yesterday. The very stone looks not discolored. You see them as Cambyzes saw them, when he stayed his chariot wheels to gaze up to them, and the Persian war-cry ceased before these acknowledged symbols of the sacred element of fire. Very noble are all these remains; but my eyes were continually attracted towards the aspiring obelisks, and again and again you turn to them with increasing wonder and admiration."

Alas for these beautiful obelisks! They no longer stand like twin deities to guard the entrance to Luxor. A solitary one remains, "ready in anger to dart at the sun, for not having annihilated, at a stroke, the barbarous Gaul who so lately robbed it of its mate. The French, by permission of the pacha, have taken one of these beautiful obelisks to Paris."

This monolith has since been erected in La Place de la Concorde, where it has excited the wonder of the Parisians, and been gazed at with awe by travellers from all lands. Much labor has been bestowed upon it, by the learned, to decipher the hieroglyphics with which it is covered. It is supposed that the Egyptian obelisks were originally finished at the top with gilt bronze or copper.

2909. THE BUST OF CHARLES I.

Vandyck having drawn Charles I. in three different faces, a profile, three quarters, and a full face, the picture was sent to Rome for Bernini to make a bust from it. Bernini was unaccountably dilatory in the work, and upon his slowness being complained of, he said that he had set about it several times, but there was something so unfortunate in the features of the face, that he was shocked every time that he examined it, and forced to leave off the work; and if there was any stress to be laid on physiognomy, he was sure the person whom the picture represented was destined to a violent end. The bust was at last finished, and sent to England. As soon as the ship that brought it arrived in the river, the king, who was very impatient to see the bust, ordered it to be carried immediately to Chelsea: it was conveyed thither, and placed upon a table in the garden, whither the king went with a train of nobility, to inspect the bust. As they were viewing it, a hawk flew over their heads with a partridge in his claws, which he had wounded to death. Some of the partridge's blood fell upon the neck of the bust, where it remained without being wiped off. This bust was placed over the door of the king's closet at Whitehall, and continued there till it was destroyed by fire.

Praxiteles, who flourished two hundred and sixty-four years before Christ, was the sculptor of some of the most famous statues of antiquity. Among these were two Venuses, one clothed and the other naked. The first was purchased by the Khoans, who preferred it as the most decent. The Cnidians took the rejected one, which was so exquisitely beautiful that many persons took a voyage to Cnidus for the sole purpose of seeing it.

Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, was so desirous of possessing it, that he offered to pay all the public debts of Cnidus, which were large, as the price; but the citizens refused to part with it on any terms, regarding it as the principal glory of the state. Praxiteles having promised the choice of his works to Phryne, a lady to whom he was attached, she, in order to discover which he most valued, ran to him one day with the false intelligence that his house was on fire. "I am undone," he cried, "unless I save my Satyr and my Cupid." This lady, having obtained an indisputable criterion, chose the Cupid as the most valuable of all his performances.

§ 281. HUMOROUS AND LIVELY DETAILS.

2911. THE DOCTOR AND THE GRAVESTONE MAKER.

The Exeter Newsletter tells a good story of the facetious Dr. Thornton, of Derry, who undertook to quiz a neighbor of his, an old Scotch gravestone maker. The doctor, one day, in passing the residence of the sculptor, who was busily at work, drew up, and accosted him as follows:—

"Mr. W., don't you believe it to be your duty, as a rational man and a Christian, to pray for your daily bread?"

"Ay," quoth Old Mortality, "I once thought it to be my duty, but I dinna noo min muckle aboot it."

"I suppose then," said the doctor, "that you pray that people may die, that you may enjoy the profits in furnishing their gravestones?"

"Na, fath," replied the old man, "there's no need o' that while one Matthew Thornton continues to practice physic; he kills off folks faster than I can make stones for them."

2912. ITALY'S SUN FAVORABLE TO CANOVA'S GENIUS.

Many authors have fancied particular hours of the day, or particular seasons of the year, as more propitious to the flights of genius. Love-sick swains seek woods, and groves, and purling streams, to pour out the overflowings of passion. Canova fancied the sun of Italy alone propitious to his genius; a clouded sky, or a foggy atmosphere, cast a gloom on his spirits which he could not overcome, so that even Paris was to him the grave of genius. Napoleon perceived that in the bust Canova made of him, and which is now in the possession of Baron Denon, there was wanting that grand character which distinguished his works from the rest of modern sculptors, and observed to him that he did not think he had been happy in the execution of his work. "I feel it, sire," replied Canova, "but I cannot help it; the clouded sky of France does not inspire me, like the warm sun of Italy."

2913. IMMORTALITY ESTIMATED BY YEARS.

Napoleon, being in the gallery of the Louvre one day, attended by the Baron Denon, turned round suddenly, from a fine picture, which he had viewed for some time in silence, and said to him,—

"That is a noble picture, Denon."

"Immortal," was Denon's reply.

"How long," inquired Napoleon, "will this picture last?"

Denon answered, that with care and proper attention, it might last, perhaps, five hundred years.

"And how long," said Napoleon, "will a statue last?"

"Perhaps," replied Denon, "five thousand years."

"And this," returned Napoleon sharply, "this you call immortality."

2914. THIRTY YEARS' PREPARATION.

"You charge me fifty sequins," said a Venetian nobleman to a sculptor, "for a bust that cost you only ten days' labor." "You forget," replied the artist, "that I had been thirty years learning to make that bust in ten days."

2915. A BITE.

Alfonso Lombardi, a celebrated sculptor of the Emperor Charles V., was a great coxcomb. He got punished one day by a lady of Bologna, to whom he took it into his head to make love in a foppish manner. She was his partner at a ball, in the midst of which he turned to her, and, heaving a profound sigh, said, as he looked her in the face with what he thought ineffable sweetness in his eyes, and we may suppose some fantastic and writhing gesture, "If 'tis not love I feel, pray what is it?" "Perhaps," said the young lady, "something bites you."

2916. DR. BURNEY AND NOLLEKENS.

Dr. Burney frequently indulged his friends with small recherché musical parties, at one of which, whilst Piozzi and Signora Cois were singing a duetto enchantingly, the eccentric Nollekens happened to drop in by accident; and, after the bravos and bravissimos had subsided, Nollekens called out, "Dr. Burney, I don't like that kind of music: I heard a great deal of it while I was in Italy; but I like the Scotch and English music better." Dr. Burney, with some degree of irritation, stepped forward and replied, "Suppose a person to say, 'Well, I have been to Rome, saw the Apollo, and many fine works; but, for all that, give me a good barber's block.'" "Ay, that would be talking like a fool," rejoined the sculptor.

2917. THE ROCK OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Many are the absurdities committed, even in modern times, in marble. The invention of the steam engine has been recorded by the figure of an elephant, which may imply power, but cannot surely represent active motion. When a basis for Chantrey's statue of Grattan was under discussion, one of the orator's friends, and a witty one too, said, "Pedestal! the best pedestal for him is the rock of the constitution: carve that, and put him upon it." "A good notion," answered another of his countrymen; "but how are we to know the rock of the constitution from any other rock?"

2918. ANECDOTES OF ANNIBAL CARRACCI.

In a company where Annibal Carracci was present, great praises were bestowed upon the group of the Laocoon, one of the finest remaining specimens of ancient sculpture; but this great painter said not a word upon the subject. As all the company expressed their astonishment at his silence, he took up a pencil, and sketched the outlines of the Laocoon with such accuracy as if the statue had been before his eyes, and thus gave it the highest proof of his approbation. "Poets," said he, "paint with words, and painters speak with the pencil."

2919. A JUST DIVISION.

The large statue of Pompey, and probably the same at the feet of which Cæsar fell,—for it was found on the very spot where the senate was held, on the ides of March,—was discovered in clearing away the ground, to make some cellars for a house that is now standing. The greatest part of the statue lay under that house; but the head of it reached under the ground belonging to their next neighbor.

This occasioned a dispute between the two proprietors, which was at last decided by Cardinal Spada. He ordered the head to be broken off, and given to the latter, and the body to the former: this mark may now be seen where they are joined again: this decision was not made out of a whim, but very prudentially. From the first, that cardinal had a great desire to get the statue into his own possession; and by this means, he got it much cheaper than he could have done; for, after this division of it, the whole cost him but five hundred crowns.

2920. MICHAEL ANGELO AND THE POPE.

During the visit of Julius to Bologna, Michael Angelo modelled a statue of him. The air and attitude of the statue are said to have been grand, austere, and majestic. In one of the visits he received from his holiness, the pope, making his observations and remarks with his accustomed familiarity, asked if the extended right arm was bestowing a blessing or a curse on the people; to which Michael Angelo replied, "The action is only meant to be hostile to disobedience;" and then asked his holiness whether he would not have a book put into the other hand. The pope facetiously answered, "No; a sword would be more adapted to my character. I am no book man."

§ 282. DEAF AND BLIND SCULPTORS.

2921. GIOVANNI GONELLI.

The London Court Gazette gives the name of Giovanni Gonelli, a Tuscan, as illustrating a very singular fact. After studying sculpture till upwards of twenty years of age, he totally lost his sight at Mantua, during its siege in 1630. He still continued, however, to labor at his profession, sculpturing striking likenesses of several individuals of high rank, and at length of the pope himself, (Urban VIII.) "Facendo," as Baldinucci in his quaint manner expresses it, "che l' ufficio degli occhi facessero le mani." He even sculptured from memory the likeness of a young woman to whom he had been attached before losing his sight.

2922. BLIND SCULPTOR.

We read of a sculptor who became blind at twenty years of age, and yet, ten years afterwards, made a statue of Pope Urban VIII., in clay, and another of Cosmo II. of Florence, of marble. Another blind sculptor is mentioned by Roger de Piles, in one of his works on painting: he executed a marble statue of Charles I. with great taste and accuracy.

§ 283. MISCELLANEOUS.

2923. MYRON.

Myron of Eleutheræ, who appears from Pliny to have executed many works of excellence, seems to have been most commended for what he probably regarded as a trifling performance. A brazen heifer which he made is celebrated by no less than thirty-six epigrams in the Greek Anthologia. The following is among the best:—

ON THE HEIFER OF BRASS OF MYRON.

"Either this heifer has a brazen skin,
Or else the brass contains a soul within."

2924. PERFECTION NO TRIFLE.

A friend called on Michael Angelo, who was finishing a statue: some time afterwards he called again; the sculptor was still at his work: his friend, looking at the figure, exclaimed,—

"You have been idle since I saw you last."

"By no means," replied the sculptor. "I have retouched this part, and polished that; I have softened this feature and brought out this muscle; I have given more expression to this lip, and more energy to this limb."

"Well, well," said his friend, "but all these are trifles."

"It may be so," replied Angelo, "but recollect that trifles make perfection, and that perfection is no trifle."

2925. SYLVANUS BEVAN.

When Lord Cobham was adorning his gardens at Stow with the busts of famous men, he made inquiry of the family for a picture of William Penn, in order to get a bust formed from it, but could find none. Sylvanus Bevan, an old Quaker apothecary, remarkable for the notice he took of countenances, and a talent he possessed of cutting in ivory strong likenesses of persons he had once seen, hearing of Lord Cobham's desire, set himself to recollect Penn's face, with which he had been well acquainted, and cut a little bust of him in ivory, which he sent to Lord Cobham, without any letter, or notice that it was Penn's. But Lord Cobham, who had personally known Penn, on seeing it, immediately cried out, "Whence comes this? It is William Penn himself;" and from this little bust the large one in the gardens was formed.

2926. FRANKLIN'S STATUE.

In a niche over the entrance to the Philadelphia Library stands the statue of this practical philosopher, which will be known, and not the less gazed at, by the classical inscription which graces its pedestal. He is made to rest (if rest can be applied to an attitude so preposterous) with the left elbow on a pile of books, while the wrong leg is unnaturally bent at the knee. He holds in his right hand, drooping, an inverted sceptre, as if the broad fame of Franklin was based on politics.

On the arrival of this statue in Philadelphia, the directors of the Library Company convened to determine on its proper designation. The majority were Quakers, of the true starch stamp, "screwed up to the sticking-point." William Rawle—himself a Quaker—evinced his taste by proposing to inscribe on the pedestal,—

FRANKLIN.

THE GIFT OF WILLIAM BINGHAM, ESQUIRE.

But this would not do, and the following became the inscription:—

THIS STATUE OF DR. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN WAS THE GIFT OF WILLIAM BINGHAM.

So here is a statue twice told; first in sculpture, next in our plain vernacular tongue. Who can mistake it?

Forcibly doth this effort of human genius remind one of a Dutch dauber, who, having painted a sign with the figures of a man and a bear, prudently added an explanation below it, thus:—

"Dis be de man, and dat be de bear."

One way to correct the bad taste of this figure of Franklin, and vindicate our civic taste, would be to convert it into a bust, by lopping off all other parts.

§ 284. TIME, IMPROVEMENT OF.

2927. CICERO'S ECONOMY OF TIME.

T was the boast of Cicero, that his philosophical studies had never interfered with the services he owed the republic, and that he had only dedicated to them the hours which others gave to their walks, their repasts, and their pleasures. Looking on his voluminous labors, we are surprised at this observation: how honorable is it to him, that his various philosophical works bear the titles of the different villas he possessed! which shows that they were composed in their respective retirements. Cicero must have been an early riser, and must have practised that magic art of employing his time so as to multiply his days.

2928. NOT AN IDLE HOUR IN THIRTY YEARS.

Dr. Rush was, perhaps, one of the most untiring students that ever lived. Two young physicians were conversing in his presence once, and one of them said, "When I finished my studies——" "When you finished your studies!" said the doctor abruptly. "Why, you must be a happy man to have finished so young. I do not expect to finish mine while I live."

He was once asked how he had been able to collect such an immense amount of information and facts as his publications and lectures contained. "I have been enabled to do it," replied he, "by economizing my time as Mr. Wesley did. I have not spent one hour in amusement for the last thirty years." And taking a small note book from his pocket, and showing it to me, he said, "I fill such a book as this once a week with observations and thoughts which occur to me, and facts collected in the rooms of my patients; and these are all preserved and used."

2929. WESLEY.

John Wesley was almost always travelling, from the time of his conversion to the close of life, which was extended to his eighty-eighth year. As a man of untiring industry he seems to have been second to few, and equalled by a very small number only. Napoleon, Brougham, Bentham, Franklin, Whitefield, Cobbett, Dow, and Peter Parley have hardly exceeded him.

Besides his numerous exhortations, he generally preached two sermons every day, and not unfrequently four or five. His various works on divinity, ecclesiastical history, sermons, biography, &c., amounted, nearly twenty years before he died, to thirty-two octavo volumes. All this, and an immense amount of other labor, at home and abroad, he was only able to accomplish by rightly improving his time.

2930. LORENZO DOW.

Dow was, beyond question, not only one of the most eccentric, but also one of the most industrious men that ever lived. Like John Randolph, he was sick all his lifetime, so to speak, and yet, in spite of his diseases, both acute and chronic, he performed an amount of labor in travelling, preaching, and writing, unknown since the days of Whitefield, if not since the beginning of the world; and yet he died in his fifty-seventh year.

Before he had completed his twenty-fifth year, he once rode fifteen hundred miles, and held one hundred and eighty-four meetings of two or three hours each, in ten weeks and two days. This was equal to twenty miles of travel, and nearly three sermons a day.

On another occasion, a year afterwards, while in the Southern States, he travelled in seven months four thousand miles, which was also an average of about twenty miles a day. In this instance, he finished his tour without stockings, shoes, or outer garment, and almost without a horse. In the year 1805, when less than thirty years of age, he supposes he travelled ten thousand miles, or an average of almost thirty miles a day.

For many years, about this period of his life, he travelled from seven to ten thousand miles, and held from six to seven hundred meetings, annually. In England, — for he crossed the Atlantic six times, — he once held nine meetings, and travelled fifty miles, in fifty-two consecutive hours; and this, of course, without the aid of steamboats or railroads. In another instance, he held two hundred meetings, and travelled seventeen hundred miles, in sixty-seven days. This was about thirty miles, and three sermons a day. It is thought — and not without reason — that during the thirty-eight years of his public life, he must have travelled nearly two hundred thousand miles.

In addition to his labors as a traveller and preacher, he wrote several volumes, among which is his Journal, or Life, which, including several miscellaneous pieces, amounts to seven hundred pages.

§ 285. TRANSLATIONS AND TRANSLATORS.

2931. WILLIAM TYNDALE.

Tyndale was a disciple of Luther. He was born in the year 1500. About the year 1526, he translated the New Testament into English, of which two editions were sold; but he was obliged to perform his work out of the limits of England. He was, however, at length betrayed by Henry VIII., tried and condemned to be first strangled and then burnt at the stake. His last words were, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes!"

The first translation of the Scriptures was, however, made by Wicliffe, about the year 1382, or nearly a century and a half before the time of Tyndale.

2932. RECOMPOSING THE BIBLE.

Joseph Isaac Berruyer, a Jesuit, born at Rouen, France, about the year 1750, wrote a work called Histoire du Peuple de Dieu, (History of the People of God,) in which he recomposed the Bible as he would have written a fashionable novel. With absurd refinement he conceives that the great legislator of the Hebrews is too barren in his descriptions, too concise in the events he records, nor is he careful to enrich his history by pleasing reflections and interesting conversation pieces, and hurries on the catastrophes, by which means he omits much entertaining matter; as, for instance, in the loves of Joseph and the wife of Potiphar, Moses is very dry and concise, which, however, our Berruyer is not.

His histories of Joseph and of King David are relishing morsels, and were devoured eagerly in all the boudoirs of Paris. Take a specimen of the style: "Joseph combined with a regularity of features, and a brilliant complexion, an air of the noblest dignity; all which contributed to render him one of the most amiable men in Egypt." At length "she declared her passion, and pressed him to answer her. It never entered her mind that the advances of a woman of her rank could ever be rejected. Joseph at first only replied to all her wishes by his cold embarrassments. She would not yet give him up. In vain he flies from her; she was too passionate to waste even the moments of his astonishment."

This good father, however, does ample justice to the gallantry of the patriarch Jacob. He offers to serve Laban seven years for Rachel. "Nothing is too much," cries the venerable novelist, "when one really loves;" and this admirable observation he confirms by the facility with which the obliging Rachel allows Leah for one night to her husband! In this manner the patriarchs are made to speak in the tone of the tenderest lovers.

2933. TOWNLEY'S HUDIBRAS.

Horace Walpole says of Hudibras that it was long esteemed an impossibility to give an adequate translation of that singular work, in any language, still more in French, the idiom of which is very remote from the conciseness of the original. To our astonishment, however, Mr. Townley, an English gentleman, has translated Hudibras into French, with the spirit and conciseness of the original.

2934. ELIOT AND THE INDIANS.

While Eliot was engaged in translating the Bible into the Indian language, he came to this passage: "The mother of Sisera looked out at the window, and cried through the lattice," &c. Not knowing an Indian word to signify lattice, he applied to several of the natives, and endeavored to describe to them what a lattice resembled. He described it as a framework, netting, wicker, or whatever else occurred to him as illustrative; when they gave him a long, barbarous, and unpronounceable word, as are many of the words in their language.

Some years after, when he had learned their dialect more correctly, he is said to have laughed outright, upon finding that the Indians had given him the true term for eel-pot—"The mother of Sisera looked out at the window, and cried through the eel-pot."

2935. ALFIERI AND HIS ASSISTANTS.

Alfieri employed a respectable young man at Florence to assist him in his Greek translations; and the manner in which that instruction was received was not a little eccentric. The latter slowly read aloud, and translated, while Alfieri, with his pencil and tablets in his hand, walked about the room, and put down his version. This he did without speaking a word; and when he found his preceptor reciting too quickly, or when he did not understand the passage, he held up his pencil.

This was the signal for repetition, and the last sentence was slowly recited, or the reading was stopped, until a tap from the poet's pencil upon the table warned the translator that he might continue his lecture.

The lesson began and concluded with a slight and silent obeisance; and during thirteen months thus spent, the count scarcely spoke as many words to the assistant of his studies.

2936. FRENCH BLUNDERS.

The French make awful havoc of John Bull's English, in their attempts at translation. They seem never to reflect that English words have often many and remote significations. Voltaire translated some of Shakspeare's plays. Shakspeare makes one of his characters renounce all claim to a doubtful inheritance, with an avowed resolution to carve for himself a fortune with his sword. Voltaire put it in French, which retranslated reads, "What care I for lands? With my sword I will make a fortune cutting meat." Another, displeased with such blunders, undertook a more correct translation of the great bard. Coming to the following passage, —

"Even such a man, so faint, so spiritless,
So dull, so dead in look, so woe-begone," he translated the Italicized words to read, "So grief — be off with you."

2937. WHO MUST PAVE THE CHURCH?

A rector of a parish church, going to law with his parishioners about paving the church, quoted this authority from St. Peter: "Paveant illi, non paveam ego," which he construed, "They are to pave the church, not I!" and this, forsooth, was admitted as good law, and by the judge, himself an ecclesiastic.

2938. PARADISE LOST.

In the French translation of Paradise Lost, "Hail, horrors, hail!" is rendered thus: "Comment vous portez vous, les horreurs, comment vous portez vous!" that is, "How d'ye do, horrors, how d'ye do?"

2939. EXEGI MONUMENTUM.

At an examination of the senior class in a college, a young man construed the following line in Horace, "Exegi monumentum cere perennius," (which is, in English, "I have finished a monument more lasting than brass,") thus: "I have eaten a monument harder than brass." One of the trustees immediately replied, "Well, sir, I think you had better sit down and digest it."

2940. THE CZAR AND THE MONK.

Peter the Great having directed the translation of Puffendorf's Introduction to the Knowledge of the States of Europe into the Russian language, a monk, to whom this translation was committed, presented it to the emperor when finished, who turned over the leaves, and exclaimed with an indignant air, "Fool! what did I order you to do? Is this a translation?" Then referring to the original, he showed him a paragraph in which the author had spoken with great asperity of the Russians, but the translator had omitted it. "Go instantly," said the czar, "and execute my orders rigidly. It is not to flatter my subjects that I have this book translated and printed, but to instruct and reform them."

2941. THE WELSH CURATE AND TILLOTSON'S SERMONS.

A Welsh curate, being asked how he managed to preach sermons so far above his own powers of composition, replied, "I have a volume of sermons by one Archbishop Tillotson, which I translate into Welsh, and afterwards retranslate into English, after which the archbishop himself would not know his own compositions."

2942. SINGULAR WINES.

In those French towns much frequented by the English, it is not unusual to find, at the cafés and hotels, translations into English of the bills of fare. At a restaurant in Boulogne-sur-Mer, the following very usual nota to the carte had a rather unusual translation. The note is, "Les vins sont qu'une qualité qui ne laisse rien à désirer," which being freely translated is, "The wines are of quality to suit the most fastidious," but was thus rendered: "The wines are of that quality they leave you nothing to hope for."

2943. IGNORANCE BETTER PAID THAN KNOWLEDGE.

Sir John Hill contracted to translate Swammerdam's work on Insects for fifty guineas. After the agreement with the bookseller, he recollected that he did not understand a single word of the Dutch language, nor did there exist a French translation.

The work, however, was not the less closely attended to on account of this small obstacle. Sir John bargained with another translator for twenty-five guineas. The second translator was precisely in the same situation as the first — as ignorant, though not so well paid, as the knight.

He rebargained with a third, who perfectly understood the original, for twelve guineas. So that the translators who could not translate a word feasted on venison and turtle, while the modest drudge, whose name never appeared to the world, broke in patience his daily bread.

2944. ELIOT'S INDIAN BIBLE.

Eliot wrote several narratives of the advancement and condition of religion among the Indians, which were published in England; a tract entitled Communion of the Churches; a History of the Gospels; and the Christian Commonwealth, a book which was pronounced seditious by the colonial government, publicly recanted, and suppressed. He was also, at an earlier day, one of the committee by whom the Bay Psalm Book was prepared. His reputation, however, rests upon his Indian Grammar, and various translations into the Indian language, the chief of which was that of the Bible, completed in 1663.

It is a curious fact that this Indian Bible was the first edition of the sacred volume published in this country. It was three years passing through the press.

We append, as a specimen of the translation, the Lord's Prayer, from the first edition of the New Testament, printed at Cambridge, in 1661: —

THE LORD'S PRAYER, Matt. vi. 9, &c.

Nooshun kesukqut, quttinatamunach koo-we-suonk. Peyau-mooutch kukketassoo-tamoonk, kukkenantoo-moonk ne n nach ohkeit neane kesukqut. Num-meetsuonqash asekesu-kokish assamaliinean yedyeu kesukod. Kah ah-quontamaliinean num-matcheongash, neane matchenehukqueagig nuta-quontammounonog. Ahque sagkompagnuainnean en qutchhuaoon-ganit, webe pohquoh-wussinean wutch matchi-tut. Newutche kutahtaut ketassootamonk, kah menuhkesuonk, kah soh-sumoonk micheme. Amen.

Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

Strange that the language of a version of the Bible, made less than two hundred years ago, should now be utterly extinct. But the second edition of the translation was the last, and the printer will never again be called to set types for those words so strange, nor will there in all after time, probably, be a person in the world who can read the book.

2945. VICAR OF WAKEFIELD IN FRENCH.

The Vicar of Wakefield has been translated perhaps as many as fifty times into French, but always in a blundering manner, in consequence of the ignorance of the translators of the meaning of certain phrases. In one case, for instance, a translator has completely misunderstood the meaning of the words "Moses flayed alive," and rendered it "Moses almost devoured alive by fleas."

Lately, however, the worthy Vicar has had justice done to him by the translation of M. Charles Nodier, who is well acquainted with the idiom of English literature.

§ 286. WIT AND HUMOR.

2946. DEAN SWIFT AND THE TAILOR.

TAILOR in Dublin, near the residence of the dean, took into the "ninth part" of his head that he was specially and divinely inspired to interpret the prophecies, and more especially the Book of Revelation. Quitting the shop-board, he turned out a preacher, or rather, a prophet, until his customers had left his shop, and his family were likely to famish. His monomania was well known to the dean, who benevolently watched for an opportunity to turn the current of his thoughts. For, singular as it may seem to those who, in their prejudices, can see nothing of a redeeming kind in Swift's character, he was not wholly without his good qualities.

One night the tailor, as he fancied, got an especial revelation to go and convert Dean Swift, and next morning took up the line of march to the deanery. The dean, whose study was furnished with a glass door, saw the tailor approach, and instantly surmised the nature of his errand. Throwing himself into an attitude of solemnity and thoughtfulness, with the Bible opened before him, and his eyes fixed on the tenth chapter of Revelation, he awaited his approach. The door opened, and the tailor announced, in an unearthly voice, "Dean Swift, I am sent by the Almighty to announce to you——"

"Come in, my friend," said the dean; "I am in great trouble, and no doubt the Lord has sent you to help me out of my difficulty."

This unexpected welcome inspired the tailor, and strengthened his assurance in his own prophetic character, and disposed him to listen to the disclosure.

"My friend," said the dean, "I have just been reading the tenth chapter of Revelation, and am greatly distressed at a difficulty I have met with, and you are the very man sent to help me out. Here is an account of an angel that came down from heaven, who was so large that he placed one foot on the earth and lifted up his hands to heaven. Now, my knowledge of mathematics," continued the dean, "has enabled me to calculate exactly the size and form of this angel; but I am in great difficulty, for I wish to ascertain how much cloth it will take to make him a pair of breeches; and as that is exactly in your line of business, I have no doubt the Lord has sent you to show me."

This exposition came like an electric shock to the poor tailor. He rushed from the house, ran to his shop, and a sudden revulsion of thought and feeling came over him. Making breeches was exactly in his line of business. He returned to his occupation, thoroughly cured of prophetic revelation by the wit of the dean.

2947. RANDOLPH IN THE SENATE.

Randolph was terrible in his readiness in retort. As Whipple has observed in his Lectures, "No hyperbole of contempt or scorn could be launched against him, but he could overtop it with something more scornful and contemptuous. Opposition only maddened him into more brilliant bitterness."

"Isn't it a shame, Mr. President," said he, one day, in the Senate, "that the noble bull-dogs of the administration should be wasting their precious time in worrying the rats of the opposition?" Immediately the Senate was in an uproar, and he was clamorously called to order. The presiding officer, however, sustained him; and, pointing his long skinny finger at his opponents, Randolph screamed out, "Rats, did I say? — Mice, mice!"

2948. COUGHING AFTER DEATH.

The famous Tony Lee, a player in King Charles II.'s reign, being killed in a tragedy, having a violent cold, could not forbear coughing as he lay dead upon the stage. This, of course, occasioned a good deal of laughter and noise in the house; upon which he lifted up his head, and, addressing the audience, said, "This makes good what my poor mother used to tell me; for she would often say that I should cough in my grave, because I used to drink with my porridge."

This set the house in such good humor, that it produced a thundering clap, and made every one very readily pardon the solecism he had before committed.

2949. THE JUDGE AND THE CULPRIT.

Lord Chief Justice Holt, when young, was very extravagant, and belonged to a club of wild fellows, most of whom took to an infamous course of life.

When his lordship was engaged, on a certain occasion, at the Old Bailey, a man was tried and convicted of a robbery on the highway, whom the judge remembered to have been one of his old companions. Moved by that curiosity which is natural on a retrospection of past life, and thinking the fellow did not know him, Justice Holt asked what had become of such and such of his old associates. The culprit, making a low bow, and fetching a deep sigh, said, "Ah, my lord, they are all hanged but your lordship and I."

2950. THE QUAKER AND THE MAGISTRATE.

A Friend having been cited as an evidence at a quarter sessions, one of the magistrates, who had been a blacksmith, desired to know why he would not take off his hat. "It is a privilege," said the Friend, "in which the laws and liberties of my country indulge people of our religious mode of thinking." "If I had it in my power," replied the justice, "I would have your hat nailed to your head." "I thought," said he, dryly, "that thou hadst given over the trade of driving nails."

2951. THE WANTING VIRTUE.

It was pretty generally known that Mr. Solicitor General Bushe was to succeed to the chief justiceship of King's Bench, or of Common Pleas, in Ireland, as soon as either became vacant. Some one in his presence was highly, and most deservedly, praising Chief Justice Downes, who, he asserted, possessed every virtue under heaven. "No," said Mr. Bushe, "I am sorry to say he does not possess the virtue of resignation."

2952. ADDISON AND THE POETASTER.

Addison, the sublime moralist, elegant critic, and humorous describer of men and manners, whose works furnish instruction to youth, amusement to age, and delight to all who peruse them, was remarkable for his taciturnity. Conscious of his talents as a writer, he acknowledged his deficiency in conversation. "I can draw," said he, "a bill for a thousand pounds, although I have not a guinea in my pocket."

Holland House, where Addison died.

A poetaster brought Addison one of his compositions, and begged his opinion of it. It was a copy of very indifferent verses, and they appeared the worse because he had prefixed to them several lines from Homer, and thus exposed them to a very disadvantageous contrast. Addison, with great warmth, struck out the lines from Homer; and when the surprised poetaster asked the reason, "Do you not recollect," said Addison, "the Roman emperor, whose statues appeared to him very ridiculous when they were placed near those of the gods?"

2953. THE APOTHECARY'S AFFIDAVIT.

A highwayman, named Bolland, confined in Newgate, sent for a solicitor to know how he could defer his trial, and was answered, "By getting an apothecary to make affidavit of his illness."

This was accordingly done in the following manner: "The deponent verily believes, that if the said James Bolland is obliged to take his trial at the ensuing sessions, he will be in imminent danger of his life;" to which the learned judge on the bench answered that he verily believed so too. The trial was ordered to proceed immediately.

2954. A QUESTIONABLE HONOR.

Lord Kaimes used to relate a story of a man who claimed the honor of his acquaintance on rather singular grounds. His lordship, when one of the judiciary judges, returning from the north circuit to Perth, happened one night to sleep at Dunkeld. The next morning, walking towards the ferry, but apprehending he had missed his way, he asked a man whom he met to conduct him. The other answered, with much cordiality, "That I will do, with all my heart, my lord. Does not your lordship remember me? My name's John —, I have had the honor to be before your lordship for stealing sheep."

"O John, I remember you well; and how is your wife? She had the honor to be before me, too, for receiving them, knowing them to be stolen." "We were very lucky: we got off for want of evidence; and I am still going on in the butcher trade." "Then," replied his lordship, "we may have the honor of meeting again."

2955. DROWNED IN A MEDICINE CHEST.

The surgeon of an English ship of war used to prescribe salt water for his patients in all disorders. Having sailed one evening on a party of pleasure, he happened, by some mischance, to be drowned. The captain, who had not heard of the disaster, asked one of the tars, next day, if he had heard any thing of the doctor. "Yes," answered Jack, "he was drowned, last night, in his own medicine chest."

2956. BOTH MAY BE MISTAKEN.

Readiness in repartee continually saved Voltaire from social overturn. He once praised another writer very heartily to a third person. "It is very strange," was the reply, "that you speak so well of him, for he says that you are a charlatan." "O," replied Voltaire, "I think it very likely that both of us may be mistaken."

2957. FOX AND JACK ROBINSON.

Mr. Fox, in the course of a speech in the House of Commons, when he was enlarging on the influence exercised by government over the members, observed, that it was generally understood that there was a person employed by the minister as manager of the House of Commons. Here there was a general cry of, "Name him, name him." "No," said Mr. Fox, "I don't choose to name him, though I might do it as easily as to say Jack Robinson." John Robinson was really his name.

2958. DIVIDING THE CROWN.

A new tragedy, of respectable pretensions, failed on its first representation from the following slight cause: Its two heroes agreeing to divide the kingdom between them, a stentorian voice from the gallery exclaimed, "Then there's half a crown apiece for you, my boys." The shouts and shrieks of laughter to which this gave rise could only be suppressed by dropping the curtain.

2959. A DEFENDER OF THE VESTIGES OF CREATION.

"A friend at Cambridge," says the Knickerbocker, "speaking of Dr. Gilman's Dupleian lectures on the Evidences of Revealed Religion, delivered at Harvard, says, 'It was a splendid, cogent, scholarly discourse. In it the speaker alluded to the Vestiges of Creation, and doubted the alleged production of winged insects from pulverized flint stone and electricity, on the ground that the experiment had never been successfully repeated.' A witty law friend instantly whispered a 'demurrer;' 'for,' said he, 'the experiment has been made from time immemorial. Winged insects not produced from silicious stone! Why, the doctor's beside himself! Always, when the flint is struck by steel, it makes the fire fly!'"

2960. LALANDE AND DE STAEL.

M. Lalande dined one day at the house of Recamier, the banker: he was seated between the celebrated beauty Madame Recamier, and Madame de Staël, equally distinguished for her wit. Wishing to say something agreeable to the ladies, the astronomer exclaimed, "How happy I am to be thus placed between wit and beauty!" "Yes, M. Lalande," sarcastically replied Madame de Staël, "and without possessing either."

2961. ONE AT A TIME.

Henry IV. of France, passing through a small town, perceived the corporation assembled to congratulate him on his arrival. Just as the principal magistrate had commenced his tedious oration, an ass began to bray; on which the king, turning towards the place where the noisy animal was, said gravely, "Gentlemen, one at a time, if you please."

2962. SEEING THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR.

A stranger once called on the eccentric Professor Hermann, when the following questions and answers passed between them:—

"What is your name?"

"War."

"How old are you?"

"Thirty years."

"Then I have the unexpected pleasure of seeing the thirty years' war."

2963. LORD BROUGHAM AND HIS SON.

Lord Brougham's son, when a minor, and consequently dependent on his father for support, was noticed somewhat for his attention to a young actress of the French theatre. His father wrote the following laconic epistle:—

"If you do not quit her, I will stop your allowance."

To which the son replied, "If you do not double it, I'll marry her."

2964. SHERIDAN AND THE PROPOSED TAX ON COALS.

On Lord Henry Petty's iron tax being withdrawn, some one suggested a tax on coals, to make up the deficiency. "Poh," said Sheridan; "do you want to raise a rebellion in our kitchens? The cooks are worse than the blacksmiths. Tax coals instead of iron! that would be jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire."

2965. ZIMMERMAN AND FREDERIC THE GREAT.

Zimmerman, the eminent physician, was sent for from Hanover to attend Frederic the Great in his last illness. One day the king said to him, "You have, I presume, sir, helped many a man into another world." This was rather a bitter pill for the doctor; but the dose he gave the king in return was a judicious mixture of truth and flattery: "Not so many as your majesty, nor with so much honor to myself."

2966. BURKE AND LONSDALE'S NINEPINS.

The Earl of Lonsdale was so extensive a proprietor, and patron of boroughs, that he returned nine members every Parliament, who were facetiously called Lord Lonsdale's ninepins. One of the members thus designated, having made a very extravagant speech in the House of Commons, was answered by Mr. Burke in a vein of the happiest sarcasm, which elicited from the house loud and continued cheers. Mr. Fox entering the house just as Mr. Burke was sitting down, inquired of Sheridan what the house was cheering. "O, nothing of consequence," replied Sheridan, "only Burke has knocked down one of Lord Lonsdale's ninepins."

2967. THE PRINCE AND THE IDLE ARTIST.

A French prince once sent an aide-de-camp to a painter, remarkable for his love of jokes and his idleness, commanding his presence. The officer went and brought the painter with him. A picture was given him to copy, and he took it away with him. It was the painting of a house. In a few days the officer went to the artist to see what progress he had made, and, having returned, acquainted the prince that all was done but one chimney, on which the painter was then employed.

Some days passed, and the picture was not returned. The prince resolved to go himself. He did so, and found the painter still at the unfinished chimney. "Why, how is this?" said he; "all this time employed at one chimney?" "I have been obliged to do and undo it several times." "For what reason?" inquired the prince. "I found," rejoined the artist, "that it smoked." The prince laughed heartily, and took his leave.

2968. THE PUZZLED PHILOSOPHER.

The North Carolina Argus tells the following story, for which it is indebted to the stump speech of a Virginia member of Congress:—

"The proprietor of a tan-yard adjacent to a certain town in Virginia concluded to build a stand, or sort of store, on one of the main streets, for the purpose of vending his leather, buying raw hides, and the like. After completing his building, he began to consider what sort of a sign it would be best to put up for the purpose of attracting attention to his new establishment; and for days and weeks he was sorely puzzled on this subject. Several devices were adopted, and on further consideration, rejected.

"At last a happy idea struck him. He bored an auger-hole through the door post, and stuck a calf's tail into it, with the bushy end flaunting out. After a while, he noticed a grave-looking personage standing near the door with his spectacles, gazing intently on the sign. And there he continued to stand, gazing and gazing, until the curiosity of the tanner was greatly excited in turn. He stepped out, and addressed the individual.

"Good morning," said he.

"Morning," said the other, without moving his eyes from the sign.

"You want to buy leather?" said the store-keeper.

"No."

"Do you wish to sell hides?"

"No."

"Are you a farmer?"

"No."

"Are you a merchant?"

"No."

"Are you a lawyer?"

"No."

"Are you a doctor?"

"No."

"What are you, then?"

"I'm a philosopher. I have been standing here for an hour, trying to see if I could ascertain how that calf got through that auger-hole."

2969. THE CATHOLIC'S RETORT.

The walls of Bandon, in Ireland, having been demolished by the Irish then in arms, the Catholics were forbidden to enter the town; and the following words set up in 1689, by the inhabitants:—

"A Turk, a Jew, or Atheist, may enter here, but not a Papist,"— are memorable as an interdict long blazoned on its gates.

The Catholics, in derision and humor, added in chalk the following couplet:—

"Whoever wrote these words, he wrote them well;
The same are written on the gates of hell."

2970. SWIFT'S SATIRE ON A MISER.

Dean Swift, having dined with a rich miser, pronounced the following grace after dinner:—

"Thanks for this miracle: it is no less Than finding manna in the wilderness.
In midst of famine we have found relief,
And seen the wonders of a chine of beef!
Chimneys have smoked that never smoked before,
And we have dined where we shall dine no more."

2971. A GOOD HIT.

Lord Stanley once alluded to Lord Brougham as "the noble lord who had just taken his seat;" but chancing to look round, and, seeing the ex-chancellor jumping about like a cricket, begged pardon, and said he meant his noble friend who "never took his seat."

2972. DANTE'S RETORT.

A sovereign of one of the Italian states, at whose court Dante, the poet, had been entertained, one day asked him how it happened that a person of his abilities should seem to partake less of the general esteem than a fool who was retained at the palace,—as was then the custom,—and who was in high favor with the prince, and all the courtiers. "You would cease to wonder," replied Dante, "if you considered that similarity of character is the source of friendship."

2973. COUNTING THE GODS WITH THE SCHOLARS.

On one occasion, Diogenes went into the school of a master, who had very few scholars, but a great many figures of the muses and other divinities. "Counting the gods," said Diogenes to him, "you have a goodly number of scholars."

2974. BURNET'S GREAT WORK.

Thomas Burnet.

Judge Burnet, son of the famous Bishop of Salisbury, when young, is said to have been of a wild and dissipated turn. Being one day found by his father in a very serious humor, "What is the matter with you, Tom?" said the bishop: "what are you ruminating on?" "A greater work than your lordship's History of the Reformation," answered the son. "Ay! what is that?" asked the father. "The reformation of myself, my lord," replied the son.

2975. SMOLLETT AND THE SURGEON.

A lad who was apprenticed to a chirurgian in Glasgow, and with whom Smollett had been engaged in frolic on a winter evening, was receiving a severe reprimand from his master for quitting the shop; and having alleged in his excuse that he had been hit by a snowball, and had gone in pursuit of the person who had thrown it, was listening to the taunts of his master on the improbability of such a story. "How long," said the son of Æsculapius, with the confident air of one fearless of contradiction, "might I stand here and such a thing not happen to me?" when Smollett, who stood behind the pillar of the shop door, and heard what passed, snatched up a snowball, and quickly delivered his playmate from the dilemma in which this question had placed him, by an answer equally prompt and conclusive.

2976. A LONG PAUSE.

A great teller of stories was in the midst of one of them, at his evening club, when notice was brought him that a ship, in which he was going to the West Indies, was on the point of sailing; he was, therefore, obliged to break off abruptly: but on his return from Jamaica, some years afterwards, he repaired to the club, and, taking possession of his old seat by the fireside, he resumed his tale: "Gentlemen, as I was saying," &c.

2977. ERSKINE AND THE TRAITOR.

When citizen Thelwall was on his trial at the Old Bailey, for high treason, during the evidence for the prosecution he wrote the following note, and sent it to his counsel, Mr. Erskine: "I am determined to plead my cause myself." Mr. Erskine wrote under it, "If you do, you'll be hanged;" to which Thelwall immediately returned this reply: "I'll be hanged if I don't."

2978. DUTY OF THE SWINISH MULTITUDE.

Soon after the appearance of Burke's work, in which the celebrated expression of "the swinish multitude," as applied to the lower grades of society, was used, a pamphlet was published in the form of a catechism, with a reference to the war then about to be commenced. The first question, "What is the first duty of a member of the swinish multitude?" was answered, "To save his bacon." A very good-humored reproof.

2979. A PRETTY IDEA.

Dr. P——, who is attached to a Parisian theatre in quality of a physician, expressed his astonishment that man and woman were not created at the same time, instead of the latter springing from a rib of our first parent. A young actress standing by, remarkable for the graceful turn which she ever gives to the expression of her ideas, immediately said, "Was it not natural, sir, that the flower should come after the stem?"

2980. WILKINS AND THE DUCHESS'S VOYAGE TO THE MOON.

Dr. John Wilkins, a man of uncommon parts and abilities, in the reign of Charles II., has been laughed at, together with his chimeras; but even these proclaim themselves the chimeras of a man of genius.

Such was his attempt to show the possibility of a voyage to the moon. In a conversation with the Duchess of Newcastle, her grace asked him, "Doctor, where am I to find a place for baiting at, in the way up to that planet?" "Madam," said he, "of all the people in the world, I never expected that question from you, who have built so many castles in the air, that you might lie every night at one of your own."

2981. JEKYLL AND THE EGOTIST.

Erskine's well-known habit of talking of himself often brought the jest of the table against him. He was once panegyriizing his own humanity. "There," said he, "for instance, is my dog. I wish it to be happy in this life, I wish it to be happy in the other. Like the Indian, I wish that wherever I may go my faithful dog shall bear me company." "And a confoundedly unlucky dog he would be," murmured Jekyll.

2982. PLATO AND DIOGENES.

Plato was one day entertaining some friends of Dionysius the tyrant. Diogenes, entering with an unusually firm step, said, "I tread on Plato's pride." "Yes," said the latter, "and with more pride than Plato."

2983. MULTUM IN PARVO.

When Greek meets Greek.—Those two celebrated divines and scholars, Drs. South and Sherlock, were once disputing on some religious subject, when the latter accused his opponent of using his wit in the controversy. "Well," said South, "suppose that it had pleased God to give you wit, what would you have done?"

The Post's Retort.—The Boston Post retorts upon some "smart" fellow in the following manner: "The person who sent us a copy of the Boston Post with Jackass written upon the margin, is requested to inform us at what stable he can be found."

Foots and the Comedy.—An author, who had given a comedy into the hands of Foote for his perusal, called on him for his opinion of the piece. Foote returned the play with a grave face, saying, "Sir, depend upon it, this is a thing not to be laughed at."

Tu Does.—The completest pun on the records of literature is produced in the following words, which were inscribed on a tea chest: "Tu does, which is the second person singular of the verb doceo, to teach, and, when literally translated, becomes Thou Tea-Chest."

Snuffing the Candle.—Burke, one evening, in snuffing the candle, was awkward enough to snuff it out. "Ah!" said he, "I fall under the censure of Horace:—

'Brevis, esse laboro, obscurus fio.'"

A Wit discomfited.—We remember witnessing the complete discomfiture of a wit of no inferior order, by a message politely delivered at a supper party, by a little girl: "If you please, Mr. B—, mamma sends her compliments, and would be much obliged if you would begin to be funny."

Erskine and the Fish Dinner.—When Lord Erskine was chancellor, being asked by the secretary of the treasury whether he would attend the grand ministerial fish dinner at the end of the session, he answered, "To be sure I will: what would your fish dinner be without the Great Seal?"

The Pedant outdone.—A pedantic fellow called for a bottle of hock at a tavern, which the waiter, not hearing distinctly, asked him to repeat. "A bottle of hock—hic, hæc hoc," replied the visitor. After sitting, however, for a long time, and no wine appearing, he ventured to ring again, and inquire into the cause of the delay. "Did I not order some hock, sir? Why is it not brought in?" "Because," answered the waiter, who had been taught Latin grammar, "you afterwards declined it."

Doubling down a Page, and turning over a new Leaf.—It being reported that Lady Caroline Lamb had, in a moment of passion, knocked down one of her pages with a stool, the poet Moore, to whom this was told by Lord Strangford, observed, "O! nothing is more natural for a literary lady than to double down a page." "I would rather," replied his lordship, "advise Lady Caroline to turn over a new leaf."

Sheridan and the Clown.—When some stupid fellow charged Sheridan with inconsistency, the wit replied that the accusation reminded him of the reasoning of the entertainer of a convivial party, who, hearing his friends observe that it was time to take leave, as the watchman was crying past three, observed, "Why, you don't mind that fellow, do you? He changes his story every half hour."

Just so.—Voltaire's saying, in answer to a stranger who was observing how tall his trees grew, "that they had nothing else to do," was a quaint mixture of wit and humor.

Hook's Choice.—A wise man, as well as witty, was Theodore Hook, when he told the alderman who had already surfeited him, and yet pressed him to partake of still another course, "I thank you; but if it's the same to you, I'll take the rest in money."

Socrates's pithy Reply to Archelaus.—Archelaus, a powerful monarch, offered Socrates a handsome pension, if he would come and reside at his court. The answer of the philosopher was as independent as laconic: "At Athens meal is twopence the measure, and water may be had for nothing."

Taxing the Air.—Voltaire related to Mr. Sheridan an anecdote of Swift. Lady Carteret, wife of the lord lieutenant, said to Swift, "The air of Ireland is very excellent and healthy." "For goodness' sake, madam," said Swift, "don't say so in England, for if you do, they will certainly tax it."

Fontaine's Reason for Silence.—Some one asked Fontaine, the celebrated geometrician, what he did in society, where he remained almost perfectly silent. "I study," replied he, "the vanity of men, in order occasionally to mortify it."

Richelieu's Gray Head, and De Lart's Gray Beard.—Cardinal Richelieu one day said to M. de Lart, a celebrated physician, "I am gray headed, yet my beard is black; and your head is black, and your beard gray. Can you account for these appearances, doctor?" "Easily," replied De Lart; "they proceed from exercise—from labor of the parts; your eminence's brains have worked hard, and so have my jaws."

§ 287. WIVES OF LITERARY MEN AND ARTISTS.

2984. LAMARTINE'S WIFE.

THIS lady, who is an English woman, was possessed of considerable property, and the old story, which never fails to follow the marriage of poets and men of celebrity in general, is told of her union with Lamartine.

It is said, we know not with what pretension to truth, that Madame de Lamartine, whose maiden name was Birch, — of Indian connection, — when no longer in the first bloom of youth, became passionately enamoured of the poet, from the perusal of his Meditations alone, and had for some time nursed this sentiment in secret, when, having been apprised, by a newspaper account, of the embarrassed state of his affairs, and of the necessity of calling a meeting of his creditors, she immediately wrote to him, with an offer of the loan of the whole of her fortune, unconditionally, and with the smallest possible reserve for her own immediate wants.

It appeared that Lamartine was so touched at this proof of generosity, that he immediately set out to throw himself at the feet of his benefactress, and chemin faisant reflecting, perhaps, that such unsought interest could have its mainspring in one sentiment alone, he generously resolved to make her an offer of his hand and heart, evidently considering, with that peculiar self-esteem for which all poets are so remarkable, the sacrifice he was making as a perfect equivalent for that which the lady had voluntarily laid at his feet.

The pair were soon after married, the fortune of the bride amply repairing every breach which youthful extravagance had made in that of her husband.

It was during the honey-moon, and while the happy couple were enjoying the tranquillity and solitude of their chateau, that the conversion of Madame de Lamartine to Romanism was effected, by the simple eloquence of the village priest, whose church, as lady of the manor, she had thought it her bounden duty to attend on Sundays, in spite of her difference of creed.

Like all neophytes, her ardor soon surpassed that of her spiritual master, and she has ever since been remarkable for her religious enthusiasm, and her unceasing perseverance in the pursuit of good and holy works, among which her patronage of religious orders has stood foremost.

2985. MOLIERE'S UNHAPPINESS.

Armande Gresinde Bejart, who became the wife of Molière, was regarded by the poet-actor with a passionate attachment. She was a beautiful, sprightly, clever, and admirable actress, fond of admiration and pleasure. Molière is said to describe her in Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, as more piquant than beautiful, fascinating and graceful, witty and elegant; she charmed in her very caprices.

Another author speaks of her acting, and remarks on the judgment she displays both in dialogue and by-play. "She never looks about," he says, "nor do her eyes wander to the boxes; she is aware that the theatre is full, but she speaks and acts as if she only saw those with whom she is acting. She is elegant and rich in her attire without affectation; she studies her dress, but forgets it the moment she appears upon the stage; and she never touches her hair or her ornaments. This by-play conceals a judicious and insinuating satire, and she thus enters more entirely into ridicule of the woman she personates; but with all these advantages, she would not please so much but for her sweet-toned voice. She is aware of this, and changes it accordingly to the character she fills."

With these attractions, young and lovely, and an actress, Madame — or, as she was called, according to the fashion of the times, which only accorded the Madame to women of rank, Mademoiselle — Molière, fancying herself elevated to a high sphere when she married, giddy and coquettish, disappointed the hopes of her husband, whose heart was set on domestic happiness, and the interchange of affectionate sentiments in the privacy of home.

Yet the gentleness of his nature made him find a thousand excuses for her. "I am unhappy," he said, "but I deserve it; I ought to have remembered that my habits were too severe for domestic life. I thought that my wife ought to regulate her manners and practice by my wishes; but I feel that had she done so, she would, in her situation, be more unhappy than I am. She is gay and witty, and open to the pleasures of admiration. This annoys me in spite of myself. I find fault, I complain; yet this woman is a hundred times more reasonable than I am, and wishes to enjoy life; she goes her own way, and, secure in her innocence, she disdains the precaution I entreat her to observe. I take this neglect for contempt; I wish to be assured of her kindness by the open expression of it, and that a more regular conduct should give me ease of mind. But my wife, always equable and lively, who would be unsuspected by any other than myself, has no pity for my sorrows; and occupied by the desire of general admiration, she laughs at my anxieties."

His friends tried to remonstrate, in vain. "There is but one sort of love," he said, "and those who are more easily satisfied do not know what true love is." The consequence of these dissensions was, in the sequel, a sort of separation, full of disappointment and regret for Molière, but to which his young wife easily reconciled herself. Her conduct disgraced her; but she had not sufficient feeling to shrink from public censure, or the consciousness of rendering her husband unhappy.

2986. MADAME ROLAND.

Madame Roland, one of the eminent French writers of her day, and one of the most enthusiastic devotees of liberty, was the daughter of an engraver, who was subsequently ruined by trafficking in jewels.

Arriving at womanhood, she lost her mother. The daughter was only drawn from her deep grief by a friend's placing in her hands an interesting volume of Rousseau, which led her at length to devote herself almost entirely to literary pursuits.

Some time after her mother's death, M. Roland de la Platiere was introduced to her by an intimate and esteemed acquaintance. He was a worthy man, employed at that time in the administration of manufactures at Rouen and Amiens. He possessed great simplicity and integrity of character; he loved study, and applied himself sedulously to gathering knowledge with regard to the manufactories of which he had the superintendence. He wrote several works that treated of such subjects.

He was a man generally esteemed for his sound, plain sense; his austere and simple manners inspired confidence, though he was more respected than loved, on account of a certain coldness of character that repelled. Mademoiselle Phippon liked him, and he took pleasure in the society of the serious and reflective recluse, and paid her long, though not frequent, visits. His age prevented any idea of impropriety on the score of his being an admirer. But the tender passion grew upon their acquaintance ere he was aware. Roland's conversation was a great resource to her, while the habit he indulged of seeing her so often at last rendered her society necessary to him, and love—slow and chill, but of deep growth—arose in his heart.

Five years after the commencement of their acquaintance he disclosed his sentiments. She was flattered by the proposal: his birth during the old régime was a tangible good, to which she was by no means insensible, but her pride led her to represent to him that she was a bad match, her family ignoble, and she herself, instead of being an heiress, ruined through her father's imprudence. Roland persisted in his address, and she permitted him to apply to her only surviving parent, which he did by a letter from Amiens. Phippon did not like his austerity, and was not pleased by the tone of his letter: thinking only of his feelings, and without consulting his daughter, he sent a rejection couched in rude and even impertinent terms.

Spite of the rejection, however, they were at length married. She became her husband's friend, companion, and amanuensis. Not only so, but she actually composed more or less for him, when her husband eventually came to Paris and became minister of the interior in the period immediately preceding the French revolution.

But in consequence of an injudicious, but enthusiastic remonstrance which she persuaded her husband to present to the king, severely censuring some measures which he contemplated, Roland was dismissed.

It was certainly a bold, if not a presumptuous act in a woman thus to put herself forward during these political agitations. But Madame Roland hated monarchical institutions, and her desire to subvert them in her own country partook of the vehemence with which women usually follow up their ideas.

Of the letter itself we may say that it is eloquent, but very ill judged if it was meant to conciliate the king; but it was not. It was written in a spirit of contempt for Louis's conduct, of menace if he did not pass the decree, and of sturdy independence and republicanism, as far as regarded the minister himself. It naturally alienated the monarch; but Roland and his wife were too enthusiastically attached to the cause of liberty and equality not to glory in expressing their sentiments openly and boldly at the foot of the throne, even at the expense of loss of office.

On this event they secluded themselves in private life, living in an obscure and modest abode in Rue St. Jacques. They mingled in no intrigues, while they deplored the misfortunes of their country, being persuaded that the king and his friends were about to call in foreign troops, to destroy its new-born liberty.

After the events of the 10th of August, Roland was recalled to the ministry. He and his wife, both hating monarchy, could not understand why the ruins of it in France should not at once be cast aside, and a republic erected on the vacant space. In consequence, Madame Roland was one of the victims of the reign of terror, and her husband committed suicide.

2987. MRS. BOWDITCH AND THE MECANIQUE CELESTE.

The wife of Nathaniel Bowditch was a woman of singular sweetness of disposition, and cheerful piety, who, by her entire sympathy with her husband in all his studies and pursuits, lightened and cheered his labors, and by relieving him from all domestic cares enabled him to go on with undivided mind and undistracted attention in the execution of his great work—the translation of Laplace's Mécanique Céleste, on which his fame as a man of science rests. He had been heard to say that he never should have accomplished the task, and published the book in its present extended form, had he not been stimulated and encouraged by her.

When the serious question was under consideration as to the expediency of Bowditch's publishing it at his own expense, at the estimated cost of ten thousand dollars, (which it actually exceeded,) with the noble spirit of her sex, his wife conjured and urged him to go on and do it, saying that she would find the means, and gladly make any sacrifice, and submit to any self-denial that might be involved in it. In grateful acknowledgment of her sympathy and aid, he proposed, in the concluding volume, to dedicate the work to her memory (she died in 1834)—a design than which nothing could be more beautiful or touching.

2988. LADY BACON.

Lady Bacon displayed at an early age her capacity, application, and industry, by translating, from the Italian of Bernardine Octine, twenty-five sermons on the abstruse doctrines of predestination and election. This performance was published about the year 1550. A circumstance took place, soon after her marriage, which again called forth her talents and zeal. She appeared the translator into English, from Latin, of Bishop Jewell's Apology for the Church of England in which he retorted upon the Romanists the charges previously preferred by them against the reformers; and with fidelity and elegance she accomplished her task.

She sent a copy of her work to the primate, whom she considered as most interested in the safety of the church; a second copy she presented to the author, lest, inadvertently, she had in any respect done injustice to his sentiments. Her copy was accompanied by an epistle in Greek, to which the bishop replied in the same language. The translation was carefully examined both by the primate and author, who found it so chastely and correctly given, as to stand in no need of the slightest emendation. The translator received on this occasion a letter from the primate, full of high and just compliments to her talents and erudition.

Lady Bacon survived her husband, and died about the beginning of the reign of James I., at Gerham-burg, near St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire. She was the mother of the wisest, brightest of mankind.

2989. AN ODD EXPEDIENT.

It is told of Berghem's wife, that she would not allow that excellent artist to quit his occupation; and she contrived an odd expedient to detect his indolence. The artist worked in a room above her: ever and anon she roused him by thumping a stick against the ceiling, while the obedient Berghem answered by stamping his foot, to satisfy Mrs. Berghem that he was not napping.

2990. FERGUSON AND HIS WIFE.

James Ferguson and his wife led a cat-and-dog life, and she is not once alluded to in the philosopher's autobiography. About the year 1750, one evening, while he was delivering to a London audience a lecture on astronomy, his wife entered the room in a passion, and maliciously overturned several pieces of the apparatus; when all the notice Ferguson took of the catastrophe was the observation to the audience, "Ladies and gentlemen, I have the misfortune to be married to this woman."

2991. MRS. FRANCES SHERIDAN.

This lady, who had the honor of giving birth to that eloquent orator and able dramatist, Richard Brinsley Sheridan, was also distinguished for her literary attainments. Her first literary performance was a pamphlet, during the time in which Mr. Sheridan was engaged in a theatrical dispute with the public in Dublin. The pamphlet being well written, and rendering Mr. Sheridan an essential service, he became anxious to know to whom he was indebted for so able a defence: after some inquiries, he found this out, was introduced to the lady, and soon after married her.

2992. THE GENEROUS INCOGNITO.

The wife of Guizot was said to be a woman of remarkable intellect. The circumstances of their marriage were somewhat tinged with romance.

Born of a distinguished family, which had been ruined by the revolution, Mademoiselle Pauline de Meulan had found resources in an education as solid as varied, and to support her family had thrown herself into the trying career of journalism. At the period in question she was editing the Publiciste. A serious malady, however, brought on by excess of toil, obliged her to desist from her labors.

Her situation was a cruel one; she was almost in despair, when one day she received an anonymous letter, in which, while she was besought to preserve her tranquillity, an offer was made of discharging her task during the continuance of her sickness. The letter was accompanied by an article admirably written, the ideas and the style of which, by a refinement of delicacy, were exactly modelled upon her own. She accepted the article, published it, and regularly received a similar contribution until her restoration to health.

Profoundly affected by the incident, she related it in the saloon of M. Suard, exhausting her mind in endeavors to discover her unknown friend, and never thinking of a pale, serious young man, with whom she was scarcely acquainted, and who listened to her in silence as she pursued her conjectures. Earnestly supplicating through the columns of the journal to reveal himself, the generous incognito at last went in person to receive his well-merited thanks. It was the same young man just alluded to; and five years afterwards, Mademoiselle de Meulan took the name of Madame Guizot.

2993. PLINY'S WIFE.

What a delightful family picture has the younger Pliny given posterity in his letters! Of Calphurnia, his wife, he says, "Her affection to me has given her a turn to books; and my compositions, which she takes a pleasure in reading, and even getting by heart, are continually in her hands. How full of tender solicitude is she when I am entering upon any cause! How kindly does she rejoice with me when it is over! While I am pleading, she places persons to inform her from time to time how I am heard, what applauses I receive, and what success attends the cause. When at any time I recite my works, she conceals herself behind some curtain, and with secret rapture enjoys my praises. She sings my verses to her lyre, with no other master but love — the best instructor — for her guide. Her passion will increase with our days, for it is not my youth, nor my person, which time gradually impairs, but my reputation and my glory, of which she is enamoured."

2994. A MODEL WIFE.

How delightful is it when the mind of the female is so happily disposed, and so richly cultivated, as to participate in the literary avocations of her husband! It is then truly that the intercourse of the sexes becomes the most refined pleasure. What delight, for instance, must the great Budæus have tasted, even in those works which must have been for others a most dreadful labor! His wife left him nothing to desire. The frequent companion of his studies, she brought him the books he required to his desk; she compared passages, and transcribed quotations: the same genius, the same inclinations, and the same ardor for literature, eminently appeared in those two fortunate persons. Far from withdrawing her husband from his studies, she was sedulous to animate him when he languished. Ever at his side and ever assiduous, ever with some useful book in her hand, she acknowledged herself to be a most happy woman. Yet she did not neglect the education of eleven children. She and Budæus shared in the mutual cares they owed their progeny. Budæus was not insensible of his singular felicity. In one of his letters, he represents himself as married to two ladies; one of whom gave him boys and girls, the other was philosophy, who produced books.

2995. THE WIFE OF BULWER, THE NOVELIST.

The wife of this novelist was a Miss Wheeler. She was a daughter of a most respectable widow, who lived in Park Mewes, a small lane, running in the rear of Seymour Place, May Fair. Mrs. Wheeler was early left a widow, with one daughter, a pale, handsome, slender girl, who chanced to attract the attention of Edward Bulwer, then fresh from college.

The attachment was a romantic one, and soon discovered, and strenuously opposed, by Mr. Bulwer's mother. But the lovers found a sympathizing friend, who occupied a room up three pair of stairs, where they frequently drank tea. This female friend ultimately succeeded in marrying the young couple, neither of whom, she then thought, were "long for this world." But to her great surprise, Miss Wheeler afterwards turned out to be among the fattest of women, and Mr. Bulwer the most immortal of men.

The aristocratic mother was soon reconciled to the match, but the daughter was soon at swords' points with every member of the family, her husband included. Bulwer bore her "incompatibility" as long as he could, in form, and finally bought a beautiful house in the country, not far from London, furnished it exquisitely, and supplying her every earthly want, except his own society, left her to expend her eccentricities on her dogs, which, to the number of upwards of a dozen, were her companions.

2996. SENTIMENT AND SAUCE.

One day in spring, Sir Walter Scott strolled forth with Lady Scott to enjoy a walk round Abbotsford. In their wandering they passed a field where a number of ewes were enduring the frolics of their lambs. "Ah!" said Sir Walter, "'tis no wonder that poets, from the earliest ages, have made the lamb the emblem of peace and innocence." "They are, indeed, delightful animals," returned her ladyship, "especially with mint sauce."

2997. HOW TO KNOW A WIFE'S BEAUTY.

When Milton was blind he married a shrew. The Duke of Buckingham called her a rose. "I am no judge of colors," replied Milton, "and it may be so, for I feel the thorns daily."

2998. GROTIUS'S DELIVERANCE.

In consequence of the persecution of the Arminians, of whom Grotius was one, and an able defender, in 1618, he was doomed to perpetual imprisonment. His confinement was alleviated by his literary occupations, and the assiduities of his wife.

The fond care of this worthy woman at last procured his deliverance, after a captivity of nearly two years. On pretence of removing books, which she declared proved injurious to her husband's health, she was permitted to send away a small chest of drawers, of the length of three feet and a half, in which he was concealed. Thus he was carried by two soldiers from the prison, the chest was then removed to a distance, on horseback, and at the house of a friend the illustrious prisoner was set at liberty, pursuing his flight afterwards in the guise of a mason with a rule and trowel.

2999. SOCRATES AND XANTIPPE.

Xantippe, the wife of Socrates, was so remarkable for her ill humor and peevishness as to become proverbial. She continually tormented him with her impertinence; and one day, not satisfied with her bitter invectives, she emptied a vessel of dirty water on his head. The good man only replied, very coolly and philosophically, "I thought that after so much thunder, we should be apt to have some rain."

3000. A XANTIPPE OUTWITTED.

An Englishman by the name of Baldwin, of Lymington, had the misfortune to live in a quarrel with his wife. The latter, who was a modern Xantippe, threatened, in case she survived him, to dance over his grave. It was her lot to be his survivor; but it was not so easy to execute her threat. The husband had the precaution to make an injunction in his will, requiring his body, after death, to be buried in the sea, near his residence, and without ceremony. The injunction was complied with.

3001. DR. PARR'S LIBRARY CHAIRS.

The doctor and his lady had occasionally divers little bickerings, as the lady did not approve of his expending so much of his money, on "dusty tomes of ancient lore," and Parr would be accountable to no one. The chairs of the library had been in a sad condition; indeed there was no ground to hope for a secure seat in them; they threatened the incumbent with a downfall, which, though it might not create such a sensation in the world as the falling of a kingdom, "the crash of a state," yet would, perhaps, be very serious to the suffering person.

Mrs. Parr, therefore, one morning in the library, took occasion to accost the doctor: "Mr. Parr, we should have new chairs for the library; they are in a very sad way." "I cannot afford it, Mrs. Parr," replied the doctor. "Not afford it," returned the lady, "when you can give ten guineas for a musty book which you never open!" "I tell you I cannot afford it," vociferated the doctor. "Not afford it," said the lady, "when your rents are coming in so fast!" (pointing to the garments of her spouse,) "when you are in as much need of repair as the library chairs." The doctor, touched by this stroke of humor, applied immediately both to the cabinet maker and the tailor.

3002. MISS CAROLINE LUCRETIA HERSCHEL.

This very interesting lady died at Hanover on the 9th of January, 1848, in the 98th year of her age. She was the sister of Sir William Herschel, and, consequently, aunt to Sir John Herschel, the present representative of this truly scientific family.

Miss Herschel was the constant companion of her brother, and sole assistant of his astronomical labors, to the success of which her indefatigable zeal, diligence, and singular accuracy of calculation not a little contributed.

From the first commencement of his astronomical pursuits, her attendance on both his daily labors and nightly watches was put in requisition, and was found so useful, that on Herschel's removal from Bath to Dratchet, and subsequently to Slough, he being then occupied with the review of the heavens, and other researches, she performed the whole of the arduous duties of his astronomical assistant; not only reading the clocks and noting down all the observations, from dictation, as an amanuensis, but subsequently executing the extensive and laborious numerical calculations necessary to render them available to science. For the performance of these duties, his majesty King George III. was pleased to place her in the receipt of a salary sufficient for her singularly moderate wants and retired habits.

Arduous, however, as these occupations must appear, especially when it is considered that her brother's observations were always carried on—circumstances permitting—till daybreak, without regard to season, and indeed chiefly in winter, they proved insufficient to exhaust her activity. In the intervals, she found time both for astronomical observations of her own, and for the execution of more than one work of great extent and utility. These observations were made with a small Newtonian sweeper, constructed by her brother, with which she found no less than eight comets; and on five of these occasions her claim to the first discovery is admitted. These sweeps also proved productive of the detection of several remarkable nebula and clusters of stars, previously unobserved.

On her brother's death, in 1822, Miss Herschel returned to Hanover, which she never again quitted; passing the last twenty-six years of her life in repose, enjoying the society, and cherished by the regard, of her remaining relatives and friends; gratified by the occasional visits of eminent astronomers, and honored with many marks of favor and distinction on the part of the King of Hanover, the crown prince, and his amiable and illustrious consort. To within a very short period of her death, her health continued uninterrupted, her faculties perfect, and her memory, especially of the scenes and circumstances of former days, remarkably clear and distinct. Her end was tranquil and free from suffering—a simple cessation of life.

We append the following just and eloquent tribute to the merits of Miss Herschel, from Dr. Nichol's Views of the Architecture of the Heavens:—

"The astronomer, Sir William Herschel, during these engrossing nights, was constantly assisted in his labors by a devoted maiden sister, who braved with him the inclemency of the weather; who heroically shared his privations that she might participate in his delights; whose pen, we are told, committed to paper his notes of observations as they issued from his lips. 'She it was,' says the best of authorities, 'who, having passed the nights near the telescope, took the rough manuscripts to her cottage at the dawn of day, and produced a fair copy of the night's work on the ensuing morning; she it was who planned the labor of each succeeding night, who reduced every observation, made every calculation, and kept every thing in systematic order;' she it was—Miss Caroline Herschel—who helped our astronomer to gather an imperishable name. This venerable lady has, in one respect, been more fortunate than her brother; she has lived to reap the full harvest of their joint glory. Some years ago the gold medal of our Astronomical Society was transmitted to her at her native Hanover, whither she removed after Sir William's death; and the same learned society has recently inscribed her name upon its roll. But she has been rewarded still more, by what she will value beyond all earthly pleasures; she has lived to see her favorite nephew, him who grew up under her eye unto an astronomer, gather around him the highest hopes of scientific Europe, and prove himself fully equal to tread in the footsteps of his father."

3003. A FEMALE LINGUIST.

Maria Cajetana Agnesi, an Italian lady of great learning, was born at Milan, March 16, 1718. Her inclinations, from her earliest youth, led her to the study of science, and at an age when young persons of her sex attend only to frivolous pursuits, she made such astonishing progress in mathematics, that when, in 1750, her father, professor in the university of Bologna, was unable to continue his lectures, from infirm health, she obtained permission from the pope, Benedict XIV., to fill his chair. Before this, at the early age of nineteen, she had supported one hundred and ninety-one theses, which were published in 1738, under the title of Propositiones Philosophicæ. She was mistress of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, German, and Spanish. At length she gave up her studies, and went into the monastery of the Blue Nuns, at Milan, where she died, January 9, 1799. In 1740, she published a discourse, tending to prove "that the study of the liberal arts is not incompatible with the understandings of woman." This was written when she was very young; she wrote upon mathematics of a high order—fluxions and analytics. The commentators of Newton were acquainted with her mathematical works while they were in manuscript. In 1801 these works were published in two volumes, at the expense of Mr. Baron Mascres, to do honor to her memory, and to prove that women have minds capable of comprehending the most abstruse studies. Her eulogy was pronounced by Frisi, and translated into French by Boulard.

3004. MADAME DE GENLIS.

Madame de Genlis died in France, at the advanced age of eighty. This lady was probably posessed of as great talent for the correct education of youth as any of her contemporaries of either sex. Her Theatre of Education has long been a model for dramatic didactic composition, being within the comprehension of the most youthful intellect, and stored with precepts of the purest morality and usefulness.

It is no small tribute to her merit to state, that she was governess over the early years both of the ex-king of France, Charles X., and of the subsequent king of the French, Louis Philippe. She may be termed the female Warwick of her time—"the setter-up and puller-down of kings."

3005. MISS BURNLEY

Miss Burnley, afterwards Madame D'Arblay, wrote her celebrated novel of Evelina when only seventeen-years of age, and published it without the knowledge of her father, who, having occasion to visit the metropolis, soon after it had issued from the press, purchased it as the work then most popular, and most likely to prove an acceptable treat to his family.

When Dr. Burnley had concluded his business in town, he went to Chessington, the seat of Mr. Crisp, where his family were on a visit. He had scarcely dismounted and entered the parlor, when the customary question of "What news?" was rapidly addressed to him by the several personages of the little party. "Nothing," said the worthy doctor, "but a great deal of noise about a novel which I have brought you."

When the book was produced, and the title read, the surprised and conscious Miss Burnley turned away her face to conceal the blushes and delighted confusion which otherwise would have betrayed her secret; but the bustle which usually attends the arrival of a friend in the country, where the monotonous but peaceful tenor of life is agreeably disturbed by such a change, prevented the curious and happy group from observing the agitation of their sister.

After dinner, Mr. Crisp proposed that the book should be read. This was done with all due rapidity; when the gratifying comments made during its progress, and the acclamations which attended its conclusion, ratified the approbation of the public. The amiable author, whose anxiety and pleasure could with difficulty be concealed, was at length overcome by the delicious feelings of her heart; she burst into tears, and throwing herself on her father's neck, avowed herself the author of Evelina.

The joy and surprise of her sisters, and still more of her father, cannot easily be expressed. Dr. Burnley, conscious as he was of the talents of his daughter, never thought that such maturity of observation and judgment, such fertility of imagination, and chasteness of style, could have been displayed by a girl of seventeen—by one who appeared a mere infant in artlessness and inexperience, and whose deep seclusion from the world had excluded her from all visual knowledge of its ways.

3006. THE IMPROVISATRICE.

Maria Madelena Fernandez Corilla, a celebrated improvisatrice, was born at Pistoca, in 1740, and gave in her infancy the most unequivocal marks of uncommon genius; and her acquirements in natural and moral philosophy, and ancient and modern history, were, at the age of seventeen, very remarkable.

At the age of twenty, she began to display that talent for extemporaneous composition which is so common in Italy, and so strangely uncommon elsewhere. Of this lady's abilities, however, we are not permitted to doubt, if we give any credit to the popularity she gained among all classes, and especially among persons of the highest rank. The Empress Maria Theresa offered her the place of female poet laureate at court, which she accepted, and went to Vienna in 1765.

Soon after 1774, she settled at Rome, and was admitted a member of the Academy of the Arcadi, under the name of Corilla Olympica, and for some time continued to charm the inhabitants of Rome by her talents in improvisation. At length, when Pius VI. became pope, he determined that she should be solemnly crowned—an honor which had been granted to Petrarch only.

Twelve members of the Arcadian Academy were selected out of thirty, publicly to examine the new edition of the Tenth Muse, which has so often been dedicated to ladies of poetical and literary talents. Three several days were allotted for this public exhibition of poetical powers, on the following subjects: sacred history, revealed religion, moral philosophy, natural history, metaphysics, epic poetry, legislation, eloquence, mythology, fine arts, and pastoral poetry.

In the list of examiners appeared a prince, an archbishop, three monseigneurs, the pope's physician, abbi, avvocati, all of high rank in literature and criticism. These severally gave her subjects, which, besides a readiness at versification in all the measures of Italian poetry, required science, reading, and knowledge of every kind.

In all these severe trials, she acquitted herself to the satisfaction and astonishment of all the personages, clergy, literati, and foreigners then resident at Rome. Among the latter was the brother of George III., the Duke of Gloucester. Near fifty sonnets, by different poets, with odes, canzoni, terze rime, attave, canzonette, &c. produced on the subject of the event, are inserted at the end of a beautiful volume containing a description of the order and ceremonials of this splendid, honorable, and enthusiastic homage paid to poetry, classical taste, talents, literature, and the fine arts.

3007. HANNAH MORE'S WEDDING DAY

The celibacy of this excellent lady, which gave her so much time to bend the powers of her mind to the interests of humanity, has been a subject of surprise. A writer in a recent Scottish periodical relates as authentic the following circumstance:—

"She was early engaged to be married to a gentleman of family and fortune. The wedding day was fixed. The bride and her party moved off gayly to the church, where the ceremony was to be performed, and the groom was to make his appearance. The lady was first upon the ground; her lover was not there. 'The laggard comes late,' thought the attendants. They miscalculated: he never came at all. A horseman rode up to the church door, and handed Miss More a letter, written by the faithless swain, declaring, with many apologies, he could not 'take the responsibility' of making her his bride. At the same time he offered her any pecuniary remuneration in his power.

"Whether the lady fainted, or only pouted, is not mentioned; but the male relatives followed the business up with such promptness and spirit, that the 'dastard in love' made a settlement upon the slighted lady of four hundred pounds sterling a year, for life."

§ 289. WORDS AND PHRASES.

3008. AMENDE HONORABLE.

A MENDE HONORABLE originated in France in the 9th century. It was at first an infamous punishment, inflicted on traitors and sacrilegious persons. The offender was delivered into the hands of the hangman; his shirt was stripped off, a rope put about his neck, and a taper in his hand; he was then led into court, and was obliged to pray pardon of God, the king, and the country. Death or banishment sometimes followed. Amende honorable is now a term used for making recantation in open court, or in the presence of the injured party.

3009. HOBSON'S CHOICE.

The expression Hobson's choice is proverbial both in Europe and America. The story of its origin is as follows:—

Thomas Hobson was a celebrated carrier at Cambridge, England, who, to his employment in that capacity, added the profession of supplying the students with horses. In doing this, he made it an unalterable rule that every horse should have an equal portion of time in which to rest, as well as labor; and he always refused to let a horse out of his turn. Hence the saying, "Hobson's choice; this or none."

3010. BOOK, ALMANAC, AND OTHER WORDS.

The word book we do not owe to the Romans, but to our Saxon or Danish ancestors. Long, long before these wondrous days of ours, when a bundle of rags introduced at one end of a machine issues from the other in the shape of snow-white paper, our worthy Teutonic forefathers were content to write their letters, calendars, and accounts upon wood. Being close-grained, and besides plentiful in the north, the oak, or beech, was the tree generally employed for this purpose; and hence came our word book. From the same fashion of writing on timber arose the pretty delicate word billet-doux.

The same people—the Saxons or Germans—are said by some etymologists to have originated the term almanac. The ancients paid much attention to the moon, and used to engrave or cut upon square sticks, about a foot in breadth, the courses of that luminary for each year. The tables thus marked with the moon's periods, got the name of Al-mon-acht. In the Saxon dialect Al mon-heed, which means the heeding or observation of all the moons.

The names that designate the various orders of tradesmen are in some cases very curiously derived.

Tinkers, for example, or tinklers, as the Scotch call them, were originally so called because the itinerant members of that profession used to give notice of their approach to villages and farmhouses by making a tinkling noise on an old brass kettle.

Milliner is a word corrupted, or at least altered from Milaner, which signified a person from Milan, in Italy. Certain fashions of female dress, that first prevailed in that city, were introduced, by natives of it, into England, and hence arose the word milliner.

The term cordwainer was once applied to a numerous and flourishing fraternity, but is now falling into desuetude. A cordwainer was maker of a peculiar kind of shoes, much worn formerly; and the appellation is a corruption from cordovaner, a worker of leather brought from the city of Cordova, in Spain. The same kind of leather is now manufactured in abundance in this country from horsehides, and is still familiarly called Cordovan.

The word attorney is in like manner a relic of ancient customs. It seems to have primarily signified one who appeared at the tourney and did battle in the place of another. Those tourneys, or minor tournaments, often consisted of single combats to support or rebut charges, civil or criminal, and where a lady, or a minor, or a very aged person, was a party in the business, some capable individual usually came forward as a substitute.

The word landlord was first applied to the keeper of an inn. Formerly, wayfaring guests were for the most part entertained by the proprietors of the land, the lords of the manor through which they journeyed.

3011. ORIGIN OF THE WORD "QUIZ."

When Richard Daly was patentee of the Irish Theatre, he spent the evening of a Saturday in company with many of the wits and men of fashion of the day; gambling was introduced, when the manager staked a large sum that he would have spoken all through the principal streets of Dublin, by a certain hour next day, Sunday, a word having no meaning, and being derived from no known language; wagers were laid and stakes deposited.

Daly repaired to the theatre, and despatched all the servants and supernumeraries with the word "Quiz," which they chalked on every door and every shop window in town.

Shops being shut all next day, every body going to and coming from their different places of worship saw the word, and every body repeated it, so that "Quiz," was heard all through Dublin: the circumstance of so strange a word being on every door and window caused much surprise; and ever since, should a strange story be attempted to be passed current, it draws forth the expression, You are quizzing me.

3012. STRIKING A BARGAIN.

Aubrey, in his manuscript collections, relates that in several parts of England, when two persons are driving a bargain, one holds out his right hand, and says, "Strike me;" and if the other strike, the bargain holds, whence the "striking bargain." The practice is retained in the mode of saying "Done," to a wager offered, at the same time striking the hand of the wagerer.

3013. WINDFALL.

The origin of this term is said to be the following: Some of the nobility of England, by the tenure of their estates, were forbidden felling any of the trees in the forests upon them, the timber being reserved for the use of the royal navy. Such trees as fell without cutting were the property of the occupant. A tornado was, therefore, a perfect godsend, in every sense of the term, to those who had occupancy of extensive forests; and the windfall was sometimes of very great value.

3014. ROBBING PETER TO PAY PAUL.

In the time of Edward VI., much of the lands of St. Peter at Westminster were seized by his majesty's ministers and courtiers; but in order to reconcile the people to that robbery, they allowed a portion of the lands to be appropriated towards the repairs of St. Paul's Church; hence the phrase "robbing Peter to pay Paul."

3015. CUT A DIDO.

It is told in history that Dido, a queen of Tyre, about eight hundred and seventy years before Christ, fled from that place upon the murder of her husband, and with a colony settled upon the northern coast of Africa, where she built Carthage. Being in want of land, she bargained with the natives for as much as she could surround with a bull's hide. Having made the agreement, she cut a bull's hide into fine strings, and, tying them together, claimed as much land as she could surround with the long line she had thus made. The natives allowed the cunning queen to have her way; but when any body played off a sharp trick, they said he had "cut a Dido," and the phrase has come down to our day.

3016. HE'S CAUGHT A TARTAR.

In some battle between the Russians and the Tartars, who are a wild sort of people in the north of Asia, a private soldier called out, "Captain, halloo there! I've caught a Tartar!" "Fetch him along, then!" said the captain. "Ay, but he won't let me," said the man; and the fact was, the Tartar had caught him. So when a man thinks to take another in, and gets bit himself, they say, "He's caught a Tartar."

3017. CARRYING THE WAR INTO AFRICA.

In one of the famous wars between Carthage and Rome, about two thousand five hundred years ago,

Hannibal, a Carthaginian leader, led his army into Italy, and for several years continued to threaten the city, and lay waste the surrounding country. Scipio, a Roman general, saw the necessity of getting rid of Hannibal and his forces; so he determined to lead an army into Africa, and threaten Carthage, and thus make it necessary for Hannibal to return home for its defence. This scheme had its intended effect; and in all time, this retaliating upon an enemy, by adopting his own tactics, is called "carrying the war into Africa."

3018. HUSBAND.

The English term "husband" is derived from the Anglo-Saxon words hus and bond, which signify "the bond of the house;" and it was anciently spelt house-bond, and continued to be thus spelt in some editions of the English Bible after the introduction of the art of printing. A husband, then, is a house-bond — the bond of a house — that which engirdles the family into the union of strength and the oneness of love. Wife and children, and "stranger within the gates" — all their interests and all their happiness — are encircled in the house-bond's embrace, the objects of his protection and of his special care. What a fine picture is this of a husband's duty, and a family's privilege!

3019. A DEED DONE HAS AN END.

When the families of the Amadei and the Uberti felt their honor wounded in the affront the younger Buondelmonte had put upon them, in breaking off his match with a young lady of their family, by marrying another, a council was held, and the death of the young cavalier was proposed as the sole atonement for their injured honor. But the consequences which they anticipated, and which afterwards proved so fatal to the Florentines, long suspended their decision. At length Mosca Lambertini, suddenly rising, exclaimed, in two proverbs, "that those who considered every thing would never conclude on any thing;" closing with an ancient proverbial saying, Cosa fatta capa ha! (a deed done has an end.) This proverb sealed the fatal determination, and was long held in mournful remembrance by the Tuscans; for, according to Villani, it was the cause and beginning of the accursed factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines. Dante has immortalized the energetic expression in a scene of the Inferno.

This Italian proverb was adopted by Milton; for, when deeply engaged in writing the Defence of the People, and warned that it might terminate in his blindness, he resolutely concluded his work, exclaiming, with great magnanimity, Cosa fatta capa ha! Did this proverb also influence his awful decision on that great national event, when the most honest-minded fluctuated between doubts and fears?

3020. BUNKUM.

A grave member of the lower house of Congress, from the venerable state of North Carolina, and from a district which included the county of Buncombe, (in which county he resided,) whose style of speaking produced a very common effect of driving the members from the hall, and all that, was one day addressing the house, when, as usual, the coughing and sneezing commenced, and the members began leaving. He paused a while, and assured the house that there need be no uneasiness on their part, and that for himself it mattered not how many left, for he was not speaking to the house, but to Bunkum. It is now understood to mean the constituent body, in congressional parlance.

3021. ANTIMONY.

Antimony is a word the etymology of which could never be guessed from the thing itself. It is, as every one knows, a certain kind of metal. Its name is derived from the French word antimoine, a monk-hater; or, to explain it properly, an against-a-monk. This remarkable appellation arose from the doings of a German abbot, by name Basil Valentine, who, as the tradition relates, having thrown some of the oxidized mineral to the hogs, observed that after it had purged them heartily, they immediately fattened. Therefore, says the story, he imagined his fellow-monks would grow the sleeker from a like dose. The experiment, however, succeeded so ill, that they all died of it; and the mineral was thenceforward called antimoine, antimonk, or antimony.

3022. BANKRUPT.

Few words have so remarkable a history as the familiar word bankrupt. The money-changers of Italy had, it is said, benches or stalls, in the bourse or exchange, in former times, and at these they conducted their ordinary business. When any of them fell back in the world, and became insolvent, his bench was broken, and the name of broken bench, or banco rotto, was given to him. When the word was adopted into English, it was nearer the Italian than it now is, being "bankerout," instead of bankrupt.

3023. GOING SNACKS.

During the plague in London, a noted body-searcher lived, whose name was Snacks. His business increased so fast, that finding he could not compass it, he offered to any person who should join him in the hardened practice half the profits; thus those who joined him were said to go with Snacks. Hence, going snacks is dividing the spoil.

3024. ACADEMY.

The word academy is derived from a strange source. A private and obscure person in Athens, called Academus, was possessed of a house which at his death became a school, and in its gardens the illustrious Plato filled the ears of his pupils with wise and eloquent discourse. "See there," says Milton, —

"See there the olive grove of Academe, Plato's retirement."

The house of "Academe" being the school of so famous a teacher, other teachers also, though no Platos, would have their petty seminaries called "Groves of Academe," until by degrees the word came to be applied in this sense universally, and its derivation from the name of honest Mr. Academus, citizen of Athens, was entirely forgotten.

3025. GASCONADE.

The Gascons were notorious for being the greatest braggarts in Europe — hence the word gasconade. The following is one of the stories told of them: —

A Gascon officer, hearing some one celebrating the exploits of a prince, who, in two assaults upon a town had killed six men with his own hands, "Bah," said he, "I would have you to know that the very mattresses I sleep upon are stuffed with nothing else but the whiskers of those whom I have sent to slumber in the other world."

3026. HONEY-MOON.

It was the custom of the higher orders of Teutones, an ancient people who inhabited the northern parts of Germany, to drink mead or metheglin, a beverage made with honey, for thirty days after every wedding. From this custom comes the expression "to spend the honey-moon."

3027. BOZ.

A fellow-passenger with Mr. Dickens, in the Britannia steamship, across the Atlantic, inquired of the author the origin of his signature, "Boz." Mr. Dickens replied that he had a little brother who resembled so much the Moses in the Vicar of Wakefield, that he used to call him Moses, also; but a younger girl, who could not then articulate plainly, was in the habit of calling him Bozie, or Boz. This simple circumstance made him assume that name in the first article he risked to the public, and, therefore, he continued the name, as the first effort was approved of.

3028. JARGON.

Jargon is derived, by corruption, from the Italian chierico, a clergyman; for, when the common people heard the Latin tongue used in the liturgies and prayers of the church, they called that, and any other language which they did not understand, chiericon, q. d. clergyman's language: chiericon soon slid into jargon, in the same manner that chirurgieon has softened itself into surgeon.

3029. ORIGIN OF THE WORD "TEXAS."

It has exceedingly puzzled many persons to determine the real meaning of the word Texas. It originated in a couplet used by the earlier emigrants to that "land of promise": —

"When every other land rejects us,
This is the soil that freely takes us."

The word Texas is a corruption of the phrase used in the last line.

3030. ORIGIN OF THE WORD "TEETOTAL."

The word teetotal originated with a Lancashire working man, who, being unused to public speaking, and wishing to pronounce the word "total" in connection with "abstinence from intoxicating liquors," hesitated, and pronounced the first letter by itself, and the word after it, making altogether t-total. This fact it is well to be acquainted with, because it sufficiently refutes the vulgar notion that tea has reference to tea.

3031. BY HOOK OR BY CROOK.

The destruction caused by the fire in London, A. D. 1666, during which some thirteen thousand two hundred houses, &c., were burnt down, in very many cases obliterated all the boundary marks requisite to determine the extent of land, and even the very sites occupied by buildings previous to this terrible visitation. When the rubbish was removed and the land cleared, the disputes and entangled claims of those whose houses had been destroyed, both as to the position and extent of their property, promised not only interminable occupation of the courts of law, but made the far more serious evil of delaying the rebuilding of the city, until these disputes were settled, inevitable. Impelled by the necessity of coming to a more speedy settlement of their respective claims than could be hoped for from legal process, it was determined that the claims and interest of all persons concerned should be referred to the judgment and decision of two of the most experienced land surveyors of that day, — men who had been thoroughly acquainted with London previously to the fire, — and in order to escape from the numerous and vast evils which more delay must occasion, that the decision of these two arbitrators should be final and binding. The surveyors appointed to determine the rights of the various claimants were Mr. Hook and Mr. Crook, who, by the justice of their decisions, gave general satisfaction to the interested parties, and by their speedy determination of the different claims, permitted the rebuilding of the city to proceed without the least delay. Hence arose the saying above quoted, usually applied to the extrication of persons or things from a difficulty. The above anecdote is of English origin, indorsed to us by an old citizen, by no means of an imaginative temperament.

3032. ORIGIN OF THE WORD "SCHOONER."

Mr. Andrew Robinson, of Gloucester, September 8, 1790, constructed a vessel, which he masted and rigged in the same manner as schooners are at this day. On her going off the stocks and passing into the water, a bystander cried out, "O, how she scoons!"

Robinson instantly replied, "A schooner let her be."

From this time vessels thus masted and rigged have gone by the name of schooners.

"This account was confirmed to me," says Cotton Tufts, "by a great number of persons in Gloucester. I made particular inquiry of an aged sea captain, who informed me, that he had not, in any of his voyages to Europe or in America, seen any of these vessels prior to Robinson's construction."

3033. MIND YOUR P'S AND Q'S.

The origin of the phrase "Mind your P's and Q's," is said to have been a call of attention, in the old English alehouses, to the pints and quarts being scored down to the unconscious or reckless beer bibber.

3034. ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

Although no phrase is in more common use, yet few are acquainted with its origin. The expression signifies the giving of an equivalent. Roland and Oliver were two knights famous in romance. The wonderful achievements of the one could only be equalled by those of the other. Hence the phrase "Roland for an Oliver."

3035. GONE TO POT.

A tailor of Samarcand, living near the gate leading to the burying-place, had by his shop board an earthen pot hanging on a nail, into which he threw a little stone when any corpse was carried by, and at the end of every morning he counted the contents of his pot, in order to ascertain the number of the deceased: At length the tailor died himself; and some time after, one that was unacquainted with his death, observing his shop to be deserted, inquired what had become of him, when one of the deceased's neighbors replied, "The fellow is gone to pot, as well as the rest."

3036. HIE! BETTY MARTIN.

Many of our most popular vulgarisms have their origin in some whimsical perversion of language or of fact. St. Martin is one of the worthies of the Romish calendar, and a form of prayer commences with the words, "O, mihi, beate Martine;" which was corrupted to "My eye and Betty Martin," and then still further to "Hie! Betty Martin."

3037. SANS-CULOTTES.

"Sansculottes, (French,) without breeches — ragged fellows." Words often differ materially, in their practical application, from the original meaning of the constituent parts of which they are compounded. This word was coined in the time of the French revolution, and applied by the royalists, in contempt, to those who rose against oppression in vindication of their rights; as the Americans had done before, and whose example they followed. The men whom this term was intended to stigmatize immediately adopted the title, and every friend of freedom was denominated a Sansculotte. Lafayette, Condorcet, Brissot, were Sansculottes. Nothing was more common in the addresses of the revolutionary party, than the following: "It is expected that every good Sansculotte will perform his duty to his country and the sacred cause of liberty." These calls were made to all friends of the revolution indiscriminately; and surely they were not all "ragged fellows."

Some days remaining were called Sans Culottides.

3038. THE SCHOOLMASTER ABROAD.

A modern writer, in a sketch of Lord Brougham, gives the origin of this popular phrase: —

"No orator of our times is more successful in embalming phrases, full of meaning, in the popular memory. The well-known talismanic sentiment, 'The schoolmaster is abroad,' is an instance. In a speech on the elevation of Wellington, a mere 'military chieftain,' to the premiership, after the death of Canning, Brougham said, "Field-marshal the Duke of Wellington may take the army—he may take the navy—he may take the great seal—he may take the mitre. I make him a present of them all. Let him come on with his whole force, sword in hand, against the constitution, and the English people will not only beat him back, but laugh at his assaults. In other times the country may have heard with dismay that 'the soldier was abroad.' It will not be so now. Let the soldier be abroad if he will; he can do nothing in this age. There is no other personage abroad—a personage less imposing—in the eyes of some, perhaps, insignificant. The schoolmaster is abroad; and I trust to him, armed with his primer, against the soldier in full military array."

CAUCUS.

On the 2d day of March, 1770, a quarrel took place at the premises of John Gray, a ropemaker, between a soldier and a man in the employ of Gray, and the former was severely beaten. He soon returned, accompanied by some of his comrades. An affray ensued between the soldiers and the ropemakers, in which the latter were overpowered.

The people became greatly exasperated, and opportunities were sought for retaliation; and on the fifth of the same month, in a similar affray, the soldiers fired upon the people of the town, three of whom were killed, and five wounded.

The anniversary of this tragical event, usually called the "Boston massacre," was kept up for a long time afterwards with great solemnity. These occurrences induced the ropemakers and calkers, whose occupations brought them in contact, to form a society, which, doubtless, was joined by those of other trades.

At the meeting of this society, patriotic and inflammatory addresses were delivered, and the most violent resolutions passed against the British government and its agents in America. The Tories, in derision, denominated these assemblies of the members of this society calker meetings; and the word in time became corrupted to caucus, which is the term still used in Boston to denote a general meeting of a party.

This fact, although not generally known, has been handed down in oral tradition by many inhabitants of Boston, as we are assured by the late John Ferguson, formerly surveyor of the port of New York, who obtained the information of the Rev. Dr. Freeman, the first Unitarian clergyman of the town of Boston.

3040. ORIGIN OF "UNCLE SAM."

Immediately after the declaration of the last war with England, Elbert Anderson, of New York, then a contractor, visited Troy, on the Hudson, where was concentrated, and where he purchased, a large quantity of provisions—beef, pork, &c.

The inspectors of these articles at that place were Messrs. Ebenezer and Samuel Wilson. The latter gentleman—invariably known as "Uncle Sam"—generally superintended in person a large number of workmen, who, on this occasion, were employed in overhauling the provisions purchased by the contractor for the army. The casks were marked E. A., U. S.

This work fell to the lot of a facetious fellow in the employ of the Messrs. Wilson, who, on being asked by some of his fellow-workmen the meaning of the mark, (for the letters U. S., for United States, were almost then entirely new to them,) said, "he did not know, unless it meant Elbert Anderson and Uncle Sam," alluding exclusively then to the said "Uncle Sam" Wilson. The joke took among the workmen, and passed currently; and "Uncle Sam" himself, being present, was occasionally rallied by them on the increasing extent of his possessions.

Many of these workmen, being of a character denominated "food for powder," were found shortly after following the recruiting drum, and pushing towards the frontier lines, for the double purpose of meeting the enemy, and of eating the provisions they had lately labored to put in good order. Their old jokes, of course, accompanied them, and before the first campaign ended, this identical one first appeared in print. It gained favor rapidly, till it penetrated and was recognized in every part of our country, and will, no doubt, continue to be, while the United States remain a nation. It originated precisely as above stated; and the writer of this article distinctly recollects remarking, at a time when it first appeared in print, to a person who was equally aware of its origin, how odd it would be should this silly joke, originating in the midst of beef, pork, pickle, mud, salt, and hoop-poles, eventually become a national cognomen.
